All the wordes, workes, and whole demeanour of his seruaunts tended to some good conclusion. Nothing moued to stryre stryfe or sedition, but al things ordered in suche frendly and peaceable sorte, that the chayne of brotherly loue seemed to haue linked them all in one minde and will.

King Dauids example, a rule of godly liuing.

Such a rule was theyr maister king Dauid vnto them and all other, to direct and frame a perfect and godly life after.

Malcolme.

KIng Dauid being dead and buried (as before is mencioned,) Malcolme nephew to him by his sonne Henry, succeeded in ỹ astate.

He was but .xiij. yeares of age, when he began his reygne, but yet his modestie and vertuous conditions were suche, that all men conceyued a good hope, that he would proue a right noble and worthie prince.

The educatiō of king Malcolme.

He was nourished and brought vp in suche vertue, euen from his infancie, that deliting in chaste conuersation and cleannesse of body and minde, he liued single all the dayes of his life, and without mariage, wherefore he was surnamed Malcolme the Mayden.

About the time of his entring into the possession of the crowne, there was a greate dearth through all the boundes of Scotlande.

A dearth.

And sone after followed a sore death bothe amongst men & beastes, though it was not perceyued that the disease whereof they died was any thing contagious.

A death not contagious.

Hereof did one Somerleid the Thane of Argile take occasion to attempt an higher enterprise, than stode with the baseneste of his lynage and estate: for considering that the one halfe of the realme was consumed by mortalitie, and the other halfe neare hande famished through lacke of fode, hee thought it an easie mater for him, now whilest the king was vnder yeares of ripe discretion, to vsurpe the gouernance of the realme into his owne handes, and so assembling togither an huge companie of such as in hope of pray lightly consented to his opinion, hee came forward to make as it were a full conquest, sleaing and spoyling all such in his way as went aboute to resist him.

Somerleid Thane of Argile, goeth aboute to make himselfe king.

But his presumptuous enterprice was shortly repressed: For Gylcrist Earle of Angus lieutenaunt of the kings army, reysed to resist Somerleides attempts, encountred with him in batayle and slew .ij. M. of his menne. Somerleid hauing receyued this ouerthrowe, and escaping from the fielde, fledde into Ireland, and so saued his lyfe.

Gilcrist fought with an army against Somerleid.

Henry the second of that name king of Englande, hearing that Malcolme had thus subdued his domestical enimies, dread least he being enboldened therwith, should now attempt somewhat against the Englishmen, and therefore by counsell of his Nobles, he sent an Herald vnto king Malcolme, commaunding him to come vnto London, there to do his homage vnto him, for the landes of Cumberland, Northumberlād, and Huntington, in maner and forme as his graundfather king Dauid had before done vnto his predecessour Henry the first, with certificate, that if he fayled he would take from him all the sayde landes.

K. Malcolme summoned to do homage.

King Malcolme obeyed this cōmaundement of king Henry, but yet vnder condition, (as the Scottish writers affirme) that it shoulde in no maner wise preiudice the fraunchesses and liberties of the Scottish kingdome.

The same time king Henry had warres against Lewes the .vj. king of Fraunce, and so passing ouer into that realme, constreyned king Malcolme to go with him in that iourney against his will, notwithstanding that hee had a safeconduite freely to come and goe.

King Malcome goeth with king Henry into Fraunce.

In this voyage king Henry did much hurte to the

to the Frenchmen, and at length beſieged the citie of Tholous.

In all whiche enterpryſes he had Malcolme preſent with him, to the ende that Malcolme might encurre ſuch hatred and diſpleaſure of the Frenchmen, that thereby the band betwixt them and the Scottes might finally be diſſolued: but in the end king Henry hauing loſte diuers of his noble men by ſickeneſſe, hee returned into England, and then licenced king Malcolme to returne home into Scotland. Who at his cõming home ſent the Biſhop of Murray, and one of his Secretaries vnto the ſea of Rome, as ambaſſadours vnto the Pope, whiche as then hight Eugenius the thirde of that name, to recogniſe the obedience which he ought to the Romaine ſea.

Shortly after alſo, there was a parliament holden at Scone, where king Malcolme was ſore rebuked by his Lordes, in that he had borne through his owne foly, armure agaynſt the Frenchmen their olde conſederate frendes and auncient alies: but king Malcolme excuſed the mater with humble wordes, ſaying he came vnwarely into king Henries handes, and therefore might not chooſe but accompliſhe his will and pleaſure at that time, ſo that he ſuppoſed verily how ẏ Frẽch king would take no great diſpleaſure with his doings, whan he once vnderſtode the trouth of the mater.

King Henry hauing perfect vnderſtanding of this grudge betwixt the Scottiſh Lordes and their king, thought to renew the ſame with more diſpleaſure, and therevpon ſent for king Malcolme to come vnto Yorke to a parliamẽt which he held there, where at his comming, he was burdened by a right greeuous complaynt furmiſed againſt him by king Henry, for that he ſhoulde reuele vnto the Frenchmen, all the ſecretes of the Engliſhe army, when hee was with him in Fraunce, at the aboue remembred iourney, allegyng the ſame to be ſufficient mater, for the which he ought to forfeyt all the landes, whiche he helde of the crowne of England, as Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington.

And though king Malcolme by many ſubſtanciall reaſons declared, thoſe allegations to be vntrue and vniuſtly forged, yet by king Henries earneſt enforcing of the mater, ſentence was giuen againſt him, by the generall aſſent of all the eſtates there in that parliament aſſembled. And moreouer to bring king Malcolme in further diſpleaſure with his nobles, king Henry gaue notice vnto them before king Malcome returned backe into his countrey, how he had of his owne accorde renounced all his clayme, right title, and intereſt, whiche hee had to the forſayde landes, ſuppoſing by this meanes to make king Malcolme far more odious to all his lieges and ſubiectes, than euer he was before.

Malcolme therfore, vpon his returne into his countrey, not vnderſtanding any thing of that ſubtile contriued policie and ſlaunderous report, was beſieged within the caſtell of Bertha by the Thane of Ernedale and diuers others.

But after it was knowen howe euill king Malcolme had bene bled, & moſt vntruly ſlaundered, they deſired pardon of theyr offence, as induced therto by vntrue reports, which once being graunted, they brake vp theyr ſiege, and euer after continued in faithfull allegiaunce like true & moſt obedient ſubiects.

But king Malcome ſore moued for that he was thus iniuriouſly handled by king Henry, firſte deſiring reſtitution to be made of all ſuche things as had bene wrongfully taken from him, and ſo deteyned by the Engliſhmen, proclaymed open warres agaynſt them.

At length after ſundry harmes done aſwell on the one parte as the other, they came to a cõmunication in a certaine appointed place, not far from Carleil, where to be briefe, it was finally concluded, that king Malcolme ſhoulde receyue againe Cumberland and Huntington: but for Northumberland he ſhoulde make a playne releaſe thereof vnto king Henry, and to his ſucceſſours for euer.

King Henry ſayleth into Normandie.

About the ſame ſeaſon king Hēry paſſed ouer into Normandy with an army, and cauſed king Willyam, with many other nobles of Scotland to goe with him in that iourney, for king Willyam would not diſobey his commandement at that preſent, in hope to attayne in quiet & peaceable maner his ſuite touchyng the reſtitution of Northumberland, (as the Scottiſh writers doe affirme) but in the ende after he had continued a long tyme with king Henry, and perceyued no comfort to recouer his lands, he got licence with muche adoe to returne home: & ſo cōmyng backe into Englād, paſſed through the realme with his nobles into Scotland, wher he applied his whole endeuour to vnderſtande the ſtate of the cōmon wealth of his ſubiectes, and ſpecially he took order in moſte diligente wyſe, to puniſhe cruelties done by theeues and robbers, which vndoubtedly was one of the moſt profitable acts that he could deuiſe to accompliſhe at that preſent, conſidering the ſtate of his realme, as it then ſtode.

For if the domages and ſkathes cōmitted by theeues and robbers were equally pondered with the hurtes and hinderances whiche dayly growe by open warre againſt any forein nation, it may well appeare, that more harme ariſeth, and more heynous cruelties are exerciſed agaynſt the poore and miſerable commons and innocent people, by ſuch as liue by reife and ſpoyling at home, than by any outward enimies, be they neuer ſo fearce and ſtrong in the field.

Complaint of theſe iniuries beyng brought vnto the wardeyn of the Scottiſhe boꝛdure, by ſuch Scottes as had loſte ſuche goodes as were taken away by the Engliſhmen, he ſente to demaunde reſtitution, but foꝛ ſo muche as he could haue no towardly aunſwere, he got together a great number of men, the which entring into the Engliſhe grounde, did muche hurt on eche ſide where they came.

At the ſame time was king Henry in France, and therefoꝛe the Engliſhmen thoughte it ſufficient to defend themſelues as wel as they might withoute attemptyng anye notable enterpꝛiſe in reuenge of theſe diſpleaſures doone by the Scottes.

Haruell was alſo at hande, and therevppon they ceaſſed on eyther parte from further inuaſions, tyll the wynter ſeaſon, whyche paſſed alſo without any exployte atchieued woꝛthy to be remembꝛed, ſauing certaine ſmall roades made by the Scottes into the Engliſhe boꝛdures, as they ſawe occaſion to ſerue thereto.

But in the ſommer nexte followyng, kyng Willyam reyſed a myghtie armie, and came with the ſame into Cumberland, the right wing of the whyche armye was ledde by Eilcriſte, whoſe appꝛoued valiauncie often ſhewed in the tyme of king Malcolme, had aduaunced hym to mary with the kings ſiſter.

The lefte wyng was aſſigned vnto the conduſte of one Rowlande the kings couſin, who was alſo lieutenant of the hoꝛſemen.

The middle warde oꝛ battaile, the king hymſelfe ledde.

The Engliſhmen to the intente they might haue tyme and leyſure to aſſemble their power, ſente vnto kyng Willyam, offering vnto him, not only large ſummes of money, if he woulde returne back with his armie without further inuaſion, but alſo redꝛeſſe of all manner of iniuries and wꝛongs if any ſuche on theyꝛ behalfe were to bee pꝛoued: but king Willyam foꝛ anſwere herevnto declared, that hee had not begun the warre foꝛ any deſire he had to money, neyther had he eyꝛſt giuen the occaſion, as one that was euer willing to lyue vpon his owne, ſo that if they could be contented to reſtoꝛe Noꝛthumberlande being his rightfull heritage, he was not ſo deſyꝛous of bloud, but that he would gladly ceaſſe from all further attempts.

The Engliſhmen hauing receyued this aunſwere, to the ende they myght pꝛotract the tyme in ſendyng ſtyll to and fꝛo, tyll they myghte eſpye ſome occaſyon to woꝛke ſuche feate as they had imagined, addꝛeſſed foꝛth other ambaſſadours vnto king William, wyth dyuers fayꝛe offers and golden pꝛomiſes.

In the meane tyme, to take the Scottiſhe men at ſome aduãtage, they conuey their whole powꝛer in the nighte ſeaſon, neere vnto the place where the ſame Scottiſhemen laye in Campe, and deuiding them ſelues into two partes, the one was appoynted to abide in the fields, tyl the ſunne were vp, and then to ſhew themſelues to the enimies, to trayn them foꝛth to battail: The other company was layd cloſely in a valley not far off to take the aduauntage as they ſaw their tyme.

The Engliſhemen ſeeke by policie to vanquiſhe the Scottes.

In the moꝛning about the riſing of the ſunne, thoſe that were appoynted to pꝛocure the ſkirmiſhe, appꝛoched ſo neere to the enimies campe, tyl they came euen within ſyght of them.

The Scottes amazed with the ſtrangeneſſe of the thyng, foꝛ that they had not heard befoꝛe of any aſſemble of the Engliſhmen, at the firſte were ſomewhat afrayde: but anone encouragyng one another, they boldly iſſued foꝛth vpon theyꝛ enimies, who of purpoſe at the firſte made but weake reſiſtance, and at lengthe fledde a mayne, to the intente to cauſe the Scottiſhemen to bꝛeake their arraye of batayle in purſuing them, whyche they did ſo egrely, that they lefte their kyng but ſlenderly guarded with a ſmall companie aboute hym.

The king lefte but weakely garded.

Then the buſhment lying in the valey, bꝛake foꝛthe vppon hym, accoꝛding to the oꝛder beſoꝛe appoynted, and in the meane tyme, the other that fledde, caſte themſelues aboute, and manly abode their enimyes, ſo earneſtly laying it to their charge, that in fine they dꝛoue them backe, and conſtrayned them to flee in good earneſt, whyche they themſelues had but only couterfaited to do beſoꝛe.

King William perceyuing his people thus diſcomfited, and himſelfe encloſed on eche ſyde, amongeſt his enimies, after he had aſſayed to bꝛeake foꝛth on ſome ſyde from amongſt them when he ſawe his endeuour couldꝛ by no meanes pꝛeuayle, and that the enimyes made onely at him, he yelded himſelfe.

There was not muche bloud ſpilled on eyther ſyde at this bickering, foꝛ the one parte in the beginning of the fꝛaye (as ye haue hearde) fleing of ſette purpoſe vnto the place where theyꝛ ambuſhe laye, eſcaped without much hurt, and the other ſtaied by the bꝛeaking foꝛth of the ambuſhe aboade the bꝛunt but a ſmall whyle, returning immediatly towards the king, and then perceyuing they couldꝛ doe no good, they made the beſt ſhift they couldꝛ eche man foꝛ himſelfe to eſcape the enimies handes.

Discorde of writers.

Other writers report the maner of his taking not altogether agreeable with that whiche wee haue here aboue remembred, who declare how king William after he had wasted all Cumberlande, came into Northumberlande, not ceassyng tyll he came to Anwyke, where he stayed for a tyme to haue had battayle, but in the meane whyle the Englishmen laye close togither withoute noyse or apperance, in suche wise that no Scottishmã could haue understanding where they were.

At lengthy king William awearied with long tarying thus at Anwike, and seeing no enimies to appeare, determined to worke some exployte yet before his returne, and therupon sent forth the most parte of all his armie abroade into the countrey, to forrey the same, keeping no greate companie about hym, tyll the returne of the other thus sente forth.

Wherupon incontinently a great ambushement of Englishmen came upon him with counterfayted Scottishe ensignes, and were not once suspected for Englishmen, til the king was compassed in by them on eche syde, & so finally taken & led away ere any Scottishmã wist therof, saue a few which were left (as is sayd) wyth hym for ẏ time. Wilhelmus Paruus.

Capitaines of the English men.

The same authour writeth, that after the taking of the king, there rose a mutinie amongest the Scottes: for where as the Irishe Scottes bare a naturall grudge agaynste the Englishe Scottes, yet whylest the king was presente amongst them, they durste not vtter their malicious intentions: but nowe that he was thus take from them, so many of the English Scots as fell into the handes of the Irishe payd derely for the bargayne, beeyng cruelly murthered and slayne: so that the residue were constrayned to get them out of the waye into castelles and townes where they myght be receyued.

W. Paruus.

But nowe it is to be considered, that bicause there was no great slaughter made at the taking of king William, the warres notwithstanding continued betwixt England and Scotland: for the two before specified chieftains Gilcrist and Rouland stoutly withstood the Englishmen, & bet them backe as they enterprised to enter into Cumberland. At length a peace was taken during the time that king William remayned in captiuitie vnder these cõditions that Northumberland shoulde continue vnder the dominion of the Englishemen, and Cumberlande with the Erledome of Huntington to remayne as afore vnder the gouernance of the Scottishmen.

Northumberland vnder Englishmen.

Immediatly vpon the taking of king Williã thus at Anwyke, his brother Dauid Earle of Huntington, thorough licence of king Henrye, came into Scotlande to haue the gouernemente of the realm, til ẏ king his brother might be redemed. So sone therfore as he had once established the realme in good quiet and iustice, he sent Richard the bishop of S. Andrewes with diuers other noble men ouer into Normandy, to take order there with king Henry, for the raunsome of the king his brother: whiche was agreed in this maner. First it was accorded, that king Williã should become & acknowledge himselfe to be the king of Englands liege man against al men (for the realme of Scotland and his other lands) and for the same should do fealtie to the sayd king of England, as to his liege soueraigne lord, in lyke sort as other his liege people were accustomed to doe. And further he shoulde also do fealtie vnto the Lorde Henry, the king of Englands sonne, (sauing always the faith whiche he ought to the king his father.) And in like maner it was couenanted and agreed, that al the prelates of Scotland, and their successours, should recognise their wonted subiection to the churche of Englande, and doe fealtie to the king of England so many of them as he should appoint: And likewise the Erle and barons of Scotlande, and their heires for their parte, should do their homage and fealties vnto the sayd king of Englande, and to the lord Henry his sonne, so many as therunto shuld be required.

Moreouer the king of Scots should paye for his redemption one hundred thousande poundes sterling, the one halfe to be payd in hand: and for sure payment of the other halfe, the Erledomes of Cumberlande, Huntington, and Northumberlande should be deliuered vnto king Henry in pledge or mortgage, tyll the tyme that the sayde summe was payde. And for the more suretie of these couenentes, & that the Scots should moue no warre against the Englishmen, foure of the strongest castels within Scotlãd, that is to wit, Barwike, Edenburgh, Roxburgh, & Stirueling were deliuered into ẏ Englishmens hands. These things being thus ordred the. 8. day of Decẽber, 1175. ẏ king retorned home, ther folowed a newe sturre in Scotlande, for Gilbert of Galowaye, a right cruell & most mischeuous person, purposing to conquer ẏ rest wone by force, made great slaughter on all them that withstode his desire. And bicause his brother repressed his wrongs, he put out his eyes, and cut off his handes.

Againſt this Gilbert was Gilcriſt ſent with an armie by the king.

There was foughte a ſore battayle betwixte them, for the moſte parte of thoſe that followed Gilbertes commaundemente, were deſperate fellowes, ſuche commonly as for murder and other heynous crimes by them committed, were in daunger of the lawes, and therefore vpon hope of pardon deſired a chaunge: but in the end yet, Gilcriſt with multitude wanne the field of them, and ſlewe mo in the chaſe than in the batayle.

Gilberte himſelfe eſcaped and got ouer into the yle of Man, fled from thence into Ireland.

Wilhelmus Paruus reporteth this matter ſomewhat otherwyſe, as thus: In the armie of king William (ſaith he) when he was taken nere vnto Anwike, were two brethren, Gilberte and Hared, that were lordes of Galloway, hauing there with them a greate retinue of their countreymen.

Theſe were the ſonnes of Fergulius, ſometyme lorde of that Prouince, after whoſe deceaſe the kyng of Scottes that is ſuperiour lord therof, deuided the countrey betwixt theſe two brethren, but Gilbert the eldeſt brother found him ſelfe muche grieued to haue any parte of thoſe landes (whiche were his fathers) gyuen from him: but yet doubting puniſhment at the kings handes, he durſte not attempt any thing againſt hys brother till it fortuned the king to be taken. And then deliuered of the feare which had ſtayed his miſchieuous purpoſe, he taketh his brother at vnwares, and cruellye murthered hym after no common manner, but rather martyred hym in beaſtly wyſe, ſo to ſatiſfie the inſtincte of his diuell ſhe nature. And immediatlye after inuading the vpper countreyes, he exerciſeth greate ſlaughter of men on eche hande. But his brother had a ſonne called Rowlande, whiche proouing a valiant yong Gentleman, boldly reſiſted his vncles rage, with the aſſiſtance and ayde of his fathers friendes.

And thus was Scotlande brought into trouble (as Wilhelmus Paruus recordeth) til by the forelayd Gilcriſt the murderer was expulſed, as before is expreſſed.

In the yeare following, came Hugo Cardinall of Saincte Angelo as Legate from the Pope into England, with authoritie to reforme the Engliſhe Churches, in ſuche cafes as were thoughte requiſite: And after hee had made an ende there, to doe the like in Scotlande.

When he had therfore finiſhed with Englande, hee cited all the biſhoppes of Scotlande to appeare before hym at a day prefixed at Northaunton.

The biſhops of Scotlande ſummoned to a conuocation at Northampton.

They came according to his apointment, and being aſſembled there in conſiſtorie, he wente about in moſt craftie wiſe to perſuade them to receiue the Archbiſhop of Yorke for their metropolitane: but one Gilbert a yong man, howbeit ſingularly well learned, and for his holyneſſe of lyfe much commended (as Hector Boetius writeth) being ſent of purpoſe by king William vnto this Conuocation, to foreſee that nothing were concluded in the ſame, preiudiciall to the auncient liberties and franncheſes of the realme of Scotlande, did argue ſo ſtiffly to the contrary, that the Cardinal left off the purſute of ſuch maner of matter, and brake vp that councel without determination of any thing to the purpoſe in that behalfe.

Gilbert a learned man defended the liberties of Scotland.

The chiefest cause that moued the Scottishe Clergie to withdrawe their obedience from the primacie of Yorke, was the dissention and continuall eminitie betwixt the two nations for superioritie in temporall causes.

The same yeare ỳ this counsel was holden at Northampto, sundry vnketh wonders wer seene in Albion. On Midsommer day being the feast day of the Nativitie of Sainte John the Baptist, there fell suche a storme of haile, that it killed manie sheepe and smal cattel: people that wer out of houses, and from vnder couert any where abroade, were beaten to the earth with violence of that storme.

By this mariage and aliance, the peace was newly confirmed betwixte England and Scotlande in suche wyse, that neyther part might receyue any rebelles to the other, by meanes wherof Gilcrist, that before was fled into England, was constreyned to returne into Scotland, disguysed in poore weede, with two of his sonnes, & there passed forth his lyfe a long tyme in great mysterie amongst the woodes and in out places, vnknowne to any man what he was, by reason of his poore and simple habite.

Somewhat before the aboue remembred marriage, Henry king of Englande at the motion of Hugh bishoppe of Durham rendred vp the Castell of Edenburghe into kyng William his handes.

About this tyme the Souldane named Saladine prospered hugely against the Christians in the holy lande, making suche cruell slaughter of them, that to heare thereof, all christian heartes were moued to pitifull commiseration and dolorous teares, in so muche that Henrye kyng of Englande vowed to goe thyther wyth an armie to relieue the common necessitie of the christian publique weale, and hadde gone in deede, if hee had not bene hyndered by the conspiracie of his sonne, whome lately before he had caused to bee crowned kyng, that wente aboute to vsurpe the sole administration to hymselfe nowe in his fathers lyfe tyme.

Aboute the same tyme king William wente with an armie into Ros, agaynste Makulzen and Makbein, two Capitaynes of the western Iles, whiche vsed vppon occasion to passe ouer into Ros, Cathnes and Murrayland, spoyling and wasting those countreyes, and when they hearde of any power comming agaynste them, they would streyghte returne to their shippes, and repasse againe to the Iles.

But at this tyme, the king had sente forth a Navie to bryng all those vessells, wherein

The king in his returne from this iourneye, came by the abbey of Abirbzothok, to viewe the wozke of that houſe, how it went fozward, commanding them that wer ouerſeers & maſters of ỹ wozks to ſpare foz no coſtes, but to bzing it vp to perfection, and that with moſt magnificence.

After his departure frō thēce, he toke the way toward Bertha, & by aduēture eſpied where Gilcriſt was deluing vp turfes togither with his .iij. ſons, & though he knew not what they were, yet he muſed to ſee two ſuch goodly yong men, as by reſemblance they appeared to be, to be thus occupied in ſuche toyling and baſe labour.

Incontinētly herewith Gilcriſt with his bald head came afoze hym, and falling downe on his knees at the kings feete, ſayde: If there be anye mercie in thee (moſt ruthful prince foz them that are brought thzough their offentes into extreme miſerie, hauing ſuffred condigne puniſhment foz the ſame: I beſeeche thee foz the loue that Chriſt had to all ſinfull people, not ſparing to ſhead his moſt precious bloud foz their redemptiō, to haue ſome pitie and compaſſion on me, and theſe my poze and miſerable ſonnes, which with me haue ſuffred muche griefe and penurie, not hauing deſerued the ſame by any crime by them cōmitted.

At the laſt, when king William had enquired of him what he was, and how it chaunced he fell into ſuch kind of miſerie, the teares came ſo faſte trickling downe frō his eyes, that of a long ſpace he was not able to declare his owne name.

At length being come to himſelf, he ſaid, I am Gilcriſt (noble prince) ỹ moſt ſozowfull creature on earth, which (alas) put my hands in thy bloud and was therfoze diſinherited of all my lands, and baniſhed with theſe my two ſons out of thy realme, wherupon we remained in England foz a time, till thzough proclamation made againſt outlawes, I was conſtrained to come hyther againe with my ſaid ſonnes, where we haue liued by rootes all the ſommer ſeaſon, and nowe in the winter are glad to get our liuing with trauayle of hand thus in digging & deluing of clods: therfoze if any ruthe oz pitie haue place in thy hearte, oz that thy indignation be qualifyed, haue mercy on our ſozowful eſtate, & remit the offence, wherby thou mayſt not only purchaſe greate honour and fame by example of pitie, beeing highly renoumed foz that vertue amongſt al nations, but alſo winne great merite afoze God, foz ſhewing thy ſelfe the folower of Chriſte, the giuer of all mercie, grace, and peace.

The king moued by theſe wozdes, and remēbzing the good ſeruice whiche Gilcriſte had employde ſo often tymes afoze in defence of the realme, and agayn pitying his caſe to conſyder from what degree of honour he was fallen into the deepeſt bottome of extreme miſerie, hee toke him wholly to his fauour, and not only fozgaue him his fozmer offences, but alſo reſtozed vnto him, and to his ſonnes, al ſuche landes as ſometymes appertained vnto them, except ſo muche as the king had alreadie giuen vnto the Abbey of Abirbzothok.

The king taketh Gilcriſt to his fauoure, and reſtoreth vnto him his landes.

Gilcriſt euer after perſeuered in due obedience to his prince, and foz ſo much as his eldeſt ſonne deceaſſed befoze him without heires, and that his yonger ſonne by reaſon of ſome impediments, which he had, was vnmete foz mariage, he gaue the moſt part of his lands after his owne deceaſſe vnto the ſayd houſe of Abirbzothok.

Though kyng Willyam was earneſtly occupied in the aduaunceing fozwarde of the buylding of Abirbzothok, yet did he not fozget hys duetie in the adminiſtration of his lawes, but diligently cauſed iuſtice to be executed, to the puniſhing of the wicked, & the rewarding of them that well deſerued.

He made alſo ſundzy newe lawes foz the reſtraining of theeues and oppzeſſours of the people, ſo rigozous, that they myght bee in feare to heare him named.

Furthermoze, where as the Church of Scotlande was ſubiecte to the church of Yozke, he obtained of Pope Clement the third of that name letters of exemption foz his Clergie, wherby the Churche of Scotlande (within the which were conteyned the Biſhoppes ſeas of Saincte Andzos, Glaſgo, Dunkelde, Dublayne, Bzeghne, Abirden, Murray, Ros, and Cathnes) was declared exempte from all other fozrayne iuriſdiction except onely from that of the ſea Rome, ſo as it might not bee lawfull from thencefozth to any that was not of the realme of Scotlande to pzonounce ſentence of interdiction oz excommunicatiō, oz otherwiſe to deale in iudgement of eccleſiaſtical cauſes, except ſuch one as the Apoſtolike ſea of Rome ſhould ſpecially appoint and ſend thither with legantine power. whome succeded his seconde sonne Richard: for Henrye his eldest son deceassed before his father.

King Richard.

King Richard after his coronation, prepared himself to passe with an army into the holy land, and therfore made peace with all his neighbors, that no trouble shuld follow to his realme by reason of his absence: & herevpon to kepe the Scots in frendship rather by benevolence than by feare, he rendred into their handes the castels of Rorburgh, Barwike, and Sterlyng: And moreouer that parte of Northumberlande whiche hys father had taken from king William when hee toke him prisoner.

The castels of Rosburgh, Berwik, and Sterling rendred to king William.

He also deliuered the Erledomes of Huntingdon and Cumberland, but vnder condition, that all the castels and holdes within them, shoulde be in the keeping of his captains and souldiours, suche as he should appoynt.

He released to king William also the residue of such summes of money as were due for the foure castels layde to guage, ten thousand poundes only excepted, which he receyued in hande at that present towards the charges of his iourney.

When king William had thus receyued hys lands and castels by surrender, he made his brother Dauid Erle of Huntington, who therupon doing his homage vnto king Richard, according to the olde ordinance deuised by king Malcolme the first, wēt with him also in that voyage with fiue hundred Scottishemen, or rather fiue thousande (as the translator of Hector Boetius hath) if no fault be in the printer. As the chrisstian armye laye at siege before the citie of Acres, otherwise called Acon, it chaunced that one Oliuer, a Scottishman born, was within ỳ town retained in seruice amōgst ỳ Saralins, for being conuict of felonie in his native coūtrey he was banished out of the same, & fled to the Saralins, remaining so long amongst them, ỳ he had lerned their toung very perfectly, so that as then fewe knewe what countreyman he was. It fortuned that this Oliuer had one of the gates in keping, on ỳ side the towne where was but a single wall without trenches, or any other fortification.

He happed by some good aduenture to espy amongst ỳ watch of those ỳ were of the retinue of Dauid Erle of Huntingtō, one of his own kinsmē named John Durward, with whom of long time before he had bin most familiarly acquainted: and incōtinētly he called vnto ỳ same Durward, desiring vnder assurāce to talke with him. After certain cōmunicatiō, for ỳ this Oliuer had not as yet vtterly in his hart renoūced ỳ chrisstian faith, he appointed with Durward e to giue entrie at a certaine houre vnto Erle Dauid, & to al ỳ chrisstian army, vpon condition ỳ Erle Dauid wold see him restored again vnto his land & heritage in Scotlād. The houre set, Erle Dauid came with a great power of mē to ỳ gate before rehersed, where he was suffred to enter according to apointmēt, and incontinētly with great noise and clamour brake into the middest of the citie.

In the morning betimes king Richard perceiuing the citie thus wonne, entred the same, & shortly after also wan a towre, which the Saralins for a while mānfully defended: and thus was the citie of Acres won from the Saralins, chiefly by meanes of the Scottishemen. But now touching their returne from this voyage (for sith in other places more large mencion is made of such exploites as were atchieued therin, I passe ouer to make any lōger discourse therof in this place) ye shall vnderstand, ỳ in that streynable tempest, in ỳ whiche king Richards naue was dispersed in his cōming homewardes as in the historie of England is more at large expressed) ỳ ship also that Erle Dauid was in, chaunced to be throwen a lande on the coastes of Egypt, where being taken prisoner, & led into Alexandria, at length he was redemed by certain merchants of Uenice, & first conueyed vnto Constantinople, & after vnto Uenice, where he was bought out & redeemed by the English marchants, & in the end suffred to depart home. At his cōming into Flanders, he hyred a vessell at Sluyce, therwith to returne into Scotland, but beieng lewsed a little off from the shore, such a vehement tempest sodenly arose that droue him, not without great dāger of life, neere to the coastes of Norway and Shetland.

He went to Scotlande.

Here in the middest of this extreme ieopardie (as hath bin reported) after he had made a vowe to buylde a Churche in the honour of the virgin Mary, if he myght escape that daunger of seas, he ariued at length in Tay water beside Dundee, not farre from Sainct Nicholas Chapell, without eyther rudder or tackle.

When his brother the king heard that he was returned, supposing long tyme before, that hee had bin dead, he came speedyly vnto Dundee to welcome him home, shewing himself most glad of his returne, in so muche, that hee caused publike processions to be celebrate thorough the realme, to giue God thankes that had thus restored his brother home into his countrey.

Procession was holden.

Erle Dauid also according as he had vowed, buylded a Church in the fielde commonly called the Wheate fielde, and dedicating it in honour of the virgin Mary, made it a parishe churche.

landes and rentes as he ſhoulde thinke good.

There were alſo many priuiledges graunted the ſame time vnto Dundee, whiche endure to this daye.

Erle Dauid not refuſing the graunt and benuolence of the king his brother, buylded an abbey called Lundonis, for monkes of the order of S. Benet. One thing there is much to be wondered at, as a ſtrange ſingularitie. For where as that houſe ſtandeth in a valleye, encloſed on eche ſide with wood and water, by reaſon wherof ther is great abundance of adders, yet doth no man catch hurt by any of them, in ſo much as ye ſhal ſee yong children play, and runne vp and down amongſt a great number of them without any ſkath or hurt following vnto them therof.

In this meane while Richard king of England (who alſo in his returne out of the holy land was taken priſoner by the Emperor of Almain) was deliuered for a great ſumme of money, and ſo returned into his countrey.

King William hearing of kyng Richardes return into England, to congratulate the ſame, toke his brother Erle Dauid with him, & came vnto London, where in token of ioy, that he had vnfainedly conceiued for his ſafe cõming home, after all troubles and dangers which he had paſſed, he gaue vnto him .ij. thouſand markes ſterling, for that he knew at what great charges he had bin, aſwell for furniſhing of his voyage, as alſo for redeeming of his libertie.

By theſe frendly points of humanitie ſhewed, there folowed great amitie & loue betwixt theſe two kings. But king William fell ſicke in England, and as it often hapneth, ſuche as wer vnquiet perſons, deſirous to be deliuered of all feare of lawes, were ſtreight way put in an vntrue belief, that he was dead: and cauſing it to bee bruted abrode, began to exerciſe all kinde of miſdemeanors by inuading the poore and ſimple people, with ſpoiling and ſlaughters in all parts.

But after it was certainly knowne, that the king was not onely alyue, but alſo recouered of his infirmitie, & cõming homewards, thoſe lynmars and wicked rebels withdrew vnder ỹ conduct of one Herald ỹ Thane of Cathnes, & Erle of Orkney vnto the vttermoſt bounds of Scotlande.

Howbeit the king purſued them in ſuch diligent and earneſt maner, that he apprehẽded the moſt part of them in Cathnes, & cõmaunded iuſtice to be done on them, in ſuch wyſe, that mercie was not yet wanting: for ſuch as were thought to bee after a ſorte gyltleſſe, were pardoned, and the other puniſhed, euery of them accordyng to the meaſure of his offences.

But the principall leader of them, that is to wite, the forenamed Herald, for that tyme eſcaped into the weſt Iles, but ſhortly after, returning into Cathnes, he was taken and brought to the king, who cauſed his eyes fyrſte to be put out, then gelded, and laſtly to bee hanged on a paire of gallowes. Alſo all thoſe of his lignage that were men, were lykewiſe gelded, that no ſucceſſion ſhould followe of ſo wicked a weed.

In the yeare nexte enſuyng was more dearth felte in Scotlande, than euer was hearde off before: for a meaſure of Barley in Scottiſhe called a bolle, was ſold for fiue crownes, and yet in the yeare next following, accompted from the Natiuitie of our ſauiour. 1199. was more plentyfull abundance than euer had bin ſeene afore. And the ſame yeare came a legate frõ the Pope ſent to king William, preſenting vnto him a ſworde, with a ſheath and hiltes of gold, ſet full of riche precious ſtones. A legate ſent from the pope

He preſented vnto him alſo a hat or bonet, made in maner of a diademe of purpure hue, in token as it ſhould meane, that he was defendor of the Churche. Manye indulgences and priuiledges were graunted at the ſame time by the Pope, for the libertie of the Church of Scotlande. A hatte. Defendour of the churche.

It was ordeined alſo the ſame time, that Saterday ſhould be kept as holyday from noone forwarde, and greate puniſhment appointed for the that tranſgreſſed this ordinaunce, in doing any bodily worke from Saterday at noone, til Monday in the morning. Saterday after noone to bee kept holy.

After this king Willyam returned agayne into Englande to doe his homage vnto kyng Iohn, for the landes of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland. King Willia did homage to king Iohn of England.

Imediatly wherupon king Iohn willed him to paſſe with him into Fraunce, to make warres againſt the Frenchemen, and becauſe he refuſed ſo to do, king Iohn made clayme to all the forſayd lands as forfayted to the crowne of England, and cauſed a great bootie of goods to be fetched out of the ſame: So that open warres had immediatly folowed, if the Engliſh Lords had not compelled king Iohn to make reſtitution of all the goodes ſo taken, becauſe they thoughte it not expedient in any wyſe to haue warres wyth the Scottes at the ſame tyme, being already in trouble with the Frenchmen.

In the wynter following, the froſte was ſo behement and continued ſo long, that till midde March, no plough might be put into the grond.

Moreouer from the twelfthtide til Februarie, there was euery day righte terrible earthquakes.

After the ende of Winter, king Johan hauing made an ende of his warres with France, he began to buyld a caſtell in Northumberlande ouer againſt Barwike, vppon purpoſe to haue ſome quarell to fall out with the Scottes.

King William being aduertiſed therof, ſente his ambaſſadoures vnto kyng Johan, requiring him to deliſt from ſuch attempts, and not to ſeke any occaſion of new trouble: but for ſo much as he receyued no towardly aunſwere agayne from king Johan, he aſſembled a power, and commyng to the Caſtell, whiche king Johan had cauſed to be buylded, he ouerthrewe the ſame, and raſed it to the earth.

King Johan ſore offended herewith, reyſed a mightie armie, and came towardes Scotlande, but at his cõming to the bordures, he founde his aduerſarie king William ready to receyue hym by battayle, if he had come forewarde, howbeit through mediation of prudente men the mater was taken vp betwixte them, ſo that on eyther ſyde the armies wer diſſolued, and both the kings repairing to Yorke, eſtabliſhed a peace there, with theſe cõditions, that Margaret & Iſabel daughters to king William, after the terme of .ix. yeares then next enſuing were once expired, ſhoulde be coupled in mariage with Henry and Richard the ſonnes of king Johan, vpon this paction and couenaunt, that if the one dyed, the other ſhould ſucceede to the crowne.

The couenãts of the peace.

For the whiche it was couenanted, that king William ſhould giue a right large dower.

Alſo the caſtell which king Johan had builded and king William raſed, it was agreed that it ſhould remayne ſo defaced, and neuer after again to be repaired.

For the ſure performance of theſe articles thus betwixt the two kings cõcluded, nine noble men of Scotlande were appointed to be deliuered as hoſtages vnto king Johan.

Scottiſhe hoſtages deliuered to kyng Iohn.

In that aſſemblie there at Yorke, king William alſo ſurrendred into the hãds of king Johan the landes of Cumberlande, Huntington, and Northumberland, to the intent he ſhuld aſſigne thoſe landes again vnto his ſonne prince Alexãder, and he to do homage for the ſame, according to the maner and cuſtome in that caſe prouided, for a knowlege and recognition that thoſe lands were holden of the kings of Englande, as ſuperiour lordes of the ſame.

A ſurrender made to a vſe.

During the aboade of theſe two kynges at Yorke, there was brought vnto them a chylde of ſingular beautie, ſonne and heire to a Gentlemã of great poſſeſſions in thoſe parties, being ſore vexed with diuers and ſundry diſeaſes, for one of his eies was conſumed and loſt through an iſſue which it had of corrupt and filthie humours: the one of his handes was dryed vp, the one of hys feete was ſo taken, that he had no vſe therof, and his toung likewiſe that he could not ſpeake.

The Phyſitions that ſawe him thus troubled with ſuche contrary infirmities, iudged him incurable. Neuertheleſſe king William making a croſſe on him, reſtored him immediatly to helth. By reaſon wherof, manie beleeued that this was done by miracle, through the power of almightie God, ẏ the vertue of ſo godlie a prince might be notified to the worlde.

After his returne from Yorke into Scotland, he endowed the churches of Newbottell, Melros, holie Rood houſe, Dunfermling, and Abirdene, with many faire poſſeſſions, as the Letters patentes made therof by him, beare manifeſt teſtimonie.

Churches endowed by K. William.

He alſo erected one new biſhops ſee called Argyle, giuing therto ſufficient landes towards the maynteinance and ſuſtentation therof.

The erecting of the ſea of Argyle.

After this, cõming vnto the towne of Bertha, he had not remayned there many dayes, but that there chaunced ſuch a flood, by reaſon of the riſing & inundation of the two riuers Taye and Almound, that through violence of the ſtreame the towne walles were borne downe, and muche people in the town drowned, ere they could make anye ſhifte to ſaue themſelues, in ſo muche that though the king wyth his wyfe and the moſte parte of his familie eſcaped oute of that greate danger and iopardie, his yongeſt ſonne yet named Johan, with his nourſe and .xij. other women periſhed, & .xx. other of his ſeruantes beſide.

The towne Bertha drowned by inundation.

The king in daunger of drowning.

Iohn the kinges ſonne drowned.

Here was heard ſuch clamour, noyſe and lamentable cryes, as is vſed in tyme when anye towne is ſodenly taken and ſurpriſed by the enimies: for as the common Prouerbe witneſſeth, fyre and water haue no mercie: and yet of theſe two, water is more terrible and daungerous: for there is no force or witte of man able to reſiſte the violence of inundations, wher they ſodeynly breake in.

King William after that the towne of Bertha was thus deſtroyed and ouerflowed wyth water, began the foundation of an other towne, which was after called Perth, by a man of that name that ought the grounde where the ſame towne was buylded.

The towne Perth buylt.

Furthermore to aduaunce the dignitie and augmentation of this towne, the king graunted ſundry beneficial priuiledges and freedoms therto, that it myghte the ſoner ryſe in ryches and wealth.

Freedomes granted to the town of Perth.

The firſt foundation thereof was layde after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1210. yeares, but the name was chaunged afterwardes, and called Saint Johns towne, which name it beareth euen vnto this day.

About the ſame time there roſe eft ſoones new trouble in Cathnes, for one Gothred the ſonne of Makuilzem (of whoſe rebellion ye haue heard before) ſpoyled with often incurſions and rodes the Countrey of Roſſe, and other bounds there aboutes.

His companie encreaſed dayly more and more, by repayre of ſuch number of Rebelles as came vnto him oute of Lochquhaber and the Weſterne Iles.

King William to repreſſe theſe attemptes, ſent forth the Earles of Fife and Atholl, with the Thane of Buthquhane, hauing ſixe thouſande in their companie, the which encountering with the enimies in ſet battail, gaue them the ouerthrow, and taking Gothred their chiefe Captaine priſoner, brought him vnto the king, who cauſed both him and diuerſe other which were likewiſe taken priſoners, to loſe their heades.

Gothred himſelfe was ſore wounded before he was taken, ſo that if his takers had not made the more ſpeede in the conueying of him to the king, he had dyed of his hurtes before execution had thus beene done on him accordingly as was appoynted.

About this tyme roſe the diſſention and variance, betwixt John King of Englande, and Pope Innocent the thirde, for that the Engliſhe Cleargie refuſed to ayde the ſayde John with ſuche ſummes of money as hee demaunded of them.

Shortly after, William king of Scotlande, worne with long age, departed out of this worlde at Striueling, in the lxxiiij. yeare of his age, and in the. xlix. yeare of his raigne, and after the incarnation of Chriſt. 1214. yeares.

He was buryed in Aberbrothak before the high aulter within the Quiere.

The yeare afore his death, two Comets or blaſing ſtarres appeared in the Monthe of March right terrible to behold, ỹ one did ſhine before the ryſing of the Sunne, and the other before the going downe thereof.

The yeare next following, there was a Cow in Northumberlande that calued a right monſtruous Calfe, for the head and necke reſembled a verie Calfe in deede, but the reſidue of the bodye was like to a Colte.

In the Winter after, there were ſeene alſo two Mones in the Fyrmament, the one being ſeuered from the other, and in ſhape naturally horned as yee ſee the Mone in hir encreaſing or waning.

King William in his life time founded the Abbay of Balmernocht, but his wife Queene Ermengard endowed it with landes and poſſeſſions after his deceaſſe. The Abbay of Balmernocht founded.

In the. xlvj. yeare of this King Williams raigne, two Monkes of the Trinitie order were ſent into Scotlande by Pope Innocent, vnto whome King William gaue his Palace royall in Abirdene, to conuert the ſame into an Abbay for them to inhabite: and was in minde to haue gyuen them many other bountifull giftes, if he had liued any longer time.

Alexander.

After the deceaſe of king William, his ſonne Alexander the ſecond of that name ſucceeded, and was crowned at Scone wyth all due ſolemnitie, which being furniſhed, hee went vnto Abirbrothok, where he remayned. xiiij. dayes in attending the funerall obſequies of his father, and commaunded that no publike playes, nor great feaſtes ſhould be vſed or kept of all that yeare, to the intent the death of his father might be lamented throughe the whole Realme. Alexander the ſecond is crowned at Scone. A tyme of mourning.

The King himſelfe and all his ſeruants alſo were clothed in mourning weed, during the ſpace of one whole yeare. A Parliament at Edenburgh.

The firſt Parliament which he called, was holden at Edenbourgh, in the whiche he confyrmed all the actes and ordinaunces deuiſed by his father: and further appoynted that all ſuche as had borne offices vnder him, ſhould ſtill enioy the ſame. Namely he commaunded that William Wlod Biſhop of Dunblayne ſhoulde ſtill continue Lord Chancellour, and Alane of Galloway high Conſtable, which is an office of moſt honor and reputation next to the king, as hee that hath power of life and death, if any man drawe bloud of an other by violence within two myles of the Court. Confirmation of Officers. The office of the Conſtable.

When this Parliament was ended, becauſe the olde Queene his mother determined to remayne during the reſidue of hir life in the place where that holye woman Queene Margaret ſometyme led hir lyfe, he gaue vnto hir towards the maintenaunce of hir eſtate, the Caſtelles and townes of Forfair, with the landes and poſſeſſions to the ſame belonging. The landes of Forfair giuen to the olde Queene.

He alſo appoynted certaine ſage and moſte graue perſonages, to be choſen forth as Iudges, which ſhould be reſident in euerie Citie and good towne of his realme, for the hearing and due determining A princely appointment.

Dissention betwixt K. Iohn & his nobles.

In this meane time great dissention rose betwixt Iohn king of Englande, & his barons, by reasō whereof great warres ensued, as in the englishe hystorie doth appeare. The Barons made sute both to the frenche king, & to ỹ king of Scots for ayd, so that at length Lewes the frenche kings sonne came ouer to suppoꝛt them, whereof when king Alexander was aduertised, he likewise came with an army through England vnto London, causing his soldiers by the way to abstaine from doing any kinde of domage to the people.

K. Alexander passeth to London.

By his comming things were partly quieted for a time, and shortly after that he had cōmuned with Lewes touching sundrie affayres perteyning to both the realmes, they passed the Seas with ten vessels ouer into France, leauing theyr powers behind them to assist the Englishe lords,

The Frenche king aduertised thereof, came down to Bulleigne, where finding his sonne and king Alexander, he renued the auncient bonde of amitie betwixt France and Scotlande, with the same Alexander, accoꝛding to the couenantes of the olde league, with this addition, that neyther Pꝛince shoulde receyue the enimies of the others realme, noꝛ to marry with any stranger, the one not making the other pꝛiuie thereto.

The league betwixt Fraunce and Scotlande renued.

These things being ratified, king Alexander and Lewes returned into Englande: shoꝛtly whereupon, king John died, moꝛe through anguish of minde and melancholy, than by foꝛce of any other naturall disease.

The best approued wryters affyrme that Lewes wēt not ouer into France, til after the death of king Iohn.

His sonne Henrie the thirde of that name, succeeded him, and in the meane time had the Pope accursed both Lewes, & king Alexander, with all those that fauoꝛed their cause against king John, which curse was pꝛonounced in a generall counsell, which was holden at Rome by Pope Innocent, there being pꝛesent foure hundꝛed and.xij Bishops, and.viij.C. Abbots.

A counsell at Rome.

King Alexander after the decease of king John, returning homewardes with his armie, thought he might haue passed quietly without any annoiance by the way, through meanes whereof, hee lost a certaine number of his men, being sodenly inuaded by such Englishe men, as watched theyr time to take the Scottes at some aduauntage, in straying abꝛode out of oꝛder: with which iniurie king Alexander was so moued, that hee spoyled and harried all the Countreyes by the which hee passed, till he was entred within the confines of his owne dominion.

King Alexander returneth into his countrey.

Shoꝛtly after Cardinall Gualo came into England furnished with the Popes authoꝛitie, to denounce the excōmunication aboue remembꝛed against Lewes & Alexander, with all their fautoꝛs, wherebpon he accursed not only the foꝛesaid pꝛsons, but also interdited all the places where they came, insomuch that in the end Lewes was constrayned to buy an absolution with no small summes of money, of that auaricious Cardinall Gualo, and after vpō agreement also made with king Henrie, he returned into France.

Not long after, came king Henrie with an army into Scotland, soꝛe endomaging the coūtry: but so sone as he was aduertised that king Alexander had assembled all the pꝛwer of his realme to giue him battaile, he retyꝛed with al speed into England. The king of Englande had in his army at the same time, 1200. men of armes, right pꝛfitly appointed and furnished with armoꝛ and weapon as was requisite, and the king of Scots but only.b.C. But of footemen there were in the Scottish army 60000. able pꝛsonages well appoynted, with Axes, Speares and Bowes, readie to die and liue with their Pꝛince, constantly beleeuing, that to lose this pꝛesent life here in his defence, was an assured way to be saued in an other woꝛlde.

King Henrie inuadeth Scotlande.

Ex codice antiquo S. Albani, written by Mathew Paris (as I take it.)

After that King Henrie was gone backe into Englande, King Alexander followed after him into Noꝛthumberland, where he ouerthꝛew and beate downe many Castels and strengthes, which the English men helde.

Then marching through the countrey vnto Carleil, he wan that Citie, and garnished it with his people.

After this, laying siege vnto Noꝛham castel, when hee had continued at the same a certaine time, and pꝛceiued how he lost but his trauail, he left it & returned home with great honoꝛ and triumph, foꝛ his other atchieued enterpꝛises in that iourney. King Henrie being once aduertised that king Alexander had bꝛoken vp his campe, incontinently got eftsones his people togither, & comming to Barwike, wanne both the towne and Castel: After entring into Scotland, he burned and spoyled the coūtrey alongst by the sea coasts, till he came as far as Hadington, putting al such to the swoꝛd as were found in the way, women, pꝛiestes, and childꝛen onely excepted.

Haddington.

He assayed to haue wonne the Castel of Dunbar, but missing his purpose there, he returned into Englande.

In the meane time, the auaritious Pꝛelate Gualo, vppon trust to purchase some large poꝛtion of money in Scotlande, put the same vnder pꝛoces of interditing, & namely he accursed king Alexander most terribly, foꝛ that he had inuaded England, (and as he alledged) spoyled Churches as well as pꝛophane places. These cursings so inflamed the heartes of the Scottish men with hatred agaynst the Englishemen, that the same was not like to haue ended without the vtter destruction and ruine of both their realmes.

Scotland interdited.

Neuer-

Neuertheleſſe at length, by the diligent trauayle of the Biſhops of Yorke and Saliſburie, which came vnto king Alexander to treate an agreement, a finall peace was concluded, vnder theſe conditions.

Sa-

First it was agreed, that King Alexander ſhould render the Citie of Carlil into the Engliſh mens handes, and king Henrie the towne of Barwike vnto the Scottes.

The whole dominion of Cumberland, to remaine vnto king Alexander with the one halfe of Northumberlande, to the Recroſſe. And further that King Alexander ſhoulde be abſolued of the Cenſures of the Churche, which Gualo the Cardinall had denounced agaynſt him.

Thus the two Kings beeing accorded, the two foreſayde Byſhops comming vnto Barwike, aſſoyled King Alexander, and deliuered his Realme of the interdiction, by ſuche authoritie as they had procured of the Cardinall Gualo.

But yet the ſame Cardinall not mynding to depart with emptie handes, ſummoned all the Prelates of Scotlande to appeare before him at Yorke, there to receyue theyr full abſolution, to the intent by ſuch meanes to trouble them, tyll they had diſburſed to his vſe ſome large portion of money.

Sundrie of them which loued quietneſſe more than contention, ſatisfyed his mynde, but others refuſed vtterly ſo to doe, taking great indignation that ſpirituall cauſes were thus diſpatched for money, & eccleſiaſticall preferments bought and ſolde, no otherwiſe than ſecular poſſeſſions and prophane dignities.

Incontinently thereupon Gualo cited them to Rome, ſuppoſing that rather thã to take vpon them ſo long a iourney, they woulde haue compounded with him at his pleaſure.

Notwithſtanding they beeing nothing in doubt thereof, went vnto Rome, and at theyr commyng thyther, made vnto the Pope their complaint in moſt grieuous maner, of the inſufferable iniuries attempted in England & Scotland, by his moſt couetous Legate the foreſayde Gualo: By reaſon of which complaint, and of ſundrie ſuch letters and informations as dayly came out of England and Scotland, from other Biſhoppes and Abbots, conteyning right grieuous accuſations concerning the inſatiable auarice of Gualo, the Pope reuoked him home vnto Rome, to make anſwer in his preſence vnto ſuch matters as were layd to his charge.

At his returne thither, forſomuch as hee was not able to diſcharge himſelfe of ſuche manifeſt crymes wherewith hee was burdened, the Pope condemned him in a great ſumme of money, to bee payed as a fine for his treſpaſſe and tranſgreſſions.

The Scottiſh Biſhops abſolued.

And thoſe Scottiſhe Biſhops, which were come for their abſolution, were abſolued by the Pope, and ſuffred to depart in peace.

Dauid Erle of Huntington deceaſed.

In this meane tyme, Dauid Earle of Huntington, brother to William late king of Scots, (of whom ye haue heard before howe he went in the iourney made by the Chriſtian Princes into the holy lande) deceaſſed, and was buried within an Abbay in England. 1219

An enterviewe betwixt the kings of Englande and Scotlande.

Henrie king of Englande, after he came to yeares of perfite diſcretion, ſhewed himſelfe to be more deſirous of peace than of warres: Whereupon at Yorke there was a meeting appoynted betwixt him and King Alexander, where mutuall alliaunce was accorded betwixt them on this wiſe.

Mariages concluded.

Jane the ſiſter of King Henrie, was promiſed to bee giuen in mariage to King Alexander, and two ſiſters of King Alexanders, were eſpouſed vnto two great Princes of the Engliſh Nobilitie.

These mariages were thus concluded in the yeare of our Lord, 1220. In the yeare next following, came a Legate into Scotlande from Pope Honorius, with bulles to gather a ſumme of money towards the furniſhing forth of an armie againſt the Turkes or rather Saraſins.

A Legate ſent from Pope Honorius for a collection.

This Legate was a Cardinall, and named Egidius, who hauing purchaſed no ſmall quantitie of coyne both of the Cleargie and Laitie of Scotland, ſpent the ſame in riot and outrageous inſolencie, making his excuſe at his returne to Rome, howe it was taken from him by certaine Bzygants and robbers.

A Legates excuſe.

Within ſhort while after, was an other Legat with ſemblable commiſſion ſent into Scotland from the foreſayde Pope: But king Alexander being aduertiſed of his comming, called a counſell, in the whiche one of the Biſhops that (as ſhould ſeeme) toke great indignation to ſee howe couetouſneſſe raigned in moſte ſhamefull wiſe amõgſt the Romiſh Legates, ſpake in maner as followeth.

An other Legate.

An oration of a Biſhop.

Howbeeit ſundrie conſiderations there are, which might ſtay me from vttering ſuch things as be moſte preiudiciall to the common wealth, yet (moſt noble Prince) when I conſider thy humanitie, fayth, and conſtancie giuen to nothing more than to the defence and weale of thy true liege people, I cannot but (for the zeale I beare to common libertie) declare the truth, for ſithe all maner of tyrannie is intollerable, yea euen that, which is exerciſed by Kings or Princes deſcended by liniall ſucceſſion to theyr rightfull heritage: much more is that tyrannie to bee deteſted, whiche is exerciſed by men of vile and baſe lynage. Therefore if the ſundrie and manifeſt wrongs done to vs these many yeares now past, had come by the Popes themselues, the same might somewhat more sufferably haue beene borne, but sithe naughtie vile persons, of base byrth and obscure lynage, promoted to benefices and ecclesiasticall dignities onely for theyr wicked and horrible vices, haue not onely interdyted our Realme, without lawfull commission, but haue also consumed in maintenaunce of theyr wanton and insolent vices; that money whiche they gathered in our Countrey by the Popes authoritie, vnder colour of rayling an army to goe agaynst the Turkes and Infidels, I am of this opinion, that theyr cursed auarice ought to haue no further place amongst faythfull people, specially amongst vs, whose simplicitie and humblenesse they haue in contempt.

Men of base lynage.

In the yeares passed, ye complayned of the iniuries done by Gualo, when he had put your Realme vnder the censure of interdyting, and the most part of your prelates vnder the curse, bycause they would not answere him of money, according to his couetous demaundes, wherewith he might mainteyne his outragious lustes: which Gualo also (as should appeare) by most certaine coniectures, was of suche a diuelish nature, that though he were sent to treate a concorde betwixt the English men and Scottes, yet to satisfie his auaritious desire, he ministred suche occasion of warre betwixt them, that both the realmes (had not the matter beene the sooner taken vp) were at a poynt to haue entered so farre into malicious hatred the one agaynst the other, that it was not lyke, that any peace would haue taken place, tyll the one or both had bene vtterly destroyed. But sith these haynous and terrible deedes are manifest ynough, to what ende should I here remember them, sith the same cannot bee done without your great griefe and displeasure?

Moreouer, after we were deliuered of thys Gualo, shortly after commeth another, one shewing him selfe to come forth of the same shoppe: for in conuersation of life, he was to be iudged no whit better, but rather worse: for after he had got vp amongest vs of this realme large summes of money vnder pretence of redeeming the Christian prisoners out of the Sarasins hands, and waging of new armies agaynst them, he wasted the same monye in ryotous lust and insolencie, fayning, when it was gone, that it was bereft him by Byggants.

Therefore sith we haue had experience, and are alreadie sufficiently taught by the doings of the two forerembred Legates, to our heauie griefes and no small domages, we may be worthily reputed vnwise and very fooles in deede, if we now admit the thirde.

For it is not to be thought, that this new Legate shall vse the matter in any better sort, than his fellowes haue done before him.

And verily if any man shoulde demaunde of me, what I thinke ought to be done in this matter, I do for my part protest, that neither this legate, nor any other in tymes to come, ought to be receyued within this realme, considering how the same hath beene wasted and robbed by their continuall exactions: if there be any amongest you that hath more money than hee knoweth which way wel to spend, he may (in the name of God) bestow it vpon the poore, rather than to the vse of such vicious Legates, as order it in suche sort, that all men haue cause to thinke, whatsoeuer commeth into their hands, is but cast away and clearely lost.

The Byshops opinion.

These wordes of this Bishop (whatsoeuer he was) were lyked so well of all the Counsell, that the Legate coulde not be receyued into the Realme.

Legate can be receyued.

After the breaking vp of this Counsell, the mariage was consummate betwixt king Alexander and Ioane, sister to Henrie king of Englande: also betwixt Hubert de Burgh high Iustice of Englande, and Margaret sister to king Alexander, by reason of whiche mariages, the peace was confirmed with the Englishmen, and as it had beene sealed vp for a more full and certaine assurance.

Peace confirmed with the English men.

Shortly after followed ciuill warres in Scotlande, by the motion of one Gilespy Ros, who hauing liued most lycentiously in ryotous outrage, at length arreared open warre agaynst the king, and first slaying diuerse such of his companions as had kept him companie aforetime in his lewde misdemeanors, for that they refused nowe to sticke to him in this rebellious enterprise, hee went with the residue that offred to take his part vnto the towne of Enuernes, which he tooke and burned, with diuers other places being of the Kings possessions, tyll at length Iohn Cumeyn Earle of Buchquhane comming agaynste hym with an armie deliuered to him by the king, pursued the sayde Gilespy in such earnest wise, that finally he toke him with two of his sonnes, and striking off all their three heades, sent the same to the king as a witnesse how he had sped.

This businesse being thus quieted, an other ensued after this maner: The men of Cathnes sore offended with their Bishop named Adam, for that vpon refusall to pay theyr tythes, he had accursed them, fell vppon him within his owne house, and first scourging him with roddes, at length set fire vpon him and brunt him within his owne kitchen.

Adam Bishop of Cathnes slaine by the people of the countrey.

Which act being reported to the king, as then soiourning at Edenbourgh, he hasted forth with all speede to punish the offenders, not ceasing till he

he had taken foure hundred of them, all the which number he caused to be hanged, and for that hee would haue no succession to come of such a wicked seede, hee appointed all theyr stones to lose their stones.

The place where they were so gelded, is called euen to this day the stonie hill.

The Earle of Cathnes, for that he neyther succoured the Bishoppe in time of neede, nor yet sought to punish the offenders that did this cruel deed, was depriued of his Earledome, and whole landes belonging to the same.

The Pope highly commended king Alexander for this punishment taken of them, that had so cruelly murthered their Bishop.

After this king Alexander comming vnto Aberdene, gaue many large gyftes and priuiledges therto, although the same before this time enioyed sundrie notable commodities and endowments giuen and confirmed by other kings hys predecessors.

The Bulles whiche were graunted by sundrie Popes concerning the libertyes of the churches in Scotlande, were committed by the king to the custodie of one Gylbert Archdeacon of Murrey, who succeeded next after the foresayde Adam in the sea of Cathnesse.

In the thirde yeare after, as king Alexander with his mother Erningarde were sitting at their banquet on the .xij. day in Christenmasse, otherwise called Yule, the Earle of Cathnes, hauing good opportunitie thereto, presented himselfe before the king, and besought him of grace and pardon for his passed offence.

King Alexander taking ruth and pitie of him, restored him (vpon his fine to be payed in maner as was agreed betwixt them) vnto al his former honours, landes and possessions: Neuertheless the offence that was pardoned by man, was afterward punished by the iust iudgement (as some thought) of almightie God: for he was slain as he lay in bed one night by his own menial seruants, whome hee had roughly intreated, as the fame went. The house also wherin he was thus slain, was likewise set on fire and burnt ouer him, that no man shoulde haue suspition of his slaughter, but that it might seeme as though it had come by some sodaine aduenture.

About this time, or somewhat before, there came into Scotland sent by Saint Dominicke, certaine blacke Friers, of whiche order the same Dominicke was the first author.

These men that were first sent by him, lyued according to his institution, more perfectly than such as followed: for as it often happeneth, all things commonly from a good beginning fall into worse estate, so that the successors of those men declined from al good religion, into most insolent abuses and misorders, and so continuing in vicious liuing the space of three hundred yeares, at length were perfectly reformed into a better rule, by a Frier named John Adamson, that proceeded doctor in the profession of diuinitie in the Uniuersitie of Abyrdene, at the same time that Hector Boetius the Scottishe Chronographer proceeded there in the same facultie. John Adamson.

On the same maner, aboute the selfe same time, were sent into Scotlande, aswell as into all other partes of the christian world, Friers minors of Saint Frances his order. The first comming of friers minors.

Many of them also, after his decease fell to dissolute liuing, keeping no such strayte rules, as both he prescribed, and also obserued.

But now to returne to the residue of the Hystorie: the Scottish people enioyed peace a long time after the appeasing of the trouble in Cathnes, till time that Alane Lorde of Galloway and Constable of Scotland departed out of this life, and for that hee had deuided his landes before his death amongst his three daughters, hys bastard sonne gathered an armye of ten thousande men, in hope to attaine the possession of Galloway by force of armes: but at length, after hee had wrought much scaith in the countrey by his violent inuasion, he was slaine with fiue thousande of those that toke his part, by the Earle of Marche, and Walter Steward of Dunewalde, whiche was sent agaynste him wyth a power. The death of Alane Lord of Galloway. His Bastarde sonne rayseth a commotion. The Earle of March.

The eldest daughter of the aboue mentioned Alane of Galloway, was giuen in maryage vnto Roger Quincie Earle of Winchester, who after his father in lawe his decease, was made Constable of Scotland, which office continued in the handes of his succession, till king Robert the seconde his dayes: In whose time this Roger of Quyncyes posteritie was disinherited and extinguished, for certaine offences committed agaynst the kings maiestie, and then afterwardes the office of the Constable was giuen to the Hayes of Arroll. Roger Quincy Earle of Winchester Constable of Scotlande.

The seconde daughter of the foresayde Alane, was maryed vnto John Ballyol, and the thirde to the Earle of Albemarle. The deuision of the lands of Galloway.

Thus was the Lordship of Galloway deuided into three, by reason whereof the inhabitants of that Countrey taking displeasure therewith, cleaued vnto the aboue mentioned bastard, till he was vanquished and slaine, as before yee haue heard.

This trouble being appeased thus within the realme, king Alexander was aduertised of great diuision rising betwixt king Henrie of England and his Nobles, and therefore to helpe towardes an agreement betwixt them, he went to London K. Alexander goeth into Englande.

with his wife Queene Jane & Isabell his sister.

Through his earnest diligence, all the debates and quarelles were remoued, and the parties throughly accorded.

Isabell the sister of king Alexander maryed to the earle of Norffolke.

Which being done, hee maryed Isabell his sister vnto the Earle of Norffolke, and in the meane tyme hys wyfe Queene Jane deceassed, wythoute leauing any issue behinde hir, whiche chaunce caused the King hir husbande to returne with great griefe and lamentation into Scotlande.

In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation, 1239. king Alexander (bycause he had no succession of his body begot) maryed at Rockesbourgh the daughter of Ingelram, Lord of Coucie, a virgin of excellent beautie named Mary, on whom he got a sonne named Alexander, which succeeded after his decease in the gouernment of the realme.

Aboute the same tyme, John Cumyn Earle of Angus being sent in Ambassade to Lewes the French king, dyed by the way.

Iohn Cumyn Earle of Angus departeth this life.

Also at Hadynton was holden a royal tournament, where Knightes and Squiers aduaunced themselues by valiant prowes to winne honor: Neuertheleſſe the ende of all that pleasure and passime ended in sorow, for Patrike Cumyn Earle of Atholl was slaine within his lodging in the nyght, and the house set on fyre and burned ouer hym, to the intente no suspition shoulde rise, but that it happened by some euill misfortune and negligence of fyre.

Patrike Earle of Athol murthered.

But yet was John Byssart, with Walter Byssart his vncle shrewdly suspected for the matter, insomuch that though no euident proufe coulde be had agaynst them, yet were they banished the Realme, and lost all theyr goodes by confiscation to the kings vse.

Iohn Byssart suspected.

After these things were thus passed, a conuocation was called of the Clergie at Saint Johns towne. In the which were diuers prouinciall ordinances and statutes, made by consent of the King and Nobles of the Realme, which were obserued in the Church of Scotland vnto these late dayes.

About the same time also, one Sommerleid Thane of Argyle, the sonne of that Somerleyd of whome ye haue heard before, following his fathers steppes, rebelled agaynst the King, sore endomaging by rodes and forages the partyes bordering vpon the confines of his Countrey of Argile, till at length the Earle of March brought him to the termes of such extreme necessitie, that he was faine to yeelde himself with a corde about his necke in token of submission, and beeyng so brought before the king, obteyned pardon of his heynous offence.

In the same season, Henrie King of Englande, prouoked by the setting on of some seditious persons remayning in his Court, as trusted by warres to aduaunce theyr priuate gaine, (during whiche time lawe and iustice haue no place) beganne to buylde a Castell for ancynst Barwike, in the same place where the other was begunne afore by King Richarde, which (as before is shewed) was razed and throwne downe by King William, by the articles of agreement with couenant that it should neuer be buylded vp againe.

A Castell begonne to be buil ded by K. Henry ancyst Barwike.

This attempt of the Englishe men had ministred sufficient occasion of warre, if the Nobles of Englande (considering that the buylding vp of this Castell was contrary to theyr bande and promysed fayth) had not slayed the worke, and so thereuppon that begynning of newe trouble betwixt the English and Scottish nations for that present ceassed.

Mathew Paris disagreeth from the Scottish writers touching the occasion of the warre, as the English chronicles yet remaine reade.

In the yeare following, came Ambassadors forth of Fraunce into Scotlande, declaring that King Lewes was readie to passe forwarde on that iourney whiche hee had taken in hande to make into Jewrie, and therefore desired ayde of King Alexander, to supporte hym in those warres agaynst Gods enimies. With these Ambassadours were sent ouer into France, certayne choyse bandes of men of warre vnder the leading of Patrike Earle of Marche, Dauyd Lyndsey of Glennesk, and Walter Stewarde of Dundonalde, three Captaynes of great wisedome, and perfect experience in feates of chiualrie.

The moste part of all those Scottishe men that thus went forth in that iourney perished, in Egypt eyther on the Swoorde or by sickenesse, so that fewe or none of them returned home agayne.

From henceforth, King Alexander lyued not long, but falling into a sore and grieuous sickenesse within a certaine Ile called Carnere, not farre distant from the coast of Argyle; deceassed ceaſſed in the ſame Ile ſhortly after, in the .lj. yeare of his age the .xxxb. of his raigne, and of our redemption. 1249.

His bodie according as he had commaunded in his lyfe time. was buryed in Mdros.

After that Alexander the ſecõd was thus dead and buryed, hys ſonne Alexander the thirde of that name, not paſſing ir. yeares of age, was proclaymed King.

There was no ſmall adoe on the day of hys coronation amongſt the Nobles, for that by reaſon of the obſeruation of ſtarres, it was iudged to bee an infortunate day for him to receyue the Diademe.

And againe ſome helde opinion, howe hee ought to bee made Knight firſt, before hee were crowned, ſo that thus they were at ſtryfe togither, in ſuche earneſt maner, that it was doubted, leaſt this contention woulde haue bred ſome great inconuenience, had not the Earle of Fife preuented the ſame, in cauſing vpon a ſodayne the Crowne to bee ſette vppon the Kinges heade, beeing placed in the Marble Chayre, according to the cuſtome, without regarde to the friuolous allegations of them that ſpake to the contrarie.

When the ſolemnitie was ended, there came before him an Hielande man (for ſo they call ſuch as inhabite the mountaine Countreys of Scotlande) who in a certaine kynde of meetre of the Iriſh language, ſaluted him as king, thus: Bennach de re Albyn Alexander, mak Alar, mak William, mak Henrie, mak Dauid, and ſo forth, receytingin maner of a Genealogie or pedegree all the Kings in order, of whom hee was diſcended, tyll he came vp to Gathelus the fyrſt begynner of the Scottiſhe name and Nation.

The wordes in Engliſhe are as followeth: Hayle king of Albine, Alexander the ſonne of Dauid, the ſonne of Alex, the ſonne of William, the ſonne of Henrie, the ſonne of Dauid, and ſo forth as before.

This Hielande Scot was highly rewarded by the King for his labour, according as was thought requiſite.

In the ſecond yeare of his raigne, King Alexander, (or rather ſuch as had the gouernment of the Realme vnder him) aſſembled togither all the Prelates and Barons of the realme at Dunfermeling, and there ordeyned to take vp the bones of his Grandmother Queene Margaret, which being done, he cauſed them to be put into a Shrine of ſiluer, the .xxj. day of July, and minding to place the ſame where it reſteth at thys preſent, as it was borne forth towarde that place, when the bearers came aneynſt the Sepulcre of hir huſbande King Malcolme, they were not able to remoue the Relykes any further, till by the counſell (as is ſayde) of an aged man that was there preſent, they toke vp the bones of the ſame Malcolme alſo, and bare them forth with hirs to the place aforeſaid, where they after reſted in great veneration of the people.

The tranſlation of Queene Margarets bones.

Such as were appoynted gouernours (during the minoritie of king Alexander) doubting leaſt the tender yeares of their ſoueraigne might enbolden the enimies of the Realme to attempt ſome inuaſion, ſent Imbaſſadors vnto Henrie king of England, requiring that the peace might be ratified of new with him and his people, and further to make a motion of mariage to bee had betwixt king Alexander and a daughter of king Henries.

They were fianced in the dayes of king Alexander the fayre as in the Engliſh chronicle it may appeare.

Shortly after, vpon this motion, both the kings mette at Yorke with a greate number of Lordes, aſwell ſpirituall as temporall of both the Realmes, where king Alexander according to the promiſe before that tyme made, maryed the Lady Margaret daughter to the forenamed king Henry, on Saint Stephens day in Chriſtmaſſe, with al ſolemnitie and ioyfull myrth that might be deuiſed.

The charges whereof, were borne partly by king Henrie, & partly by the Archbiſhop of Yorke, who in feaſting thoſe princes ſpẽt right liberally.

At length, king Alexander after he had ſolaced him ſelfe in the companie of his father in lawe King Henrie a certaine tyme, returned into Scotlande wyth hys newe maryed wyfe.

During the minoritie of King Alexander, the realme of Scotlande was gouerned in great proſperitie by the Nobles: But after his comming to rype age, he was enformed of certaine extortions done by ſome of the Peeres of hys Realme againſt the powre people, and therevpon determined to ſee redreſſe therein.

Amongeſt other there were accuſed of ſuche tranſgreſſion, the Earles of Menteith, Atholl, and Buchquhane, with the Lorde of Strabogy, which were of one ſurname, that is to wit, of the Cumyns.

Complaint made of the Cumyns.

These being ſummoned to appeare before the Juſtices, with one Hugh Aberneth, and other of their complyces, vpon theyr contempt ſo to doe, were proclaymed traytors, and as the Scottiſhe men terme it, put to the horne.

The Cumyns put to the Horne.

The foreſayde Lordes moued with this diſpleaſure, purpoſed to reuenge the ſame, and aſſembling their powers in ſecrete wiſe, toke the king at Kynroſſy, & brought him vnto Striueling, where they kept him as captiue in warde a long time after.

But of this matter ye may ſee more in the Engliſh Chronicles about the 39. yeare of Henrie the thirde.

The greate power of the Cumyns.

The houſe of the Cumyns was in thoſe dayes of great power within the Realme, both in multitude of offſpring, riches, landes, poſſeſſions, and manrent. There were at the ſame time to the number of .xxxij. knightes of that ſurname within the realme, all men of fayre poſſeſſions and reuenues.

Thirtie and two knights of one ſurname.

But as it often happeneth that men of great poſſeſſions and dominion are had in ſuſpition with the Prince, whereby the ſame is for the more part the cauſe of their ruine and fall, ſpecially when they preſume too farre vpon their high power: ſo it chaunced here: for within a ſhorte time after that the king was thus taken (as before is ſhewed) the chiefe authour of the whole conſpiracie, that is to witte, the Lorde Walter Earle of Menteth, who was highelt in authoritie amongſt all thoſe Cumyns, was poyſoned, as was thought by his owne wife, through which miſchaunce the reſidue of the Cumyns were ſo amated, that obteining their pardon for all offences paſſed of the king, they did ſet him againe at libertie.

This woman did thus make away hir huſband the Earle of Mentaith through inſtigation of an Engliſh man called John Ruſſell, as by coniectures it was ſuſpected, namely for that refuſing to marrie with any of the Scottiſh nobilitie, ſhe toke the ſaid Ruſſell to huſband, though in eſtate to be compared with hirs he was iudged a match farre vnmeete, and therevpon conſtrayned to flee with him into Englande, ſhee dyed there in great miſerie.

About this time Pope Vrbane the fourth of that name, inſtituted the feaſt of Corpus Chriſti, to be celebrated eche yeare on the Thurſday after Trinitie Sunday.

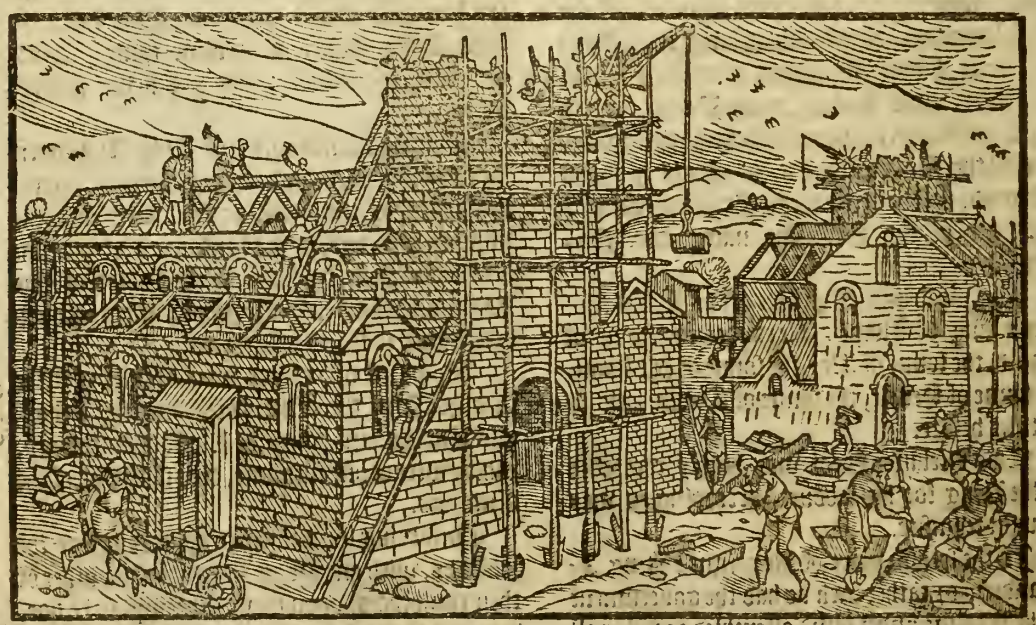
The Carmelite Friers came at this tyme into Scotland, and erected a Chappell of our Ladie without the walles of Saint Johns towne, which the Biſhop of Dunkeld appoynted them, therein to celebrate their ſeruice.

The firſt comming of the Carmelite Friers.

It was alſo ſayde, that in this ſeaſon a Monk of Melroſſe was admoniſhed in a dreame, where he ſhoulde finde a part of the holy Croſſe, not farre from Peplis in Louthian, encloſed in a Caſe engrauen wyth the tytle of Saint Nicholas.



A parte of the holy Croſſe founde.

And not farre from the ſame, was lykewiſe founde a ſtone Cheſt, right cunningly wrought and engrauen, wherein were founde certaine bones wrapped in ſilk, but whoſe bones the ſame were, it was not knowne.

As ſoone as the caſe was opened within the which the Croſſe was included, many myracles were wrought (as it was then beleeued.)

King Alexander for deuotion hereof, buylded an Abbay in honor of the holy croſſe, in the ſame place where that peece of the croſſe was ſo found.

An Abbey buylt.

In this Abbay afterwards there were Monks inhabiting of the order of the Trinitie.

Not long after, the two kings of Englande and Scotlande, met togither at Warke Caſtell, accom-accompanied with a great number of the nobles and gentlemen of both theyr Realmes, for the redreſſe of certaine miſorders committed betwixt the borderers.

Suche reformation alſo was here deuyſed, and recompence made on eyther ſyde, that bothe the Realmes continued afterwardes in more perfect tranquilitie for a certayne ſpace, than euer was ſeene in anye Kinges dayes before that tyme.

In this ſeaſon was the Church of Glaſkew finiſhed, in that perfection as it ſtandes to bee ſeene at this day, right ſumptuouſly buylded for the moſt parte at the charges of William Byſhop of that Sea, who lyued not long after the finiſhing of the ſayde worke.

In the yeare following, whiche was the yeare after the byrth of oure Sauiour 1263. there fell a great dearth through both the realmes of Englande and Scotlande, by reaſon of the weate Harueſt preceeding, ſo that the corne and graine was quite marred and corrupted before it could be got beſide the ground.

Acho King of Norway, being informed how the Scottes were thus oppreſſed with famine and other miſeryes, by report of them that made the ſame more than it was in deede, ſuppoſed to fynde tyme and occaſion fytte for hys purpoſe, to ſubdue them wholy to his dominion

Herebpon, preparing an armie and fleete of Shippes, conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe, hee landed with the ſame in the Weſterne Iles, on Lammas daye otherwyſe called Petri Aduincula.

Thoſe Iles continued vnder ſubiection of the Norwegians and Danes from King Edgars time vnto the dayes of this Acho.

From thence the ſayde Acho with a mightie power of his Danes & Norwegians came ouer into Aran and Bute, which are two Iles, & only at that time amongeſt all the reſidue were vnder the dominion of Scottes.

But Acho hauing quickly ſubdued them at his pleaſure, in hope of more proſperous ſucceſſe, tranſported his whole armie ouer into Albion, & landed with the ſame on the next coſtes, where after he had beſieged the Caſtel of Ayre a certain time, he toke the ſame, and began to waſte and ſpoyle all the Countrey there aboutes.

King Alexander beeing ſore aſtonyed with theſe newes, for that he was yong, and not able as it was doubted to reſyſt the force of his enimies, enboldned vpon ſuche frequent victories as they had atchieued, thought beſt to prolong the time by colour of ſome treatie for a peace, that waye to diminiſhe the enimyes force, by long ſoiourning in Campe without tryall of anye battayle.

Herebpon were Ambaſſadors ſent vnto Acho, of the which one amongſt them appoynted therto, being well languaged and wiſe, at their firſt comming before him ſpake in this maner. Ambaſſadors ſent to Acho.

Were it not that our King and Nobles of the Realme (by an auncient cuſtome obſerued euen from the begynning) doe vſe fyrſt to ſeeke redreſſe of all iniuryes receyued, before they offer to bee reuenged with the ſworde, ye ſhoulde not nowe beholde Orators ſent vnto you to talke of concorde, but a mightie armie in ordinaunce of battayle comming towardes you to giue the onſet: We are of that opinion, that we neuer get ſo muche gaynes by victorie of the enimies, no though they haue robbed and ſpoyled our confines, but that we account it muche better to haue peace, if wee maye haue reſtitution of wrongs done to vs, by ſome maner of honeſt meanes. For what greater follye may be, than to ſeeke for that by fyre and ſworde, which may be purchaſed with fayre and quyet wordes: Neuertheleſſe when our iuſt deſires and reaſonable motions are refuſed of the enimyes, when we finde them not wylling to haue peace, (for the obteyning wherof all warres ought to be taken in hande) but rather that their onely ſeeking is to haue warres, not reſpecting the quarell: wee are readie to riſe wholy togither in reuenge of ſuch contempt with all poſſible ſpeed and violence againſt our aduerſaries. We are ſent therfore from our King and Soueraigne, to enquyre what occaſion you haue thus to inuade his Realme and Subiects, in violating that peace and league, whiche hath beene obſerued and kept betwixt vs and your Nation, the ſpace of this hundred yeares, and not onely to take from him hys two Iles of Bute and Aran, but alſo to inuade the mayne lande of hys Dominions, wyth ſuche crueltie, as neyther conſideration of age or perſon ſeemeth to be had, but that women, children, and feeble olde perſons haue paſſed by the Sworde, as well as thoſe that haue ſtand at reſiſtaunce with weapen in hande agaynſt you.

What haynous offence haue the Scottiſhe men at any tyme committed eyther agaynſt you or any other (whoſe reuengers yee maye ſeeme to be) that they ſhould deſerue to haue ſuch cruelties ſhewed agaynſt them?

Burning of Churches.

What furious yre hathe moued you to burne the Churches of God and his Saintes, with the murther of his people that flee into the ſame for ſauegarde of their lyues?

But if you dreade not God that gouerneth all things (by his diuine prouidence) which here in this worlde wee ſee: If yee dreade not the Saintes nor vengeaunce to come on you by the puniſhment of the righteous God, yet ought yet to dreade the two moſte puiſſaunt Kings of Albion, allied togither in bonde of amitie and maryage, whiche ſhall come agaynſt you with ſuch puiſſaunce, that ye ſhall not be able to reſiſt the ſame.

Therefore ſithe ye maye depart with honour, we on the behalfe of him from whome wee are ſent, doe admoniſhe you, that better it is for you to redreſſe ſuche iniuryes as yee haue alreadie done, and therewith to repayre home, than in aduenture to bee brought to ſuche deſperate termes, that when yee ſhall bee conſtrayned to ſeeke for mercie, the ſame in no wiſe wil be granted vnto you.

These wordes were ſpoken by the Ambaſſadours, vppon purpoſe to put ſome terror into the heart of this hardie king Echo.

Neuertheleſſe hee abaſhed ſo lyttle therewyth, that hee aunſwered them in thys maner.

King Achoes anſwere.

Your beliefe is (I perceyue) ye Ambaſſadors, to abaſhe vs with your fierce and awful wordes, ſuppoſing vs ſo weake hearted, that wee ſhoulde leaue off our enterpryſe through your menaſing threates: but ye are farre deceyued ſurely if your ymagination be ſuch.

And where yee exaggerate our iniuries done to you in taking from you certaine Iles, we perceyue you are not meete nor indifferent perſons to be choſen for iudges in that cauſe, neyther doe wee mynde to learne of you, what wee ought to eſteeme right or wrong in ſuch behalfe.

If yee deſyre further to knowe and vnderſtande the cauſe, why wee haue inuaded Arrane and Bute, wee ſay and affyrme, that not onely thoſe two Iles perteyne to vs and oure people by good tytle and auncient right of inheritaunce, but alſo al the other Iles of Scotland, as we are able ſufficiently to proue.

And therefore are we come to take preſently ſo muche in value out of Scotlande, as ye haue taken in iſſues and profytes out of thoſe Iles in times paſt from vs.

The cauſe of Achoes comming into Scotlande.

Shewe then to your King, that wee feare neyther his menacing wordes, nor yet anye other violence that hee can ſhewe agaynſte vs: Notwithſtanding, if hee bee more deſyrous of peace than of battayle, and luſteth to auoyde the ſpoyling and burning of hys Townes, the ſlaughter of hys people, or if hee deſyred not to ſee the vtter extermynion of his Realme afore hys eyes, commaunde him to ſende vnto vs forthwith tenne thouſande Markes ſterling for the fruites of oure landes taken vp and receyued by hym and his elders in tymes paſt, and further that hee make a cleare reſignation of all clayme or title that he may ſeeme to pretend vnto the ſayde Iles, in ſuch ſort that the ſame may paſſe vnder our dominion in perpetuitie without any contradiction.

When King Alexander had hearde what the anſwere of his enimie was, he was therewith ſore amoued, and perceyuing no waye to eſchue the battayle, but that he ſhoulde bee conſtrayned to trye fortunes chaunce, hee aſſembled togyther an armye of fortie thouſand men, that thoughe hee were not able to matche hys enimyes in prowes, hee might yet paſſe them in number.

King Alexander aſſembleth his power.

Hee deuided this hoſte into three battayles. In the ryght Wing was Alexander Stewart a right valyaunt Knight, Nephewe to that Alexander whiche endowed the Abbey of Paſley. He had with him all the menne that came forth of Argyle, Leuenor, Atholl, and Galloway. In the left Wing was Patrike Dunbarre, hauing wyth him the men of Louthian, Fyfe, Mers, Barwike, and Striueling ſhyre. In the myddle warde was the King himſelfe, with all the remnant people of the other partes of Scotlande to ſuccour the wings when daunger appeared.

These battayles were ordered in ſuche array, that euerye clan had a Captayne aſſigned to them of theyr owne language, to exhort them to manhoode, thereby to winne prayſe and honour.

At his entring into the confines of Conningham, where he came fyrſt within ſight of hys enimies, hee called his people togyther, and exhorted them to doe theyr dutyfull endeuours lyke hardie and valyaunt men, againſte thoſe enimies that inuaded theyr Countrey without any iuſt cauſe or tytle of warre: and to put their truſte in almightie God, deſyring hym to graunt victorie vnto that parte, which had moſt right and iuſteſt cauſe of battayle. He further ſhewed how neceſſarie it was for them to behaue theſelues valiantly, and how much it ſtood them in hand to fight with manly courages, in defence of their wiues, children, lyberties and landes, hauing y hauing no hope of ſuretie of lyfe but in the valyaunt vſing of theyr able handes, ſo that theyr whole ſauegarde reſted in thys poynt, eyther to vanquiſhe the enimyes wyth manhoode, or elſe c to liue in ſeruile bondage as theyr ſlaues and miſerable thralles, and to ſuffer theyr wyues and daughters to be abuſed at theyr luſte and pleaſure. He willed them therfore to conſider, that not onely hee, but all Scotlande ſhoulde ſee them fight that day, noting both theyr manhoode and cowardiſe: but ſithe theyr cauſe was iuſte and moued onely in defence of theyr natiue Countrey and auncient libertyes, hee truſted they woulde ſhewe the more hardyneſſe and courage, namely agaynſte them that ſought onely bloud and ſpoyle.

Theſe wyth other the lyke wordes King Alexander vttered wyth bolde ſpirite, to encourage hys people. And on the other part King Acho likewyſe thought it expedient to vſe ſome exhortation vnto hys armye, that they ſhould not bee afrayde of the great number and huge multitude of the Scottes.

The chiefeſt poynt to encourage them to do valyauntly, he ſuppoſed was the hope of ſpoyle, and therefore he put them in remembrance, howe by victorie not onely all ſuch ryches as the Scots had brought thyther wyth them (whiche coulde not bee ſmall) but alſo all the whole ſubſtaunce and treaſure of the Realme to be at theyr commaundement, yea and the Realme it ſelfe, if they mynded to enioye it: ſo that this was the day whiche they had ſo muche deſired, wherein ſufficient opportunitie was offered to ſhewe what reward ſhoulde followe to eche man for hys good and valiaunt ſeruice. But for that highe enterpryces and famous exployctes might neuer bee atchieued without extreeme ieopardie, it behoued them to attaine to theſe ſo greate commodities by pierſing through, and ouerthrowing by dynt of ſworde, the arrayed battayles of theyr enimyes, whiche howe eaſie a matter it ſhoulde be for them to bring to paſſe, ſuche as well conſidered the circumſtances, might ſome coniecture: for through dearth and famine whiche ſo long hath raigned amongſt the Scottiſh people, their bodies and forces (ſayth he) are ſo wonderfully enfeebled, that they appeare to repreſent rather ſhadowes than full perſonages of men able to make reſiſtance.

Again, in conſideration howe neceſſarie it was for euery man to fight without faynting, ſithe they were enuironed on eche part without meane to eſcape, he deſyred them, that if it ſo fel out, that they ſhould chaunce to be ouercome, (which as he truſted ſhould not come to paſſe) that in ſuch miſaduenture they woulde yet ſell their lyues dearly and not to die vnreuenged.

Thus hauing opened vnto them what proſperous hap followed by victorie, and what danger by the ouerthrow, he thought to haue ſufficiently inſtructed them to put all feare aſyde, and to doe what lay in their vttermoſt forces to vanquiſh the enimies.

The Kings on eyther ſide, hauing thus exhorted their people to do their deuoirs, they array their battayles. The ordering of the battails.

Acho diſpoſed all his beſt ſouldiers and whole force of his armie in the middle warde, for that he had knowledge howe the Scottiſh king was placed in the middeſt battaile of his people, wherfore he ſuppoſed, that if he might ouerthrow and vanquiſh that part where the king ſtood, he ſhould eaſily then put the reſidue to flight.

His wings (becauſe he had not number ſufficient to furniſh thē fully) were arayed more weakly in ſlender and thin rankes: but yet at the fyrſt encoūter there was a terrible fight betwixt them, The battailes ioyne.

eſpecially where the two Kinges fought: For they preaſſed ſtill with great violence on that part where they ſaw any daunger, not ceaſſing to exhort and encourage theyr men to ſtande to the bargaine with manly ſtomackes, ſo that on eyther ſide theſe two kings playde the partes of right valiant captaynes.

Acho with a bande of right hardie ſouldiers aſſayed ſundrie tymes to pierce and diſorder the battaile where king Alexander fought, notwithſtanding he had ſo great number of people there with him, that he ſtuffed euer the ranks with freſh men where he ſaw it needfull.

The great nūber of Scottiſh men.

Alſo betwixt the wings, there was no leſſe crueltie ſhewed on eyther ſide in the beginning of the battaile, till at lengthe the Norwegians perceyuing themſelues ouerpreſſed with multitude, and compaſſed in on euery ſide, they ſomewhat beganne to ſhrinke, and fyrſt thoſe in the lefte wyng, conſtrayned to breake theyr order, fell to running away.

The left wing of the Norwegians are put to flight.

Alexander Stewart therefore, that had the leading of the right wing of the Scottes, hauing purſued the enimies a certaine ſpace, and ſlaine Achos nephewe, a man of high reputation and authoritie amongſt the Norwegians, cauſed the retreate to be ſounded, and gathering his men againe into array, brought them agaynſt the enimyes of the myddle warde, where was hard hold betwixt the two kings, the battaile continuing with great ſlaughter on both partes, and vncertaine a long while to whether part the victorie would encline: but the Norwegians being now aſſayled on the backes by a new power of theyr enimies, at lengthe they began to flee amaine: but in the meane time the left wing of the Scottes wherof one Patrike had the leading, was in great daunger, by reaſon the Captain himſelf was ſore wounded, and thereby all the companies in the ſame wing ſore diſcomforted: but after they once beheld how the middle ward of their enimies was put to flight, they recouered new corages, & with great force cauſed their aduerſaries, with whom they were matched, to giue back alſo: and ſo were the Danes and Norwegians chaſed by ỹ Scots with right cruel ſlaughter through al Cunningham, not ceaſſing from the purſute of the enimies til night made an ende of that dayes worke.

King Acho with a few other eſcaped out of daunger, and comming to the Caſtell of Ayre, which (as ye haue heard) he had wonne before, he was there informed of another loſſe, whiche hee had ſuſteyned: for his fleete conteyning the number of an hundred and fiftie ſhippes, were ſo beaten wyth an outragious tempeſt, that there were not paſt foure of all that number ſaued, the reſidue being drowned and broken againſt the rocks and clyues.

The Mariners alſo, beeing conſtrayned to come a lande for ſafegarde of their lyues, were ſlaine by the people of the countrey, ſo that few of them or none at all eſcaped.

Acho being thus abaſhed with theſe two infortunate miſchaunces, aſwell for the loſſe and diſcomfiture of his armie by lande, as for the periſhing of his Nauie on the Seas, got him vnto thoſe foure ſhippes that were ſaued, and ſayled with them aboute the coaſt, till he arryued in Orknay.

Acho fleeth to Orkney.

In thys battayle whiche was foughten at Largis, the thirde daye of Auguſt in the yeare 1263. there were ſlaine of Danes and Norwegians. xxiiij. thouſande, and of Scottes about fiue thouſand.

Thus hath Hector Bo. But Fourdon ſeemeth not to agree altogither herewith, who writing of this inuaſiō made by ỹ Norwegians into Scotland, ſaith, that they were but. xx. M. men of war in al embarked in. lxxx. ſhips, which comming to the new caſtel of Aran, beſieged aſwel ỹ ſaid caſtel of Aran, as the caſtel of Bute, & toke thē both, ſpoyling alſo the churches alongſt the ſea coaſt, & after arriuing at Largis in Cunningham on the feaſt of the Natiuitie of our Ladie, loſt the moſt part of their veſſels, whiche were drowned togither with thouſands of men in the ſame. The reſidue that got to land, encoūtering with ỹ Scots led by Alexander Stewart of Dondenald, were diſcōfited, put to flight, chaſed & drowned in the ſea, into the which they were driuen. Amongſt other that were ſlaine, a nephew of king Acho was one, a yong Gentleman of great valiancie, and ſore lamented of his Vncle. Acho had muche adoe to eſcape himſelfe he was ſo egrely purſued of his enimies. Thus haue I thought good to ſhew the diuerſitie of writers in this behalf, that it may appere how things are ſomtimes amplified by Boetius to aduance the glory of his coūtrymē further perhaps than by the ſimple veritie of thoſe that did write before him may in ſome poynts be well auerred. But now to proceed. King Acho at his cōming into Orkney, ſent into Norway and Denmarke for a newe army, and prouided ſhips and al other things neceſſarie, to haue made a new inuaſion into Scotlande againſt the next ſpring: but for that he himſelf departed out of this life in the beginning of the yeare next following, all that purueyance and great preparation was daſhed and came to none effect.

John Fourdon.

Acho prepareth to make new inuaſion into Scotland, but dieth before his proviſion was readie.

The ſame day, that Acho deceaſſed, that is to wit, the. xxj. day of January, Alexander Prince of Scotlande the eldeſt ſonne of King Alexander, whiche hee begotte on his wyfe Queene Margaret the ſyſter of Henrie King of Englande was borne, to the great reioyſing of the people.

Alexander Prince of Scotland, eldeſt ſonne the king is borne.

For

For the people conceiued double ioy and gladneſſe therof, becauſe that both a newe Prince was borne, and that enimie deade which ſought the deſtruction of the whole Realme.

After the deceaſſe of king Icho, his ſonne Magnus ſucceeded him, a right faythfull prince, and one that had the feare of God before his eies.

In the ſeconde yeare of his raigne, he ſent his Ambaſſadours (of whome the chiefe was the Chauncelor of Norway) vnto king Alexander, whome they found at Saint Johns towne, and there ſignified to him that king Magnus their maiſter, would willingly giue ouer all his tytle, right and clayme vnto Arrane and Bute, ſo that the reſidue of the Iles might remaine in quiet poſſeſſion of him and his ſucceſſours in tyme cõming. Herevnto was anſwere made by K. Alexander, that the Iles by right of olde inheritance perteined vnto him and his progenitors kings of Scotland, and therefore he might not make any agreement with the Danes or Norwegians, til he had recouered the ful poſſeſſion of ỳ ſame Iles.

The Ambaſſadors being diſpatched and ſent away with this anſwere, incontinently Alexander Stewart of Paſley, and John Cumyn were ſent with an armie ouer into Man, which Ile they then recouered (though not without bloud) forth of the handes of the Danes and Norwegians, who had kept the ſame in poſſeſſion nowe for the ſpace of 167. yeares paſſed, but not without ſome alteration and trouble, as may appeare by the annales of Richard Southwell, a writer (as ſhould ſeme) wel inſtructed in matters aſwel touching Scotland and the North partes, as alſo concerning the ſtate of the out Iles. And therfore that the ſame maye the better appeare to the Readers, I haue thought it not impertinent to ſet downe what I haue read in the ſame Southwell, touching the kings, or rather viceroyes of Man, and thoſe Iles which for a ſeaſon as ſhuld ſeeme in deede, were ſubſtituted by the kings of Norway, although it may alſo appeare, that ſomtime there was a certaine ſucceſſion in them, as from the father to the ſonne, and from the brother to the brother, &c. in maner as if it had beene by way of inheritance.

In the dayes of king John therfore (as ſaith the forſayd Southwel one Guthred raigned as king in Man. And in the yeare 1228. one Reginald being king of thoſe Iles, was murthered by wicked perſons, and thẽ his brother Olaue raigned in his place. In the yeare 1230. the King of Norwaye appoynted one Huſbac, the ſonne of Olmond (ſurnamed Hacon) to gouerne the ſayd Iles called Sodorenſes, that is to meane, the Ile of Man, & the other Iles there abouts the coaſts of Scotlande; the which Huſbac, togither with other two Captaynes Olaue and Godred ſurnamed Don came by ſea, and arryued at Bute, where they wanne the Caſtell: but Huſbac was ſlaine with a ſtone that was throwne downe vpon him. And then after this, the forſayde Olaue and Godred came vnto the Ile of Man, where they deuided the Kingdome of the Iles betwixt them, ſo as Olaue had Man alotted to him for his part, and Godred the other Iles. But after that Godred was alſo ſlaine, Olaue gouerned both in Man, and in all the other Iles (thoſe excepted which the ſonnes of Somerled helde in poſſeſſion) In the yeare 1237. in the moneth of May, Alane king of Man, the ſonne of Godred, and brother to Reginald, departed this life, after whoſe deceaſſe his ſonne Harolde ſucceeded him, & raigned. rij. yeares, being but. riij. yeares of age whẽ he began his raigne. In the yere 1247. Haco king of Norway ſent for Harolde king of Man to come vnto his coronation. Who comming thither, was honorably receyued, & obteyned king Hacons daughter in mariage: but as he returned from thence in the yeare 1249. togither with his wife, they periſhed in the ſeas by a tempeſt on the coaſtes of Iſcland. Then ſucceeded his brother Reginald, who raigned but. xvij. dayes, for he was ſlain the firſt of June the ſame yeare, by the ſeruants of a knight called Yuarus. Then Haralo the ſon of Godred Don gouerned Man one yere, being remoued by the king of Norway: and after him Magnus the ſon of Olaue began his raigne ouer Man and the other Iles, by conſent of the Manſke men themſelues. But in the yere 1254. one Yuarus was ordeyned king, or rather viceroy of thoſe Iles, and gouerned the ſame, tyll the forſaid Magnus king of Norway reſigned his tytle to all the ſayd Iles vnto K. Alexander, (as ye haue heard) who placed his Lieutenants there, of whõ the firſt hight Godred mac Mares, the ſecõd Alane. And after him Maurice Okarefair ſucceeded: and then folowed one that was the kings Chaplain. For the time of the reſignatiõ made, I followe Hector Boetius, by reaſon of ſome contrarietie which appeareth in Southwel in the accoũt of the yeares aſſigned to the raignes of thoſe Iland kings, if you cõferre the ſame with the time of the forſayd reſignation. But now to the matter: the lieutenant appointed to haue the rule of thoſe yles now, ỳ they wer thus come into the handes of the Scots, was bound by his office to be redy with. riij. ſhips, and. b. C. mariners to come to the ayd of the Scots, at al times whẽ he ſhould therto be required. After this, were the erles of Athol, Carik, & March, Alexãder Stewart, & the Thanes of Argile, & Lennox, ſent & a puiſſãt army vnto the other of ỳ weſtern Iles, the which thoſe that were greateſt, they brought with much ado vnder the obeyſance of the crowne of Scotland, the reſidue ſubmitted themſelues.

The weſterne Iles recouered out of the handes of the Norwegians.

The Chancelor of Norway ambassador to K. Alexander.

Magnus King of Norway informed hereof, sent eftsones his Chauncelour in Ambassade vnto King Alexander, to trie if he might by treatie recouer againe those Iles: and if he might not bring that to passe, yet to compounde with him for a yearly tribute.

The first motion of the Chauncelor woulde in no wise be heard, therefore surceassing to spend any longer tyme aboute it, they fell in communication touching the seconde, which toke effect at length in this wise.

The releasse of Magnus king of Norway to the Scottish Iles.

King Magnus by his Letters vnder hys greate Seale, renounced and gaue ouer all tyght or clayme that hee had or myght haue, both for him and his successours to all the Iles of Scotlande.

A yearely pencion.

And King Alexander for this resignation was agreed to paye to the sayde King of Norway, foure thoulande Markes sterling, togither with a pension or tribute of an hundred Marks by yeare: And for the more confyrmation of loue and amitie betwixt the two kings and their people, Margaret the daughter of King Alexander being not past one yeare of age, was promised in maryage vnto Hannigo, the sonne of King Magnus, the same maryage to be consummate when she came to yeares maryageable.

Further, in place where the greatest slaughter of Danes and Norwegyans had bene made, it was couenaunted that an Hospitall shoulde bee erected and founded there, for the sustentation of poore folkes.

Warres in England.

Aboute thys season there was great warres in Englande betwixte King Henrie and hys Barons, of whome the chiefe was Symon Mountfort Earle of Leycester, and dyuerse other.

King Henrie requireth ayd of Scottes.

King Henrie being not wellable to withstand his aduersaries attempts, requested King Alexander to sende him some ayde of Scottes to subdue the rebels of his realme, that had arreared warres agaynst him.

Alexander Cumyn sente into England.

Herevpon shortly after, was Alexander Cumyn with fiue thousand chosen me sent by king Alexander into Englande, who right valiantly bare themselues in that warre whiche king Henrie held against his Barons, wherof in the English Chronicle ye may read more at large.

Robyn Hood and little Iohn his cõpanion.

In these dayes (as the translator of Hector Boetius hath written) that notable and moste famous outlawe Robyn Hwde lyued, with his fellow little John, of whom are many fables and merie ieastes deuised and sung amongst the vulgar people.

But John Maior writeth, that they lined as he doth gesse, in the dayes of King Richarde, the first of that name, which raigned in England about the yeare of our Lord. 1198.

In the yeare next after that Henrie king of England had subdued his domesticall enimyes, there came a Legate from Pope Clement the fourth, requiring hym to haue a collection of money in Scotlande towardes the charges of leuying an armye agaynst the Saralins: But thys Legate was not receyued into the Realme, but commaunded to shewe his message vppon the borders. A Legate from Pope Clemẽt.

The Legates demaunde.

Hee demaunded therefore of euery Parishe Church in Scotland foure Markes sterling, and of euery Abbey 80. Markes: and to the ende hee might the sooner purchase fauour to the furtherance of his purpose, he deuised by the way certaine statutes and ordinances right profitable to be vsed in the realme of Scotland as he iudged.

The answer of K. Alexander to the Legates message.

But king Alexander for answere hereunto alledged, that the Scottes minded not to receyue any statutes or decrees other than such as were ordeyned by the Pope, or some generall Counsell: For by a generall rule the more precepts, the more offendours are alwayes found.

The more precepts, the more offenders.

And as touching the requeste made for the collection of so greate summes of money, it was not thought necessarie, that so much coyne shoulde goe forth of the Realme: Neuertheless if it were thought expedient, he woulde bee contented to sende forth at his owne proper costs and charges, a number of armed men to go with the Christian armie agaynste the Turkes: but for money otherwise forth, the Realme woulde not depart with any, least it shoulde be wastfully spent, or taken by the way of theeues, as it had beene afore time.

K. Alexander wisdome prayled by king Henrie.

Henrie King of Englande praysed much the wisedome of king Alexander for this his answer; as he declared shortly after by his sonne Prince Edwarde (who came to visite his sister the Queene, and his brother in lewe King Alexander at Rokesbourgh, where they met him) for ye must vnderstand that king Henrie had also learned by experience) to be wise in that behalfe, as well as other.

A thousande Markes sent to the Pope.

King Alexander yet after this, sent vnto the Pope a thousande Markes in siluer: and vnto Lewes the French King that requyred his ayde in that iourney whiche hee made into Affrike agaynst the Saralins there, a thousande Souldiours vnder the leading of the Earles of Carrike, and Atholl, John Stewart the brother of Alexander Stewart, Alexander Cumyn, Robert Reth, George Durwarde, John Quincie and William Gordon.

Scottish captaynes sent to Affrike.

All these going ouer with King Lewes into Affrike, dyed there, either vpõ the enimies sword, or by the intemperate heate of that Countrey, (whervnto they had not bene accustomed) in the yeare after the incarnation. 1270.

The Earle of Carrike, whoſe name was Thomas, periſhing thus amongſt the reſidue in Affrike, left no inheritor behinde him to enioy his landes, ſauing a daughter named Martha, being then about .xb. yeares of age.

This yong Ladie chaunсing to ryde a hunting in the Woods for paſtime and ſolace, as the vſe is, fortuned by aduenture to meete with a noble yong man one Robert Bruce the ſonne and heyre to Robert Bruys the Lorde of Annandale in Scotland, and Cleueland in England, begot of Iſabel the ſecond daughter of Dauid Earle of Huntington,

The Lady immediately became ſo inamoured of this yong Gentleman, that ſhee ledde him with hir home vnto Carrike, where without making hir friendes priuy to the matter, ſhe maryed him in all haſt, leaſt any man ſhould be about to hynder hir determinate purpoſe.

Of this maryage was borne that Robert Bruce whiche afterwardes (through want of heyres of the lynage of King Alexander) attayned the Crowne of Scotlande.

As ſone as King Alexander was aduertiſed hereof, he toke ſuch indignation that ſhe ſhoulde beſtow hir ſelf ſo lightly vpon one whom ſhe neuer ſaw before, that he toke hir Caſtel of Turnberie into his own hands with al hir other lands and poſſeſſions, as it were by eſcheit, for that ſhee had maried without his conſent.

Notwithſtanding, within ſhort while after, he toke pitie on hir caſe, and for an eaſie compoſition of money which ſhe payed for hir mariage, reſtored vnto hir againe all hir landes & liuings, ſuffring hir to enioy hir huſbande without any more trouble or vexation.

In the thirde yeare after, the ſayd Ladie was delinered of the afore remembred Robert Bruce that was after king of Scotland. And the ſame yeare which was the yeare after the byrth of our Sauiour 1274, Dauid the ſeconde ſonne of king Alexander deceaſſed: and the thirde yeare after, the brethren of Edward king of England came into Scotland to viſite the Queene their ſiſter, and their brother in lawe the King, and after did attend them both in theyr iourney to London, whither they went to be preſent at the coronation of the forſayde Edwarde, as then returned forth of Affrike after the deceaſſe of his father King Henrie, to take vpon him the gouernment of the Kingdome deſcended vnto him by right of inheritance.

He was crowned the ſame yeare on the day of the aſſumption of our Ladie in Auguſt, wyth great ſolemnitie and tryumph.

The ſame time there was a Norman in king Edwardes Court, of ſuche paſſing ſtrength of bodye, that he ouerthrewe all men with whome hee wraſtled, tyll at length one Ferquhard a Scottiſh man borne, of the Countrey of Roſſe, deſcended of noble parentage, vanquiſhed him to his great prayſe and aduauncement in honor, for King Alexander in guerdon of ſo worthie a deed there done in the preſence of ſo honourable an aſſemble, gaue vnto him the Earledome of Roſſe foreuermore.

Ferquhard a Scottiſh man ouerthrew the ſayd Norman.

Of this Ferquhard deſcended the Earles of Roſſe of his ſurname, but the firſt Earle was named William Roſſe, otherwiſe Leſly, in whoſe ſonne the ſeuenth Earle, fayled the dignitie of that houſe for fault of ſucceſſion. At the ſame time prince Alexander king Alexanders ſonne did homage vnto king Edward for the Earledome of Huntington, as the Scottiſh writers do teſtifie.

The Earldom of Roſſe giuen William Roſſe alias Leſlie.

Shortly after that king Alexander was returned forth of Englande at that time into Scotlande, his wife Queene Margaret deceaſſed, and was buried in Dunfermling.

The death of Queene Margaret.

She bare by him two ſonnes, Alexander and Dauid, and one daughter named Margaret, the which (according to the aſſurance before made) was maried about three yeares after hir mothers deceaſſe, vnto Hanigo, or rather Aquine king of Norway, and deceaſſed in the ſeconde yeare after the ſolemnization of the maryage, leauing behinde hir a daughter named alſo Margaret.

But before this happe fell ſo oute, euen immediately after the death of Queene Margaret the mother, hir yonger ſonne Dauid deceaſſed: By reaſon whereof, King Alexander being carefull for his ſucceſſion, procured a maryage for his elder ſonne Prince Alexander, wyth the Earle of Flaunders his daughter, the whiche being brought into Scotlande, was maryed vnto the ſayd Prince at Ferwoyth, on the Sunday after the feaſt of Saint Martyn in Winter, in the yeare 1279.

This yeare a number of the Scottiſh nobilitie which had attended the Ladie Margaret into Norway, were loſt by ſhipwracke, as they would haue returned back againe into Scotland after the conſummation of hir maryage there with king Hanigo or Iquine.

Shortly after, by force of deathes dreadfull dint, two grieuous loſſes chaunced vnto King Alexãder, the one following in ẏ neck of another.

For firſt his eldeſt ſonne Prince Alexander being not paſt .xx. yeres of age, departed out of this worlde, without leauing any iſſue behinde him: and not long after, his daughter Margaret Queene of Norway deceaſſed alſo, leauing behinde hir one onely daughter (as before is mentioned) being as yet but an infant.

It is ſayde, that the day before the Kinges death, the Earle of Marche a little before night demaũded of one Thomas Leirmont, otherwiſe named Thomas the rymer, or as the tranſlator of Hector Boetius hath, Tho. Erſilton, who in thoſe dayes was reputed for a notable propheſier or (as we may cal him) a foothsaier) what wether they shoulde haue on the morow? To whome the sayd Thomas answered, that on the morow before none, shoulde blowe the sorest wynde and tempest, that euer was heard of in Scotlande at any time before.

On the morow, when the skye appeared clere and bright, without cloude or any other signe of foule weather, and that it drewe neere vnto the middest of the day, and no winde heard from any syde, but all calme and quiet, the Earle of Marche sente for the forenamed Thomas, and tolde him that hee had mystaken his markes, in prophesying of any suche notable tempest as he had spoken of the nighte before, considering it proued so lythe a day without appearance of any tempest to ensue.

This Thomas sayd little therto, sauing that he alledged how it was not yet past none.

And incontinently herevpon came a poast to the castell gate of Dunbar, where this Earle of March as then lay, bringing word of the kings sodaine death, as before is recited.

Then said the Prophesier: That is the scathfull winde and dreadfull tempeste, whiche shall blowe suche calamitie and trouble to the whole estate of the realme of Scotland.

This Thomas was a man in greate admiration of the people, shewing sundrye thinges, as they afterwardes chaunced: howebeit they were euer hidde and inuolued vnder the vayle of darke and obscure speeche.

Many strange wonders and vnketh sightes were seene in the dayes of this Alexander the thyrde.

In the .xvij. yeare of his reigne, there was suche an infinite number of wormes through al the parties of Albion, that not onely the leaues and fruites of trees, but also flowres and herbes in gardens, were eaten vp and consumed with them.

And in the same yeare, the waters of Furth and Tay rose with suche high tydes in flowing ouer the bankes, that many townes and villages were drowned, to the great destruction both of men and beastes.

In the .xx. yeare of his reigne, there was a Comete or blasing starre seene of a meruailous quantitie, shyning euery day towarde the south, euen about none dayes.

On the Epiphanie day next after, rose so great windes, with stormes of such vnmesurable great hayle stones, that many townes were throwne downe by violence thereof.

In the meane tyme, rose throughout the vehemente rage of windes a sodaine fyre, in manye boundes within the realme of Scotlande, that did muche hurt in buyldings and edifices, brenning vp steeples with such force of fyre, that the belles were in diuers places melted, as though it had bin in a furnace.

Amongest other, those of the abbey of Abirbrothok were most precious, which were as then consumed together with the steeple wherin they hung. The townes of Abirden and Perth, were brenned the same tyme: Also parte of Laynrike, with the temple and all the townes and villages in Clow a part of Angus, and lykewyse manie townes and other buyldings in Lowthian, and in dyuers other partes of the realme, too long here to reherse. Belles melted

In the .xxxj. yeare of his reigne was the first commyng of the pestilence into Scotland, with great mortalitie of the people, where it had not bin herd, that euer this sickenesse had come within that realme before that tyme. The first commyng of the pestilence into Scotland.

In the solennization of the seconde mariage of king Alexander, as the bridegrome according to the maner, ledde the bryde in a daunce, a great number of lordes and ladies folowing them on the same daunce, there appeared in their sight as it were closing vp the hindermoste of the daunsers, a creature resembling deathe, all naked of flesshe and lyre, with bare bones right dredfull to beholde, through whiche spectacle the king and the residue of all the companie were so astonyed, and put in such fright and feare, that they hadde quickly made an ende of their daunce for y time. A strange sight in daunsing.

In the dayes of this king Alexander the third, lyued sundry great clarkes. Learned men.

Amongst other one Michaell Scot was reputed for an excellent Physition, and for his singular practise and knowledge in that profession was no lesse esteemed and hadde in high fauour, with Edward king of England, than wyth K. Alexander during his lyfe tyme. Michaell Scot a phisition.

King Alexander the thirde, being in such miserable wise deceassed, as before is specified, the realme remained in great discomfort, by reason he had neyther left any issue behynde him to succeede in the gouernement therof, neyther taken order in his lyfe tyme by testamente, or otherwise, for any other to supply the rowmth of a gouernour, so that hereof ensued such infinite misorders, by the presumption of wicked and vngracious persons, the which vpon hope to escape vnpunished (bicause Justice was lyke to wante due processe,) ceassed not to attempt many vnlawfull actes, to the grieuous oppression of the people: whiche misruled demeanours and disordred enterprises of those outragious persõs, whẽ such as had any zeale to the welth of their countrey, vnderstood daily to multiply & increase, they thought it apertained to their dueties to prouide some remedie in tyme, and therevppon called a councell together, wherin after sundry consulta- Scotland without a king and gouernour. Mischeues ensuing for lacke of a ruler.

tations had, & many matters debated touching ẏ rule of the realme, it was finally agreed, ẏ ſix gouernors ſhould be elected & choſē, of the which thꝛee ſhould haue the adminiſtration and rule of the noꝛth partes, and theſe were William Fraſer biſhop of ſaint Andꝛowes, Duncane Erle of Fyfe, and John Cumyne Erle of Buchquhane.

Six gouernors choſen to haue the rule of Scotland.

The other thꝛee were appointed to the gouernance of the South countreys, that is to ſaye, Robert biſhop of Glaſgew, ſir John Cumyn (a man of high eſtimation foꝛ his wyſedome and experience as well in matters concerning peace as warre) & James high Steward of Scotland.

But in the meane tyme Edwarde king of Englande, ſurnamed Longſhankes, caſt in hys mynd, howe he might make ſome conqueſte of Scotlande, nowe that the ſame was thus deſtitute of an head to gouerne it.

And foꝛ that he well vnderſtode ẏ the daughter of Nozway (of whom befoꝛe ye haue heard) was right inheritoꝛ to the crowne of Scotland, though ſhe were but very yong in yeres, and not able foꝛ mariage: yet to cõpaſſe his purpoſe that wayes foꝛth, he ſente his ambaſſadoꝛs vnto the Lozdes of Scotlande, requiring to haue hir to wife, and the realme withall, as dewe vnto hir by good title and right of inheritance.

How can this be true when king Edwarde had a wyfe at that tyme? but verily the ſcots writers ſhewe themſelues ouercome with too much malice in moſte thinges whyche they write in the defamatiõ of king Edwarde.

The lozds after long deliberation herein had, conſented to his deſire, vnder theſe conditions, that the realme ſhould remain in all freedomes & liberties, without any kind of ſeruile ſubiection, in the ſame maner and ſtate as it was vſed in ẏ dayes of king Alexander laſt deceaſſed, and other his noble pꝛogenitoꝛs: and if it chaunced, that no iſſue came of this mariage to ſucceede them, then ſhould the crowne returne by remaynder ouer, to the next heires of king Alexander, without any clayme oꝛ pꝛeterte of title to bee made by kyng Edwarde, oꝛ any of his ſucceſſours in time to come. Immediatly herewith, two noble knights ſir John Scot of Albawoze, & ſir James Wemys were ſent into Nozway to fetche the bryde ouer into Scotlande: but befoꝛe their comming thyther, ſhe was deceaſſed, and ſo they returned backe into Scotland againe withoute effecte of their errande. And thus by meanes of hir death all amitie and frendſhip betwixt Engliſhemen & Scots ceaſſed. Then began to enſue great trouble & buſineſſe in Scotland, by reaſon of the contention whiche ſpꝛang betwixte the kinſemen of king Alexander, foꝛ the title & clayme which they ſeuerally made and pꝛetended to the crowne.

There were .iij. chiefly that ſemed by nereneſſe of bloud to haue moſt right, and therfoꝛe made moſt earneſt ſuite in their claime, John Ballyol, Robert Bꝛuce, and John Haſtings. This Robert Bꝛuce, was ſonne to the ſon of that Robert Bꝛuce, which maried Iſabell the yõgeſt daughter of Dauid Erle of Huntingtõ, on whome he got a ſon named alſo Robert, that maried the inheritoꝛ of Carryk, as we haue ſhewed befoꝛe, whoſe ſonne this Robert Bꝛuce was, that nowe claimed the crown. John Balliol came of Margaret, eldeſt daughter to the foꝛeſaid Dauid erle of Huntington: foꝛ Allane lozde of Galloway, which marryed the ſayde Margarete, begot on hir two daughters, of the which the eldeſt named Deruogil, was giuen in mariage vnto ſir John Ballyol, father vnto this John Ballyol, ẏ thus made clayme to the crowne, alledging that foꝛ ſomuch as he was come of the eldeſt daughter of Earle Dauid the bꝛother of king William, hee ought by reſon to be reputed as next heire to the ſame king William, ſith none other perſon aliue approched ſo neare vnto him in bloud.

On the other ſyde Robert Bꝛuce, albeit hee was deſcended of the youngeſt daughter to Earle Dauid, yet was he come of the firſte iſſue male, foꝛ his father was firſt bozne, and therefoꝛe if king William had deceaſſed without iſſue, the crowne had deſcended vnto him: foꝛ which conſideration, he mainteyned that he ought nowe to be pꝛeferred. Haſtings alſo foꝛ his part, becauſe hee was come of the yongeſt daughter of king Dauid, maryed to his father Hencie Haſtings, wanted not allegations to pꝛopone, why he ought to be admitted. Beſides theſe, there were other alſo that made claim to the crowne of Scotland, and had matter ſufficiẽt to mainteyn their ſute. This controuerſie being bꝛought befoꝛe the gouernoꝛs, was at ſundꝛy times argued with much cõtention, not without the aſſiſtance of the nobles fauoꝛing the parties, as occaſion of frendſhip oꝛ kynred moued them, namely Ballyol & Bꝛuce had no ſmall nũber ẏ leaned vnto their parts, by reaſon wherof, ẏ gouernoꝛs were in doubt to pꝛoceed to any definite ſentẽce in the mater, leſt if they declared one of thẽ king, an other wold attẽpt to vſurpe the crowne by foꝛce.

Herevpon they iudged it beſt to refer the deciſion of all this whole mater vnto ſome mightye king, whiche was of puiſſance able to conſtrayne the parties repugnant, to obey his ſentence.

Herevnto was none thought ſo meete as Edward king of Englãd, & therfoꝛe they choſe him, who taking the charge vpon him as competent iudge, pꝛomiſed by a certayne daye to come vnto Barwike, willing that their counſell might be aſſembled there againſt that time.

At his comming thither, at the day aſſigned, and hauing heard what could be ſayd on eache part, and thꝛoughly conſidering at length theyꝛ allegations, he pꝛeceyued the ſame doubtfull, and required a longer time to diſcuſſe ẏ troth by good aduiſe of counſel, & therfoꝛe required to haue .xij. of al the realme to be associate with .xij. English men, whiche he promised to chose for the of the most perfect and wyest clerkes that myght bee founde within all his dominions, to the intente that by their ripe & aduised debating of the matter, the trouth might appeare, accordyng to the whiche, he minded to giue sentence, without fauour eyther of one parte or other.

When all suche matters and proues as were propouned by the parties alleged by them for furtherance of their titles were put in writing, as matter of recorde, he returned backe agayne into Englande.

Here the Scottishe writers reporte, that king Edwarde vsed himselfe nothing vprightely in this matter, but accordingly as it often happeneth, had the eyes of his conscience blynded, vpon hope to gayne somewhat by this credit thus to him cõmitted. But how vniustly he is slaundered in this behalfe, I leaue to the indifferente readers to consider, by conferring that which the Scottes doe write thereof, with that which is to be founde in our Englishe historie. But to proceede as we fynd it in the Scottish writers: king Edward to be satisfied in knowlege of the truth, sent into France for men lerned & of great experience in the lawes, that he might haue their opinions in the demandes of ỹ parties for their doutfull righties. But (sayth Hector Boetius) he first cõmaunded them in no wise to agree vpon any resolute poynte, but rather to varie in opinions, that when the plea should seme doubtfull by reason of their contrarietie in deciding thereof, he might the better vnder that colour, giue iudgement with which parte he thought most expedient to serue his purpose.

Howbeit the most parte of the lawyers iudged with Robert Bruce, both for the worthines of his person, and also for that hee was come of the fyrst issue male.

But some there were that gaue sentence with John Ballyole, for that he was descended of the eldest sister.

King Edwarde supposing this to be the time moste conuenient for his purposed intention to conquere the realme of Scotlande, returned to Barwik, where he had appointed the .xviij. learned men before specified, to be present, that finall sentence myght be giuen, accordyng as he had before promised.

When he was come thus vnto Barwik, and the foresayd .xviij. learned lawyers assembled, as assistantes with him, and the parties appearing before him in a chamber prouided for ỹ purpose, he caused the dores to bee surely kepte, and the entries strongly warded, that no man myghte come in or out, but by his appointment & licẽce.

His purpose was to make hym king, that would be sworne to holde the crowne of Scotlande of him, as superiour lorde thereof.

And bycause he knewe that Roberte Bruce was a man of singular manhode and wysedom, he thought best to assay hym first, and if he sõd him not cõformable to his purpose, then he mynded to trie what the Balliol would doe.

When Robert Bruce had throughly hearde king Edwardes motion, he aunswered that he wayed the libertie of his countrey, more than his priuate preferrment, and therefore mynded not to deliuer his countrey, (whiche euer to that day had bene free) into the bondage and seruitude of the Englishmen.

The answere of Roberte Bruce.

King Edwarde perceyuing his stoutenesse of stomacke, brake off with him, and fell in talke with the Ballyole, who had suche blynde desire to attayne the crowne, that he passed not whether he enioyed the same in libertie or seruitude, so he might haue it.

Herevpon when this Ballyoll had giuen his fayth by assured othe vnto king Edward, that he would doe homage vnto him for the realme of Scotlande, and acknowledge to holde the same of him as superiour lorde, king Edwarde gaue sentence with him, to haue moste ryghte to the crowne and realme of Scotlande nowe thus in controuersie.

The Ballyol promiseth to do homage to king Edward.

It is sayde, that the Erle of Gloucester, a man of great prudence and authoritie in Englande, (seyng the Ballyol thus made king, and Robert Bruce without reason put backe) spake in thys sort to king Edward: Oh king, remembre what is done by thee this day, sparing to giue righteous sentence in this matter, for though the same bee nowe couered and hidde, it shall be reuealed, when the great iudge that searcheth consciences and the secretes of euery mans mynd, shal cause thee to answere for it at the dreadfull day of that vniuersall iudgement: thou hast nowe giuen sentence for a king; but then shall iudgemente be giuen on thee.

The saying of the Earle of Gloucester (as the scots write but not lyke to be true) K. Edwarde was no man so to be delt with.

Shortely after, John Ballyol went in great aray vnto Scone, where he was crowned king of Scotlande on saint Andrewes day, in the yere from the incarnation. 1292.

In the yeare next ensuing, on saint Stephes day in Christmasse, he came to Newcastel vpon Tyne, and there did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotlande, contrarye to the mynde and consent of all his nobles, for that by this meanes, hee seemed to submitte his realme (whiche had remayned in freedome vnto those dayes) into the seruitude of the Englishemen; but small felicitie succeeded thereof: for within fewe yeares after, king Edwarde commaunded hym by tenour of his bonde of homage, to come with all the power he might make to ayde him in his in his warres against the king of Fraunce.

King John incontinently herewith, became repentaunt, in that he had indaungered hymselfe thus by doing his homage: and therupon sent his ambassadours to king Edward, as then soiorning at London, to renounce his acte touching the same homage, alledging that forsomuche as it was done without the aduise of the thre estates of Scotland, it was of no force in it selfe, and not meete to be obserued.

King Edward answered these ambassadors thus: Sith we perceiue your king will not come vnto vs, we intend shortly to come vnto him. Herewith also he depriued him according to the maner, (so farreforth as might bee done in hys absence) of all his kingly authoritie.

And the better to accomplish his purposed intention against the Scots, he founde meanes to conclude a peace with the king of Fraunce, and for the more confirmation of the same peace, the French kings daughter was giuen in mariage to king Edward his son, neuertheles (as sayth the Scottish Chronicle) he purposed (when hee had wrought his will once against the Scottes) to inuade France as fiercely as before, notwithstanding any bonde of amitie, or mariage by him contracted.

After this, he procured ỹ frendship of Robert Bruce, and vpon promise (as it is to be thought) to make him king, the same Robert deliuered into king Edwarde his handes all suche castels as he helde in Scotlande.

John Ballyol the Scottish king, vnderstanding that king Edwarde entended to make a conquest vpon him, sent William bishop of Saint Androws, & Mathew bishop of Dunkeld, with sir John Sowlis, and sir Ingrame Umfrayuille into Fraunce, to renewe the auncient league betwixte him and Philyp the fourth as then king of Fraunce: whyche accordyngly was done: and for the more corroboration thereof, the eldest daughter of Charles Earle of Valloys and Angiewe, brother to king Philippe, was promised in mariage vnto Edwarde Ballyoll, the sonne of king John, whyche Edward should inioy landes of yearely rente and reuenues to the summe of xv. C. li. sterling, in places not of the demains belonging to the crown, as Ballienlle, Dampiere, Haretourte, and Hozney, which his father helde in Fraunce with Lanarke, Kidion, Maldesly, Cuntyngham, and the castell of Dundee, with the apurtenaunces in Scotland: and herto was annexed a prouiso, that if those seignories and places exceeded the value of xv. C. li. of yearely reuenues, then should the surplusage remaine to the king of Scotland: but if the same amounted not to that summe, then shoulde the sayd king make them good & supply ỹ same, with other rentes in Scotlande, or otherwise, as shuld be thought meete. And further, the sayde summe of xv. C. li. in yearely rente was assigned as it were the dower of the sayde Ladye, to enioye to hir selfe during hir lyfe after hir husbandes decease, if hir happe were to survyue him. In consideration wherof, king Philip couenanted to content and pay vnto king John in name of the mariage mony, the sum of lx. M. crowns, or (as other write) xxv. thousande pound Turnoise. The charter conteyning the articles, couenants and agreementes of this mariage & league aboue mencioned, beareth date at Paris, the xx. day of October, in the yeare of our Lorde. 1295. And the letters procuratorie made by king John vnto the said bishop of Saint Androws and the other his associates, bare date at Strivelyng, the third Nonas of July the same yeare.

Shortly herevpon, king John was aduertised that king Edwarde purposed to come and besiege Barwike: wherfore by aduise of his nobles he sent the most parte of all the lordes and gentlemen of Fyfe and Louthian vnto Barwike, to defende the towne against the comming, if he came to besiege it.

The gentlemen of Fyfe, and Louthian sent to Barwike to defend it against the Englishmen.

The Englishmenne came not onely with a mighty power by lande, but also wyth a greate nauye by sea towardes the saide towne of Barwyke: Of whose commyng the Scottes being aduertised, came forth against those that approched by sea, twelue. xviij. of their shippes, and chased awaye the residue.

Englishe shippes taken at Barwike.

King Edwarde rather prouoked than feared with this misaduenture, came with a far greater puissance than before, to renewe the siege: but when he perceyued his purpose toke not so speedy effect as he hoped it shoulde haue done, he deuised howe to take this towne by some slightefull policie.

Barwike besieged.

Herevpon he fayned as though he wold haue broken vp his siege, & so reysing his camp, withdrew a little from the towne, and then hauing prouided banners and ensignes, resembling altogether such as diuers noble men in Scotland vsed, he sodeynly returned towards the towne, euery one of his soldiors wearing a crosse of saint Androwes aboue on their harnois, after the maner of the Scottishmen.

The policie of king Edward to winne Barwike.

There were also sente before vnto the towne certayne Scottes that serued the kyng of England, whiche gaue knowledge to the captaynes within the towne, that their lord king John was comming with his armie to their succours.

The Scottes that were within the towne, beleeuing it had bin most true, set open the gates and came forth against their king (as they supposed) to haue receyued him with all ioye and gladnesse.

In Chron. Abindon. as I take it.

But when they came nere vnto the Engliſhmen, they perceyued both by their language and habite what they were: but this was not before the Engliſhmen were harde at the gates, ſo that when the Scottiſhmen would haue fledde backe to haue got into the towne agayne, the Engliſh men purſued them ſo faſte at the heeles, that they entred the gates with them, & ſo toke the towne with great ſlaughter, as well of the ſouldiours and men of warre, as alſo of women, childzen, & aged perſons, without all ruth or compaſſion, ſo that they lefte not one creature alyue of the Scottiſhe bloud within all that towne.

Thus was Barwike wonne the .xxx. day of Marche, in the yere. 1296.

Suche abundance of bloud was ſpilled thorough all partes of the towne (as the Scottiſhe Chronicles teſtifie) that where at a falling tyde the water was not able to dryue aboute the milnes, ſome of the ſame mylnes yet, were nowe at a lowe water ſet on gate, by reaſon the ſtreames were ſo hugely augmented with bloud. The abundāce of bloud ſpilled. Streames augmented with bloud.

There were ſlayne aboue. vij. thouſand perſons that day, with the greateſt parte of all the nobles and gentlemen of Fyfe and Louthian.

Kyng Iohn hearing of this ſlaughter of his people at Barwyk, in great deſire to be auenged, gathered his power, and ſent the ſame forth againſte king Edwarde, with whome they met not farre from Dunbar, and there encountring The Scots diſcomfited at Dunbar.

with hym in battayle, the Scottiſhe hoſte was diſcomfited, the moſte part of the Scottes being eyther ſlayne or taken.

The Erles of March and Menteth with .xx. knightes, fled to the caſtell of Dunbar, but they were beſieged ſo ſtraightly by the Engliſhe power, enuironning the Caſtell on eche ſide, that in the end they were conſtrayned for lack of victuals to yelde themſelues to king Edwarde, on condition to haue their lyues ſaued, which couenant was not obſerued (as the Scottiſhe wryters affirme:) for king Edwarde hauing got the into his handes, cauſed them forthwyth to bee put to death.

It was reported that Robert Bruce vpon ſecrete conference had with king Edwarde before this battaile at Dunbar, ſolicited all his frends in the Scottiſhe armie to flee vpon the firſt ioyning, whiche the reſidue perceyuing, were ſo diſcomforted, that incontinently they threw away both armour and weapon, and ſo were vanquiſhed without reſiſtance.

Trouth it is, that after this victorie, Robert Bruce ſubmitted himſelfe vnto king Edwarde, requiring him to performe his promiſe touching the right whiche he had to the crowne of Scotland: howbeit he receyued no anſwere to his lyking touching that requeſt: for king Edwarde had no leſſe deſire to enioy the kingdom of Scotland, than Bruce (as the Scottiſhe wryters affirme.) Therfore to caſt off Robert Bruce concerning his demaunde, he anſwered thus (as is ſayd) Beleeueſt thou that we haue nothing elſe a doe but to conquere realmes, and to delyuer them ouer againe vnto thee? The anſwere of king Edwarde to Robert Bruce.

Roberte Bruce hereby perceyuing the ſuttle meaning of king Edwarde, returned righte ſorowfull vnto his landes in Englande, hauyng great indignation in his mynde, that he had obeyde king Edwards requeſts: but yet conſidered with himſelf that he muſt ſuffer for the time, tyll occaſion ſerued to reuenge the iniuries receiued whiche he mynded to doe, and that in moſte cruell maner, as afterwardes it will appeare. The caſtels of Edenburgh & Striueling wonne.

King Edwarde after he had thus wonne the caſtell of Dunbar, got lykewiſe both the caſtels of Edenburgh and Striueling, & purſued king Iohn till he had conſtrayned him to take for his refuge the caſtell of Forfair. King Iohn driuen into the caſtell of Forfaire.

Herewith Iohn Cumyn lorde of Strabogy came came to kyng Edwarde, and was ſworne his liege man.

Shortly after, by a politik practiſe of the ſame John Cumyn, king John with his ſon Edward Ballyol came to Mountros, where perceyuyng himſelfe vnwyſely fallen into the hands of king Edward, through feare of death which he doubted by reaſon of the menacing wordes of king Edward, he ſuffred himſelf to be ſpoyled of al his kingly abiliments, and with a white wande in his hande (as the maner is) preſented himſelf before king Edward, reſigning there vnto him all the right and title which he had to the crowne of Scotland, vtterly renouncing the ſame both for him and his heires for euer.

Hereof was a charter alſo made in moſt ſufficient wyſe, confirmed with the hande and ſeale of king John, and other the nobles of Scotland ſubſtancially as might bee deuiſed, bearing date the fourth yeare of his reigne.

A charter.

After this, king Edwarde aſſembled all the lordes and barons of Scotlande at Berwyke, where he cauſed them to be ſworn his liege men, and to doe homage vnto hym as to their ſoueraigne lorde and ſupreme gouernour.

Homage of the barons of Scotland to king Edward.

And for the more ſuretie of their allegiaunce, he conſtrayned them to ſurrender into his hands all the ſtrengthes and holdes of the realme, bothe as well thoſe that ſtode on the ſea coaſtes, as alſo ſuche other as were ſituate in the inner partes of the countrey.

The holdes of Scotland deliuered into K. Edwarde his handes.

These things don, and order taken in eche behalf as was thought requiſite for ỹ quiet keping of the cõtrey, he ſent king John & his ſon Edwarde Ballyoll vnto London, where they were kept in ſtrong ward, tyll at length he ſuffred the ſayd king John to returne into Scotlande, but leauing ſtill his ſonne in pledge behynd him, leſt he ſhould attempte any newe rebellion after his departure.

John Ballyol kept as priſoner in Englãd.

King John vpon his returne into Scotland, perceyuing that he was in the hatred both of his lordes and commons, he withdrewe agayne of his owne accord into England, forſaking wholly the adminiſtration of the Scottiſh dominion, and finally wente ouer into Normandie to hys auncient inheritance and landes there, where at length falling blind, and waſting away by long age, he departed out of this worlde in the caſtell Gallyard, leauing thoſe landes which he poſſeſſed on that ſide the ſea, vnto his ſonne Edward Ballyoll, who beeing releaſed out of captiuitie, was come ouer to his father before his deceaſſe.

In the mean time king Edward hauing wel in remembrance the warres which he had intended to make againſt Frãce, had he not bin ſtayed thorough the buſineſſe of Scotlande, purpoſed now to purſue the ſame with all diligence: and therefore firſt garniſhing all the ſtrengthes and forts in Scotland to withſtãd the Scots, if they attempted any rebellion againſt him in his abſence, he appointed Hugh Creſſingham to be regent there, whileſt he ſhuld be occupied in Frãce, which Creſſingham before was Treaſourer.

King Edward his purpoſe to inuade Frãce.

Hugh Creſſingham regent of Scotland.

Then hauing prouided a great nauie of ſhips, hee paſſed ouer into Fraunce, truſtyng that the Scots would not ſturre, ſith they had of late ſuſteyned ſo many ouerthrows and ſore loſſes one after an other by the laſt warres: but tyrannie is of ſuch a nature, that by no kind of prouiſion it may any long tyme be ſurely defended.

For thoſe people that be oppreſſed by any tyrannicall ſeruitude, will not fayle to ſeeke to deliuer themſelues from the yoke of that importable burdeyne when ſoeuer opportunitie of tyme and occaſion ſeruyth.

King Edward burdened by the Scottiſh writers of tyrannie.

Therfore the lords of Scotlãd hauing knowledge that kyng Edwarde was paſſed the ſeas, they got them together ſtreightwayes, & aſſembled in counſel at Striuelyng, where by general agreement. xij. noble men were choſen to be gouernors of Scotland, euery one in their limittes appointed, that they might the better prouide to reſiſt the enimie.

Amongeſt theſe gouernours John Cumyn Erle of Buchquhan was principall, a man of great wyſedome and ſingular knowledge in all aſſayres, as well of peace as of warre.

This Earle of Buchquhan reyſed a myghtie armie, and with the ſame entred into Northumberland, wher he waſted with fyre and ſword all that countreye. After this, hee layde ſiege to Carleile, but he wanne nothing there, the towne was ſo well defended.

Iohn Cumyn.

In that ſeaſon alſo, the fame of William Wallace began to ſpring, a yong gentleman of ſo huge ſtature and notable ſtrength of bodye, with ſuche ſkil and knowlege in warlike enterpryſes, and hereto of ſuch hardineſſe of ſtomacke in attempting all manner of daungerous exploites, that his matche was not anye where lyghtly to be founde.

Willia Wallace beginneth to waxe famous.

He was ſonne to one ſyr Andrew Wallace of Cragy, knight, and from his youth bare euer an inwarde hatred agaynſt the Engliſh nation.

Sir Andrewe Wallace knight father to Willia Wallace.

Sundry notable frates alſo he wroughte againſt the Engliſhmen in defence of the Scots, and was of ſuche incredible force at his comming to perfecte age, that of him ſelfe alone, without all helpe, he would not feare to ſette vpon three or foure Engliſhemen at once, and vanquiſhe them.

When the fame therefore of his worthie actes was notified thorough the realme, manye were put in good hope that by his meanes the realme ſhoulde bee deliuered from the ſeruitude of the

Engliſhemen within ſhorte tyme after: And hereupon a great number of the Scottiſhe nation as well of the nobilitie as other, were readye to aſſiſte him in all his enterpriſes. By reaſon wherof he myght not bee eaſily entrapped nor taken of the Engliſhmen, that went aboute to haue got him into their handes.

At length, when occaſion ſerued to vſe the helpe of ſuche a notable chiefetayne, he was choſen by generall conſente of the Scottiſhmen as gouernour vnder Iohn Ballyoll, to deliuer his countrey from bondage of the Engliſh nation.

At the ſame tyme many Abbeyes and ſpirituall benefices in Scotlande were in Engliſhe mēs handes. Neuertheleſſe this William Wallace by commiſſion hadde of Willyam Fraſer Biſhop of Sainct Andrewes, auoyded and put them forth of all partes of Scotlande, leauing neyther temporall nor ſpirituall perſon of theyr bloud within that realme.

For ſhortely after, by publike authoritie, he receiued the armie that Iohn Cumyn Erle of Buchquhan had led before, & conſtrayned thoſe Scottes that fauoured kyng Edward, to obey his commaundementes, in renouncing all ſuch faith and promiſe as they had giuē or made vnto him. This done, he paſſed forth with greate puiſſance againſt the engliſhmen, that held ſundry caſtels within Scotlande, and with greate hardineſſe and manhode he wan the caſtelles of Forfair, Dundee, Brechen, & Mountros, fleaing all ſuch ſouldiers as he founde within them.

Wallace nowe ioyfull of this his proſperous ſucceſſe, and hearing that certaine of the chiefeſt capitaines and officers of thoſe Engliſhemen ỹ kepte the caſtell of Dunoter, were gone forth to conſulte with other Engliſhemen of the fortes nexte to them adioyning, came ſodeynly to the ſayd caſtel, and toke it, not leauing a man aliue of all thoſe whiche he found as then within it. Dunoter won by William Wallace.

Then after he had furniſhed that holde wyth his owne ſouldiors in moſte defenſible wiſe, hee went to Abyrden.

The towne he founde in maner voyde of all the inhabitants, but the caſtell was ſo ſtrongly garniſhed with men and munitiō, that conſidering it might not be won without great murder, he reyſed from thence and returned into Angus.

King Edwarde as then beeing in Fraunce, hearing of theſe exploits atchieued by this Wallace his aduerſarie, ſent dyuers noble captaines vnto his lieutenāt Hugh Creſſingham with an armie into Scotland to redreſſe the matter. Hugh Creſſingham ſent into Scotlande.

Wallace in the meane tyme had layde ſiege vnto the caſtell of Couper, but nowe being aduertiſed of the comming of this armie againſte hym, he reyſed his ſiege, and wente to Striueling to defend the bridge there, that Hugh Creſſingham with his armye ſhoulde not paſſe the ſame, accoryding (as the reporte wente) his intent was to doe.

Heere encountryng with the enimies the thirde Ides of September, he obtayned a righte worthie victorie, for he ſlewe not only the forſayde Creſſingham with a greate parte of his armye beeing paſſed the ryuer, but alſo forced the reſidue to flee, in ſuche ſorte, that a greate number of them were drowned, and fewe eſcaped awaye with lyfe.

Thus hauing gotten the vpper hande of his enimies here at Striueling, hee returned againe to the ſiege of Couper, whyche ſhortely after vppon his returne thyther, was rendred vnto hym by thoſe that were within in garriſon. The caſtell of Couper rendred to Wallace.

There were many of the Scottiſhe nobilitie the ſame tyme, that ſente vnto hym, offeryng to leaue the king of Englands part, and to ayde him with money and victuals, if he would onlye receyue them into fauoure, wherevnto hee graunted.

to

By which meanes sundry other castels were yelded vnto him, the whiche after he had garnished with men, munition, and victuals (accordingly as was thought requisite) he brake vp his campe, and went with sundrie of his most faithfull frendes vnto the castell of Striueling.

Dearth in Scotlande.

The policie of Wallace to relieue the peoples lacke in tyme of dearth.

Afterwardes perceyuing that through scarcitie of corne, great dearth rose on eche side within the realme of Scotland, he deuised which way he might best relieue the peoples necessitie & lack in that behalfe, and herevppon he determined to passe with a mightie armie into Englande, and wasting and spoyling the countreye euen vnto Newcastell.

Thus putting the enimies in great feare and terrour of his awfull name, he brought his army backe againe into Scotlande loden with spoyle and glorie of their prosperous atchieued iorney.

They entred into Englande (as Johannes Maior writeth) about the feaste of all Saintes, and remayned there till Candelmas after, liuing still vpon the spoyle of the Englishmens goodes.

King Edwards message vnto Wallace.

Edward king of Englande beeing enformed of the greate slaughter of his people, and what damage the Scottes had done in Northumberlande, hee returned in greate displeasure out of Fraunce into Englande, and sent his ambassadors vnto Wallace, sore menacing him, for that he had inuaded his realme in suche cruell wise in his absence, which he durst (as he sent him word) ful little haue done, if he had bin at home himself.

The answere of Wallace to king Edwards message as the Scots do write

Wallace herevnto answered, that he had taken the aduauntage for the atchieuing of his enterprise, touching the inuasion of Englande, in lyke sort as king Edward had done for the conquest of Scotlande, at suche tyme as hee was chosen by the nobles of the realme as indifferent Iudge in decision of the right and lawfull title of the parties that strone and were at contention for the crowne.

And further, to the ende it might appere vnto king Edward, that he inuaded Englande in defence of his owne native countrey, and that he was fully bent to employe his whole endeuor to deliuer the same from all manner of subiection to any forraine power, and to reuenge the iniuries done by the Englishmen in tyme past, he willed the Englishe ambassadors to declare from hym vnto king Edward, that he purposed to hold his Easter in Englande (if God fortuned him lyfe) and that in despite of king Edward and al such as would beare armour against him.

And vndoubtedly according to his promise, he kept his day: for assemblyng together an armye of. xxx. thousend men, he entred into Englande at the tyme before appointed, where king Edwarde was readie with an armie vpon Stanesmore, double in number to the Scots, to giue them to soiorne there the moste parte of the winter in susteyning the whole number of his men of war on suche prouision as they might fynde within the boundes of their enimies countrey.

He commaunded therfore that all the Scots appointed to goe with him in that iourney, shuld be readie at a certaine day and place prefixed, but dyuers of the Northerne Scottes (as they of Aberden and other) for that they disobeyed his commaundements sette forth by letters and proclamations, were hanged as rebelles and traytours to theyr countrey.

Disobedience punished.

By whose example, other being put in feare, his commaundementes were the better obeyed, so that hauing got together an huge host of men, he entred with the same into Northumberlande, them battayle: but when the tyme came, that both parties were ready to haue ioyned, the Engliſhemen withdrewe, hauing no luſt, as ſhould ſeeme, to fyght with the Scottes at that tyme, who perceyuing them to giue back, incontinently woulde haue ruſhed forthe of their rankes to haue purſewed in chaſe after them: but Wallace doubting leaſt the Engliſhemen had ment ſome policie, cauſed the Scottes to keepe together in order of battayle, and ſo preſeruing them from the deceytfull malice of their enimies, broughte them backe into Scotlande with lyues and honours ſaued, beſides the infinite ſpoyle and bootes, which they got in this iorney.

But as in the beginning all men were glad to ſupport Wallace in all exploytes and enterpriſes which he toke in hand, ſo afterwards whē his fame began to waxe great, to the derogation of other mennes renoumes, ſuche as were farre his ſuperiours in birth and lignage, that fauour which many bare him at the firſt, was now turned into Enuie, hauyng no ſmall indignation, that a man of ſo baſe parentage, ſhoulde ſo ſurmount them in all honour and dignitie.

Thoſe that enuied him moſt, were of the Cumyns bloud, and Robert Bruce.

King Edwarde beeing aduertiſed of this enuious grudge and new ſedition amongſt the nobles of Scotlande, had ſecrete conference by his agentes with the chiefeſt amongeſt thoſe that thus enuied the high glorie of Wallace, and vpon truſt of ſuche practiſe as was concluded by reaſon of the ſame conference, hee came with a mightie armie into Scotland, and at Falkyrke mette with this Wallace, who myſtruſting no guyle, had rayſed a power to reſiſt him: but now being come in ſight of the Engliſhmen, ther roſe a ryght odious contention betwirte the head capitayns, who ſhuld haue the leading of the vantgarde, whiche is reputed a moſte high honour amongſt the Scottiſhmen.

Wallace rayſeth a power to reſiſt him.

Striſe for the leading of the vauntgarde.

And amongſt other, Stewarde and Cumyn thought ſkorne, that Wallace, a man of ſo low beginning, ſhoulde bee preferred before them in that honour: But on the other parte, Wallace conſyderyng that the charge of the whole was giuen vnto hym by agreemente and conſente of the three eſtates, thonghte it no reaſon that hee ſhould giue place to any of them.

In the meane tyme came the Engliſhemen vpon thē right fiercely, before the Scottiſh chieftains (hauing their breſtes filled with more malice one againſt an other, than with deſire to defend theyr countrey againſt their enimies) could bryng their men into any perfecte araye.

Herewith at the cōming to the poynt of ioyning, the Cumyns wyth theyr retinues fled out of the fielde, and lefte the reſidue of the Scots in all the daunger.

Robert Bruce ſeruing that day amongſt the Engliſhmen, fetched a compaſſe about an hill, & came on the backes of the Scottes, ſo that they were in maner compaſſed in, & beaten downe on eche ſide: Yet Wallace left nothing vndon that might pertaine to the dutie of a valiant captain. But at length all his endeuors notwithſtāding, the Scots (ouerſet with multitude of enimies) (as the Scottiſh writers affirme) were ſlayne in ſuch huge numbers, that he was conſtrayned to draw out of the field with ſuche ſmall remnant, as were left alyue.

The Engliſhmen purſued fiercely after hym, and namely one valiant captayne named Frere Bryan Jay, a Templer, whome Wallace perceyuing to be within his daunger, ſtepped forth vnto hym, and ſlewe him there in ſyght (as it is ſayd) of all the Englyſhe armie: Whiche valiaunt acte of Wallace, cauſed the Engliſh men

In this infortunate battaile wer ſlain on the Scottiſhe ſide, John Stewarde of Bute wyth his Brandanes (for ſo they name them that are taken vp to ſerue in the warres forth of the Stewardes landes) Mackduff erle of Fyfe, with ſir John Graham, whoſe death was much lamented by Wallace, as one whome he highly eſteemed for his great experience in warlyke knowledge.

Nobles of Scotland ſlayn at the battayle of Falkyrke.

Many other noble and valiant men dyed in this conflict, whoſe names wold be to long to reherſe.

This batail was ſtricken on Mary Magdalens day, in the yere of our Lorde. 1298. and therfore the Engliſhmē haue holden it euer ſithence an happy day for to fight againſt Scottes.

Mary Magdalens day proſperous for the Engliſhemen to fyghte againſte Scots.

Wallace after thys diſcomfiture, came to Perth, and there vttering by complaint the iniurious enuie of the nobles againſt hym, he renoūced and diſcharged hymſelfe of all the auctoritie which had bin committed to his hands, touching the gouernance of the realme.

Wallace renounceth his office.

The ſame tyme, Philip king of Fraunce the fourth of that name, and ſurnamed le Beau, hauing great ruth in his heart for the miſerable calamities thus chaunced to his auncient confederate frendes the Scottes, and that chiefly for the quarell of Fraunce, ſente his ambaſſadors vnto Edward king of Englande, who had lately before maryed his daughter, requiryng that there might be ſom peace or abſtinēce of war grāted.

Philip king of Fraunce.

At his requeſt therefore a truce was taken betwixt the Scottes and Engliſhemen, to endure from the feaſt of all Saincts, til the feaſt of Pentecoſt next following.

A truce.

The Scottes in the meane tyme ſore oppreſſed by reaſon of long warres, ſent ambaſſadors to Pope Boniface, in preſenting a right greuous complaint vnto him for the great affliction done to them by king Edwarde, who was fully bente by iniurious meanes (as they alledged) to conquere their realme, and therefore they beſoughte hym to conſtreyne king Edwarde by vertue of his prerogatiue which he pretended to haue ouer the realme of Englande, to ſtand to his order in deciding the right cōcerning ẏ liberties of Scotland, which might no otherways be determined, but by intollerable damage falling to the people thorough blynd deſire and couetous ambition of the nobles, contending for the crowne.

Scottiſh ambaſſadors ſent to Pope Boniface.

The Pope (as is ſaid) after he had by good and deliberate aduiſe heard the matter, gaue ſentence with the Scottes, that they had iuſte cauſe of warres in defence of the liberties of their cōtrey againſt king Edward and his fautors.

The opinion of the Pope.

The Scots ſomewhat recomforted herewith, ſhortly therevppon chooſe John Cumyn to their gouernour, in purpoſe to trie with the Engliſhemen for their liberties. Wherof king Edwarde being aduertiſed, ſente forthwith an armie into Scotlande, which paſſed thorough the countrey to Saint Johns towne, with greate damage of thoſe that were adiudged rebelles to king Edwardes Empire.

John Cumyn elected gouernour of Scotland.

An armie of Engliſhmen ſent into Scotlande.

All the countrey in manner vnto Forthyr at this ſeaſon was ſubiect to the Engliſhemen, ſauing ſuche fewe of the inhabitauntes, as lyued within the woods, hauing more regard to the ancient liberties of their countreye, than to any deſire of preſeruing their goodes or lyues.

John Cumyn therefore deſirous to redreſſe this heaue miſerie and lamentable caſe of his countrey, admitted Symon Fraſer fellow with him in the adminiſtratiō of the warres, againſt the Engliſhmen, and therwith gathering an army of .viij. thouſand hardy men of warre, ſetteth in hande to reuēge the iniurious doings of the enimies, chaſing out of the realme all ſuch officers with their ſeruauntes as king Edward had placed in any romthes within the bounds of Scotland, and ſuche as reſiſted hee purſued in moſte cruell wyſe, not ſparyng to put them vnto the ſwoorde in all places where hee might fynde them.

King Edwards officer chaſed out of Scotland.

King Edwarde ſore kyndeled in diſpleaſure with theſe attempts of ſuche deſperate perſons, reyſed an armie of thirtie thouſand men, and ſent the ſame into Scotlande vnder the leading of a right ſtoute and valiant capitayne named Radulph or Rafe Confray.

Scotlande gayn inuaded.

Radulph Confraye. I remember not that any of the Engliſh nobilitie hath this ſurname in theſe dayes, wherefore I thinke it the lord Segraue.

This Radulph at his comming into Scotlande, toke ſmall regarde to the ordering of his field, but deuided his armie into three partes, euery part conteining .x. thouſand men, and appointed them to paſſe forth to forrage the countrey, and to mete altogither at Roſlyn, in ſuche ſort and tyme as he preſcribed. John Cumyn & Symon Fraſer being aduertiſed hereof, gathered their powers together, to the nūber of .viij. or viij. thouſand men, and determined to try the chance of battayle with one part of the Engliſh armye firſt, truſting that if they happed to haue the vpper hande of one of the three parts, the other two would be the more eaſy to deale with.

John Cumyn & Symon Fraſer.

The Scottiſh captains reſolued thus vpon that point, exhorted their people to remēber how they were to fight in defence of their wiues, their children, their goods and liberties of their countreye, againſt ſuch as ſought to bring them into thraldome and vile ſeruitude.

With which wordes the Scottes were ſo emboldned, that minding either to die or to winne the victorie, they gaue the onſette ſo fiercely on their enimyes, that the fyrſte battayle of the Engliſh-

Englishemen was quickely ouerthrowen and banquished.

But scarcely hadde they gathered the spoyle, theyr fresshe wonne victorie, got themselues speedyly into array, and receyued their enimies with suche incredible manhood, that they had quickely got the vpper hande of these also. But vnethe had they made an ende with this seconde battayle, when the thirde parte was at hande readie to charge them, beeing nowe sore enfeebled, what thorough wearynesse and woundes receyued in the two former encountres, besydes the want of suche of theyr numbers as were slayne: yet by exhortation of theyr Capitaynes, and the valyaunt presence of the officers of bandes besyde, they rushed forthe on their enimies with suche earnest forewardenesse to receyue them, that after a syghte sharpe bickering, they put the whole number of them to flight.

Fewe of the Englyshmen hadde escaped the Scottishmens handes, had they not ben so awearyed with continuall fyghte, that they were not able to followe anye greate waye in the chase.

Thys victorie fell to the Scottes in manner as before is rehersed vppon Sainct Mathewes daye, in the yeare after the byrthe of oure Sauiour. 1302. The glorye of thys victorie was greate, consydering that thirtie thousand Englishemen well furnyshed, and thoroughly appoynted for warre, shoulde be thus in one daye banquished with an handfull of Scottishmen. For as theyr Hystories make mention, they passed not eyghte thousande at the moste: and therefore all menne supposed, that it came to passe by the singular fauoure and grace of almyghtie GOD. But yet the Scottes dyde not long enioye the benefytes of so notable a victorie.

For kyng Edwarde hearyng of thys discomfiture of his people at Roslyng, gathered a myghtie armye of Englishemenne, Gascoynes, Irishemen, and suche Scottes as tooke hys parte, and hauyng all hys furniture and purueyaunce readye bothe by sea and lande, he set forwarde with the same to inuade the Scots on eche side.

The Scottes perceyuyng they were not of puissaunce able to resist his inuasion, withdrew to their strengthes: by meanes wherof the Englishe armie passed through all Scotland, euen from the South partes to the North, and found fewe or none to make resistance, except Wallace and suche as followed his opinion, whyche were fledde to the mountaynes and woddes to eschewe the malice of the Englishmen.

The englishe armie passeth through Scotland from the South parts to the North.

It is sayde, that king Edwarde requyred by a messenger sente vnto thys Wallace, that if he woulde come in and be sworne his lyege man and true subiecte, he shoulde haue at his handes greate Lordshippes and possessions within Englande to mayntayne his porte as was requisite to a manne of righte honourable estate. But Wallace refused these offers, saying that he preferred libertie with small reuenues in Scotlande, before any possession of landes in Englande, were the same neuer so greate, considering he myght not enioye them, but vnder the yoke of bondage.

Wallace refuseth the offers of K. Edward.

The Castell of Sterlyng at the same tyme was in the kepyng of one sir William Uthred knighte, who woulde not render it to king Edwarde by any summonaunce or other meanes, tyll after three moneths siege he was constrayned to gyue it ouer vnder these conditions, that all persons being within the castell, shoulde departe by safe conduyt with bagge and baggage at their pleasure.

The castell of Sterling rendred.

Neuertheless K. Edward caused the said sir Willia Uthred to be conueyd to London, wher he remained as prisoner many yeares after.

Sundry other Caſtelles were taken by force the ſame tyme by king Edwarde, and all ſuche as reſiſted, beyng founde within anye of them, ſlayne without mercie or raunſome.

The caſtell of Vrquhard taken by force.

Amongeſt other, the caſtell of Urquhard in Murraylande was taken by force, and not one lefte alyue that was founde in the ſame (one Gentlewoman only excepted) who beyng great with chylde was in that reſpecte preſerued.

She was the wyfe of Alexander Boyis lord of that houſe, though by reaſon ſhe was got into poore apparell, the Engliſhmen toke hir but for ſome other woman of meaner eſtate.

She therefore with hir lyfe ſaued being ſuffered to depart, got hir ouer into Ireland, where ſhe was delyuered of a ſonne, that was named at the Font ſtone Alexander, the whiche when Scotlãd was recouered out of the Engliſhmẽs hands, came to king Robert le Bruce, requiring him to be reſtored vnto his fathers heritage, being as then in the occupation of other poſſeſſors.

King Robert doubtfull what to doe herein, for he thought it neyther cõuenient that a prince ſhoulde take landes or poſſeſſions from noble menne, whyche hadde bene gyuen to them in rewarde of theyr manhode, ſhewed in defence of the realme, neyther iudged hee it reaſon to keepe hym from his rightfull inheritaunce that hadde loſte hys father, his friendes, and all his whole ſubſtaunce in the lyke cauſe and quarell by iniurie of the common enimies. Wherefore to qualifie the matter, hee deuyſed thys meane: he gaue vnto thys Alexander Boyis certayne other landes in Mar, nothyng leſſe in value, (conſideryng the largeneſſe and fertilitie) than the other of Urquharde were: and willed hym to content hym ſelfe with thoſe, in recompence of ſuche as belonged to his father: to the intent that all parties myght bee ſatisfied, and no man ſhoulde ſeeme to haue wrong in being depriued of his rightfull poſſeſſions.

This Alexander Boyis hadde afterwardes hys name chaunged, and was called Forbes, for that he ſlewe a Beare in thoſe parties by greate and ſingular manhode.

The beginning of the name of Forbeſſe.

And ſo the ſurname of the Forbeſſes had begynning, as deſcended from hym.

Scotlande beyng ſubdewed by the mightye puiſſaunce of kyng Edwarde, he wente aboute to abolyſhe all the olde Statutes and auncyente conſtitutions of the Realme, truſtyng by that meanes, that Scottes lyuyng togyther wyth Engliſhemen, vnder one vniforme maner of Lawes, they ſhoulde fynally ſort themſelues to bee of one mynde and opinion, as wel touchyng the ſupreme gouernemente of theyr publyque weale, as alſo in all other thyngs, touchyng the frendly ſocietie of lyfe.

Chronicles other bookes brent.

Hee brente all the Chronicles of the Scottyſhe Nation, with all manner of Bookes, as well thoſe conteynyng diuine ſeruice, as anye other Treatyſes of prophane matters, to the ende that the memorye of the Scottes ſhoulde periſhe: and thereto appoynted greeuous puniſhementes for them that ſhoulde diſobeye hys commaundementes herein, in keeping any of the ſayde bookes vndefaced. And he ordeyned alſo, that the Scots ſhuld occupie church bookes after the vſe of Sarum, and none other.

Scottiſh learned, maunded be reſident Oxforde.

Moreouer, he cõpelled al ſuch Scottiſhmen as wer of any ſingular knowledge in lerning or literature, to be reſident in Oxford, doubting leſt the Scottiſh nobilitie encreacing in politik prudence by their inſtructions, ſhould ſeeke to throw off the yoke of bondage. Thus king Edward going about (as the Scottiſh writers do report) to extinguiſh the name of Scots together with their rule & empire, paſſed through the moſt part of all the bounds of Scotlande, and vppon verye hate whyche he hadde to the Scottiſhe antiquities, at his comming to Camelon, he commaunded the round temple ſtanding ouer againſt the ſame, to be throwne downe, which was builded (as before is ſhewed) in the honour of Claudius the Emperor, and the goddeſſe Victoria. But for that his commandemẽt was not immediatly put in execution, he chaunged his purpoſe and apointed only that the monumẽts of Claudius with the ſuperſcription of his name ſhould be taken away, and in place therof, the armes of king Arthur, with his name to be ſet vp, commanding the place to be called Arthurs hoik (as ye wouide ſay) Arthurs Courte.

Moreouer king Edward at his returning into Englãd, toke the chaire of Marble with him, and cauſing it to be conueyd vp to London, dyd place it at Weſtminſter, where it remaineth yet vnto this daye. Furthermore, before his departure out of Scotlãd, he apointed al the Scottiſh lordes to aſſemble at Scone, where he cauſed them to take a newe othe, that from thencefoorth they ſhoulde take him for their ſoueraigne lord, & to obey him in al things as loyal ſubiects.

All the nobilitie of Scotlande was ſworne to hym that daye (Wallace onely excepted) who eſchewed more than the companye of a ſerpent, to haue any thing to doe with the Engliſhmen, touching any agreement to be made with them, agreeable to their deſires.

Moreouer to kepe the Scottes from rebellion; king Edwarde ordeyned Odomare de Valence to be gouernor there as his general lieutenaunt ouer the whole realme of Scotlande in his abſẽce. And hauing thus ſet al things in good and quiet order (as he ſuppoſed) he returned into Englande with great ioy and triumph.

In the meane time John Cumyn ſurnamed the reddе, and Roberte Bruce hauing conference together, complayned the one to the other of the myſerable ſeruitude wherein the Realme of Scotlande as then ſtoode by the oppreſſion of king Edward. And at length vpon offers made betwixte them, it was agreed, that if by anye meanes they myght deliuer the Realme out of the Engliſhmens hands, the one of them ſhould be king, that is to witte the Bruce, and the other that is to ſay the Cumyn, ſhoulde enioy all the Bruces landes and poſſeſſions, with many other prefermentes of honoures and dignities as nexte vnto him in all authoritie touchyng the gouernement of the realme.

There were Indentures made betweene them, ſubſcribed wyth theyr names, and ſealed with theyr ſeales interchaungeably, for the full ratifying of couenauntes agreed in thys confederacie betwixte them.

And ſhortely after vppon deliuerie of thoſe writings, Bruce wente into Englande, for he myght not remayne long in Scotlande, for doubte of ſuſpition, whiche kyng Edwarde had in hym, bicauſe of the title whiche he had to the Crowne of Scotlande, as before is ſpecifyed; inſo muche (as was thoughte) kyng Edwarde woulde haue put bothe hym and his brotherne vnto death long before, if he myght haue once get them all into his handes.

John Cumyn doth doubt.

John Cumyn (after that hee and Bruce were thus agreed vppon Articles, and departed the one from the other) beganne to doubt, leaſt this conſpiracie deuiſed betwixte them, woulde not ſorte to anye luckye concluſion for his purpoſe, eyther for that hee feared the greate puiſſaunce of kyng Edwarde, eyther elſe for that his authoritie and power (as hee myſtruſted) woulde not bee greate, if the Bruce once atteyned the Crowne: And herevppon hee ſente one of his ſeruauntes vnto kyng Edwarde, with his counterpane of the Indenture conteynyng the couenauntes of the conſpiracie, ſigned and ſealed wyth Bruces owne hande and ſeale.

Cumyn diſcloſeth the conſpiracie.

The meſſenger delyuered this writing in ſecrete wyſe vnto king Edwarde, declaryng vnto him the whole matter as it was paſſed and concluded betwixt the Bruce and his maiſter, accordyng to inſtructions gyuen hym in ỹ behalf.

But king Edwarde at the firſt gaue lyghte credite eyther to the writings or wordes of the Cumyn, ſuppoſyng that the ſame proceded only through enuie, whiche he bare towardes the Bruce, euer dreading leaſt he ſhoulde beare no rule in Scotland, if the Bruce once atteined any authoritie within the ſame.

At lengthe yet, king Edward pondering with himſelfe the whole circumſtance, and beeing in ſome doubte of the matter, he ſhewed the counterpane of the Indenture vnto Bruce himſelfe, queſtionyng with him, if he knew his own hand.

The Bruce ſtoutely denyed that he was pri-uie to any suche deuyse or writyng, and therefore desyred of kyng Edwarde to haue the same for one nyghte to perúse and scanne ouer at leysure, and then if he were not able to proue that it was forged and maliciously deuised vpon an enuious purpose to put him in daunger of lyfe, he would forfait all his landes and lyuings that he helde eyther within the realme of Englande or elsewhere.

King Edwarde bicause he coniectured at the fyrste howe thys accusation of Cumyn was, nothing lyke to bee true, graunted his request, wherein many iudged he dydde vnwysely: but suche was the ordinaunce of almightie GOD, that Bruce should escape that danger to accomplishe that whereunto he was appointed.

The Erle of Glocester immediatly after that Robert Bruce was departed frō the kings presence, sent vnto him .xij. sterling pennies, wyth two sharpe spurres, whereby he coniectured his meaning to be, that the best shift for him was to auoyde out of the waye in moste speedy wyse, whervpon he caulyng a smyth to shoe. iij. horses for him, contrarily with ỳ calkyns forward, that it should not bee perceyued whiche way he had taken by the tracte of the horses for that the ground at that time (being in the winter season) was couered with snowe: hee departed oute of London aboute midnighte, accompanyed onely with two truslie seruantes.

It chaunced also, that ther fell the same night more snow aloft vpon the other snow that was fallen before, by reason whereof it could not bee iudged in the morning which way he was gon, though king Edward vpon knowlege had that he was fled, sent out a great mayny of horsmen after, to haue brought him againe, if they might any where haue founde him.

He commeth to Lochmaben.

But the Bruce hasted forth with such speede in his iourney, that the .vij. day after his departure from London, hee came to Lochmaben in Annandale, and there found Dauid (or as some bookes haue) Edward his brother, with Roberte Flemeyn, a worthie young Gentleman, vnto whom (they musing what he ment by his sodain comming) he declared into what perill of lyfe he had fallen by meanes of the Cumyn, and howe narowly he had escaped oute of king Edwardes handes.

A seruaunt of Cumyns taken with letters on him.

His brother hearing the matter, consented to goe wyth him, and to be partaker of all happes that might fortune to fall out in his flighte: and by the way they chaunced to light vpon one of Cumyns seruantes, that was going with letters vnto king Edwarde from hys mayster, the said Cumyn, signifying by ỳ same, that if Bruce were not the sooner put to death, there would ensue shortely suche trouble and ruffling in Scotlande agaynste kyng Edwarde, that it woulde bee muche adoe to appeale it.

These letters beyng founde vppon Cumyns seruaunt, thorough meanes of yong Flemeyn, the Bruce after he had apposed the bearer thoroughly in eche behalfe, and learned of him that his maister the sayde Cumyn was in the Fryers at Domfryse, he first slewe this fellow that was thus sente with the letters, and after in all haste possible came to Dounfryse by the guyding of the same Flemeyn, where in the Quyer of the the Fryers churche there, he found the Cumyn: and reasoning the matter with hym, for that he had vsed him so euill, and withall shewing hym the indenture whiche king Edwarde had deliuered to him, as before is mencioned, in the ende after some multiplying of wordes together, Robert Bruce plucked forth his swoorde, and stroke the forsayde Cumyn a sore blowe in the belly, and therupon fleeing out of the Churche, mette with two of his dearest frendes, James Lyndsey, and Roger Kyrkpatryke, who beholding his countenance altered, and comming forth of the churche in suche haste, demaunded of hym what was the matter: I trowe (said he) that Cumyn is slayne.

Cumyn was the Fryers in Dunfreis.

Why (sayd they againe) hast thou attempted so hyghe an enterpryse, and lefte it doubtefull? And immediatly herewith they went to the place where Cumyn lay wounded (as before is mencioned) and asked of hym whether he thoughte he had any deathes wounde or, hoped to recouer if he myght haue a good Surgion. and for that he answered howe he trusted to doe wellynough if he might haue a good surgion in tyme: they gaue him three or foure other woundes so greuous and deadly, that forthwith vppon the same, he yelded vp the ghost.

Cumyn is slayne. 1305.

This chanced in the yeare of our Lord. 1305. the fourth Ides of Februarie.

Aboute the same tyme was William Wallace taken at Glaskow by the meanes of sir John Menteth and other, in whome he had euer put a moste speciall truste: but they beeing corrupted with the offers of large rewardes promysed by king Edwarde to suche as coulde helpe to take him, wrought suche fetches that he was apprehended at length by Odomare de Valance Erle of Penbroke, who with a greate power of men brought him to London, where hee was put to death, and his quarters sent into Scotlande, and set vp in sundry great townes there for a spectacle, as it were, to giue ensample to other. Thys was the ende of that puissant champion William Wallace, praysed amongest the Scotishmen aboue all other in that age, for so muche as hee woulde neuer yelde or consent to acknowledge any superiorite in the Englishemen ouer hys countrey, countrey, no not when all other had ſubmitted themſelues to king Edward as his liege ſubiects and moſt obedient vaſſals.

It is ſayde, that when hee was young and went to ſchole, he learned by hearte two verſes of his ſchoolemaiſter, which euer after hee bare in mynde, and vſually woulde reherſe them, which were as followe.

Dico tibi verum, libertas optima rerum, Nunquam ſeruili, ſub nexu viuito fili.

Whiche maye be Engliſhed thus.

My ſonne, I ſay, freedome is beſt,
Then neuer yelde to thralles arreſt.

BVt now touchyng the Bruce: after hee hadde ſlayne the Cumyn (as before is mencioned) he purchaſed an abſolutiõ from Rome for that acte, & to ẏ end he might then through authoritie obtaine ſome ayde to reſiſt ẏ puiſſance of his aduerſarie K. Edward, he went by ſupport of frends vnto Scone, & there cauſed himſelf to be crowned king, on the 27. day of Marche, though he had no great nũber that toke his parte in the beginning, as ſhortely after well appered. For when he ſhould aſſemble an armie againſt a power of Engliſhmen that were ſent againſt him by K. Edward, immediatly vpon knowledge had of his attemptes, hee was not able to get togither any ſufficiẽt number to reſiſte his aduerſaries, though with thoſe few which came vnto him, he thought to try the chaunce of bataple, and ſo encountryng wyth Ddomare de Valence lieutenant of the engliſh armye at Meffene the. xix. daye of June, in the yeare. 1306. he was ther put to flight: and though the ſlaughter was not great, yet for that it was iudged to be an euill ſigne to haue ſuche infortunate lucke vpon his entring into the eſtate, the peoples fauour ſhranke greatly from him.

Absolution from Rome.

Ddomare de Valence after he had obteyned this victorie againſt king Roberte, baniſhed the wiues of all thoſe that ſupported the ſame Robert, by meanes whereof many ladies and gentlewomen were conſtrayned to flee into woodes, and other deſert places, to eſchewe the cruelties of their aduerſaries. King Robert alſo after this ouerthrow, fled into Athole, where the. iij. Ides of Auguſt at a place called Dalry, he fought agayne with the Cumyns and other ſuche Scots and engliſhmen as were aſſembled in thoſe parties readie to purſewe him, and had the like luck here that had chaunced to him before at Meffen, for he was put to flight after the ſame manner, though he loſt here but fewe of his men, neither in the fyght nor chaſe.

Wherevpon fynding Fortune thus contrarie vnto him in theſe two ſeuerall batayles, he was left ſo deſolate and vnprouided of all frendſhip, that he was conſtrayned for his refuge to withdrawe into the woodes and mountaynes, with a fewe other in his companye, and there lyued on herbes and rootes, oftentymes for want of other foode.

The miſerable ſtate of king Robert in the beginning of his reigne.

Whyleſt he remayned in this eſtate of aduerſe Fortune, there were two that ſhewed themſelues ryghte truſtie and faithfull ſeruantes vnto hym aboue all the reſte, the Earle of Leuenax, and Gilberte Hay: for though eyther enforced by perſecution of enimyes, or conſtrained through ſome other neceſſitie, they departed ſometymes from his preſence, yet didde they euer acknoweledge hym for theyr Soueraygne lorde and only king, readie at all ſeaſons to ſerue and obey hym in eche behalfe.

The moſte parte of all other his frendes yea and ſeruauntes, in that preſent miſerie, did clerely forſake hym, ſo that ſometymes he was lefte wyth onely one or two in his companye, and gladde to keepe hymſelfe ſecrete in deſerte places, where no perſon vſed lyghtly to reſort.

King Roberts wyfe taken.

His wyfe the Quene fledde to Sainct Dutho, and chaunced to be taken by William Cumyn Earle of Ros, who delyuered hir to kyng Edward, by whoſe commaundemente, ſhe was cõmitted to ſafe keping at London, where ſhe remained til after the battayle of Bannockborne.

Nigell, Thomas and Alexander brethrẽ to king Robert are taken and put to death.

His brother Nigell was alſo taken, and ſo afterwardes were his two other brethren, Thomas and Alexãder, with many other nobles and gentlemen of Scotlande, of whome ſome were executed at Carleile, and ſome at Barwike.

Finally the moſte parte of all ſuche as hadde ayded him before, and were nowe ſhrunke from him, were within one yeare after eyther ſlayne or kept as priſoners in Englande.

Yet though he was thus lefte deſolate of all ayde and ſuccour, hauyng his bretherne and other of his frendes murthered and ſlayne to hys vtter diſcomfort and ruine (as was to be ſuppoſed) hee neuertheleſſe liued euer in hope of ſome better fortune, whereby in tyme to come, hee myght recouer the realme oute of the enimies handes, and reſtore the auncient libertie thereof to the former eſtate.

As for the paynes whiche he toke in lyuing barely for the moſt part by water and rootes, and lodging oftentymes on the bare earth withoute houſe or other harborough, he was ſo accuſtomed therto by haunting the warres in his youth, that the ſame greeued him little or nothing at all. But to conclude, ſuche was his valiauncie and moſt excellent fortitude of mynde and courage, that no iniurious miſchance of frowarde aduerſitie coulde abaſhe his inuincible heart and manlyke ſtomacke.

His inuincible hart and vndaunted ſtomacke.

At length, after he had wandred from place to place in ſundry partes of Scotlande, the better to auoyde the ſleyghtes of them that lay in awayte to apprehende hym, he got ouer into one of the Iles, where comming vnto one of his ſpeciall frendes, a man of high nobilitie and welbeloued of the people in thoſe parts, he was moſt hartily welcome, and gladly of him receyued, to his great eaſe and comforte.

King Robert getteth ouer into the Iles.

Here, after he had remayned a certain ſpace, he got ſupport of men, armour, and weapons, by meanes whereof taking newe courage, hee paſſed ouer into Carryke, and winning the caſtell there that belonged to his fathers inheritaunce, he ſlewe all the Engliſhemen, whiche hee founde within it, and beſtowed all the ſpoyle of money and goods gotten there amongeſt his ſouldiers and men of warre.

He winneth the caſtell of Carryke.

His frendes that laye hidde in couerte and ſecrete corners, hearyng of theſe his doings, beganne from eche ſyde to reſorte vnto hym, by whoſe aſſiſtance ſhortely after he wan the caſtell of Innerneſſe, and ſlew all them that were within there in garryſon.

Innerneſſe caſtell taken.

With the lyke felicitie he got the moſt part of all the Caſtels in the north, raſing and brenning vp the ſame tyll hee came to Glenneſke, wher being aduertiſed that John Cumyn with ſundry Engliſhemen and Scots were gathered againſte him, becauſe hee was vppon a ſtrong groũd, he determined there to abide thẽ: but they being thereof informed, and wondryng at his manly courage, durſt not approche to giue him battaile, but ſent Imbaſſadors vnto him to haue truce for a time, vnder colour of ſome communication for a peace, till they might increase their power more strongly against him: whiche being done, they pursued him more fiercely than before.

Neuertheles King Robert receyued them at all tymes in suche warrelike order, that they might neuer take him at any aduauntage, but were still driuen backe with slaughter and losse, though the same was of no great importance to make account of, but suche like as happeneth oftentymes in skirmishes and lyght encounters, where the battayles come not to ioyne puissance against puissance. The same whereof yet procured him the fauour of sundrie great Barons in Scotland.

Amongest other, James Douglas a man of great courage and singular valiancie, cousin to William Lamberton Bishop of S. Andrewes, and remayning with the sayde Bishop in household, toke all the Bishops golde, and certaine of his best horses, with the which hauing in his cõpanie diuers other hardie yong gentlemen priuie to his doings, he fledde with all speed vnto King Robert, offring him his seruice, and to spende his life in his quarell and defence.

The Bishop was priuie to his cousins going away, yea and counselled him therto, though he would by no meanes it shoulde outwardly so appeare, for doubt least if things had not come to passe as he wished, he might haue run in daunger for his cloked dissimulation.

The Dowglas was ioyfully receyued of king Robert, in whose seruice he faythfully continued both in peace and warre, to his liues ende.

Thoughe the surname and family of the Dowglasses was in some estimation of Nobilitie before those dayes, yet the rysing thereof to honour chaunced through this James Dowglas, for by meanes of his aduauncement, other of the same lynage toke occasion by theyr singular manhode and noble prowes shewed at sundrie tymes in defence of the Realme, to grow to such heigth in authoritie and estimation, that theyr mightie puissance in manrent, landes, and great possessions at length was (through suspition conceyued by the kings that succeded) the cause in parte of their ruinous decay. Edwarde king of England hearing of the doings of his aduersarie king Robert, doubted (if some redresse were not founde in tyme) least the Scottes reioysing in the prosperous successe of his sayde aduersarie, would reuolt wholy frõ the English obeysance: and hereupon purposing with all speede to subdue the whole Realme of Scotlande from ende to ende, he came with a farre greater armie than euer he had raised before to the borders, but before his entring into Scotlande, he fell sicke of a right sore and grieuous maladie, wherof he died shortly after at Burgh vpon sandes, as in the Englishe hystorie more plainly it doth appeare.

The Scottish writers make mention that a little before he departed out of this worlde, there were brought vnto him .lv. yõg striplings, which were taken in the Castell of Kildrummy, after it was wonne by the English men, and being asked what should be done with them, he commaũded they should be hanged incontinently, without respect to their yong yeares, or other consideration of their innocencies that might haue moued him to pitie. The crueltie of king Edwarde as is noted by the Scottish writers.

After his decease, his sonne Edward of Carnaruane succeeded in the gouernment of England, who following his fathers enterprise, called a counsell at Dunfreis, commoning the Lordes of Scotlande to appeare at the same, and caused a greate number of them at theyr comming thither to doe their homage vnto him, as to their superiour Lorde and gouernour: But diuerse yet disobeyed his commaundements, and would not come at his summoning, vpon trust of some chaunge of fortune by the death of his father, for that the sonne was muche giuen (as was reported) to incline his eare to lewde counsell, not without the great griefe of his people, and namely of the Lords and chiefe Nobles of his realme. Edwarde of Carnaruan, sonne to Edward Longshankes. Homage to king Edward of Carnaruan.

Shortly after this, the sayde Edwarde of Carnaruane returned into Englande, and in the meane time Iohn Cumyn Erle of Buchquhane gathered a mightie armie, both of Scottes and English men to resist against king Robert, that he might thereby declare his faythfull affection towardes the new English king.

He trusted onely with multitude of people to cause his enimies to giue place: But K. Robert though he was holden with a sore sicknes at that time, yet he assembled a power, and caused himselfe in a Horselitter to bee caried forth with the same against his enimies, who abiding him at a streyght, supposed it had bene an easie matter for them to haue put him to flight: but it chaunced quite contrarie to their expectation: for in the end the Cumyn with his whole armie was discomfited, and a great number of King Roberts aduersaries slaine or taken. This victorie was gotten at a village called Enuerrour, tenne myles distant from Aberdene, on the Ascention daye, wherewith king Robert was so muche refreshed in contentation of minde, that hee was sodenly therevpon restored to his former health. Iohn Cumyn discomfited by king Robert at Enuerrour. 1308.

The same yeare Donalde of the Iles came with a great armie of English men and Scottes against King Robert, and was on the feast day of the Apostles Peter and Paule discomfited by Edward Bruce the kings brother, at the water of Deyr. Donald of the Iles discomfited by Edward Bruce.

At this battaile was a right valiant knight named Rowlande, slaine of the English parte, with a great number of other aboute him, and Donalde himselfe was taken prisoner. Thus king Robert through fauour of prosperous fortune, obteyning the victorie in sundrie conflicts, came with an armie into Argyle, and not onely subdued the Countrey to his obeysance, but also tooke Alexander Lorde of Argyle out of a strong Castel in that Countrey, and banished him with all his friendes into Englande, where shortly after he deceassed.

Argyle subdued by King Robert. This was, An. 1309. as Iohn Maior hath.

In the yeare next following king Edwarde came with an armie into Scotlande, where ioyning with an other armie of Scottes that were assembled readie to ayde him, he passed through the countrey vnto Ranfrew, and at length without atchieuing any notable enterprise worthy the mentioning, he returned againe into England.

King Edwarde commeth into Scotlande. Anno 1310. as should seme by Io. Ma.

The same yeare, through continuall warres, there rose suche dearth and scarcitie of things in Scotland, that neither corne nor other vytayles could be had for money, for the ground in maner generally through the countrey lay vntilled, and beastes with all kind of Cattel were driuen away as booties taken by the enimies.

A fore dearth,

By reason whereof famine so encreased on eche side, that the people were constrayned to eate horses and other lothsome flesh and meates, thereby to sustayne theyr liues.

In the yeare following, which was after the incarnation 1311. king Robert chased the English men out of all partes of Scotlande, winning many castels out of their handes, diuerse of the which he razed and consumed with fire.

Castels recouered by king Robert.

After this entring at sundrie times into England, with his fierce armie, he brought frō thence innumerable booties of cattell and other ryches, afflicting the Englishe men with like slaughter and calamities as the Scottes had suffered in the yeres before by the outragious force and puissance of king Edwarde.

King Robert inuadeth England.

On the eight day of Januarie next ensuing, King Robert wanne by fine force the strong towne of Perth, sleaing and hanging all the people both English, and Scottish, which were found in the same.

The towne of Perth recouered, otherwise called S. Iohns towne.

He threw also the walles of that town to the ground, and filled the ditch with the rampyre.

The same yeare the Castelles of Dunfreis, Ayre, Lanarke, with many other strengthes and Castelles were rendred vnto him, and cast to the ground.

Castels won.

The Castell of of Rokesbourgh was taken by sir James Dowglas on fastings euen, in the yeare 1312. when they of the garrison were ouercome with immoderate surfeyting by meates and drinkes excessiuely taken, according as on that day the accustomed vse is.

Rokesbourgh wonne on Shrouetuisday.

In that yeare also Thomas Randall afterwardes created Erle of Murrey wanne the Castell of Edenbourgh.

The Castell of Edenbourgh wonne.

And the same yeare Edwarde Bruce besieged the Castell of Striueling: but the strength of the house was such, what by nature of the highe cragge whereon it stode, and what by fortification of mans hand beside, all his trauaile and inforcement diligently employed to winne it, proued vaine for the time.

Striueling Castell besieged.

Within this Castell, as Captaine thereof, was a right valiant Knight named sir Philip Mowbray, a Scottishe man borne, but taking part with the English men, who feared nothing the siege, for he had sufficient store of mē, vitails, munition, & all maner of purueyance sufficient to defend the holde for a long season: so that finally Edward Bruce perceiuing no meanes whereby to atchieue ỹ enterprice which he had rashly take in hand, was abashed therof: for by force he saw wel enough

ynough it coulde not be brought to paſſe, and by large offers made to the Captaine if hee woulde render the place and become ſeruant to the King his brother, he coulde not once moue him to giue any care therto, inſomuch as at ẽgth he ſought to trie him another way forth, which in ẏ ende toke better effect than was likely it would haue done, conſidering the lacke of circumſpection vſed in the bargain making: as thus.

After long ſiege, and (as before is ſayde) no good done, there was a motiõ made betwixt him and the Captaine within for a truce, which was accorded on this wiſe: that if the fortreſſe were not ſuccoured within .xij. monthes next enſuing, it ſhould then be rendred to king Robert, and in the meane time no force ſhould be vſed againſt it.

This compoſition was vnwiſely made, as moſte men iudged: for euery man of any wiſedome might eaſily coniecture, that king Edward hauing ſo long day to make his proviſion, would come in ſupport of them within the Caſtell, and that ſo ſtrongly, as would be hard for the Scots to reſiſt him.

King Robert himſelfe alſo was ſore offended with his brother for his follie ſhewed in this behalfe, but yet he would not goe aboute to breake the couenant accorded, for doubt to loſe his brother, whoſe ayde he might not well want.

In the meane time king Edwarde ſent forth meſſengers with letters, not onely vnto all hys ſubiects, but alſo vnto all his confederates and allyes, to haue men of warre taken vp and retayned to ſerue him in his warres againſt the Scots which he intended to follow to the vtter deſtruction of the whole nation.

There came therefore in hope of ſpoyle, not onely ſuch as were appoynted by commiſſioners of the muſters, but alſo a greate number of other that offered themſelues of their owne accorde to go in that iourney, namely ſuch as had lyttle to liue vpon at home, and truſted to amend the matter by ſome good fortune in the warres abrode.

The Countreys out of the which it is reported by the Scottiſh writers, that ſuch ayde came to the Engliſhe men, were theſe, Hollande, Zeland, Brabant, Flanders, Picardie, Boloignois, Gaſcoigne, Normandie, Guian, and Burdelois, for all theſe at that time were either ſubiect to the King of Englande, or elſe in confederate league with him.

There were alſo many Scottes that were Engliſhe by deuotion, and ayded king Edward at this tyme.

But the number of natural Engliſhmen exceeded any one nation beſyde, inſomuch that the whole armie what of one and other conteyned (as the fame went) one hundred and fiftie thouſande footmen, and almoſt as many horſemen, beſide carpage men, coyſtrels, women, and lackies, but the fame herein belike (as often happeneth) did farre exceed the ſoth.

Fame oftentymes exceedeth the ſooth

For it is not to bee thought (as Iohn Maior himſelfe writeth) that he ſhould get ſuch a number togither, not for that Englande it ſelfe is not able to ſet forth ſuche a power: For as the ſame Maior ſayth, as many men as are to be found in Englande of lawfull age, ſo many able perſonages may be found there to paſſe for able ſouldiers.

But either kings are not of abilitie to finde ſo greate a multitude with victayles and ſufficient proviſion, or elſe they will not ſtraine themſelues thereto.

Neuertheleſſe the whole number by all likelyhoode was great, for manye aſwell ſtraungers as Engliſhmen, brought their wiues, their children, and whole houſeholde meinie with them, in hope after the Countrey were ſubdued, to haue dwelling places appoynted them in the ſame, there to inhabite: For ſo had king Edward promiſed them.

King Edwards promiſe.

By reaſon whereof the diſorder was ſuch, that no warlike diſcipline might be obſerued amongſt them, for men, women, and children were all myxt togither, with ſuche clamour and noyſe through the huge number of people, and diuerſitie of languages, that it was a thing right ſtraunge to beholde a campe ſo confuſedly ordered.

The confuſed order.

King Edward himſelfe moſt proude and inſolent of ſuch incredible number, toke no heed at all to the gouerning of them, ſuppoſing victorie to be alreadie in his handes, inſomuch that at his comming to the borders, he toke aduiſe with his counſell to what kinde of torment and death hee might put king Robert, for he put no doubtes of catching him at all.

Fiſhing before the net.

Hee alſo brought with him a religious man ſomewhat learned belike, of the order of the Carmelites, to deſcribe the whole maner of his conqueſt and victorie ouer the Scottes, ſo ſure hee thought himſelfe, that all things woulde come to paſſe as he could wiſhe or deuiſe.

King Edwarde thinketh himſelfe ſure of victorie.

This Carmelite, as maye appeare in Iohn Bales booke intytled a ſummarie of the writers of great Brytaine, was named Robert Baſton, and had the gouernaunce of an houſe in Scarbourgh, of the Carmelites order, he being (as before is ſayde) of that cote himſelfe.

Robert Baſton a Carmelite.

On the contrarie part king Robert ordred al his doings by good and prudent aduice, and with xxx. thouſande men right hardie and throughlye exercyſed in warres, came forth againſt his enimies, ſhewing no token of feare in the world, but boldly pitched downe his tents in good order and warlike array, vpon a plaine, a little aboue Bannocks borne.

Iohn Maior hath in his booke .xxxv. thouſande.

King Robert his comming towardes the battaile.

Whether he did this for the great confidence

he

he had in the hardinesse of his people, or for that he woulde shewe howe little he doubted the puis-sance of his enimies, least they should haue him in contempt, it is uncertaine.

The opinion of expert warriours of king Robert.

In deede there were diuerse expert warriours amongst the English men, that sayde when they heard howe the Scottes were thus assembled to fight, that the victorie would not be had, except it were dearely bought: the wisedome and manhood of king Robert was knowen so wel amongst them, that they were assured he woulde not iooparde himselfe in such a case, but that he knew he had such fellowes about him as woulde sticke to their tackle.

Trenches made by Scots to ouerthrow the Englishe men.

Moreouer the Scottes by appoyntment of their king to the furtherance of his hardie enterprise, had caste deepe pyttes and dytches in the place where it was iudged the battayles shoulde ioyne, and pitched sharpe stakes within the same, and after couered them ouer slightly with greene turfes or soddes, in such wise that a few footemen might passe ouer well ynough, but if any great number shoulde come pressing togither, or that any horsemen came therepon, the soddes would shrinke and fall to the bottome of the trenches, with extreme perill of the men and horses, that were sure to fall vpon the stakes set there for that purpose, or else to be so enclosed, that they should not be well able to get out of those pitfalles.

Bannockf-borne.

By the place where king Robert was thus encamped there runneth a greate Broke or water called Bannockesborne, so named of Ote cakes called Bannockes, which were vsed to be made commonly at the Mylnes standing on the banks of the same water.

It falleth into the Forth right famous afterwardes by reason of this battaile foughten neare to the same.

When both the armies were approched within a myle togither, King Edwarde sent an eight hundred horsemen by a secret way, vnto the Castell of Striueling, to giue notice to sir Philip Mowbray the Captain, that he was come with his armie to succour him. King Robert being aduertised of their gate, & beholding them whiche way they toke, he sent Thomas Randall with fiue hundred Scottish horsemen to saue the countrey from spoyle, who with singular manhode encountering with those English men in sight of both ỹ armies, there ensued a cruel fight betwixt them for so small a number, continuing a long space with uncertaine victorie.

The fight Thomas dall with hundred tish men his comp against hundred lishe men

In the meane time sir James Dowglasse dreading that his speciall friende the sayde Thomas Randall shoulde be ouerset with multitude of the Englishe men, came to king Robert, and falling on his knees before him, requyred licence to go forth to the support of them that were thus fighting with their enimies: whiche because the king would not graūt at the first, he rushed forth of the campe without licence, hauing in his cōpanie a small bande of men, but yet chosen out for the purpose, that if it were but by shewing himselfe, he myght put the enimies in some feare.

Notwithstanding, when he was come neare to the place where they fought, and sawe how the Scottes had got the victorie with great murther of the English men, he stayed and went no further, least he should by his comming seeme to bereue them the glorie of ỹ victorie which had won it with so great prowes and singular valiancie.

All those in the Scottish campe were relieued in good hope of greater successe to followe in the whole enterprise by so happie a beginning.

The Engl men dete to giue b taile.

The English men passed little thereof, but yet for that the Scots shoulde not ware proude, and take ouermuch courage thereby, they determined to giue them battaile the next morow.

King

King Robert with great diligence cauſed his people to prepare themſelues readie to receyue the enimies, though he was nothing able to matche them in number, deuiſing which way hee might traine them into the ditches before prepared.

He commaunded throughe the armie that euery man ſhould on the next morow receyue the Sacrament of the Lordes bodie, throughe the which they might haue the better hope of victorie againſt the vniuſt inuaders of theyr Realme and Countrey.

On the other ſide, the Engliſh men truſted that al things would proſper with them, euen as they could beſt deuiſe: for by one ſmall dayes labour they hoped to be Lordes of all Scotlande, and to diſpoſe of the landes and goodes of theyr enimies as ſhoulde ſeeme to them good and moſt for their owne auaile.

But king Robert all the night before the battaile toke little reſt, hauing greate care in hys mynde for the ſuretie of his armie, one while reuoluing in his conſideration this chaunce, and an other while that, yea and ſometymes he fell to deuout contemplation, making his prayer to God and Saint Phillane, whoſe arme as it was ſet and encloſed in a ſiluer caſe, he ſuppoſed had bene the ſame time within his tent, truſting the better fortune to follow by preſence thereof.

In the meane time, as he was thus making his prayers, the caſe ſodenly opened, and clapped to againe. The Kings Chaplaine being preſent, aſtonied therewith, went to the aulter where the caſe ſtoode, and finding the arme within it, hee cried to the king and other that were preſent, how there was a great myracle wrought, confeſſing that he brought the emptie caſe to the fielde, and left the arme at home, leaſt that Relyke ſhoulde haue beene loſt in the fielde, if any thing chaunced to the armie otherwayes than well.

On the morrowe he cauſed all his folkes to heare diuine ſeruice, and to receyue the Sacrament as ouer night he had appoynted.

The Abbot of Inchechaffray did celebrate before the king that day, and miniſtred vnto him and other of the Nobles the communion, other Prieſtes being appoynted to miniſter the ſame vnto the reſidue of the armie.

After this, when ſeruice was ended, the king called the people to his ſtandart, and firſt declared vnto them from poynt to poynt how neceſſarie it was for them to ſhewe their wonted manhood, conſidering that ſuch an huge multitude of people was brought thither againſte them by king Edwarde, not of one Nation or dominion, but of ſundrie languages and parties, aſwel ſubiectes as alyes to the Engliſh men, with ful purpoſe vtterly to extinguiſh the Scottiſh name and memorie, and to plant themſelues in their ſeates and rowmeths, as in poſſeſſions vtterly voyded of all the auncient and former inhabitants.

To encreaſe the fierce ſtomacks of the Scottiſh men againſt the enimies, he recounted vnto them what hee heard by credible report touching the menacing wordes and inſolent braggs of the ſame enimies, able to moue right quiet mindes vnto full indignation.

Againe, to auoyde feare out of their heartes, which they might conceiue by reaſon of the multitude of their aduerſaries, hee rehearſed what a number of raſkals were amongſt them, without any ſkill of warrelike aſſayres, not taken vp by choyſe and election in appoynted muſters, but reſorting withoute difference togither, in hope of ſpoyle and bootyes, hauing not elſe wherevpon to liue at home in their countreys.

Moreouer, if nothing elſe might rayſe theyr hearts in hope of victorie, their iuſt cauſe ſith they come in defence of their countrey againſt iniurious inuaders, was matter ſufficient to aduaunce their manly ſtomackes, in truſt of Gods ayde in that quarell, hauing partly aſſured them thereof, by notable myracles ſhewed in the night laſte paſſed.

Hereto hee added, that the greater multitude there was of the enimies, the more ſpoyle and ryches was to be got, if they atteyned the victorie.

Finally, the more to ſtyre their heartes to do valiantly, he required the of one thing, which he truſted (their manhoode being ſuch) they woulde not thinke harde for them to atchieue, and this was, that euerie of them woulde but diſpatch one of the enimies, whiche if they performed he promiſed them aſſured victorie.

As for ten thouſande, he knew to be amongſt them of ſuch approued ſouldiers, and olde men of warre, as he durſt ſafely vndertake for them that they would ſlea two of the enimies a peece at the leaſt. Such maner of perſwaſions king Robert vſed to encourage his people.

On the other part king Edwarde cauſed the Coroncls of eche Nation within his campe to exhort their retinues to remember, that if they fought valiantly for one houre or two, they ſhuld purchaſe infinite ryches with the whole Realme of Scotlande in reward of their labor: for he deſired nothing for himſelfe, but the ſuperiorite.

Againe, hee willed they ſhoulde haue in remembrance what irrecouerable ſhame would follow (ſith they had departed out of their countreys in hope of gaine) to returne home with emptye handes, and voyde of victorie, not without ſome reproche and note of cowardice. But yet when they ſhould marche forwarde in array of battaile towardes the Scottes they might vneth be ſeuered from their wiues and children which they had there in campe with them: Neuertheleſſe at length by the ſharpe calling vpon of their Captaines, they were brought into order of battaile, not without much a doe, by reaſon of the vnruly multitude.

The order of the Engliſh battayles.

The Archers were placed in wings, mingled amongeſt the horſemen on the ſides of the wardes and battayles, which ſtoode enclоſed in the middeſt of the ſame wings.

The appoynting of the Scottiſh battayles.

King Robert appoynting all his battayles on foote, deuided the ſame into three partes, the forewarde he committed to Thomas Randulf, and James Dowglas captayns of right approued valiancie: vnder whō went ſeuen thouſande of the borderers, and three thouſande of the Iriſhe Scots, otherwiſe called Kateranes or Redſhanks: Theſe no leſſe fierce & forward, than the other practiſed and ſkilfull.

The firſt battaile.

The ſecond ward was gouerned by Edward the kings brother, wherein were ten thouſande, men: but for that he was ſuſpected of too muche raſhneſſe, there was ioyned with him certain ancient gentlemen of greate ſobrietie and circumſpection, to qualifie his haſtie and hote nature.

The ſecond.

The thirde battaile, in the whiche were (as Iohn Maior recordeth) fiftene thouſand fighting men the king himſelfe led, ſhewing a right chearfull countenance amongeſt them, ſo farforth that euery one that beheld him, conceyued in his mind an aſſured hope of victorie to ſucceede.

The thirde.

The Abbot of Inchchaffray bearing a croſſe.

The Abbot of Inchchaffray aforeſayd (who as before is mentioned, did celebrate that morning afore the King) came forth before the battayles with the Crucifix in his hands, bearing it aloft like a ſtandart.

Incontinently wherevpon, the Scottiſh armie fell on knees before it, deuoutly commending themſelues to almightie God.

The Engliſh armie beholding the Scots fall on knees, thought verely they had yeelded themſelues without ſtroke ſtryken.

But when they ſawe them riſe againe, and to come forward, they began to be ſomwhat doubtfull. And hereupon ruſhing togither, at the firſte ioyning, a great number of people on eyther ſyde were beaten downe and ſlaine. The Archers whiche were arrayed on the vtter skirtes of the Engliſh wings, ſore annoyed the Scottes, till finally Edwarde Bruce came on their backes with a thouſande Speares, and brake them aſunder, in ſuche wiſe that they did but little more hurt that day.

Thirtie thouſand Engliſh horſemen ouerthrowne in trenches.

Albeit incontinently herewith a battaile of horſemen to the number of .xxx. thouſande, came ruſhing togither all at once in ſhocke, to haue borne downe and ouertrodden the Scots, but being ſo in their full race gallopping with moſt violence towards the, they tumbled into the ſolles & pittes before mentioned, in ſuch wiſe one vpon an other, that the moſt part of the were ſlain, without all recouerie. Neuertheleſſe the Scots in maner oppreſſed through the huge multitude of the enimies, were neare at the point to haue bin vanquiſhed.

But hereupon thoſe that were appointed to attend the cariage, as carters, wainmen, lackeys, & the women, beholding in what daūger their maiſters, friends, & countrymen ſtood, put on ſhirtes, ſmockes, and other white lynens aloft vpon their vſuall garments, and herwith binding towels & napkins to their ſpeares, and to other ſuch ſtaues as they got in their handes, placed themſelues as wel as they might in aray of battail, and to making a great muſter & ſhew of new, came downe the hill ſyde in the face of their enimies, with ſuch a terrible noyſe & hideous clamor, that the Engliſh men fighting as then with moſt fury againſt the Scots with vncertaine victorie, and beholding this new reenforce comming down the hill on their faces, ſuppoſing verily it had bene ſome new armie, their hearts began to faint, the more in deede, for that they ſaw themſelues vnethe able to ſuſtain the violent encounter of the Scots the preſent. And hereupon they began to turne their backes, and fell to running away as people clearly vanquiſhed: on whom the Scottes folowed with inſatiable yre, & ſlue the downe on all ſides where they might ouertake the.

The Engliſh men put to flight.

Sir James Dowglas with .iiij. C. choſen horſmen, was cōmaunded by king Robert to purſue the king of England with all ſpeede, to trie if he might ouertake him.

The Dowglas (according to his charge) folowed him in chaſe vnto Dunbar, & caſting betwixt that and the borders, lay in awayt to haue taken him, if he had returned by land: but hee being receyued into the Caſtell of Dunbar by Patrike Dunbar Erle of March, with .xv. Erles in his compaine, was by the ſame Earle of Marche conueyed into certaine veſſels, lying there at anker, with the which he paſſed alongſt by the ſhore into England, to ſhew an example of the vnſicker ſtate and glorie of princes: for though thys Edwarde was that daye in the morning right proude of the great puiſſance and number of people which he had about him, not vnlike ſomtime to the great armie of king Xerxes, yet he was cōſtrayned before the Euening of the ſame day, to ſaue his life in a poore fiſhers boate.

But the death of ſir Giles Argentine, that dyed amongſt other in this mortall battaile, was ſo diſpleaſant to king Robert, for the familiaritie which he had ſometymes with him in England, that he reioyced little of all the gaine got by ſo famous a victorie.

He cauſed his bodie to be buryed right honourably in Saint Patrikes Church, beſyde Edenbourgh.

The Queene king Roberts wife, who had bene kept in captiuitie the ſpace of .viij. yeares in Englande, was now deliuered by exchaunge for one of the nobles of Englande, which was taken at this battaile.

The rich clothes of Silkes, Ueluet, and gold, which were founde in the Engliſh campe, were diſtributed to the Abbayes and Monaſteries of the realme, to make therof veſtments, copes, and frountalles for aulters.

The Carmelite Frier, of whom ye heard before, brought thither by king Edward to deſcribe the victorie of the Engliſhmen, was taken priſoner amongeſt other, and commaunded by King Robert to write contrarily the victorie of the Scots, according as he had ſeene: who therevpon made certaine rude verſes begynning thus.

There be ſome that haue iudged howe thys victory was attayned by the ſingular fauor of almightie God, by reaſon of myracles whiche they rehearſe to happen at the ſame time.

The night before the day of the battaile, there came to the Abbay of Glaſtenburie two men in complete armour, deſiring to lodge there for that night: The Abbot keeping an houſe of great hoſpitalitie, receyued them right gladly, and making them good cheare, demaunded what they were, & whither they wer going, who anſwered that they were the ſeruants of God, and going to helpe the Scottes at Bannockeſborne.

On the morrow the chamberlain found them departed before any of the gates were opened, and the beddes fayre made, and not ſtyred otherwiſe than as they left them ouer night.

The ſame day that the battail was foughten, a knight clad in fayre bright armour, declared to the people at Aberdene, how the Scots had gotten a famous victorie againſt the Engliſh men, and was ſene ſhortly after to paſſe ouer Pictland Fyrth on horſebacke.

It was ſuppoſed by the people that this was S. Magnus, ſometime prince of Orkney, and for that cauſe K. Robert endowed ỳ church of Orkney w. v. li. ſterling of ỳ cuſtoms of Aberdene, to furniſh the ſame church, with bread, wine, & wax.

Many noble men for their approued manhood ſhewed in this conflict, were highly rewarded at the handes of king Robert.

One Robert Flemeyn, by whoſe meanes he reuenged the treaſon wrought againſt him by John Cumyn, with ſlaughter of the ſame John, had the lands of Cumnernald giuen him, whiche were of the inheritãce belõging to ỳ ſaid Cumin. Robert Flemeyn rewarded for his faythful ſeruice.

It is reported by writers, that two knights of Brabant that ſerued amongſt the Engliſh men, chaunced to heare many reprochfull wordes ſpoken in the Engliſhe campe againſt king Robert, who being ſomewhat moued therewith, & miſlyking ſuch diſmeaſured talke, wiſhed in wordes that the victorie might chaunce vnto him.

For the which wiſh king Edwarde informed thereof, cauſed them by a trumpet to be conueyed vnto the Scottiſh campe, with commaundement to ayde King Robert to the vttermoſte of theyr powers, purpoſing to puniſh them according to his minde, if he atteyned the victorie, as hee put no doubt, but he ſhoulde.

And herevpon, before the ioyning of the battayles, he cauſed proclamation to be made, that whoſoeuer brought their heades vnto him, ſhould haue an hundred Markes in rewarde. A proclamation.

King Robert hearing in what daunger they had run for his ſake, rewarded them with great riches of the ſpoyle got in the field, with the which they returning into Brabãt, buylt a goodly houſe in Andwarpe, naming the ſame Scotlande, and cauſing the Scottiſhe armes, and the picture of Bruce to be ſet vp in the ſame, appoynted it for a lodging to receyue them of the Scottiſhe nation that ſhoulde reſort vnto that towne, as may appeare euen vnto this day. The Scottiſh houſe in Andwarpe buyld.

And this was done for a memoriall, to ſhew what loue and heartie benеuolence theſe two knights bare towardes king Robert & his people, for the great liberalitie receyued at his handes.

This glorious victorie chaunced to the Scots on the day of the natiuitie of S. John Baptiſt, in the yere. 1314. Immediatly after, K. Robert called 1314 a Parliamẽt at Ayre, where by cõſent of the three eſtates he was cõfirmed king, & the crown entailed to the heyres males of his bodie lawfully begotten, & for want of ſuch heyres to remaine vnto his brother Edward Bruce, & to the heyres male of his body: and if he chanced to die without ſuch heyres, thẽ ſhould the crowne deſcend vnto Mariory the daughter of K. Robert, and to the heyres generall of hir bodie, by lawfull ſucceſſion. The crown of Scotlande entayled. Marioric the daughter of king Robert by his firſt wife.

This

This Mariorie was gotten by king Robert on the Earle of Mar his sister, his first wife, and was maryed by the aduice of his Nobles, vnto Walter great Steward of Scotlande.

The seconde maryage of king Robert.

Also K. Robert, for that his first wife aforesaid was deceassed, maried shortly after Elizabeth the daughter of the Earle of Ulster, on whom he got a sonne named Dauid, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Maulde.

The issue of king Robert by his seconde wife.

The first was maryed to the Earle of Sutherlande, and bare him a sonne named John.

The seconde departed this worlde in hir infancie.

After the maryage solemnized betwixt hys daughter Mariorie, and the foresayde Walter Steward, King Robert went through all the boundes of his Realme, and did not onely confirme the auncient lyberties and priuiledges of the Burrowes and townes in al places where he came, but also augmented the same, and graunted vnto diuerse auel townes as baronies, sundrie newe prerogatiues and franchises, as maye appeare by his charters made vnto them of the same, specially to the townes of Perth, Dundee, and Aberdene.

Liberties by king Robert.

In the yeare following, whiche was in the yeare 1315. the Princes of Irelande oppressed (as they toke it) with long and insufferable tyrannie of the English men, and trusting by suppost of Scottes to recouer their libertie, now after so notable an ouerthrowe of the whole Englishe puissance, sent Ambassadors vnto king Robert, requyring that it might please him to sende hys brother Edwarde Bruce, to receyue the crowne and gouernment of theyr Countrey of Irelande.

The Lordes of Irelande require ayde of king Robert.

This request being graunted, Edwarde prepared to take that iourney in hande, and so with a small power of Scottish men transporting ouer into Irelande, and ioyning with an army of such as were readie to assist him there, he toke the towne of Ulster, and slue a great number of English men which were found in the same.

Vlnester.

Then afterwardes, by the generall consent of all the estates of Irelande, Edwarde Bruce was proclaymed king of that Realme, and certaine of the Irish Nobilitie sent Ambassadors vnto the Pope, to sewe for a ratification of theyr act and proceedings, for the suretie and weale of theyr Countrey, sithe they were not able longer to sustayne the grieuous yoke of the English thraldome.

Edward Bruce proclaimed K. of Irelande.

These Ambassadours, through their earnest diligence, got such fauour in theyr sute, that the Pope sundrie tymes charged the English men to auoyde out of Irelande, howbeit they seemed to passe little of his commaundements in that behalfe, for they dayly sought how to make themselues strong in that part, least they shoulde lose the possession of that Countrey, whiche they r enimies were aboute to get forth of their handes.

The English men passe litle on the Popes commaundements.

King Robert being enformed howe through the reenforcement of the Englishe armie beeing dayly refreshed with newe succours, his brother was like to runne in peril and daunger to be cast away, he left sir James Dowglas gouernour in Scotland, with a competent number of men to defend the borders, and he himself with a great power of other souldiers and men of warre, went ouer into Irelande to support his brother: but suffering great distresse at his first comming thither, for want of vitayles and other prouisions, he lost almost the one halfe of his folkes throughe verye famine and hunger, & the residue were constrayned to eate horses, and other suche lothsome meates, therewith to sustayne theyr languishing lyues.

King Robert passeth ouer into Irelande.

At length beeing approched within a dayes iourney of his brother, in purpose to haue supported him with those people which he had left, hys brother not abyding his comming, fought vnwisely with the Englishe men at a place called Dundach, & receyuing the ouerthrow, was slaine himselfe with a great number of other.

It is vncertaine whether hee had any knowledge of the cōming of his brother king Robert, for that through desire of fame he feared least if he stayed till his brother came, a greate parte of the prayse (if they got the victorie) should remaine to him: and therfore he made such hast to fight. But howsoeuer it was, thus he was slaine the .xiiij. of October, in the yeare 1317.

See more of this matter in Irelande.

Edwarde King of Englande, hearing that K. Robert was passed ouer into Irelande, thought the time to serue well for his purpose, eftsones to inuade Scotlande: and hereupon comming with a great power to the borders, he purposed to haue done some great feate: but sir James Dowglas the gouernor hauing likewise gathered an army, gaue him battaile, and put both him and his people to flight.

In this battail were slain three notable Captaynes on the English side: as sir Edmond Lylaw a Gascoigne, Captaine of Berwike, with sir Robert Neuill, and the thirde sir James Dowglas slue with his owne handes.

King Edward perceyuing it was not like that he should doe any good at that time agaynst the Scottes by land, thought it best to assayle them by sea, which way forth the English men commonly were euer too good for the Scots.

He rigged therefore a fleete of shippes, and sent the same into the Forth, which burned the Countrey on eche side, and toke many rich bootes from the inhabitants neare to the shore. Duncan Erle of Fyfe, hearing of these cruelties done by the English men, came forth with fiue hundred hardy

ſouldiers to defende the Countrey from ſuche inuaſions: but when hee perceyued that the enimyes were of greater number than hee was able well to encounter, hauing but an handful of men in compariſon to them, he gaue ſomewhat back, and in the meane time met with William Sinclare Biſhop of Dunkelde, hauing aboute.lx. armed menne in his companie, who blaming the Earle for his faintneſſe of courage, cauſed hym to ſet forward againe towardes the enimies, and finding them buſie in ſpoyling and harrying the cuntrey, they gaue an onſet vpon them ſo fiercely that there was ſlaine at the firſt encounter to the number of fiue hundred of the Engliſh men, & the reſidue chaſed to their boates lying at Dunbrytſel, which they entred in ſuch haſt, that one of the boates being preſſed with ouer great number, ſank with thē before they could get to their ſhips.

King Robert euer after cuſtomarily called thys W. Synclare his owne Biſhop, for the noble prowes which he thus ſhewed in this enterpriſe.

In the ſame yeare Robert Steward the ſonne of Walter Steward, and Mariozie Bruce was borne, which Robert after the death of king Dauid le Bruce, was preferred to the Crowne.

After this, Thomas Randol Earle of Murrey, the ſecond day of Apryll recouered the towne of Barwike out of the Engliſhe mens handes, whiche they had helde for the ſpace of twentye yeares before.

It was taken nowe by practiſe, through meanes of one Spaldeyn an Engliſh man, who for his labour had certaine landes giuen him in Angus, whiche his poſteritie enioyeth vnto theſe dayes.

After that the Earle of Murrey had recouered Barwike, he & the Lord James Dowglas in the Month of May inuaded Englande with a puiſſant army, paſſing further into the countrey than the Scots had bene accuſtomed to do afore time, burning as they wente forwarde the townes of Northallerton, and Burrow brig, and comming to Ripon, they ſpoyled the towne of all the goods found therein: but compounding with them that kept the Churche againſt them for a thouſande marks, they forbare to burn any of the buildings. After they had taried here three dayes, they departed thence and went to Knareſbourgh, whiche towne they burnt, and beating the woods (into the which the people were withdrawn with their goods and cattell) they got a great bootie, and returning homewards by Skipton in Craue, they firſt ſpoyled the towne, & after burnt it, & ſo marching throughe the Countrey, came backe into Scotland with their ſpoyles and priſoners without any reſiſtance.

In the yeare following, king Edwarde came and laid ſiege vnto Barwike, but the towne was ſo well defended, that he was conſtrayned with ſmall honor to returne home, and leaue it as hee founde it.

For in the meane time, whilſt king Edward lay at ỹ ſiege before Barwike, Thomas Randoll Erle of Murrey, and the Lord James Dowglas aſſembled their forces togither, but perceyuing thēſelues too weake to remoue the ſiege by force, they paſſed by, & entring into Englande, waſted and ſpoyled all before them, keeping on their way vnto Borrow bridge: whereof when the Citizens of Yorke were aduertiſed, with their Captaines William Melton their Archbiſhop, & the Biſhop of Ely, not making them of the countrey once priuy to their purpoſe, but hauing in their company a great number of prieſts and men of religion, they gaue battaile to the Scots one day in the after none, not farre from the towne of Miton vpō Swale. xij. miles diſtāt from Yorke northwards. But forſomuch as the more part of the Engliſh men were not expert in the feates of warre, and came not in any orderly aray of battail, they were eaſily vanquiſhed and put to flight by the Scots, who were readie to receyue them in good order, cloſe togither in one entier ſquadrone, and after their accuſtomed maner, at their firſte ioyning they gaue a great ſhowte, wherwith the Engliſh men out of hand began to giue backe: which whē the Scots perceyued, they got them to their horſes, and followed the chaſe moſte egrely, beating downe and ſleaing the Engliſh men, neither ſparing religious perſon nor other, ſo that there died to the number of.iiij.M. Engliſh men that day, and amongeſt the reſt was the Maior of Yorke ore. In the water of Swale (as was ſayde) there were drowned to the number of a thouſand: to be ſhort, if night had not come the ſoner vpon, it was thought vneth there ſhould any of the Engliſh part haue eſcaped. When K. Edward lying as yet at the ſiege of Barwike, vnderſtoode what miſchiefe the Scots did within his realme, he rayſed his ſiege, in purpoſe to haue encountered with his enimies: but the Scots aduertiſed of his purpoſe, returned with all their priſoners and ſpoile by Stanemore and ſo through Gilleſlande, and the weſt marches, wōdrew home into their cūtry.

About the feaſt of al Sainte, when the inhabitants of the north partes had got in their harueſt, ſo that their barnes were now ſtuffed with corn, of the which proviſion they were to liue all ỹ yere after, the Scots vnder the conduct of the ſaid two captains, the Erle of Murrey, & the Lord Dowglas, entred into England, and burnt the country of Gilleſāl, taking away both ſuch people as they toke priſoners, and alſo all the cattell which they might meete with, and ſo kept vpon their iourney till they came to Bourgh vnder Stanemore, deſtroying all afore them, and then returning throughout Westmerland, practised the like mischiefe there, in burning vp houses and corne in all places where they came, as they had done before in Gilslande. And finally passing through Cumberlande with the like hauocke, at length they drewe home into their owne Countrey with no small number of prysoners, and plentie of great ryches which they had got in that iourney.

Marioty Bruce deceaseth.

About the same time dyed Mariotie Bruce, king Roberts daughter. Shortly after also was a truce taken betwixt the two Realmes of England and Scotlande for a certaine time.

A Parliament at Perth.

Then king Robert hauing no trouble, neyther within his Realme, nor without, caused a Parliament to be holden at Perth, where he requyred the Lordes to shew their deedes and charters whereby they helde their landes.

The euidence and charters whereby the Lords of Scotlande helde their landes.

The Lords after long aduisement taken herein, at length pulled out theyr swords all at once, declaring that they had none other euidence nor Charters to shewe for the tenure of theyr landes.

King Robert was somewhat amased of this sight, and toke no small indignation therewith, but yet he dissembled for the time, and commended them for their noble heartes and valiant stomacks: neuertheless he purposed to be reuenged of their proude presumptions when more opportunitie of time serued thereto.

Conspiracie of the Lordes gaynst king Robert.

Sundrie of the nobles perceiuing that the king bare an inwarde grudge towardes them for this matter, deuised amongst themselues how to deliuer him into king Edwardes handes, so to auoyd all daunger that might folow of his displeasure conceyued thus agaynst them.

For the accomplishment of this their treasonable practise, they made a bonde in wryting, confirmed with their handes and seales betwixt the, and minded to send the same into England vnto king Edward. But king Robert hauing some vnkeling of this their purpose, caused diligent watch to be layde by the way for such as shoulde passe into England frō them with the said bond, insomuch that in the ende a Palmer or Pylgrym was apprehended which had the bonde and other wrytings enclosed within his pylgrimes staffe.

King Robert vnderstanding by these writings all the maner of the treason, and what they were that had consented to the same, he hastily sent for the whole number of them, as though there had beene some matter in hand wherein he wished to haue their aduise.

They were no sooner come, but streyght-wayes calling them before him, hee questioned with them whether they knew their owne hands and seales, and immediately therewith shewed the wrytings, which were found in the Palmers staffe: and bycause they coulde not denie theyr owne acte, they were committed to warde within sundrie Castelles, till he had taken further aduise in the matter.

The Lordes that had conspired are committed to warde.

Incontinently after, he went to Barwike, and there arrested the captaine of the towne named sir William Soulis, and caused him to bee conueyed vnto Perth, where shortly after he called an assembly of all the estates of the realme.

The blacke Parliament. 1320

This was called the black Parliament, kept in the yeare after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1320. In this Parliament at the begynning therof, was Dauid Abernethy, the sisters sonne of K. Robert, accused as party to the treason afore-sayd, though being labored vnto by the rest of the conspirators to ioyne with them therein, he refused so to doe, but yet for that he did not vtter the thing, but concealed with them, he was condemned & lost his head, the people sore lamenting his mishap, for the great valiancy which was knowne to be in him, hauing serued honorably many yeares

In deed the king himselfe would gladly haue saued his life, but for that he minded to do iustice on the residue, and finding no man to make sute for hym, he permytted the execution to procede agaynst him.

On the morrowe after, he caused all the residue of the trayters to be brought forth to iudgement, and sentence being giuen agaynst them, he commaunded without delay that they should be executed.

Then came diuerse and sundry persons in most humble wise to make sute for pardon to the king for their friends and kinsmen: but he made them plaine answere, that there was none to bee founde that would make intercession for the saning of his kinsmans life the day before, when he was led to execution, that had offended nothing so grieuously in comparison to them for whome they now made sute, & therefore he bad them be contented, for they shoulde assuredly haue according to ỹ which they had deserued. And therwith were the officers cõmaunded to make hast with the execution, whiche was done incontinently without any further respite.

There were some that were accused to bee partakers in this treason, but yet for that no euident proues could be produced against them, they were dismissed, as Walter Maxwel, with Walter Berelay Shirif of Aberdene, Patrike Graim, Hamelyne Meydzinton, and Eustace a Rathze, knights, beside eight others. But yet the Coũtesse of Stratherne, and William de Soulis, were condemned to perpetuall prison.

The Earle of Buchquhanes landes, who suffred at that present, were deuided into two parts, the one being giuen to William Hay that was made Constable of the realme in place of John Quincie, who likewise suffred the same time: and the other part was giuẽ vnto William Reth, togither with the office of the Stewardship of the Realme.

About the same time the king of England by complaynt made to the Pope, purchased that a Legate was sent from the See Apostolike into Scotland, to admonish king Robert to ceasse frõ further disquieting the realme of Englande, by such cruell inuasions, as were surmised that hee wrongfully exercised against the same Realme. But answer was made herevnto by the king and other the nobles of the realme of Scotlande, that all the worlde might well vnderstande that the whole occasion of al the trouble which had chanced betwixt the two Realmes of Englande and Scotland, did only proceed of the couetous desire in the English mẽ, seeking to conquer that realm without any iust clayme or title: and therefore they thought it reason first to suppresse the loftie stomacks of the English men, and then if there were any thing worthie to be reformed on theyr behalues, they would be contented to stand vnto the order of the Popes authoritie therein.

Shortly after K. Robert entred with an army into Englãd, & wasted the country before him, til he came to the Recrosse, whiche standeth vpon Stanmore. King Robert with an army in Scotlande.

Howbeit it should seeme by that which R. Southwel. writeth hereof, that K. Robert was not present himselfe in person in this iourney, but that he appointed the Erle of Murrey to be his Lieutenãt, who with an army after ỹ feast of the Epiphanie entred into England, & comming to Darington, stayed there for a season, whilest the Lord James Dowglas, and the Lord Steward of Scotlande went abrode to harie and spoyle the countrey on eche side, the one of them passing forth towardes Hartilpole, & Cliueland, and the other towardes Richmond. The inhabitants of Richmond shire hauing no captain amongst them to defend their countrey from that grieuous inuasion of the enimie, gaue a great summe of money in like maner as at other times they had don, to haue their coũtrey spared from fire & spoyle. The Scots tarryed at this time about .xb. dayes within Englande & in the end returned without battaile. For when the Knightes of the north Countreys repayred to the Duke of Lancaster then lying at Pomfret, and offred to goe into the field with him agaynst the Scots, he would not once styre his foote by reason of the discorde that was depending betwixt him and king Edward: but howsoeuer the matter went, king Edward sore grieued in hys minde with such inuasion made by his enimies the Scots, he gaue order to leuie an army of an hundred thousand men, what on horsebacke and on foote, (as the report went) appoynting them to be readie to enter into Scotlande at Lammas next: wherof king Robert being aduertised, ment to preuent him, and therevpon in the Octaues of the natiuitie of Saint Iohn Baptist, hee entred into Englande with an armie neare to Carleil, & burnt a manor place that sometime belonged to him at Rosse, & Allerdale, & spoiled the monastery of Holme, notwithstãding his fathers corps was there interred. Frõ thence he marched forward, destroying and spoyling the country of Copland, & so keeping vpon his iourney passed Doden landes towards the Abbay of Furneis: but ỹ Abbot meeting him on the way, redeemed his landes from spoile, and brought king Robert to his house, and made to him great chere: but yet the Scots could not hold their handes from burning and spoyling Paſſing from thence they came to Lancaſter, which towne they alſo brent, ſaue onely the Priorie of blacke Monkes, and a houſe of preaching Friers. Here came to them the Erle of Murrey, and the Lorde James Dowglas with an other armie, wherevpon marching further ſouthwards, they came to Preſton in Anderneis, & brent that towne alſo, the houſe of Friers minors only excepted. And thus being lxxx. miles within England frō their owne borders, they returned homewards wᵗʰ al their priſoners, cattel, & other bwties which they had got in that iorney, cōming to Carleil in the vigill of S. Immediately hereupon, to wit about the feaſt of Lammas, King Edwarde with his armie came to Newcaſtell, and deſirous to be reuenged of ſuche iniuries done to his ſubiects, entred into Scotlande, and paſſing forth till he came to Edenbourgh, through want of vitayles and other neceſſarie prouiſion, he was conſtrayned to returne home within the ſpace of .xv. dayes. For king Robert aduertiſed of his coming, had cauſed all the corne and cattell in the Countrey to be conueyed out of the way into certain ſtrengthes, where the Engliſh men might not come to get it into their handes, ſo to relieue themſelues therewith. But in their returning homewardes, ſomewhat to reuenge their diſpleaſures, they ſpoyled & brunt the Abbayes of Melroſe, and Drybourgh, with diuerſe other religious houſes & places, not ſparing any kinde of crueltie agaynſt all thoſe of the inhabitants that fell into their handes.

In reuenge hereof, King Robert ſhortly after entred with a puiſſant army into England, ſpoyling and waſting the Countrey, till he came almoſt to Yorke.

King Robert inuadeth the north parte of England approching almoſt to Yorke.

At length hearing that king Edwarde was comming towards him with an army, he choſe a plot of grounde betwixt the Abbay of Bylande and S. Sauiour, there to abyde battayle, whiche King Edward refuſed not to giue, though in the end, he was put to flight with his whole power, and chaſed with great ſlaughter both of Engliſh men and Normans, whiche were there in hys ayde. Diuerſe alſo of the Nobilitie were taken priſoners, as Iohn de Bryttaine Earle of Richmont, and Henrie Sowly, with others.

And from thence they paſſed forth into Yorkeſwolde, ſpoyling and waſting the countrey euen vnto Beuerley, which town for a ſumme of money they were contented to ſpare, and ſo then they returned homewardes, entering agayne into Scotlande on all Soules daye, whiche is the ſeconde of Nouember, after they had remayned wythin Englande at that tyme the ſpace of a Monthe and foure dayes.

Shortly after king Robert ſent an Ambaſſadour to the French King, to renue the auncient bonde of amitie betwixte the two Realmes of Scotlande and Fraunce, which was accompliſhed with this newe condition added to the former articles, that if it chaunced that ſucceſſion fayled touching the enheritance of the crowne of eyther Realme, ſo that a doubt ſhould riſe, who ought by right to enioy the ſame, the clayme and tytle thereof ſhoulde be tryed and decyded by the nobles of both the realmes, and further, that they ſhould not onely remoue and exclude all ſuche as went aboute wrongfully to vſurpe the crowne, but alſo to defend and mainteyne the true inheritour to the vttermoſt of their powers.

Scotland

In confirmation of this couenant, both the kings receyued the Sacrament: and for the further ratifying of it, they made a prouiſo, ẏ where (as then) they had the Popes conſent hereto, neither he nor any of his ſucceſſors hereafter ſhoulde diſpence with them for the breaking of that bond, and if they did, euery ſuch diſpenſation ſhould be reputed voyde and of none effect.

In this yeare 1323. as Richard Southwell reporteth, aboute the Aſcention day came commiſſioners from the two kings of Englande and Scotlande, vnto Newcaſtell, there to treate of ſome agreement of peace. For the king of Englande came Amerie de Valence Erle of Pembroke, the Lorde Hughe Spencer the yonger, and foure other perſons ſufficiently authoriſed. And for the King of Scottes came the Biſhop of Saint Andrewes, Thomas Randall Earle of Murrey, and foure other perſons likewiſe of good calling. After much talke, in the ende they agreed vpon a truce to endure for. xiij. yeares, which was proclaimed in both realmes about the feaſt of Saint Barnabie next enſuing.

About this time alſo, or not long before, an Engliſh man diſcended of noble lynage called Hamton, chaunced for ſpeaking certaine wordes in commendation of king Robert, to fall at variance with one of king Edwardes priuie Chamber named John Spencer, inſomuch that fighting togither about the ſame wordes, Hamtons hap was to ſlea this Spencer, and therevppon knowing there was no way but death if he ſhuld hap to be caught, he fled with al ſpeed into Scotland, where he was receyued of the king in moſt friendly wiſe, & had giuen to him for the maintenance of his eſtate like a gentleman, the lands of Cadzow.

The poſteritie of this Hamton remayneth in Scotlande vnto this day, increaſed ſo in kinred & honor, by reaſon it was in proces of time mingled with the kings bloud, that few linages within ẏ realme are of like eſtimation. They are now called Hammiltons, ſomewhat chaunged from the name of their firſt beginner.

In the meane time, Edward king of England being ruled altogither by two of the Spencers, as Hugh the father, and Hugh the ſonne, ran ſo farre into the hatred of his people, aſwel the nobles as commons, that in the end he was depoſed of all kingly authoritie, committed to priſon, and in fine ſecretly murthered as in the Engliſhe Hiſtorie more plainly appeareth. King Edwarde depoſed.

His ſonne Edward the third was placed in his rowmth, and crowned the. xxvj. day of January in the yeare. 1326. His ſonne Edward the third crowned. 1326

In the night of the ſame day in which he receyued the crowne, the Scottes ment to haue ſtolne the Caſtel of Norham by ſcaling, and they went ſo cunningly about their purpoſe, that there were to the number of. xxj. of them got aloft on the walles: but ẏ captain of this caſtell Robert Maners being warned afore hand of their comming by one of his ſouldiers that was a Scottes man borne, ſodenly aſſailed them, ſlue. ix. or. x. of them, and toke. v. priſoners alme, but ſore wounded, ſo as this miſfortune falling to them in the beginning of king Edward the third his raigne, might haue bene a forewarning of their loſſes to follow in the dayes of his gouernment. Ri. Southwel. The Caſtell of Norham.

Whileſt theſe thinges were a doing in Englande, King Robert though hee might ſeeme to haue title iuſt ynough to the Crowne of Scotland, which he had poſſeſt now not only by rightful conqueſt, but alſo by lawfull intereſt of inheritaunce for a certaine number of yeares, by conſent of all the eſtates of the Realme, yet to the ende to put awaye all doubtes, and to conclude the ſucceſſion of the Ballyoll from all clayme, which hereafter they might pretende to the Crowne of Scotlande, hee ſent ſir James Dowgals into Fraunce vnto the Lorde John Ballyoll, to require him to tranſpoſe and reſigne all the chalenge of right and intereſt whiche hee might ſeeme to haue to the crowne of Scotland, aſwell for himſelfe as his heyres & ſucceſſors for euer to K. Robert le Bruce and his heyres. Iames Dowglas ſent into Fraunce to the Ballyoll.

In conſideration of which reſignation, he offred fayre landes and rentes vnto him to bee appoynted forth in Scotland.

The Ballyol being now ſore worne with age, and thereto blinde of bodily ſight, lightly conſented vnto this motion, conſidering (as he ſayde) he toke it to be the ordinance of almightie God that king Robert ſhould enioy the gouernment of the Scottiſh kingdome, as moſte worthie and able thereto, hauing deliuered the ſame and defended it moſt valiantly from the handes of moſt cruell enimies.

He called therefore his friendes and kynnelmen togither, in the preſence of whome he wholy reſigned vnto king Robert and his heires, all the right and title whiche hee or any other for him either had, or hereafter might haue to the crowne of Scotlande, concerning any intereſt or clayme The reſignation of the Ballyoll to king Robert.

which might be auouched for any cauſe or conſideration, from the beginning of the worlde vnto that preſent day.

After the returne of ſir James Dowglas forth of Fraunce, with ſo good expedition and diſpatch of that buſineſſe where aboute he was ſent, King Robert right ioyfull thereof, aſſembled a Parliament of the Nobles and other eſtates of the Realme at Cambuſkenneth, where hee procured a new acte to be eſtabliſhed touching the ſucceſſion of the crowne, which was, that if his ſonne Dauid deceaſſed without heires of his body lawfully begotten, that then Robert Steward begotten on Mariorie Bruce his daughter, ſhould ſucceede in poſſeſſion of the Crowne.

A Parliament at Cambuſkenneth.

An act for the ſucceſsion of the crowne.

All the Lordes at the ſame time were ſworne to maintayne this ordinance.

In the meane while, King Edward the thirde ſent vnto king Robert for peace, but forſomuche as it was perceiued to be but a coloured pretence, no concluſion thereof enſued, but preparation made on eyther part for warres.

King Robert ſhortly after fell ſicke, by reaſon whereof, being not able to ride abrode nor to trauaile himſelfe, he committed the adminiſtration of all things touching the common wealth and other the affayres of the realme vnto Thomas Randall, Earle of Murrey, and to the Lorde James Dowglas, two Captaynes, for theyr high prowes and noble valiancie in thoſe dayes greatly renowmed.

The rule of things committed to Thomas Randall, and to Iames Dowglas.

These two hardie chieftaynes aſſembling an armie of .xx. thouſande men, or as ſome writers haue .xxv. thouſande, entred with the ſame into Northumberlande, waſting and ſpoyling the countrey on eche ſide.

Against whom came king Edward with an army of an hundred thouſand men: of the which number there were (as Froiſſart hath) an eight thouſande horſemen, and .xxiiij. thouſande Archers. At their comming into Northumberland, they might wel perceyue by the ſmoke of the fiers which the Scottes made in burning of villages, houſes, and townes, where the enimies were: but yet becauſe they taryed not long in a place, but paſſed on without ſoiourning here or there, the Engliſh men might not come neare to fight with them.

King Edward the third commeth with an army againſt them.

King Edwarde therefore, was counſelled to draw towardes Scotlande, that lying betwixt them and home, he might haue them at ſome aduauntage as they ſhoulde returne, whiche was thought woulde bee ſhortly, as well for lacke of vitayles, as alſo to defende theyr owne borders, when they hearde once that the Engliſhe armye drew that wayes forth.

But comming to the riuer of Tine, through abundance of rain (lately fallen) the ſtreame was ſo ryſen, that neither horſe nor man might paſſe, ſo that the armie was conſtrayned to encampe there for the ſpace of three dayes, in great ſcarcity of vitails, till they were faine to ſend vnto Newcaſtell, (whiche was diſtant from thence .xxvj. myles,) and to Carleil, (whiche was aboute .xxij. myles thence,) for prouiſion, which was ſent them from thoſe places in great plentie.

In the meane tyme were thus certayne lyght horſemen ſent abroade into the Countrey to vnderſtande where the Scottes were, and to viewe their doings.

Those that were ſente, finding where the Scottes were encamped, vppon the toppe of a mountain, not paſſing fiue myles from the Engliſh campe, they returned backe to king Edward, and declared what they had ſeene and learned of the enimies doings.

The Scots are encamped on a hyll.

King Edwarde right ioyfull of the newes, cauſeth his armie to be deuyded into three battailes, tayles, and forthwith marcheth on towardes the place where his enimies laye. And comming about .ix. dayes within ſight of the Scottes, he perceyued at length that the place whiche they kept was ſo ſtrong, what with the heigth of the ground, and thereto defended on the one ſide with the courſe of a Ryuer, that by no meanes they might bee aſſayled wythout great and manifeſt daunger.

The Engliſh men in the ende, thought it beſt to chooſe forth a place, to encampe in for ẏ night, and ſo doing ſent an Heralde at armes vnto the Scottes, requyring them to come downe vnto ſome euen grounde where battaile might bee giuen: but the Scottes refuſed ſo to doe, alledging that ſithe the Engliſhe men were three to one of them in number, it was no reaſon to wil them to forſake their grounde of aduauntage which they had taken and choſen forth for their own defence.

Thus were they encamped neare togither eyther in ſight of other for the ſpace of three nights, euery day ſhewing themſelues in order of battail, without breaking their array, except certain of ẏ horſmen which on either part now and thē came forth & fel in ſkirmiſh, ſo ẏ ſomtimes a mā might haue ſeene good emptying of ſaddles betwixt thē.

On the fourth day in the morning, when the Engliſh men beheld the hill where the Scots had lyen the night before, they perceyued howe they were gone, & therevpon ſending forth light horſmen to trie out which way they were takē, word was brought howe they were but remoued to an other hil a litle of, lying faſt by the ſame riuer, and there lay encamped more ſtrongly than before.

Incontinently herevpon king Edward rayſeth his camp, and remoueth to an other hil lying ouer againſt that hil where the Scots were now lodged.

At length, after that both the armies had lyen thus a good ſpace the one fore againſt the other, Iames Dowglas toke aduiſe with himſelfe to exploit a right hardie enterpize.

He choſe forth two hundred of perfite good horſemen, mounted vpon very ſwift and readie geldings, with the which in the night ſeaſon hee paſſed ſlily by the Engliſh watche, that he was not once diſcryed by any of them, till he was entred into their campe, where by the dyn and noiſe made by the moning of the horſe feet, ſome chanced to awake that lay and ſlept, but yet ere the alarme were rayſed to any purpoſe, the Scottes thus led by ẏ Dowglas had pierced through cuē vnto the kings tent, & cut two cordes of the ſame in ſunder, ſo that the king was in no ſmal danger to haue beene ſlaine, had not the Scottes withdrawne ẏ ſooner for doubt of being incloſed with their enimies as now rayſed on eche ſide to come to his ſuccours, but the Dowglas yet returned in ſafetie with his number back againe to the Scottiſh campe, hauing ſlaine (as ſome bookes report) three hundred Engliſh men at this brunt.

The Engliſh men warned hereby, toke better heede after to their watch.

These armies lay thus one againſt an other for the ſpace of .xviij. dayes, till at length the Scottes priuily in the night conueyed themſelues away, and returned home in moſte ſpeedye wiſe, ſuppoſing they had done ſufficiently inough for that tyme.

The Scottes ſecretly returne home to their countrey.

It chaunced that in the Euening before the Scottes went thus their wayes, there was a Scot taken by the Engliſh watch, who beeyng brought before the king, confeſſed that there was cōmaūdement giuē through the Scottiſh camp, that euery man ſhould be ready with his armour and weapon to follow the ſtandart of the Dowglas at a certaine houre the ſame night, but whither they intended to go it was vnknowne, ſaue onely amongſt the Captaines.

Herevpon the Engliſhmen doubting leaſt the Scots minded to giue thē a camiſado that night, placed themſelues in order of battail, & ſo ſtood till the next morning readie to haue receyued them, if they had come. The Scots alſo made great fires within their camp, that they might ſee about thē.

In the breake of the day, there were two Scottiſh Trumpetters taken by the Engliſh ſcoutes, the which being brought before the king, declared how the Scottiſh armie was broken vp and returned, & further ſhewed how they were appoynted thus to declare vnto him, hauing ſuffred themſelues to be taken for the ſame intent.

As ſoone as the Engliſh men were aduertiſed that the Scots were thus departed, they haſted to the place where they had lyen encamped, in hope to haue founde ſome riches, which for haſt they had left behind them: but at their cōming thither, they found nothing, but .x. M. payre of Hielande ſhoes, which are made of greene hydes of beaſtes vntanned: Alſo they found three hundred hydes of ſauage beaſts ſet vpon ſtakes in ſtead of Cawdrons, therein to ſeeth their meate.

Moreouer, they had left behinde them fiue hundred dead carkaſſes of beaſtes & ſheepe, which for that they coulde not driue them away, they killed, to the ende the Engliſhe men ſhoulde haue no gaine by them.

There were likewyſe founde fiue Engliſhe men wyth theyr legges broken, and bounde naked vnto trees, which were quickly loſed and cōmitted to the cure of Chirurgians.

The enimyes beeing thus departed, king Edwarde by aduice of his Counſell brake vp hys campe, and returned to London, ſuppoſing it but loſt labour to trauaile his people any further at that tyme.

King Edward breaketh vp his campe.

1326. as Io. M. hath, but that cannot be, if ſhe died the ſame yeare that the Scots were beſieged in Stanhop parke.

And in the yeare following, or rather the ſame yeare, Q. Elizabeth mother to Dauid Bruce the Prince deceaſſed, and was buried in Dunfermling in the yeare after the byrth of our Sauiour. 1328. In the ſame yeare, king Robert wanne the Caſtell of Norham, and ſhortly after beſieged the Caſtel of Alnwike, where were ſlain William de Mountalte knight, John Clapanen and Maliſius de Dunbar, with diuerſe other of the Scottiſh nobilitie.

Ambaſſadors ſent from K. Edward for a peace.

In the ende of the ſame yeare, there were Imbaſſadours ſent from king Edwarde into Scotland for the concluſion of a peace, which was accorded in this wiſe: That king Edward ſhoulde renounce all his right & clayme which he had or might haue to the crowne of Scotland, in declaring it free as it was in time of K. Alexander the third, vnder theſe cõditions, that Northũberland ſhould be admitted for the marches of Scotland on the eaſt part, and Cumberland on the weſt.

A peace concluded with England in the yeare 1328. after the account of them that beginne the yeare at Chriſtmaſſe.

For the which renunciation thus to be made, and for the domages done to Englande by the Scots, it was couenanted that K. Robert ſhould pay to K. Edward. xxx. M. Markes ſterling.

And for the more ſuretie & ratification of this finall agreemẽt & peace betwixt the two nations,

it was cõcluded that Jane the ſiſter of King Edward ſhould be coupled in mariage with Dauid Bruce the Prince of Scotland.

All which articles were put in writing, whereunto all the ſeales of the great Lords within both the realmes were ſet in moſt ſubſtantiall wiſe.

The ſolemnization of the mariage before remembred was kept at Barwike within a while after, on the. xviij. day of July, in the preſence of a great number of the Nobilitie, both of Englande and Scotland.

The death of king Robert.

King Robert liued not paſt a tweluemonth after this mariage, departing out of this life at Cardros the ſeuenth day of July in the yeare of our Lorde. 1329.

In the latter ende of his dayes, he was grieuouſly vexed with a leproſie, which thus finally made an ende of him, in the. xxiiij. yeare of hys raign, being one of the moſt valiant princes knowen in any part of the whole worlde in thoſe his dayes, hauing felt in his time the force of eyther fortune: for in the beginning of his raigne, ſuche ſtormes of aduerſitie ſurrounded him on eche ſide, that if his conſtant manhode had not beene the greater, it might haue brought him in diſpayre of all recouerie: for beſides ſundrye diſcomfitures, which he receyued at the handes of the enimies, with loſſe of all his brethren (his brother Edward only excepted) the moſte part of all the Lordes of Scotlande were againſt him, and ayded his aduerſaries to the vttermoſt of their powers: yet he nothing diſcouraged herewith, ceaſſed not to employ all induſtruous meanes to deliuer his countrey from the yoke of ſeruile bondage (which hee beleeued would ſucceed by the gouernment of the Engliſh kings) til at length (as it were in deſpite of all former chances) he atteyned the effect of his whole indeuours, ſo much the more to his praiſe, as he had found the hinderance & difficultie great in bringing the ſame fully to paſſe.

King Robert. taſted both proſperous & aduerſe fortune.

His fame therfore did ſpread hugely, not onely amõgſt his own people, but alſo amongſt ſtrangers, inſomuch as his due praiſe was not wanting, no not euen amongſt and in the middeſt of his verie enimies.

The fame of king Robert.

For (as it is ſayde) on a tyme it chaunced that king Edward the third, ſitting at a banket amongeſt his Nobles, fell in talke with them of warlike enterpriſes, and of ſuche notable Captaynes, as had excelled in knowledge in ẏ behalf.

His prayſe amongſt the enimies.

At length after much reaſoning to and fro, he propounded this queſtion to the king of Heralds, that as then ſtood by, cõmaunding him to declare which were the three moſt worthie and valiant captains that he had knowne in all his dayes.

A queſtion proponed to an Engliſh Heralde by king Edwarde the third.

The Herald aduiſing with himſelf of this matter, ſtayed a ſpace, in which meane while all the cõpanie were quiet, longing to heare his anſwere therein, both for that they knew his ſkil was ſuch as was able beſt to giue ſentence in ſuch a matter, and againe, for that many of them thought he woulde haue numbred ſome of thoſe that were there preſent, amongeſt thoſe three. But the Herald did not onely know all the noble men within the realme of England, but alſo al ſuch ſtrangers as had in any wiſe excelled in martiall prowes, hauing all their actes and valiant doings in freſh memorie, and therevpon boldly vttered his mind as followeth:

The Heralde anſwere to the queſtion.

The firſt, moſt worthie and valiant chieftain (ſayd he) that hath liued in theſe our dayes, was Henrie the Emperor, for he ſubdued three kings and three realmes, and mainteyned his imperiall eſtate with proſperous felicitie to his liues ende.

The ſecond, was ſir Giles of Argentine, who in three ſundry battails againſt the Saracins got the victorie, and ſlue two of their principall Captaynes with his owne handes.

The Heralde is ſcorned.

The third (if vnder your graces correction I may prayſe the enimie) I muſt iudge to be Robert Bruce king of Scotlande: whome the Herald had no ſooner named, but all thoſe that were preſente with ſkornefull laughter began to leaſt at the Heraldes preſumption, for that he durſt ſo malapertly in the kings preſence honour the enimie with ſo high prayſe.

At length, at the Heraldes requeſt, the King commaunded

commaunded them to be ſtyll: the Harold then began againe thus: I beſeeke youre highneſſe, (ſayd he) if I haue oughte offended, to take my wordes in good part: for I haue bene euer of this opinion, that the trouth ſhould in euery caſe bee vttered, receiued and allowed in your graces preſence, namely where your highneſſe commaundeth any man to declare the ſame.

This one thing therefore, I ſhall deſyre you to conſider, that if a man muſt needes bee vanquiſhed, it is leſſe diſhonoure to bee vanquiſhed of him that is knowne for a right valiant perſonage, than of him that is but a coward.

Moreouer, to ſhew playnly vnto your grace, how much I eſteeme the valiancie of king Robert (whom I perceiue ſome here may not abide to haue numbred with the .ij. former moſt valiant capitains) if the trouth myghte appeare, I durſt be bold to preferre him with good cauſe before them both: for the valiaunt actes atchieued by Henry the Emperour may be aſcribed rather to the wiſedom of his counſellors, than to hys own valiantneſſe and prudencie: but contrarylye King Robert being conſtrued out of his cõtrey, and deſtitute of frendes and all conuenable ayde, recouered the realme of Scotlande, by his ſingular manhood out of the handes of your noble father, and eſtabliſhed it with ſuche tranquillitie that he appeared more terrible to his enimies of Englande, than euer they hadde bin afore to hys ſubiects of Scotland.

These or the ſemblable wordes vttered by the Heraulde, were well allowed of the kyng, and ſtopped the mouthes of them that toke the matter ſo ſtraungely at the firſt.

But now to return to the purpoſe, King Roberte a little before the tyme of his death, called togither into the chamber where he lay, the chiefeſt peeres of his realme, and there in preſence of them all, committed vnto them the gouernment of his ſonne Dauid, a child as then not paſt ſeuen yeares of age.

He alſo aduiſed them of ſundry things touching the rule of the Realme after his deceaſe, whiche he perceyued was at hand.

And firſt he counſelled them that in no wyſe they ſhould at any tyme make an abſolute lord ouer the Iles, by cauſe the people of the ſame are of nature vnſtedfaſt, ſoone ſeduced & brought to moue rebellion againſte the Kyng, into the which being once fallen, they are not eaſily reduced to their due obedience againe, by reaſon theyr countreys are of ſuche ſtrength, that they can not be approched but by ſea, as enuironned with the ſame.

Secondarily, hee aduiſed them neuer to appoynt any ſette battayle with the Engliſhmen, nor to ieoparde the realme vpon the chaunce of one fielde, but rather to reſiſt and keepe them off from endomaging their countrey, by often ſkirmiſhing and cutting them off at ſtraits and places of aduauntage, to the intent that if Scottes be diſcomfited, they maye yet haue ſome power reſerued to make new reſiſtance.

Thirdly, he forbad them in any wiſe to make any long peace with Englande, for naturally men waxe dull and ſlouthfull by long reſte and quietneſſe, ſo that after long peace, through lack of vſe and exercile of armes, men are not able to ſuſtaine any great paines or trauaile.

Moreouer, he alledged, how the Engliſhmen woulde continue in peace no longer than there wanted opportunitie and conuenient occaſion for them to attempt the warres, and therfore he iudged it beſt, that the Scottes ſhoulde neuer conclude any perpetuall peace with them, nor take any truce longer than for three or foure yeares at the moſte.

He willed them farther to conſider one thing, that when there appeared leaſt occaſion of warres with England, then they ought to be moſte circumſpecte, in aduenture their enimies ſhould come at vnwares, and fynde them vnprouided, for tymely reſiſtance.

Herevnto hee deſired them, that after his deceaſe, they woulde chooſe ſome one of the moſte worthie capitaines within the whole realme to beare his heart vnto Hieruſalem, and there to ſee it buried within the temple, before the holy Sepulchre of our Lorde.

His deſire to haue his harte borne to the holy ſepulchre

For if he had not bin for a long ſpace hyndered by vrgent buſineſſe of warres at home, and laſtly preuented by death, he had vowed to haue paſſed with an army into the holy lande, in defence of the chriſtian faith, againſte the Turks and Saraſins.

Herevpon, when he was dead, the lordes by one aſſent, appointed ſir Iames Dowglas, to take this enterpriſe in hande, who willingly obeyed their order, as he that had euer duryng the lyfe of king Roberte ſerued moſte faithfully the bodie wherin the ſame hart was incloſed.

Sir Iames Douglas appointed to goe with K. Roberts heart to the ſepulchre.

And for this cauſe, the Douglaſſes beare the bloudy heart in their armes.

The cauſe why the Douglaſſes bear the bloudye heart.

Syr Iames Douglas then, choſen as moſte worthy to paſſe with king Robertes heart vnto the holy lande, cloſed the ſame in a caſe of golde, enbalmed with ſweet ſpices, and right precious oyntments. And herewith hauing in his companie a number of nobles, and gentlemen, amongſt whome ſir William Synclare, and ſir Robert Logan were chiefe, he paſſed forth tyll he came to the Citie of Ieruſalem, where hee buried the hart afore ſayd, with al reuerence and ſolemnitie that he might deuiſe.

This done, he reſorted with ſuch number as he had brought thither with him vnto such other Christian princes as at the same tyme were gathered with great puissance, from sundry partes of Christendoome to warre against the Turkes, and there in companye with them, he did so noble seruice agaynst the common enimies of our religion, that by his often victories he wan great honour to the Christian name.

At lengthe, hauing accomplished his charge in those parties, with no lesse fame and glorye, than princely magnificence, he toke the seas to haue returned home into Scotland, but by force of contrary wynds he was driuen on the coast of Spayne, landyng there vppon the bordures of Granado, where at the same tyme, he found the king of Aragone, readie to make warres against the Sarasins that inhabited in those parties.

Iames Douglas cõmeth a land in Spayn.

The Douglas to make his manhod and prowes the more knowne in all partes where hee came, offered the king of Aragone, to serue vnder hym in those warres against the infidels, and so fought at sundry times in his support against the enimies with prosperous successe, til at lẽgth hauing to much confidence in fortunes fauour, (whiche hathe broughte so manye noble men to their deaths) he wared negligent, and toke small regarde of daungers that myghte ensue, so that in the ende he was inclosed by an ambushe layde for him by the enimies, and there slayn amongst them with all suche as he had about him.

Iames Douglas slayne by the Sarasins in Spayne.

This was the ende of that noble Douglas, one of the most valiant knightes, that lyued in his days. He had gotten the victorie. lviij. sundry tymes against the Englishmen, & xiij. tymes againste the Turkes, as it is written at length (sayth Balentine) in Scoticronicon.

How often Iames Douglas had got the victorie.

He might haue bin right necessary for the defence of Scotland, if his chance had bin to haue returned home in safetie. He ended his life in maner (as is before mencioned) on the. xxvj. day of August, in the yeare of grace. 1330.

King Dauid.

BVt now to procede in order with the historie, ye shal note ẏ after ẏ decease of K. Robert, his sonne Dauid a childe vneth. viij. yeres of age, was proclaimed king, & afterwardes crowned at Scone, the. 22. day of Nouember, in the yere of our lord. 1331. During ẏ time of his minoritie, Erle Thomas Rãdal was ordeined gouernor of ẏ realm, who for the space of four yeres, in the later ende of K. Roberts reigne, had ẏ whole administration of things cõmitted to his charge by the same king, for that by reason of sickues, he was not able to attẽd ẏ same himselfe. This Erle Thomas then beeing elected gouernour by the generall consent of al the nobles of the realm, cõsidered with himself, how necessarie it was for the people to continue in peace, till they had somewhat recouered their hynderance and losses chãced to them by the former warres. He addressed therfore certaine ambassadors immediatly after the death of king Robert vnto the king of England, to require a new confirmation of the peace betwixt both the realmes for a season.

Erle Thomas Randall gouernoure of Scotland.

Ambassadours sent into England.

These ambassadours founde the king of England ealy ynough to be intreated for the graunt of their suite, so that a generall truce was taken for the space of. iij. yeares.

In that meane tyme, Erle Thomas applied his whole studie for the mayntenance of iustice and equitie thorow the whole realme, not omitting yet to appoint order, that menne shoulde be prouided of armoure and weapon for defence of the countrey, if necessitie so requested.

A truce for three yeares.

Moreouer, for the better prefe of executyng Iustice amongest them that coueted to lyue by truthe, and to haue more readie occasion to punishe other that ment the contrarie, he commanded ẏ saddles and brydles with all other such instruments and stuffe as pertained to husbandry, shoulde be left abroade both day and night without the doores: and if it chaunced that anye of them were stollen or taken awaye, the Sheriffe of the shyre shoulde eyther cause the same to be restored agayne, or else to paye for it on hys owne purse.

A meane to haue iustice executed.

Finally suche punishment was exercised against theeues in all places, that both theefte and pickerie were quite suppressed, and the Realme broughte to more tranquillitie than euer it was in any kings dayes before.

Punishment of theeues.

Many insolent and misruled persons wer tamed by his seuere chastisement and iustice.

Also that vertue might be cherished within the realme, he commaunded that no vagabunde nor vnknowen person should be receiued into any towne or place, except they had some craft or science wherwith to get their lyuing.

A laudable ordinãce against vagarant persons.

By this meanes he purged the realm of Scotlande of many idle and slouthfull roges and vagabundes.

It is saide, that during the tyme whylest such straight punishment was exercised against offendors by the ministers of the lawes therto by him authorized & assigned: it fortuned that a carle of the countrey, bicause he durst not steale other mens goodes, stale his owne plough yrons, ẏ he might haue the value of them recõpenced to him by the Sheriffe: Neuertheless such earnest diligence was vsed in the serche and triall, who had the plough yrons, that finally the trouth came to light, wherupon for his craftie falshod the partie giltie was hanged, as he had well deserued.

Vpright iustice.

The gouernor himself for ẏ he saw how hard it was to reduce them that had bin brought vp in slouthfull loytering, vnto honest exercise, helde euer aboute him a guarde of warlyke persons, that that he myght the more eaſily oppreſſe all ſtubborne offenders, which would not ſubmit themſelues to his commaundementes.

Thoſe that appeared before him, vppon ſummonance giuen, had fauorable iuſtice, tempered with muche mercie miniſtred vnto them.

Others, that refuſed to obey, were purſewed with his gard, and hanged euer as they were taken: as it hapned on a time at Hadington, where threeſcore euil and naughtie diſpoſed perſons being gathered together, robbed & ſpoyled the people on eche ſyde: and for that they regarded not, but rather myſuſed a purſeuaunt, which he ſent vnto them, they were all taken incontinently by his foreſayd gard, which followed the ſayd purſeuaunt at the heeles, and without reſpite hanged the vp on gybets to giue enſample to others.

Through ſuche rigorous iuſtice, no rebellion was hearde of within the realme of Scotlande many yeares after, ſo that ſuche tranquillitie followed, that not only theeues and loytering lymmers were daunted, but the realme alſo aduaunced in wealth and riches, to the greate terrour of all the foes and enimies therof.

King Edward aduertiſed of this great felicitie chaunced to the Scottes, by this meanes began to enuie the ſame, and imagined with hymſelfe, that if Erle Thomas, the author of ỹ ſame felicitie were diſpatched out of the way, it ſhuld not onely impeache the proceeding of ſo greate wealth to the Scots, but alſo make for the ſuretie of the realme of Englande: for the ſingular manhood and high prowes of this Erle, was by him and other his nobles ſore ſuſpected.

He thought good therfore to attempt the thing by ſleight, that myght not be done by force, that afterwrads the realme of Scotlande myght bee the more enfeebled, and as it were made open to receyue diſpleaſure at his handes.

For king Dauid was yong, and many of his nobles bare ſmall good will towards either hym, or his houſe, for the ſlaughter of their fathers and frendes in the blacke parliament.

Herevpon he deuiſed, whiche way hee myght beſt deſtroy Erle Thomas, the only confounder of all his imagined hope, as to atchiue any luckie enterpriſe againſt the Scots.

At lengthe hee deuiſed to diſpatche hym by poyſon: and after hee hadde long debated by whome he mighte worke that feate: fynally hee founde none ſo fitte for his purpoſe, as a Monke of the order and facultie of thoſe, that wandring from place to place, can with diſſembling viſage ſay that thing with mouthe, whiche they neuer thought in heart: for oftentimes men of that order put no difference betwixte ſhame and honeſtie, clokyng their execrable wickednelle vnder the fayned ſhadow of their hypocritical cowles.

This Monke, fully inſtructed in that whereabout he was ſent, came into Scotland, and fayning himſelfe to be a Phyſition, got credit within a whyle amongeſt the people, to be a man of moſt excellente knowledge, for he had a companion with him, that beeing made priuie to the matter, ſette forth his cunnyng and practiſe to the vttermoſte, declaryng what notable and moſte deſperate cures he had taken in hande, and made the pacientes perfectly whole of the ſame, where al other had quite giuen them ouer, namely he bruted it abroade, that for healing of the ſtone and grauell, his lyke was not to be found in all Chriſtendome, as euidently had appeared by cures whiche he had ſhewed vpon ſundry noble men, both in England and Fraunce.

A Monke ſent into Scotlande to poyſon the gouernor. The fitteſt inſtrument to bring ſuch a thing to paſſe.

This he ſpake, for that it was knowne, how the Lorde gouernour was ſore vexed with that diſeaſe, hoping by this meanes to haue hym in cure, that he might therby the more eaſily worke his his diueliſhe enterpryſe.

And euen accordyng to his deſire it came to paſſe: for being taken for ſuch a man as he was named to be, he was ſente for to the gouernour, and comming before him, he handled the matter ſo with wordes, that the gouernor was contented he ſhould take him in hande, whiche he didde with ſuch wicked intention, that perſuading him to keepe ſuche diet as he preſcribed, & therewith to take ſuch ſirupes and other things as he woulde giue him, at length, he moſte trayterouſly poyſoned him in deede.

The venim was of ſuche mixture, as would not ſlea him out of hande, but by little and little waſte his entrayles, that the Monke might haue leyſure to eſcape home into England, ere it were perceyued what he had done.

The gouernor is poyſoned.

He therfore after he had miniſtred his wicked poyſon, found meanes to conuey himſelfe out of the way, and returned moſte ſpedyly into England, informing king Edward how he had delt.

The Monke fleeth.

The gouernour feelyng himſelfe tormented dayly worſe and worſe in his ſtomack & woumb, and hearing that the Monke was gone, & myndep not to returne to him againe, he beganne to doubt the matter, and ſhortly after learned by Phyſitions that he was poyſoned, and that the venym had taken ſuch holde within his bowels, that it was not poſſible to remoue it.

In the meane tyme, was king Edward come with an armie vnto the bordures, purpoſing to inuade Scotlande, for that he thought how the gouernor was eyther dead, or at the verie poynt of death, and therfore he was in hope, that comming in tyme of the trouble vpon his death into Scotland, he ſhoulde finde occaſion to atchieue ſome enterpryſe highly to his aduantage.

King Edward his purpoſe to inuade Scotland.

But the gouernour aduertized hereof, reyſed a power, and though he were not able eyther to ryde or goe, he yet cauſed himſelfe to bee caryed forth in an horſe litter.

The gouernor in an horſe litter is caryed forth to encounter the Engliſhmen.

King Edwarde hearing that the gouernour was comming towards him with an armie, and that himſelfe in perſon quite contrary to his expectation, he ſent an herauld vnto him for meane of communication of ſome peace, as was outewardly pretended, though nothing elſe was ment but that he ſhoulde eſpye howe all things in the Scottiſhe campe ſtoode.

An herauld ſent to the gouernour.

The gouernour hearing of this heraulds comming, arayed himſelfe in his beſt apparell, that it might appeare he was rather recouered of his infirmitie, than otherwyſe weake and feeble through his diſeaſe, and then cauſing the Herauld to be brought afore him, where he was ſette in a chaire, to heare what his meſſage was, which cõſiſting in certain demaundes not greatly agreable to reaſon, the gouernour with bolde countenãce anſwered, that he truſted within ſhort time to make it knowne, what right the Engliſhmen had to moue ſuche vnreaſonable requeſtes, and thus diſpatching the herauld, he gaue him all ſuche gorgeous and riche apparel as he ware the ſame tyme when he thus talked with hym.

The gouernours anſwere to the herauld.

King Edward at the returne of the Heralde, not perceyuing otherwiſe by his report, but that the gouernour was in health, he returned immediatly with his armie into England, and licencing euery man to depart to his home, layd handes on the monke, and as one that had diſſembled with his prince, (for ſo hee tooke it) cauſed hym to be brent for his vntrouth.

The monke is brent.

Thus was the wretche righteouſly recompenſed, as he had moſt iuſtly deſerued.

In the meane tyme, the gouernor returning homewards, through force of the venym ſtil encreaſing, deceaſed at Muſcelburgh, and was buryed at Dunfermlyng in the yere of our redemption. 1331.

After his deceaſſe, by common conſent of the three eſtates of the realme in councell aſſembled, Patrike Erle of Marche, and Dauid Earle of Mar were choſen gouernours, the firſt (that is to wit the Earle of Marche) had the charge of that part of the realme which lyeth on the ſouth ſide of the Fuith, and the other (that is to ſaye, the Erle of Mar) was appointed to gouerne al that on the north ſyde.

Two gouernours choſen to rule Scotland.

Shortly after roſe great trouble in Scotland by meanes of Edwarde Ballyoll, the ſonne of John Ballyoll before remembred, as thus: It chaunced there was one Twynam Lozſon, a Gentleman borne, but ſpotted with vile conditions, as adulterie & diuers other, for the whiche being put vnder cenſures of the church by the officiell of Glaſgowe: he tooke at length the ſame Officiall as he was going toward the towne of Ayze, and helde him in captiuitie till he had paid two hundred pounds for his deliuerance. But this iniurie remayned not long vnpuniſhed: for ſir James Douglas before his paſſage to the holy lande, would not ſuffer him to reſt, till he had conſtrayned hym to flee into Englande for his more ſafegarde.

Twynam Lozſon.

At his comming into England, he met with Dauyd Cumyn Earle of Athole, and many other Scottiſhmen, which wer baniſhed in tymes paſt by king Robert, for y they aſſiſted the king of England againſt him.

Scottiſh lords baniſhed into England.

Theſe perſons being driuen out of the realme and confederate altogither in one bande, remayned in Englãd long time after, euer truſting to ſee ſome occaſion offred, wherby they might one day return agayn into their own natiue coũtry.

And now, hearing that Erle Thomas Randall the gouernour was deceaſſed, this Twynam nam Laryſon in name of them all was ſent ouer into Fraunce to perſuade Edwarde Ballyoll to attempt the recouerie of the crowne and realme of Scotlande, as the rightfull heritage of his father, and diſcended vnto him as lawfull & rightfull heire.

Though the Ballyoll had no regard to make any claime at all to the crowne of Scotland before this tyme, yet through the pithye perſuaſiõs of the earneſt meſſenger, declaring howe eaſy a matter it were for him to atchieue, conſidering the ayde which he ſhould haue in England, both at the kings handes, and alſo by the Scottiſhemen, whiche remayned there in exile, by whoſe meanes he might aſſure himſelfe of ſuppoꝛt ynough within Scotlande it ſelfe, after hee was once entred: finally he concluded to paſſe ouer into Englande, to proue what purchaſe he myght make there.

At his comming thither, he made ſuite to the king, to ayde hym in his rightuous quarell towards the atteyning of the crowne of Scotland, whiche if he might bring to paſſe with proſperous ſucceſſe, hee promiſed to holde the ſame of him and his ſucceſſoꝛs as ſuperioꝛ loꝛds thereof.

King Edward gladly vppon that condition, condiſcended to his requeſt, notwithſtanding the aliance contracted with king Dauid, by the mariage of him with his ſiſter.

Herewith he appoynted forth. vj. thouſande men well apparayled and arayed foꝛ the warre, to paſſe by ſea with the Ballyol & other the confederates into Scotlande, truſting that vppon their arriuall there, they ſhoulde fynde no ſmall number of frendes to aſſiſt them.

Foꝛ beſide the Ballyoll, there was the loꝛde Henry Beaumount a Frenchmã, who had maryed the erle of Buchquhanes daughter & heire: Alſo the Erles of Athole and Angus, and other ſuche Scottiſhe loꝛdes as were baniſhed Scotlande, when king Robert le Bruce recouered it out of the Engliſhe mens handes.

Theſe were appointed to goe with the Ballyoll to aſſiſte him in that enterpryſe: and lykewyſe the loꝛde Staffoꝛde and diuers other Engliſhe capitaynes, whervpon when al their proꝛuiſion was once ready, with the number apointed them by king Edwarde, and a fewe others, they got them a ſhipboꝛde, and ſaylyng forth by the coaſte till they entred into the Foꝛth, at length they came a lande neare to the towne of Kingoꝛne, and ſhoꝛtly after, encountring with Alexander Seyton, they ſlewe him, and put his folkes to flight.

Ballyoll ryght ioyful of this happie ſucceſſe, came with his people to Perth, otherwiſe called S. Johns towne, wherof the erles of Mar and March being aduertiſed, they reiſed two mightie armies, and haſted towarde the enimies, not as though they ſhuld haue to doe with men of war, but to chaſtiſe a number of theeues & robbers that were come out of Englande.

At length yet they concluded to ioyn both together in Stratherne, that they might ioyntly ſet vpon their enimies both at once.

The Ballyoll ſeeing the matter broughte ſo farforth, that no feare of death noꝛ ſtarting hole by flight might auayle him, boldly came foꝛeward, and pitched downe his tentes at Duplyn neare to the water of Erne, truſtyng that if his armie would ſtande to it, and fighte with manlyke conſtancie, he ſhould weyld his enimies wel ynough, notwithſtanding their huge number. Edward Ballyol at Duplin

The ſame night came the Erle of Mar with his power, and encamped with the ſame within ſight of the engliſh armie, but the erle of March lodged about fiue myles from thence, at Othirardour.

The Scots that were with the Erle of Mar, hauing knowledge of the ſmall number of theyꝛ enimies, made no accompts of them, ſo that they neither toke heede to their watche, noꝛ to any other oꝛder foꝛ defence of themſelues, but fell to ſinging, daunceing, reuelling and dꝛynkyng in moſte diſſolute maner. The negligẽce of the Scottes.

The Ballyol taking occaſion hereof, determined to aſſayle them ẏ ſame night in their campe: and therevpon cauſing his people to make them readie to accompliſhe that enterpꝛiſe, in the dead of the night he iſſued forth of his campe, & comming vnto the water of Erne, paſſeth the ſame by the foꝛde, where one Andꝛowe Murraye of Tullybarde had pight a ſtake of ſet purpoſe, in midſt of the ſtreame, to ſhewe them the way.

Thus hauing got all his armie ouer ẏ water, without any noyſe oꝛ dinne, ſo ſecretly as might be deuiſed, he entred the campe of his enimies, and brake through till he came to the tent of the Erle of Mar the Scottes general, before he was once deſcryed.

Here at the firſt was the Earle himſelf ſlayne lying faſt a ſleepe in his bed, and after with huge noiſe they ſet vpon the whole camp, murthering the Scottes as then buried in ſleepe without al defence. And therevpon folowed ſo cruel ſlaughter, that nothing was hearde but grunting and groning of people, as they lay on heapes redie to dye, weltring togither in their owne bloud. The Earle of Mar is ſlayn in his bedde. See more here of in Scotland.

And if it had not bin that Edward Ballyol had cauſed eche of his men to wꝛappe a whyte cloth aboute his arme, no man might haue knowen (by reaſon of the myꝛkneſſe of the night) his frende from his foe.

The Engliſhemen were ſo earneſtly bente to the ſlaughter of Scottes, that they myghte not bee ſatiate with the bloud and murder of them, ſo ſo that they ſaued none whom they myght ouertake. There were ſlain of nobles & gentlemen, to the number of .iij. thouſand, beſides innumerable of the commons. A certain number of the Scots that eſcaped out of the place, cloſed themſelues together, and in purpoſe to bee reuenged on the Engliſhemen for the death of their fellowes, returned vpon them againe, and were ſlaine themſelues euery mothers ſonne.

The Earle of Mar was not ſlayne in the night as before ye haue heard, but now in the morowe following as hath Southwel.

The chiefeſt nobles that wer ſlayn at this batayle, were theſe the erle of Mar generall of ẏ armie, Roberte Bruce erle of Carryke, Alexander Fraſeyr knight, William Hay cõſtable of Scotlande, with al his lygnage ſo wholly, ẏ had not his wyfe as then being great bellyed, bin afterwardes deliuered of a ſonne, all his ſurname had bin vtterly extinguiſhed.

There were ſlayne alſo Robert Keyth Marſhall of the realme, with many of his ſurname, Dauid Lyndſey of Glenneſk, Alexander Beyton, George Dunbar, Roberte Strathaquhen, Thomas Halyburton, and John Skrymgeour knightes, with many other ouerlong to reherſe.

After that Edwarde Ballyoll had atchieued this victorie thus at Duplyn, he wente ſtraighwayes vnto Perth, (otherwyſe called Saynct Johns towne) and giuing aſſault thereto, quickly entred it by force, without any great reſiſtance.

The Erle of March that lodged (as is ſayd) the ſame night that the battaile was fought, not paſt fiue myles off, hearyng what had chaunced bothe of the battayle and towne, came wyth his people arayed in good and perfecte order vnto Perth aforeſayde, to beſiege the Engliſhmen with Ewarde Ballyoll and other as then within it.

filled the dieches in the meane tyme to ſuch aduãntage, that it was thought if he had giuen the aſſault, he muſt nedes haue entred, he ſodenly reiſed frõ thẽce, & departed, to ẏ vnſpeakable domage (as was thought) of the whole Scottiſh nation. The ſiege being thus reiſed, ther came dayly great nũbers of nobles & cõmons vnto ẏ Ballyol, offering him their ayd & ſeruice as his loyal ſubiects, towards ẏ atteyning of his right to ẏ crowne.

HEreupon perceiuing his power ſufficientlye increaſed, and receyuyng the Othes of the Erle of Fyfe, and William de Saint clare Byſhoppe of Dunkelde, hee wente accompanyed with them and a greate number of other, vnto Scone, where he was crowned the .xxiiij. daye of September, in the yeare laſte before remembred, and receyued there the ſame tyme the homages and fealties of a greate companye of nobles and Gentlemenne, at that ſolemne feaſte there aſſembled.

the towne of Perth, otherwiſe called S. Johns towne, which ſtandeth almoſt in the middle part of the Realme, and was at that preſent not cloſed with any wall, or rampire, they reyſed theyr powers, and beſeeged him within ỹ ſame towne, he hauing as then no great company about him. Whereof whē they of Galloway had aduertiſemente, bycauſe the Kyng was their ſpecial Lord and chiefe gouernoure, they aſſembled togyther vnder the conduct of the Lorde Euſtace de Makeſwel, and inuaded the lands of thoſe Scottiſhmen that had thus beſeeged their Lorde King Edward Ballyol, and by that meanes conſtreyned the aduerſaries to leuie their ſeege. Whereupon Earle Patricke ỹ newe Earle of Murrey, with the Lord Andrewe de Murrey, and the Lord Archēbald Dowglas, with an army aſſēbled in all ſpeede, entred into Galloway, doing al the miſchiefe they coulde deuiſe, with fire and ſworde, taking and bringing away from thence a great number of Cattell and other gwdes, but they ſlewe no greate number of people, for they found them not at home, being withdrawen out of ỹ way for feare of this terrible inuaſiō. Thus did the Scottes in that part of the Realm ſpoyle and harrie each others countreys. In the meane time, King Edwarde le Balliol fortifyed the towne of Perth, appoynting the Earle of Fife to the keeping thereof, whileſt he with an army paſſed into the countrey, but before he returned, hys aduerſaries, to witte, the ſonnes of them that had bin ſlain at the battel of Duplyn, Robert Keith, Alexāder Lindſey, James and Simon Fraſeir, wanne Saint Johns towne in the third moneth after they had layde ſeege thereto, as Hector Boetius hath, but whether that is to be intended after the firſt beſeeging thereof, or now after theyr laſt comming thither I can not affirme, but as the ſame Boetius writeth: now when the towne was won, the Earle of Fife, and Andrew Murray of Tullybard, were taken with other of their complices.

The Earle was ſent to ỹ Caſtle of Kyldrūmy, there to remayne vnder ſafekeeping: but Andrew Murray for his treaſon afore committed, was beheaded.

The towne being thus won, was deliuered to the keeping of Johṇ Lindſay.

The gayning of this towne, put the Scottes in hope of more proſperitie to ſucceede.

And thereyppon John Randoll the Earle of Murrey, ſon to Earle Thomas late of famous memorie, and Archembald Douglas Lorde of Galloway, the brother of James Douglas lately ſlayne (as before is mentioned) in Spain with Symon Fraſeir and others, gathered a great army, and came with the ſame againſt the Balliell, who being aduertiſed thereof, mette them in Annandale, where encountring togither after cruell fight, and great ſlaughter on both partes, at length Ballyols part was put to the worſt, ſo that he him ſelfe was glad to flee, hauing got an Horſe without a bridle, & rested not till he came to Roxburgh or rather to Carleil, as Richarde Southwell hath.

In this battel wer ſlayn Sir Henry Ballyol, a man of great valiancie, Sir John Mowbray, Walter Walter Cumyn, and Richard Kyrkby: but Alexander Bruce Erle of Carryke, and the lorde of Galloway were taken priſoners, and ſaued by the helpe of the Earle of Murray, for that they hadde ſubmitted them ſelues to the Balyoll but lately before.

Androw Murray choſen fellow gouernor with the erle of Marche.

Shortly after the atchieuing of this victorie, Androw Murray a man of great puiſſance and poſſeſſions was choſen to be gouernoure, as colleague and aſſociate with the Erle of March.

These two gouernors, hearing that the king of England was mynded to inuade Scotlande with a mayne armie, ſent ſir Alexander Seyton with many other gentlemen vnto Berwike for defence of that towne and caſtell. Shortly after, the newe gouernour Androw Murray was taken priſoner at Rorburgh, by reaſon that hauing put his enimies to flight in a ſkirmiſhe which he made with them at the bridge without the caſtell, he purſewed ouer raſhely in the chaſe, and was incloſed amongeſt them, and ſo taken ere he might be reſkued.

There was alſo taken beſide the gouernoure, a notable pyrate named Crab, who before that tyme had done many diſpleaſures to the engliſh men both by ſea and lande: and now bicauſe his countreymen woulde not raunſome him, but to his further griefe, had ſlayne his ſonne within Barwike, he became the king of Englands man, and did the Scots more domage afterwards thã euer he had done to the Engliſhmen before. The gouernour at length was raunſomed for a great ſumme of golde.

Ric Southwel. Crab, a pyrate taken.

About the ſame tyme William Douglas of Lyddeſdale named for his ſingular manhood, the floure of chiualrie, fought with the Engliſhmen in Annandale, where himſelfe was taken, and his people diſcomfited.

William Douglas of Lidaſdale taken priſoner.

Bothe theſe noble men thus taken priſoners, were deteyned in captiuitie more than a twelue moneths ſpace, and then raunſomed for a great ſumme of golde.

This William Douglas was ſonne to ſir James Douglas, of whome ſo often mention is made heretofore.

The realme of Scotlande being thus deuyded in two partes, the one aſſiſting the Ballyol, & the other continuing in their allegiance ſworn and promiſed to king Dauid: Edwarde king of England iudged ẏ time to ſerue wel for his purpoſe to make a conqueſt on the Scots, and hereupon gathering a mightie armie both of Engliſh men, and ſtrangers, as well ſuche as were ſubiectes to hym as other, whome he retayned out of Normandie, Aniou, and Flanders, he came with the ſame to ſubdue (as he outwardely pretended) only ſuch Scottes as woulde not yelde themſelues to the Ballyoll.

Edward king of England purpoſeth to ſubdue the Scottes.

The Scots perceyuing themſelues thus ouerſet with enimies on eche ſide, ſent John Randoll Erle of Murray into Fraunce vnto kyng Dauid, that by his meanes they might purchaſe ſome aid of the French kyng to defend ẏ realme from the force of the enimies.

The Erle of Murray is ſent into Fraunce.

In the meane tyme the king of England beſiegeth Barwike both by ſea and land, notwithſtandyng ſuche as were within it, defended the towne ſo manfully that he got but ſmall gaynes by aſſaultes, by reaſon whereof, the ſiege contynued for the ſpace of four months: during which tyme many iſſues and ſkirmiſhes were made betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen, whereat manye proper feates of armes were atchieued with varyable fortune.

William Seyton ſonne to the captaine of the towne was taken priſoner, and his baſterde brother, as he aſſayled the engliſh ſhippes one night ouerfiercely, was drowned by miſchaunce in the ſea.

At length when they within the towne began to want victuals, the captain ſir Alexander Seiton ſent vnto king Edward, promiſing that if he would graunt a truce for the ſpace of. vj. dayes, if no ſuccour came in the meane tyme, to reſiſte his ſiege, the towne ſhould be delyuered into hys handes at the ende of that terme, and for aſ-

ſurance thereof, he was contented that his eldeſt ſonne and heire Thomas Seiton ſhould remain with the ſayd king in hoſtage.

Whyleſt thinges paſſed thus at Barwyke, the nobles of Scotland by common conſente, choſe Archembald Douglas to be gouernour in place of Iohn Murray.

This Archembald Douglas reyſing a mightie armie of Scottiſhmen, entred with the ſame into the boꝛdures of Englande, ſo to withdꝛawe king Edward from the ſiege of Barwike to defende hys owne landes from bꝛennyng and ſpoiling.

But king Edwarde aduertiſed hereof, deuiſed an other ſhift, foꝛ immediatly ſending a meſſenger vnto ſir Alexander Seiton captain of the towne, he certified him playnly, that onleſſe hee rendꝛed the town foꝛthwith into his hands, both his ſonnes whiche hee had with him, the one as hoſtage, and the other as pꝛyſoner, ſhoulde bee without further delay hanged vpõ a gybet there in ſight afoꝛe his owne face.

Sir Alexander Seiton herevnto aunſwered, that as yet the terme of the truce was not expired, and therfoꝛe deſyꝛed the King eyther to obſerue the couenauntes, oꝛ elſe to deliuer the pledges, that he mighte be at his aduauntage: But King Edward (as ſaith the Scottiſh chꝛonicle) immediately cauſed a payꝛe of gallows to bee reyſed afoꝛe the towne, and bothe the ſonnes of the ſayde ſyꝛ Alexander to be led thyther, to ſuffer on the ſame without further reſpite.

Sir Alexander Seiton beholdyng that pityfull ſighte, and weying with himſelfe, that hee myght ſaue the lyues of thoſe innocent creatures, if he woulde, was bꝛoughte into great perplexitie of mynde, the naturall affection & compaſſion which he bare towardes his ſonnes, mouing him to haue rendꝛed the towne on the one ſide, and the duetie with faithe pꝛompted to his king and countrey, reſtrayning him from all ſuche reſolution on the other: but in the end the tender regard he had to ſaue the lyues of his ſonnes, had ouercome him, and cauſed him to haue rendꝛed the town into his enimies hand, had not his wyfe and mother to his ſayd ſonnes, exhoꝛted him moſt earneſtly to the contrary, alledging that ſuche repꝛoch and diſhonour ſhuld redounde vnto them, and their poſteritie, if thꝛough their fault the towne were trayterouſly deliuered into the enimies hande, that from thencefoꝛth they ſhoulde be infamed foꝛ euer: and as foꝛ the death of their ſonnes, it was not to bee accompted a loſſe, foꝛ by this kynde of death, they ſhuld win immoꝛtall name, and leaue to their parentes the high honoure and renoume of faythfull and loyall ſubiectes.

Agayne, they were yong ynough to begette and bꝛyng foꝛthe newe chyldꝛen, where they ſhould be neuer able to recouer honour once loſt, if by deliuering the towne into the enimies handes, they ſhoulde ſeeme to betray their countrey, and falſe their faithe to their naturall pꝛince and ſoueraigne.

With ſuche and many other the lyke woꝛds, thys noble and woꝛthie Ladye perſwaded hir huſbande to refrayne his inwarde griefe, and bꝛoughte hym with ryghte ſoꝛowfull and heauie cheere vnto hir chamber, that thꝛough commiſeration hadde of his ſonnes, he ſhould commit nothyng eyther agaynſt his honoꝛ oꝛ weale of the towne.

In the meane tyme, his two ſonnes were put to death, endyng their lyues (ſayeth Hectoꝛ Boetius) with moſte honour, foꝛ the righteous quarell of their countrey. Sir Alexander Seitons ſonnes executed.

Archembalde Douglas the gouernour, beyng at that pꝛeſente entred into Noꝛthumberlande with his armye, hearing that king Edward had thus cruelly put to death thoſe two yong Gentlemen, came the thirde daye after wyth all his power, and pitched downe his tentes not farre from King Edwardes armye, fully reſolued to giue him battaile, as well to reuenge the diſpleſure foꝛ the death of the ſaid gentlemẽ, as to deliuer the towne of Barwike from further danger of the enimies foꝛce. Archembald Douglas purpoſeth to giue battaile.

Yet were there ſundꝛie pꝛudent counſelloꝛs in the Scottiſhe armie, that foꝛ diuers reſpectes aduiſed him in no wiſe to fight with the enemies at that pꝛeſent, conſidering the huge number of pꝛactiſed ſouldiours whiche they had amongeſt them, and the wante of ſkilfull warrioures on his ſyde, hauing fewe wyth hym ſaue young nienne, and ſuche as lacked experience in the warres, foꝛ that they hadde bin but little trayned therein.

Notwithſtanding, he hymſelf was of a contrary opinion, iudging that the good willes and deſyꝛe whyche his people hadde to fighte wyth the Engliſhmenne, ſhoulde ſupplye their lacke of ſkill: and therevppon determyning to tꝛye the chaunce of battayle wyth them, commaunded his armye to refreſhe themſelues with meat, dꝛinke and ſleepe foꝛ that nyght, and to pꝛouide them ſelues readye foꝛ battayle on the nexte moꝛnyng.

In the bꝛeake of the daye he arayed his people in oꝛder of battayle. The vauntgarde was giuen to Hugh, loꝛde Roſſe, hauing with him Kenneth Earle of Southerlande, Symon and Iohn Fraſeyꝛ, and Iohn Murraye Lieutenaunt to the Earle of Murray, who as then was ſoꝛe tormented with a grieuous maladie oꝛ ſickneſſe. The apointing of the Scottiſh battails.

The ſeconde battayle was committed to the gouernaunce of Alexander Lyndſey, with whome were ioyned Alexander Gordon, Reynolde Grahaume, and Robert Keanneth.

In the thyrde battayle was the gouernoure hymſelfe, accompanyed with James, John and Alane, Stewardes, the ſonnes of Walter great Stewarde of Scotlande.

On the other part, the Engliſhmen were nothyng ſlacke to come forwarde to encounter the Scottes, but at the firſt to take the vauntage of the grounde, they gaue ſomewhat backe, withdrawyng to the ſide of an hill, whiche they hauing once got, boldely turned themſelues to the Scottes that purſued them ouer raſhely, in hope that the victorie had bin alreadie theirs: but being here fiercely receyued by the engliſhmen, and The policie of the Engliſh men.

beaten downe in heapes on eche ſyde, thoughe they enforced themſelues with all their might to be reuenged both for olde & newe iniuries whiche they had receyued, and ſo ſlewe no ſmall number of the enimies: yet in the end was the Scottiſh army put to flight, and more ſlaughter made in the chaſe, than was afore in the battayle: for one wing of the Engliſhmen making forwarde to get before the Scottes, ſo ſtopped their paſſage, that they were ſlayne miſerablye on eche ſyde, as they had bin encloſed within a toylle or deere ſtall. There were but few in number that were taken priſoners, thoſe on the next day were beheaded by commandement of king Edward, except a ſmall number whiche were kept ſecrete by ſome of the Engliſhemen for profite of their raunſome. There were ſlayn on that day of the battayle, to the number of. xiiij. thouſande men, amongeſt whome were theſe as principall, Archembald Douglas the gouernour, John Steward, James Stewarde, and Alane Stewarde the ſonnes of Walter Stewarde: the Earle of Ros, the Earle of Suthirlande, Alexander Bruce Erle of Carryke, Andrew, James, and Symon Fraſeir. This batayl was fought on the Magdalene day, in the yeare. 1332.

That this number and therewith many mo doe abounde by one yeare, William Harylon dothe gather by the feries, becauſe Adam Weremouth ſayeth, that Magdalene day fell on the Monday this yeare, and that the morrowe after being Tuiſday, Barwike was ſurrendred. But for ſo much as the ſame Weremouth may be perhappes deceyued, or miſtaken heerein, I haue here thought good as in other places, to note in the margent the yeere, according to the accompt of Hector Boetius, ſpecially in this place, the rather becauſe he agreeth with Richard Southwel, Robert Auelburie, and other of our Engliſh writers, concerning this yeere in whiche this battell was fought: but where the ſame Boetius ſayth, that it was fought on Magdalen day, Richarde Southwell, Robert Auelburie, Thomas Walſ. and diuers other affirme, that it was fought the xix. of July being Saint Margarets euen. But now to proceede.

The place where this battell was ſtriken, is called Halidown hill.

Immediately vppon this ouerthrowe of the Scottiſh power, Alexander Seyton and Patrick Dunbar captaynes of Barwicke, deſpayring of all ſupport, yeelded the towne to King Edward, with condition to haue their liues and goodes ſaued, and to become ſubiects vnto King Edward. The towne of Barwike yeelded to King Edward on S. Margarets day, as Southwell hath.

Herevpon, when they had receyued their othes, Patricke Dunbar was commaunded by K. Edward, to builde vp agayne the Caſtel of Dunbar vppon his owne coſtes and charges, for that hee had throwne it downe, when he ſawe he was not able to defend it againſt the Engliſh power comming towards hym.

King Edwarde hauing thus accompliſhed hys

hys delyze, returned backe into Englande, leauing behynde hym wyth the Ballyoll, manye greate Lozdes of Englande (amongeſt whom as chiefe was Rycharde Talbot) that vlyng the aduice and councell of them hee might rule the Realme of Scotlande as ſhould be thought expedient.

Edwarde Ballyoll herebypon wente thorough all the boundes of Scotlande, placing garniſons of Engliſhmen in moſte part of all the ſtrengthes and caſtels of the realme, foz he had them al at his commandement, fiue of them onely excepted, whyche were kepte by ſuche Scottiſhmen, as woulde not renounce their allegiance pzomiſed to king Dauid.

Foz Dounbzyton was kepte by Malcolme Flemmyng of Cummirnalde: Lochlebyn by Alane of Uepount: The Caſtell of Kyldzummy by Chziſtine Bzuce: And Urquharte by Roberte Lawder: The pyle of Lowdoun, a ſtrong thyng of ſo ſmall a compaſſe, was in the keeping of one Johm Thomſon.

Theſe Capitaines would by no meanes neyther yeeld themſelues noz their foztreſſes to Edward Ballyol, but defend them to the vttezance foz the behoſe of their ſoueraine Lozd and maiſter king Dauid.

In the meane tyme, Philip king of Fraunce laboured to the Pope, that he might by his authozitie cauſe the Engliſhmen to ſurceaſſe from further bexing the Scottes, by their cruell inuaſions made into their countrey: But when the Popes ambaſſadours came aboute this matter into Englande, they were ſo little regarded, that they could not get licence to declare ẏ meſſage, ⁊ ſo were they glad to returne without doing any thing in the matter whereabout they were ſent.

Shoztlye after was a Parliamente called at Perthe, where Edwarde Ballyoll was confirmed Kyng of Scotlande, a greate number of the nobles pzomiſing there by ſolemne othes neuer to moue anye rebellion agaynſte him in tymes to come.

In the meane tyme roſe great altercation betwixt Henry Beaumont, and Alexander Mowbzaye foz certaine landes in Buchquhane: Henry Beaumount claymed thoſe lands by the right of his wyfe, that was daughter to the ſayd Alexander, but the Mowbzaye claymed them as heire to his bzother.

After long contention, Mowbzay hadde the landes adiudged to him by ſentence of the Ballyoll, by reaſon wherof, Dauid Cumyn Earle of Athole, and Richarde Talbot, fauouring the cauſe of Henry Beaumont, began to pzactiſe ſuche conſpiracies againſt the Ballyoll, that to auoyde further daunger, he was glad to repeale the fozmer ſentence by him gyuen on the behalfe of Alexander Mowbzaye, and by newe ſentence adiudged the landes vnto Henry Beaumounte, foz that (as was alledged) he had maryed the inheritour therof.

Thus thozoughe puiſſaunce of the parties, the truthe in decydyng of the Controuerſye, myghte not haue place, and alſo the Ballyoll conſtrayned to haue the one of them to hys enimyes.

Not long after this, Edward Ballyol came to Rainfrewe, and there receyuyng the people into his obeyſaunce, hadde the keyes of the caſtell of Rothſaye and Dunnone bzoughte vnto hym by ſir Alane Lyle Sheriffe of Bute.

The caſtels of Rothſay and Dunnone deliuered to the Ballyoll.

Thus didde the Ballyoll encreaſe in puiſſaunce by ſuche confluence of people, as daylye ſubmitted them ſelues vnto hym, and hee eurycbed them liberally wyth landes and gwdes ſtill as they came vnto him, therby to winne their gwd willes.

He ſoughte by all meanes poſſible to haue gotten Roberte Stewarde into hys handes, as the perſone whome hee knewe to haue moſte ryghte next vnto kyng Dauid to the Crowne of Scotlande: but thozough the dyligent foz-ſyghte of hys frendes: Thys Roberte Stewarde beeyng aboute the age of fyfteene yeares, was conueyed to the caſtell of Dunbzeton, where hee was ioyefully receyued by Malcolme Flemyng the Captais.

Robert Stewarde.

The Ballyoll beeyng ſoze offended, that ſuche Caſtelles as were kepte by his enimies, were ſo greate an impediemente to hys enterpziſes, by ſuccouring and relieuyng hys aduerſaryes to maynteyne warres agaynſt him, he got togyther an armye, and the nexte yeare layde ſiege vnto the Caſtell of Lochlebyn: But perceyuyng that thys Caſtell myghte not bee wonne without long ſiege, he appoynted Syz John Striuelyng to continue the ſiege wyth a greate power of menne, vntill the Caſtel were yelded.

Lochleuyn beſieged.

There were lefte alſo with him Michaell Hereot, Dauid Wemis, and Richarde Maleville, with diuers other. Theſe capiteines aduiſing the place and ſyte of the Caſtell, lodged themſelues within the Churcheyarde of Sainte Serfe, beſide Kinroſſe, makyng Baſtyles and other defenſes within the ſame, foz their moze ſafegarde.

Within the Caſtell were two valyant captaynes to defende it, the one named Alane Uepount, and James Lamby Citezins of Saint Andzowes.

Alane Vepont & Iames Lamby captains of Lochleuyn.

The enimies aſſayd al the meanes that might be deuiſed to haue wonne this caſtel, but al was in vayne.

At lengthe they deuiſed a ſubtill ſleight, wherby to compaſſe their intent on this wyſe:

A deuyſe to drowne the caſtell.

They wente aboute to damme vp the mouth of the ryuer where it iſſueth out of the Loche, wyth earth, trees, and ſtones, that the water beyng ſo kepte in, might ryſe to ſuch an heighte, that it ſhoulde ouerflowe the Caſtell, and ſo drowne all the people wythin it: and to cauſe the Loche to ſwell more ſpeedyly, they tourned the courſe of dyuers ryuers and brookes in the countrey thereaboutes, and broughte them into the ſame loche.

It chaunced at the ſame tyme, that ſir John Striuelyng capitayne of the ſiege, with a great parte of the armie, went vnto Donfermling for deuotion ſake, to viſite the ſhrine of Saint Margaret, ſometyme Queene of Scotlande.

Whereof Alane Uepount then capitayne of the Caſtell, hauyng vnderſtanding, about midnight prepared three boates, and takyng certayn ſouldiours with hym, rowed forth to the heade of the damme or water, and there with ſuch engines as he had deuyſed for the purpoſe, aſſayed to boare thorough and make a hole in the banke or rampier that kepte vp the water, which when they had brought to paſſe, they returned quickely agayne to the caſtell.

The water hauing once gotten an iſſue, within a whyle ware the hole ſo large, that entryng with more violence, it finally brake downe the banke, & ruſhed forth with ſuch an huge ſtream, that it bare downe all afore it, drowning vp the baſtils and tentes of them that lay at ſiege there, and carryed the ſame with men and all downe into the deepe ſea, they were ſo ſodenly taken, ere they could make any ſhift to eſcape.

The baſtiles and tentes of them that laye at ſiege drowned.

Alane Uepount, whē the water was fallen to the olde marke, iſſued forth of the caſtel, and ſetting vpon thoſe that had eſcaped the daunger of the water, ſlew part of them, and put the remnant to flyght.

John Striuelyng hearing the miſchiefe that had hapned to his folks, returned to the ſiege, and made a bowe neuer to departe from thence, til he had taken the caſtel, and ſlayn al them within it.

But yet after he had layne there a long tyme, and ſawe it was not poſſible to wynne that fortreſſe, he was conſtrayned to reyſe his ſiege, and to goe his wayes, after he had loſt therat no ſmal number of his people. This ſiege of Loche Leuyn chanced in the Lent ſeaſon in the yere. 1335.

In the yeare following, King Edward prepared an armie both by ſea and land to enter into Scotlande.

King Edward inuadeth Scotlande both by ſea and land.

He ſent by ſea. lxx. ſhips well and ſufficiently decked for the warres, to enter by the Forth: but by a ſore tempeſte many of thoſe veſſels periſhed betwixt Inchkieth and the north lande.

He himſelf hauing the Ballyol in his companie with fiftie thouſande menne, came by lande vnto Glaſgow, and perceiuing there was little for him to doe, for that no rebellion greatly anye where apeared, he returned back again into England with the Ballyol, and left Dauid Cumyn Erle of Athole gouernor in his rowmth to ſubdue the reſidue of the rebels, and to win thoſe ſtrengthes, which as yet were defended againſt him.

Dauid Cumyn erle of Athole gouernour for the Ballyol in Scotlande.

Dauid Cumyn lefte thus to be gouernoure in Scotlande, toke vpon him to rule in name both of the king of Englād, and alſo of the Ballyoll, and ſealed into his handes all thoſe landes in Murray and Buchquhane, whiche pertayned to Robert Stewarde, confiſcatyng all the gowdes of ſuche the inhabitauntes, as woulde not bee ſworne vnto him.

Incontinently wherbypon, Robert Stuarde aſſembled his frendes by the helpe of Dungall Campbell of Lochquhow, and ſodeinly toke the caſtell of Dunnone, ſleying all the Engliſhmen and other which were found therin.

The caſtell of Dunnone taken.

The

The commons of Bute and Arrayne glad of this prosperous beginning, assembled together to the number of .iij. hundred persons, and set forward, that they might come to support Robert Steward in suche his late begon enterprises: and being encountred by the waye by Alane Lyle sheriffe of Bute, they layd so lustily about them, that they slewe the sheriffe there in the field, and discomfited all his people.

Diuers of them taken prisoners, were brought away and presented vnto Robert Steward, who in recompence of this seruice, graunted sundrye priuiledges vnto the inhabitantes of Bute and Arrane: As among other things, to bee free from paying tribute for their corne and grayne.

Suche felicities succeedyng one an other, caused manye of the Scottes to ioyne themselues wyth Roberte Steward, in hope to recouer the Realme oute of the Englishmennes handes.

Amongest other, Thomas Bruce Earle of Carryke, and William Cantbere, with a number of the commons came vnto hym.

About the same tyme, the Earle of Murray returned forth of Fraunce, and landed at Dounbryton, where he was moste ioyfully receyued by the sayd Robert Steward.

Shortlye after the sayd, Steward and the sayde Earle, hauing with them a greate power of their frendes and allies, came into Clydesdale, Ranfrew, Kyle, Cuninghame, and Lyne, which together with Ros and Murray, they reduced to the obeysance of king Dauid. The Earle of Murraye also, to reuenge the iniuries done by the Earle of Athole, went vnto Abyrden, and there learning where hee soiourned, made thither with all speede: but the Earle of Athole vnderstanding howe all the countrey toke parte with his aduersaries, fled into the mountains, where hee sustayned his lyfe wyth hearbes and rootes for a tyme, and durste not come forth to shewe his head.

At length when he sawe no waye to escape, he came forth and in most humble wyse submitted himselfe to the lordes that defended the parte of king Dauid.

They receyuing him vppon his submission, sware him to be true vnto king Dauid, and exhortyng him to bee as diligente in reconcilyng the people vnto king Dauid, as he hadde ben afore to subdewe them to the obedience of the Ballyoll, they suffred him to departe.

Abonte the same tyme, sir Wylliam Douglas of Lyddysdale, and Andrewe Murraye were raunsomed home oute of Englande, for a great summe of monaye, after they had bene kepte there by the space of three yeares in captiuitie.

At theyr commyng to Edenburgh, they founde the Lordes assembled in Councell, at the whyche the Earle of Murray and Robert Steward, wyth generall voyces were elected gouernours. The Earle of Murray and Robert Steward elected gouernours.

Many Scottishemen at thys tyme reuolted from the Kyng of Englande, in submyttyng themselues to king Dauid, as Alexander Ramsay, a ryghte skylfull warryour, Laurence Preston, Iohn Herryng, and Iohn Halyburton knyghts, with diuers other.

Not long after, was an other Parlyamente called by the gouernours at Darle, to deuise for the ordering of things perteyning to the comion wealth: but for so muche as Dauid Cumyn Earle of Athole came thyther with a greater power than was thought expedient for suche an assemble, other mistrusting his meaning, grudged therat, and alledged howe they myghte not with suretie proceede in theyr doyngs, and so by that meanes the assemble brake vp for that tyme, withoute effect of that whereabout they were come.

Edwarde Kyng of Englande vnderstandyng the Rebellyon of the Scottes, determyned to assayle them bothe by sea and lande: and so prouydyng a Nauye of an hundreth and fourescore shyppes, sente the same well victualled and manned to sayle into the Forth, the whyche beeyng there arryued, brente and spoyled the townes on bothe sydes that ryuer, but returnyng backe into Englande, they losse many of their vessels by a tempest. Ye may reade more of thys matter in the historie of Englande. A nauie sente into Scotland. Shipwracke.

Kyng Edwarde hymselfe, together wyth Edwarde Ballyoll entred by lande, wyth an armye of fyftye thousande menne, leadyng the same vnto the towne of Perth, otherwyse called Sayncte Johns towne, and there lodged in Campe, abydyng for the comming of the Earle of Athole, who as then beeyng solicited thereto by the Kyng of Englandes agentes, was readye to tourne agayne incontinently to hys syde. King Edwarde inuadeth the Scots by land.

The same tyme whylest the kyng of Englande laye thus at Perth, the Earle of Namure (whome the Scottishe writers wrongly name the Duke of Gelderlande) came into Englande wyth an armye, and purposyng to passe thorough Scotland vnto the place where Kyng Edwarde laye in Campe, to come to hys ayde, was discomfyted on the Bourrowe Moore, beside Edynburghe, by the power of the Gouernoures, and others, whiche were there assembled agaynst him. Not the Duke of Gelderland, but the Erle of Namure, named Guy.

There died many on bothe partes in the fight (as Iohn Fourdon writeth) for the strangers fought right valiantly: in so muche, that if William Douglas with diuers other, had not come Iohn Fourdon downe from Pictlande hilles to the ayde of the Scottes, whylest they were thus fightyng, the strangers that day had wonne the victorie. But now discouraged with the sodayne comming of this freshe ayde to theyr aduersaries, they began to giue place, and drewe towardes Edenburgh, neuertheleſſe kepyng themselues in order of battayle, they fought still: and at length comming to Edenburgh, they were driuen vp thorough the Fryers streete, and so by an other streete, called Saint Marie Wynde, where one sir Dauid de Anand a right valiant knight chaunced to be wounded by one of the enimies, by reason wherof he was so kindled in wrathfull desire to be reuenged, that with an axe whiche he had in his hande, he raught his aduersarie (that had hurt him) suche a blow on the shoulder, that he cloue hym downe togither with his horse, that the axe stayed not till it light vpon the verie harde pauement, so as the print of that violēt stroke remained to be sene a long tyme after in one of the stones of the same pauement. The Strangers still retiring, and manfully defending themselues, at lengthe got to the hill where Edenburgh castell standeth, and there slew their horses, made as it were a rampier of their carcasses, so to defend thē selues from the force of their enemies: but being enuironed by the Scots on eche side all ỹ night, and hauing neither meate nor drinke wherwith to sustain their languishing bodies, the which beside hunger and thirst were sore tormented with cold also and wante of conuenient lodging, they yelded themselues the next day, with condition to haue their lyues saued. When the spoyl of ỹ field (where they first ioyned was gathered, amongst the dead bodies, there was found a woman of an huge stature, who in the begynning of the battayle, stept forth before hir companie, & encountring in singular fight with an esquire of Scotland named Richard Shaw, she ouerthrew him & afterwards beating down hir enimies oneche side, long it was ere she might be ouerthrowne, which chanced not before she was enuironed about on eche side with hir enimies.

Dauid de Anand, a Scottish knight.

A woman of manlyke force and stature.

The Erle of Namure hauing yelded himself into the handes of the gouernours, was tyght curteously vsed, the Erle of Murray not onely rendring vnto him all his goodes, but also granting him licēce to depart: and for his more suretie, he went himselfe in person with hym to the borders, to see hym safe deliuered oute of all daungers.

The Erle of Murray is taken prisoner.

But by an ambushe that laye in awayte for the Erle of Murray, he was taken prisoner, and brought to king Edward.

Dauid Cumyn Erle of Athole, hearing that the Erle of Murray one of the gouernours was thus taken, supposing king Edwards parte to be muche aduaunced thereby, came streightwayes vnto Perth, & gaue his faith ectsones vnto Edwarde Ballyoll, and was againe established by him gouernour of the realme of Scotland, as he was before. The king of England hauing in the meane tyme gotten the towne of Perth, returned into Englande, and toke the Ballyoll with him, for doubte least when he had recouered the whole gouernemente of the realme, he shoulde shrinke away from him.

The king of England returneth home taking the Ballyoll with him.

The Earle of Athole is slain.

The Earle of Athole hauing now regayned his former authoritie, began to exercise greate crueltie againste all those that were enimies to the Ballyoll.

The nobles of the contrarye faction (as Patrike Dunbar Erle of Marche, Androwe Murray, and William Douglas with other) toke greate despite thereat, and reysing an armye to restrayne his insolente doings, came towardes him, whereof he being aduertised (as then lying at siege before the castell of Kyldrummy) rose and met them in the fieldes within the forrest of Kilblayn, where hee gaue them a sore battayle, and hadde gone away with the victorie, had not John Crag Captayne of Kildrummy sallyed forth of the castel with three hundred fresh men, and comming to the succour of his frendes, renewed the battaile in such earnest wise, that the aduersaries therby were discomfited, Earle Dauid their chiefetayne beeyng slayne in the fielde, with Walter Bryde, Robert Cumyn, and a greate number of other, bothe Gentlemen and commons.

Sir Thomas Cumyn was taken prysoner, and beheaded the next day, being Newyeres day. For the battayle before mencioned, was fought the laste daye of December (as Fourdone noteth.) Who further sayeth, that the Earle of Athole had with hym three thousand menne agaynst his aduersaries, whyche were not passe xj. hundred.

Fourdon.

After that Dauid Cumyn Earle of Athole was slayn on this wise, Androw Murray was chosen gouernour in place of the Erle of Murray taken (as before is sayde) by the Englishemen. This Androw Murray in the beginnyng of his new office, layd siege to the castel of Couper with a nyghtie power of men, but hearyng that the Cumyns made sowle worke in the north partes of the realme, against suche as fauoured not the Englishe parte, he left that siege, & went against them, with whom encountring in battayle, he ouerthrewe their armye, and put them all to flyght.

At this bickering were slaine two of the Cumyns, Roberte and Williams, Thomas Caldar, and diuers other valyant men, though enimies for the tyme vnto the gouernour.

This victorie reduced all the north partes of Scotland vnto the obeysance of king Dauid.

Few Englishmen after the same, abode within the north boundes of Scotlande, excepte those that were within the Castell of Dungarde in Buchquhane.

At lengthy this castel was wonne, and all that kepte it slayne, excepte Henry Beaumount the captayne, who being sworne neuer to returne againe into Scotlande, was licenced by the gouernour to depart into Englande without any interruption.

After this, the gouernor came to the castell of Lochindoris, and layde siege to it, where within was the Countesse of Athole, the wife of the late slayne Erle Dauid. The castell of Lochyndoris besieged.

This woman hauing knowledge afore hand, that hir house shoulde be besieged, had sente vnto the king of England, and to Edward Ballyoll for succours.

The king of Englande doubting least all the strengthes in Scotland kept by such as were his frendes woulde be lost without recouerie, if the same were not the sooner reskued, hee reysed an armie of fortie thousand men, and entryng therewith into Scotlande, came to the castell of Lochindoris afore sayde. The king of England commeth to rayse the siege of Lochindoris.

The Scots that lay there at siege vpon knowledge had of his comming towards them, brake vp, and departed from thence.

Herevpon, whē he had refreshed the hold with newe men, munition, and victuals, he toke the countesse forth with him, and passed with bloudye sworde thorough Murray, euen vnto Elghyne, and returnyng by Mar, brente the towne of Abyrdene. The towne of Abyrden brēt by the Englishmen.

His nauie being on the sea, the same time, entred into the Forth, and spoyling (as other had done afore tyme) the church of saynt Colme, felt reuenge thereof shortly after: for that shippe (as they tell the tale) wherin Saint Colmes godes (for so they call them) were laden, sonke to the bottome of the sea, without force of tempest, or other apparant occasion.

The king of Englande at his commyng to Perth, forth of the north partes of Scotlande, and finding the towne vnfortified, caused the same to be newly fensed with walles and bulwarks at the charges and only expēses of these. vi. abbeys, Abirbrothok, Couper, Lundoris, Balmerinoch, Dunfermlyn, and saynt Androws.

Henry Beaumount also, who contrarye to his othe before taken, was nowe returned with kyng Edwarde into Scotland, was made captaine of Saint Androws.

Also Henry Ferrar was made captaine of the castel of Lucres: Willia Mountagew of Striueling: Willia Felton of Roxburgh: and the keping of the towne of Perth, was committed vnto one Thomas Vthred.

Whilest king Edward ordred things in Scotlande after this manner, his brother surnamed by the Scottishe writers Helthan, came vnto him at Perth, who in the Weſt partes of Scotland, had exerciſed much crueltie, aſwell againſt the enimies of the Engliſhmen, as againſt thoſe that were fauourers and friends vnto them, in ſo much, that paſſing thꝛough Galloway, Caryck, Kyle, and Cunyngham, he put al to the fire and ſwoꝛd that came in his wayes.

His crueltie.

He bꝛenned the Churche of Saint Bute, and a thouſand perſons within it, whiche were fledde thither foꝛ ſafegard of their liues.

At his comming to Perth, he found the king his bꝛother within the Churche there, who being ſoꝛe offended with him foꝛ his miſoꝛdꝛed doings, right ſharply repꝛoued him foꝛ the ſame, and foꝛ as muche as he aunſwered him ſomewhat fꝛowardly, he plucked fꝛoth hys ſwoꝛde: and there thꝛuſt him thꝛough the body euen befoꝛe the alter of Saint John, wiſhing that all ſuche might periſh on the ſame wiſe, as put no difference betwixt friend and foe, place hallowed oꝛ vnhalowed, as being no reaſon, that the Church ſhould be any moꝛe refuge foꝛ him, than he had made it foꝛ other.

King Edwarde ſleyeth his bꝛother Helam.

It may bee that Kyng Edward ſlewe ſome other man in thys ſoꝛte, as the Scottes here doe wꝛite, but foꝛ the Earle of Cornwall that was bꝛother to King Edward, ſurnamed John of Eltham bycauſe he was boꝛne at Eltham, it is nothing true that he was ſo made away, foꝛ hee dyed of a naturall infirmitie, as by our Engliſhe wꝛiters it manifeſtly appeareth. But nowe to pꝛoceede with the hiſtoꝛy as we finde it wꝛitten.

He dyed of a naturall infirmitie, as by our Engliſhe wꝛiters it appeareth.

Such things accompliſhed in Scotlande as befoꝛe ye haue heaꝛde, King Edward retourned into Englande, and lefte the Ballyoll behynde him with a great power of men at Perth.

King Edward returneth into England.

About the ſame time Henry Beaumont ſlew all ſuch Scottes as he might lay hands on, that had bin at the battell of Kylbleyn, where hys couſin Dauid Cunyn was ſlayne.

Moꝛeouer nowe, after that King Edwarde was returned into England, Andꝛow Murray came fꝛoth of the Mountaynes, into the which he was befoꝛe withdꝛawen to eſchew the fury of the Engliſhmen, and by the aſſiſtance of ſundꝛy of the nobles of Scotland, he wan the Caſtell of Kyncleuyn, and raſed it to the earth.

Andꝛow Murray commeth foꝛth of the mountaynes.

He winneth the caſtell of Kyncleuyn.

Shoꝛtly after, hee came into Mernes, and there tooke the Caſtell of Kylneſſe, and likewyſe raſed the ſame.

Then paſſing foꝛwarde hee bꝛenned Dunoter.

And on the other part, the Engliſhmen made no leſſe ſpoyle and deſtruction on each ſide where they came, ſo that the Mernes, Angus, Stermond, and Gowꝛy thꝛough reif, murder, and other diſgraces, chaunceing by continuall warre, were left in manner waſt and deſolate.

The calamitie chaunceing to ſundry countreys of Scotland thorough continual warres.

At length, this Andꝛow Murray aſſembling a great power, with ſuppoꝛt of them of Murray, Mar, and Buchquham, fought with his enimies at Panmoꝛ in Angus, where hee obtayned the victoꝛy with huge ſlaughter of Engliſhmen, and other his aduerſaries.

The victorie of Androwe Murray gotte at Panmore.

In this battell was ſlayne Henry Mountfoꝛt, who lately befoꝛe had bene ſente by Kyng Edward into Scotland to ſuppoꝛt the Ballyol, beſides foure thouſande others, the moſt parte gentlemen, ſo that this ouerthꝛowe was ryghte diſpleaſant to the King of England, hauing hys ſyde ſoꝛe weakened thereby.

Henry Mountfoꝛt ſlayne.

After the gayn of thys victoꝛy, Andꝛow Murray paſt thꝛough Fife and Angus, ouerthꝛowing the caſtell of Lucres, wyth all the other ſtrengthes of Fyfe, the Caſtell of Couper onely excepted.

The caſtell of Lucres ouerthrowne.

So

So that king Edwarde hearing of ſuch proſperous ſucceſſe chaunceing to his aduerſaries, ſent incontinently two captaynes with two armies into Scotlande, to the ſuppoꝛt of the Baliyoll.

William Tailbois a man of notable prowes hauing the conducte of the one of theſe armyes, was encountred by William Keith, and after the diſcomfiture of his people being taken priſoner, was kept in captiuitie til he payde two thouſand Markes foꝛ his raunſome.

The other was led by Richarde Mountfoꝛt, with whome Laurence Preſton & Robert Goꝛdon met, and gining him battaile, ſlue the ſame Richard with the moſt part of all his companie.

Richarde Mountfort or Montagew is ſlaine.

About the ſame time ſir William Mountagew Erle of Saliſburie, togither with the Erle of Arondall came into Scotland with a great power of men, & beſieged the caſtell of Dunbar, lying at the ſame foꝛ the ſpace of .xrij. weekes.

The Caſtell of Dunbar is beſieged by the Earles of Saliſburie and Arondall.

Within the whiche Caſtell was the Counteſſe hir ſelfe, ſurnamed black Agnes of Dunbar, who ſhewed ſuch manly defence, that no gayne was to be got any wayes foꝛth at hir handes, ſo that in the ende they were conſtrayned to rayſe theyr ſiege, and to depart without ſpeede of their purpoſe.

It is ſayde, that this Counteſſe vſed manye pleaſant woꝛdes in ieaſting and taunting at the enimies doings, thereby the moꝛe to encourage hir ſouldiers.

One day it chaunced that the Engliſhe men had deuiſed an engine called a Sow, vnder the pentiſe oꝛ couer wherof they might appꝛoch ſafely to the walles: ſhe beholding this engine, merily ſayde, that oneleſſe the Engliſh men kept their Sow the better, ſhe woulde make hir to caſt hir pigges.

In the yeare nexte after this ſiege, there was ſuch a dearth thꝛough all the boundes of Scotland, which ſuch moꝛtalitie of people, as a greater had not lightly beene ſeene noꝛ heard of. The cauſe of whiche moꝛtalitie pꝛoceeded (as was thought) foꝛ that the ground lay vntilled and not occupied, by reaſon of the continuall warres beꝛoze paſſed.

All the ſouldiers that kept the Caſtel of Cowper, foꝛ lacke of vytayles left the houſe voyde, and comming to the ſea ſide, hyꝛed a ſhippe to haue paſſed into Englande, but thꝛough negligence of the maiſter Mariner, they fell vpon a ſande bed, and ſo were caſt away.

About the ſame time the moſt part of all the ſtrengthes and foꝛtreſſes in Louthian were kept by Engliſh men.

The Caſtels of Louthian in the handes of the Engliſh men.

The towne of Edenbourgh was ſtuffed with a great number of ſouldiours, both Engliſh men and Scottes. Amongſt whom there was a Scot of a right ſtoute ſtomacke named Robert Pendergeſt: he, foꝛ that it was pꝛeceyued hee loued but little the Engliſh nation, was euill entreated and vſed amongeſt them, in ſomuch that one day hauing his heade broken by the Marſhall named Thomas Knatoun, hee ceaſſed not to ſeeke ſome meane to be reuenged, tyll he brought his purpoſe to paſſe, ſo that ſhortly after he ſlue the ſayde Marſhall, and afterwarde to auoyde the daunger of death due for that fact, he got away, and came to William Dowglas, whome hee perſwaded with all diligence to paſſe vnto Edenbourgh, where he might finde his enimies at ſome greate aduauntage, by reaſon of the ſlouthfull negligence as then growne amongeſt them.

William Dowglas following this aduertiſement, came ſecretely on a night vnto the foreſayd towne, and ſlue foure hundred Engliſhmen ſnorting in ſleepe and dronkennelle, before they were able to make any reſiſtance.

The death of Andrew Murrey the gouernour.

Not long after, Andrew Murrey the gouernour of Scotland deceaſſed, to the great domage of the common wealth, and was buried in Roſmarky, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1338.

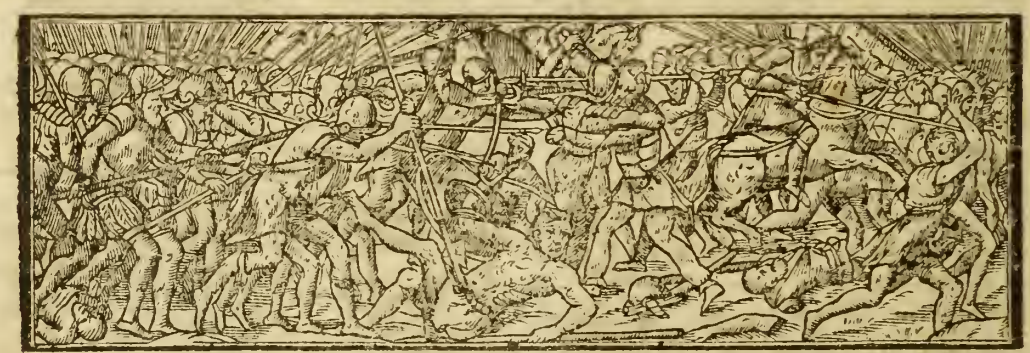
It came well to paſſe for Scotland, that about the ſame time the king of England entring into warres againſt France, was conſtrayned to ceaſſe his purſute of the cõqueſt which he minded to make in Scotland, the which muſt needes haue come to full effecte, if he had followed hys former purpoſe and intent.

But to proceede, after the deceaſſe of Andrew Murrey the gouernour, Robert Stewarde toke all the charge on him for the gouernment of the Realme, till king Dauid returned home out of France, and began to rule all things himſelfe.

Tiuidall recouered out of the Engliſh mens handes by William Dowglas.



Tiuidall alſo was recouered out of the Engliſh mens handes, with diuerſe other places, about this time, by the high prowes and manly valiancie of William Dowglas and other Scottiſh Captaines: and therefore in the reward of the good ſeruice ſhewed by the ſame William in cõqueſt of that countrey, he enioyed the ſame afterward as his rightful inheritance.

Sir Thomas Berckclay.

The King of Englande moued with highe diſpleaſure at theſe doings, ſente a ryght valiaunt Knight named Sir Thomas Berckclay wyth a greate power of men into Scotland:.

The battail of Blackborne.

Againſt whome came William Dowglas, and Robert Stewarde the Gouernour, and gaue him battaile at Blackeborne, where the Scottes were diſcomfited and ſo beaten downe, that few of them eſcaped, whiche were not eyther ſlaine or taken. Notwithſtanding, the two Captaines ſaued themſelues by flight.

Sir Iohn Striueling diſcomfited.

And not long after, William Dowglas fought with his enimies at the Cragings, where hauing not paſt a. xl. men in his companie, hee diſcomfited ſir John Striueling, who had with him neare hande fiue hundred Engliſh men and Scottes, that toke his part in the king of Englandes quarell.

The Caſtell of Hermitage wonne.

In the yeare following, the ſame William Dowglas wanne the Caſtell of Hermitage, and ſlue all them that were found within it.

Sir Laurence Abernethy taken priſoner.

In the yeare next after, he fought fiue times in one day with ſir Laurence Abernethy, principall Captayne vnder the Ballyoll, and beeing put to the worſe at foure of thoſe tymes, at the fifth he vanquiſhed his enimyes, and toke priſoner theyr Captaine the ſayde ſir Laurence, who was ſent to the Caſtell of Dunbryton, there to remaine in ſafe keeping for a time.

For theſe and ſuch worthie enterpryſes hardely atchieued, thys William Dowglas was much commended, and within a fewe dayes after the taking of the ſayde ſir Laurence Abernethy, hee was ſente by the Gouernour the ſayde Robert Stewarde into Fraunce, as Ambaſſadour to King Dauid, for the diſpatche of certaine weightie matters touching the ſtate of the Realme.

In the meane time, Robert Stewarde the gouernor raiſed a mightie armie, and came with the ſame vnto ẏ towne of Perth, planting a ſtrõg ſiege rounde aboute it: for deuiding his hoſt into four partes, he lodged them with their Captaines in foure ſeuerall places.

The towne of Perth beſeged.

The fyrſt conſiſting for the moſte parte of Weſterne Scottes, he gouerned himſelfe: the ſeconde he committed to Patrike Dunbar Erle of Marche: the thirde to William Earle of Roſſe: and the fourth, to Maurice of Mowbray Lorde of Clydeſdall.

There was alſo in that army beſide other noble men William Lord of Galleſton

Theſe lay thus at ſiege of this towne for the space of ten weekes, and though sundrie tymes they gaue alarmes and assaultes to it, yet was it so stoutly defended by Englishe men and other within, that the Scots for a long time lost more than they wanne.

At length when they were in maner out of all hope to get the towne, and readie to haue departed from it, William Dowglas arriued in the Tay, bringing with him out of Fraunce in fiue shippes, both men of warre, and also munition of armure, artillerie, and weapons, whiche serued the Scottish men in that season greatly to purpose.

Amongst other, there were two knightes of the family of Castelgaliard, and two Esquiers, Giles de la Hois, and John de Bryse: also a noble Pirate, named Hugh Handpile, who had the charge ouer the forelaude fiue shippes.

About the same time, one William Bullok had taken eftsones the Castell of Cowper to the king of Englandes vse, but by perswasion of this William Dowglas, he rendred it vp againe and departed with bagge and baggage.

Those Scots that had serued vnder him likewise, were contented to forsake the king of Englandes wages, and to serue William Dowglas, who led them forthwith to the siege of Perth, the which towne shortly after his cõming was rendred into the gouernors handes, by Thomas Vthred the Captaine, in the thirde moneth after it was first besieged, and in the yeare after our redemption. 1341.

Among other exployctes attempted at this siege after the comming of the Lorde William Dowglas, the French man Hugh Handpile, taking vpõ him one day to approch the towne with his shippes, & to giue an assault therto, he lost the chiefest vessell he had, although afterwards when the towne was now rendred, the Lord William Dowglas caused the same shippe to be to him againe restored, and with great thankes and liberall rewards giuen as well to him as to the other of the French men, he sent thẽ backe into France greatly to their pleasure and contentation, although in their returne, as they passed oute of Drumley Fyrth they escaped very hardly from the shore.

In which same yeare (as some do write) or according vnto other, in the yeare following, there was such a miserable dearth, both through England and Scotlande, that the people were driuen to eate the flesh of horses, dogges, cattes, and such like vnused kindes of meate, to sustaine their languishing liues withall, yea insomuch that (as is sayde) there was a Scottish man, an vplandishe fellow named Trysticlok, spared not to steale children, and to kil women, on whose flesh he fed, as if he had bene a Wolfe.

Dearth

Perth being once deliuered (as before is sayd) to the gouernour, hee went with his armye to Stryueling, and besieging the Castell, had it rendred vnto him, the. viij. daye after his comming thither, on these conditions, that Thomas Foulby the Captaine, with his wife and children might safely passe into Englãd, without fraud or guile of any empeachment. The Castell of Striueling rendred.

Alias Rugby.

Edward Ballyoll, by such good and prosperous successe, as did thus daily fall vnto his enimies, to auoyde further daunger, after oft remouing from place to place, at length hee was constrayned to flee into Englande, least hee should haue light into his aduersaries handes. Edward Ballyol withdraweth into Englande.

Not long after, the Castell of Edenbourgh was wonne by policie on this wise: William Dowglas hauing acquaintance with one Walter Towers, caused him to prouide a ship, and to arriue therewith in the Forth, feyning as though he were a Marchant, and to offer wines to sell vnto the garison that kept Edenbourgh Castell. The Castell of Edenbourgh wonne.

This Towers according to instructions thus giuen him, prouided him of all things necessarie for his purpose, and so comming into the Forth with his ship, came a lande himselfe, and brought with him vnto Edenbourgh two punchions of wine, which he offred to sell vnto the stewarde of housholde to the Captaine of the Castell, who falling at a price with him, appointed that hee should bring them early in the morning vp to the Castel, that they might be receyued in. A policie.

Towers hyring a Cart ouer night, came with the punchions vp to the Castell gate early vpon the breake of the day in the next morning, and hauing the gates opened, entred with his Cart, and being come within the gates with it, hee plucked forth a wedge or pynne deuised of purpose, and immediately therewith the Cart with the punchions fell downe, stopping so the entrie of the gates that in no wise they might bee shut or closed againe.

The Dowglas hauing in his cõpanie William Bullock, Walter Fraser, & John Sandlandes, right valiant knightes, with diuerse other hardie and bolde personages, lay in couert not farre off from the Castell, and hauing knowledge giuen him by sound of horne or otherwise whẽ to come forth, he hasted therevpon with all diligence vnto the gates, and finding them thus open, first slue the porters, and after into the Castell, within a while had dispatched all them within, and so became maisters of that fortresse, within the which for Captaine, they left one William Dowglas, the bastard brother of the other William Dowglas, by whose conduct chiefely, both this enterpryse and diuerse other were luckily atchieued. Bullok Knight lish men and all other that toke part with the Balliol constrayned to auoyde out of all the partes and bounds thereof.

The Castell of Edenbourgh was thus recouered by the Scottes in the yeare last before remembred, to wit, 1341.

1342. Io.M. King Dauid returneth into Scotlande.

The same yeare, or in the yeare next ensuing, the second of June, King Dauid with his wyfe Queene Jane, and sundrie nobles both Frenche and Scottishe, came safelye through the Seas, and arryued at Innerbervy, from whence wyth no small tryumphe they were conueyed vnto Perth.

Alexander Ramsey roderh into Englande.

About the same tyme, Alexander Ramsey of Dalehouse, one of the moste valiant Captaynes knowne in those dayes, gathering a great power of men, entred into England, and hauing knowledge that the Englishe men were assembled, in purpose to giue him battaile, layde an ambushe for them, and trayning them within daunger thereof, by such a fierce and new onset as he gaue vpon them, he put them out of order, and chased them moste egrely, kylling and cleauing a great number of them at his pleasure.

This Ramsey was so renowmed, that euery noble man was glad to haue his sonne and kinsman to serue vnder him.

Amongest the prysoners that were taken, the Earle of Salysburie, as the Scottishe Hystorie sayeth, was one, and the Captaine of Rokesbourgh another.

The Earle of Salisburie taken afterwards in the borders of Picardie, as not here, afterwardes I haue noted.

Sir Alexander Ramsey perceyuing that the most part of the garrison of Rokesbourgh were eyther slain or taken in this last conflict, togither with their Captaine came hastily thither, and gyuing a right fierce assault thereto, by fine force toke it. Wherefore king Dauid in recompence of his valiancie thus declared in his seruice, gaue vnto him the keeping of this Castell, togyther with the Shirifwike of Tiuidall. Wherat William Dowglas toke suche displeasure, that seking to be reuenged, he founde meanes to apprehend this Alexander Ramsey within the Church of Hawyke, and put him in prison within the castell of Hermitage, where he remayned in greate misserie and lacke of foode till he dyed.

Froissart.

Alexander Ramsey taken by William Dowglas, and emprisoned.

King Dauid was sore moued herewith, purposing to see such punishment done on William Dowglas for that rebellious attempt, as might serue for an ensample to all other how they went about any the lyke offence.

Neuertheless the Dowglas kept himselfe out of the way amongst the Mountaynes and other desart places, till finally Robert Steward and other Nobles purchased his pardon, so that at length he came into fauour again, and had al his landes and liuings restored vnto him, as well in Tyuidall as elsewhere.

A Parliament at Perth.

The bountifous liberalitie of K. Dauid.

This Hugh was Grandfather to Hector Boetius.

The Earle of Salisburie exchanged for the Earle of Murrey.

Soone after the Earle of Salisburie taken by sir Alexander Ramsey (as before is sayd) was exchaunged for the Earle of Murrey, that had bene holden many yeares before as prisoner in Englande. But it shoulde appeare by other writers, that the Earle of Salisburie was not taken at that time on the borders of Scotlande, (as before is supposed) but in the borders of Fraunce, where he was in the warres which king Edwarde the same tyme made against the Frenchmen, and now exchaunged for the Earle of Murrey. But howsoeuer it was, king Dauid after the Realme of Scotlande was once brought into a quiet estate from the former trouble of warres, he called a Parliament at the towne of Perth, where he rewarded verye liberally all suche as had eyther done any notable seruice themselues, or had lost any of theyr friendes or parents in defence and recouerie of the Realme oute of his aduersaries handes.

Amongst other, Hugh Boece had in recompence of his fathers slaughter at Duplin the inheritour and Ladie of the Baronie of Balbride gyuen to him in mariage, which Baronie is yet possessed by the heyres of the sayde Hugh.

Shortly after vpon the breaking vp of thys Parliament, king Dauid raysed a mightie armie, and entred with the same into Northumberlande, but committing the whole charge to the Earle of Murrey as lieutenant Generall, he woulde not that any of his owne Barons should be ſpread and borne in all that voyage, in the which the moſt part of al Northumberland was burnt and ſpoiled, for they remained there a Moneth before they returned, conueying away with them great ryches whiche they got abrode in all places where they came.

Shortly after he came with a newe armie into Englande, cauſing his owne ſtandard to bee borne afore him at that time, as he that toke vpon him the whole gouernance of that enterpriſe himſelfe.

The Engliſhe men withdrawing all theyr goodes into ſtrengthes, mynded not to giue the Scottes any ſet battaile, but to take them euer at ſome aduauntage, if they ſtrayed abrode any where vnwarely to fetch in bootes.

Neyther were they altogyther diſappoynted of their hoped pray, for fiue Scottes knightes, whoſe names were Steward, Eglyntō, Cragy, Boyd, and Fullarton, purſuing their enimies one time ouer fiercely, were taken priſoners, and after redeemed for great ſummes of money.

At length king Dauid, perceyuing that hee waſted but tyme, returned into Scotlande.

But not long after he went againe into Englande, in which iourney his people were ſo beaten with behement ſtormes of rayne and hayle, that they had much adoe to ſaue themſelues from periſhing through the vnmeaſurable force of that ſo rigorous weather.

On the other ſide, the Engliſh men that were gathered to reſiſt agaynſt him, were in ſemblable maner neare handes deſtroyed with the lyke rage of tempeſt.

Hereupon King Dauid to the ende that his enterpriſe ſhoulde not ſeeme altogither to want effect, ouerthrewe ſundrie ſtrong houſes on the Engliſh borders, and ſo returned home without other domage eyther done or receyued.

About the ſame time did Edwarde King of England beſiege the towne of Calice: the French king therefore deuiſing all wayes poſſible whereby to ſaue that towne, and to cauſe his aduerſarie to reyſe hys ſiege, ſent Ambaſſadours into Scotlande, to require king Dauid, that with an army he would enter into Englande, and do what domage he might vnto the Engliſhe men, to trie if by that meanes king Edward could be conſtrayned to leaue his ſiege, and to returne home for defence of his owne Countrey and ſubiects. Ambaſſadours frō the French king into Scotlande.

In the meane time alſo (as I finde in the Scottiſhe Chronicles) king Edwarde addreſſed his Orators into Scotland, offring vnto K. Dauid, vpō condition that peace might be had, to deliuer into his hands not only the town of Barwik, but alſo Edwarde Ballyoll his olde aduerſarie, for whoſe cauſe the warre had ſo long continued betwixt them. Ambaſſadours from the king of England into Scotland. The king of Englands offers.

Theſe offers beeing proponed in counſaile, though ſome of the wiſer ſort gaue aduice that in no condition they ought to be refuſed, yet the king himſelfe (for loue that he had to the French king with whom he had bene brought vp) and other of the Nobles hauing yong heades, vppon deſire to be reuenged on the Engliſhe men by practiſe of warres (whereunto they were enclined) would be needes condiſcende to the French kings chargeable requeſt, and refuſe the king of Englands beneficiall offers. The Scots readie to help the French, and hinder their neighbours the Engliſh.

Whereupon an army was leuied, and ſolemne proclamation made that al ſuch as were able and meete to beare armour, ſhould meete the king at a certaine day and place which was to them in the ſame proclamation aſſigned. The Earle of Ros therefore came with his people vnto Perth, and there made his muſters before the king, but in the night following he ſlue the Lord of the Iles with ſeuen of his kinnſmen as they were in their beds, and An army rayſed to inuade Englande. The Lorde of the Iles ſlaine by the Earle of Ros.

and therevpon ſledde and got him with all ſpeede againe into Ros.

King Dauid though hee was ſore diſpleaſed herewith, and deſired moſt earneſtly to haue puniſhed that heynous act, yet bycauſe he woulde not hinder his iourney, he let paſſe the puniſhmẽt thereof, tyll more conuenient opportunitie might ſerue thereto.

William Dowglas created Earle of Dowglas.

At his comming to the borders, and before he entred into Englande, he made many knightes, to ſtyre them the rather to doe valiantly. But firſt hee created William Dowglas an Earle, which William was ſonne vnto Archembalde Dowglas, ſlaine before at Halydowne hill.

Two thouſand men of armes.

XX. thouſand Hoblers.

There was vndoubtedly a mightie power of the Scots aſſembled at that preſent, inſomuch as there was of Erles, Lords, Knights, & gentlemẽ, to the number of two M. men of armes, & of ſuch armed men as they called Hoblers, ſet forth by the Burrowes and good townes. xx. M. beſyde the Archers and other footemen, ſo that they were at the leaſt. xl. M. men in all, or as ſome writers affyrme. lx. thouſande. King Dauid wyth that his puiſſaunt armie, the ſixth of October entred Northumberlande, and comming to a fortreſſe not farre off from the borders called Lydell, they lay rounde about that place for the ſpace of three dayes, without giuing thereto any aſſault: but the fourth day they aſſayled it right fiercely, and in the ende entred by fine force, ſleaing the more part of all thoſe whiche they founde wythin the houſe. The Captaine ſir Walter Selby was taken aliue, but immediately by king Dauid his commaundement had his head ſtryken off, and was not permitted to haue ſo muche time as to make his confeſſion, which he inſtantly deſired to haue done, but it woulde not be graunted.

The Fort of Lydell.

Sir Walter Selby beheaded by the Scottes.

From thence the army remoued, and went vnto the Abbey of Lauercoſt, which they ſpoiled, and that done they departed, and paſſing by Nawarde Caſtell, & the town of Redpeth, kept on tyll they came vnto ỹ Priorie of Herham, which they ſacked, but the Towne was ſaued from fire by commaundement of King Dauid, who in this iourney appointed to preſerue foure townes onely from burning, to witte, Herham afore ſayde, Corbridge, Darington, and Durham, to the ende he might in them lay vp ſuch ſtore of victuales, as he ſhould prouide abrode in the Countrey, wherewith to ſuſteyne his army during the time of his abyding in thoſe parties.

Lauercoſt.

From Herham, where he lay three dayes, he marched to Ebcheſter, waſting and ſpoyling the Countrey on eche hande, and after turned towardes the wood of Beaurepaire, and comming thyther, lodged himſelfe in the Manour, and ſet his people abrode into the Countrey to fetch in bootyes and to burne vp the townes and houſes in all places where they came.

King Dauid lodged in the Manour of Beaurepaire.

The ſpoyle, waſt, deſtruction, and ſlaughter which the Scottes practiſed with fire and ſworde, was wonderful to heare, and incredible almoſt to bee tolde, they ſpared neyther yong nor olde, Church nor Chappell: Religious houſes as wel as other were conſumed to Aſhes. The Abbay of Durham, and all places thereabout (as the Scottiſhe writers affyrme) were ſpoyled and miſerably ſacked, although it was ſayde King Dauid was admoniſhed in a dreame that hee ſhoulde in anye wyſe abſtayne from violating the goodes and landes pertayning to Sainct Cutbert.

The Abbey of Durham ſpoyled.

The Erle of Northumberland Lieutenant of the North vnder king Edward to reſiſt theſe iniuries, rayſed a great power of men, and ioyning the ſame with ſuch bands of old ſouldiers as king Edwarde had lately ſent ouer out of Fraunce for that purpoſe, firſt diſpatched an Heralde at armes vnto king Dauid, requyring him to ſtay from further inuading the Countrey, and to returne into Scotlande till ſome reaſonable order for a finall peace might be agreed vpon betwixt him and the king his maſter: otherwyſe he ſhould be ſure to haue battaile to the vtteraunce within three dayes after.

The Earle of Northumberland Lieutenant of the north.

A Heralde.

King Dauid contemning thys meſſage, requyred his folkes to make them readie to receyue theyr enimyes if they came to aſſayle them, and on the next morrowe, he deuided hys armie into three battayles: in the firſt was Robert Steward Prince of Scotlande, and Patrike Dunbar Earle of Marche: In the ſeconde were appoynted Iohn Earle of Murrey, and William Earle of Dowglas: In the thyrde was the King himſelfe, with all the reſidue of the Nobles.

The appoynting of the Scottiſh battayles.

In the morning early before the battayle, the Earle of Dowglas departed frõ the armie to deſerie the Engliſh hoſt, and to vnderſtande their force and order (if it were poſſible) but entring ſomewhat vnwarely within daunger of his enimies, he was chaſed, and that to ſuch diſaduantage, that he loſt fiftie or rather fiue hundred (as ſome bookes haue) of yong Gentlemen, and ſuch other light horſemen as he toke forth with him, eſcaping verie narowly himſelfe alſo from beyng taken at the chaſe.

The Earle of Dowglas chaſed.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Engliſh hoſt deuided likewyſe into three battayles, approched forwarde, and came wythin ſyght of the Scottiſh armie. Wherevppon Dauid Graham wyth a wing of fiue hundred well appoynted horſemen, gaue a full charge on the ſkyrtes of the Engliſh Archers, thinking to haue diſtreſſed them: but he was ſo charpely receyued and beaten with arrowes, that loſing a great number of hys men, Dauid Graham driuen backe.

he was conſtrayned to flee backe to the maine battaile, and that not without great daunger of being taken in his flight by ſuche as followed him.

These two diſcomfitures notwithſtanding, the Scots ruſhed fiercely vpon their enimies, and fought with great manhode a long ſeaſon, but in the ende, Robert Stewarde and the Earle of March perceyuing their people partly to ſhrinke backe, cauſed the retreate to be ſounded, in hope to ſaue their men by withdrawing into ſome ſicker place: but this fleeing backe of the Earle of Marche and Robert Stewarde, brought the diſcomfiture vpon all the reſidue of the Scots, for that battaile of Engliſh men that was firſt matched with the, came now with ſuch violence vpon the maine battail where king Dauid fought, that within a ſhort while after, the ſame was vtterly diſcomfited and put to flight.

In this buſineſſe king Dauid himſelfe did in euery poynt play the part of a moſt valiant chiefetaine, encouraging hys people as well wyth words as notable examples to doe theyr deuoires.

Neyther woulde he flee after he ſawe himſelfe deſtitute of all conuenable ayde, but ſtil continued in earneſt fight, deſiring nothing ſo much (as ſhoulde appeare) as death, for that he thought nothing more diſpleaſaunt than lyfe, after the ſlaughter of ſo manye of his Nobles and liege people.

At length hauing his weapons ſtricken oute of his handes, one Iohn Coplande came vnto him, and wylled him to yeelde, but he with one of his fiſtes gaue this Coplande ſuche a blowe on the mouth, that by force of the Gauntlet he ſtrake out two of his teeth before hee did yeelde vnto him. Which Coplande is myſnamed by Iohn Maior, and not onely called Couptaunt, but alſo reported by him to be a Gaſcoigne, whereas it is euident by our Hyſtories, that hee was named Coplande and a mere Engliſh men.

But to our purpoſe. The Scottes that fought in the rereward had no better ſucceſſe than the other: for that battaile was alſo broken and put to flight, with great ſlaughter as well of the nobles as other commons, beſides thoſe that were taken.

There were ſlain in this doloroꝰ conflict, the Earle of Murrey, the Earle of Stratherne, the Conſtable, the Marſhal, the Chamberlaine and Chaunceloꝛ of Scotlande, with a great number of other nobles and commons. Nobles ſlaine in this battail.

There were taken with the king fiue Earles, that is to witte, Dowglas, Fife, Sutherlande, Wigtoun, and Menteith. Priſoners taken.

And beſydes other great ryches loſt in thys fielde, the holye Croſſe (as they call it) of holye Rode houſe, was founde vpon king Dauid, who bare it about him, in truſt that by vertue thereof he ſhould be inuincible: but he was ſpoyled both of that and al other his iewels which were found vpon him at the ſame time.

This battayle was ſtryken neare vnto Durham, the .xvij. day of October in the yeare 1346. What Countreys and places the Engliſhe men got after thys victoꝛie, ye may read in the Engliſh Hyſtoꝛie.

In the yeare following, the Ballyell, wyth the Earle of Northumberlande made a rode into Louthian, and Clyddeſdale, bringing a greate bootie of goodes and cattaile out of thoſe Countreyes into Galloway, in which Countrey the Ballyoll abode a long time after. The Ballyoll ſoiourneth in Galloway.

At length the Scots recouering thẽſelues with much paine, after the ſlaughter of ſo many of their their nobles and commons, beſide the diſcomfort for the taking of their king, chose and appointed Robert Stewarde as gouernor to haue the rule of the realme.

Robert Steward gouernor of Scotlande.

About the same time William Dowglas the ſon of Archimbalde Dowglas, that was brother vnto good ſir James Dowglas, who (as before is sayde was slaine in Spaine) returned forth of France, and by ſupport of his friends chaſed the Engliſhe men out of Douglaſdale, Tiuydale, Twydale, Etrike Foreſt, and Twedale.

Countreys recouered out of the Engliſhe mens hands.

John Copland captain of Rokeſbourgh to reſiſt ſuch enterpriſes, gathered a number of men, & came forth againſt his enimies, but receyuing the ouerthrow, he was chaſed into Rokeſbourgh againe, with loſſe of diuerſe of his men.

In the yeare next following, which was from the incarnation 1349. there came ſuch a peſtilence through al partes of Scotland, ſo vehement and contagious, that it ſlue neare hande the third part of all the people. This was the ſecond time that the peſtilence was knowne or heard of to haue come in Scotland.

The ſecounde peſtilence that was heard of in Scotland.

The ſame yeare (or as other bookes haue, the yeare next enſuing) one John Saint Mighell ſlue ſir Dauid Berclay knight at Aberdene in the night ſeaſon, by procurement of ſir William Dowglas of Liddeſdale, as the priſoner in Englande with the Earle of Dowglas, both of them beeyng taken at Durham fielde.

Sir Dauid Berclay ſlaine.

The occaſion was, for that this ſir Dauid Berclay had afortime ſlaine one John Dowglas, brother to the ſayd ſir William, and father to ſir James Dowglas of Dalkeeth.

1353. Io. Ma.

In the yeare folowing, was the ſame ſir William Dowglas, being lately before ranſomed out of England, ſlain, as he was a hunting in Etrik Foreſt, by his couſin and godſon William Erle of Dowglas, in reuenge of the ſlaughter of Alexander Ramſey, and other olde grudges.

Sir William Dowglas ſlain.

Thus was the houſe of the Dowglaſſes deuided amongſt themſelues, purſuing eche other many yeares togither with great vnkindneſſe, vnnaturall enmitie and ſlaughter. 1354

In the yeare next following, which was 1355 ſhortly after Eaſter, there arriued in Scotland a noble knight named ſir Eugenie de Garenteris, with a companie of Frenchmen, though fewe in number, yet valiant and right ſkilfull warriours, which were ſent thither by John king of France, that ſucceeded his father king Philip of Valoys, lately before deceaſſed, and deliuered vnto the gouernor and other Nobles of the realme of Scotlande, forty thouſand Crownes of the Sunne, to be employed aboute the leuying of an armye againſt the Engliſh men, that they might be conſtrayned the ſooner to withdrawe theyr powers out of France. 1355

Sir Eugeny de Garenteris French men arriued in Scotland.

Forty thouſand crownes

This money was receyued, though a ſmall part thereof came to the handes of the Souldiers or men of warre of Scotland, for the Lordes and nobles kept it ſafe ynough to their owne vſe. Yet neuertheleſſe, the Earle of March, and William Dowglas gather their people, & paſſe forth with the ſame to the borders, and entring into Englande, appoynt William Ramſey of the Dale-houſy, to ride afore with a number of light horſemen, to the ende, that if the Engliſh men did aſſemble and come forth too ſtrong againſt him, hee might retyre backe to the mayne battayle, where they lay in couert at a place called Nyſbet Moze.

The Earle of March and William Dowglas entereth to Englande with an armye.

William Ramſey of the Dalehouſy.

This Ramſey doing as he was commaunded, made a great forrey through the Countrey, and hauing got togyther a greate bootie of Cattaile, withdrew with the ſame homewardes: but being ſharpely purſued by the Engliſhe men in hope to recouer theyr gwdes, he fledde amayne, and they following egrelye in the chaſe were vpon the Scottiſh army before they were ware.

and

The Scottiſhe men, and thoſe fewe Frenche men that were there, ſette vppon the Engliſhe men right fiercelye, and finallye putte them to flight, though not without ſome ſlaughter on theyr part: for there were ſlaine of Scottes ſir John Holyburton, and ſir James Turnebull knightes.

There were taken priſoners of Engliſh men, ſir Thomas Gray, and his ſonne, with John Darras, and many other Engliſh men. Priſoners taken.

The Erles of March and Dowglas, after the obteyning of this victorie, came ſodenly in the night ſeaſon vnto the towne of Barwike, and rayſing vp Ladders to the walles wanne the towne, but not without loſſe of diuerſe Scottiſhe gentlemen, as Thomas Claus, Andrew Scot of Balwery, John Gordon, William Synclare, Tho. Preſton, & Alexander Mowbray knights. Barwike wonne.

Of Engliſh men were ſlaine Alexander Dygyll Captaine of the towne, Thomas Percye, brother to the Earle of Northumberlande, and Edward Gray, with other.

Eugeny de Garenteris with his French men did right valiauntly beare himſelfe in this enterpriſe, whome Robert Stewarde the gouernour rewarding with great gyftes, ſent backe into Fraunce, commending him by letters vnto the French king, as he that had done his duetie in euery behalfe right throughly.

The Caſtell of Barwike notwithſtanding that the towne was thus wonne, helde forth the Scots and French men, by reaſon whereof when an armye of Engliſhe men came to the ſuccours thereof, they razed the walles, and burnt the houſes of the towne, and ſo departed.

King Edwarde himſelfe comming to the reſcue, when he ſawe the towne thus defaced, hee toke order for the repayring thereof againe, went to Roxbourgh, and there receyued of the Ballyol a full reſignation of all his pretenced right to the crowne of Scotlande, and after paſſing forth to Hadington, ſpoyled and waſted the Countrey by the waye on eche hande as hee marched forwarde: and for diſpleaſure that his Nauie on the Sea (after the ſouldiers and mariners had beene a lande and burnt a Church of our Ladie in thoſe parties called Whitekyrke) had with force of a rygorous tempeſt beene ſore ſhaken, and manye of the Shippes loſt and drowned togyther with men and all, he fell into ſuch a rage, that he cauſed all the buyldings in thoſe partyes to be burnt and ſpoyled, as well Abbeys as all other Churches and Religious houſes, as though hee mynded (ſay the Scottiſhe writers) to make warre both agaynſt God and all his Saints.

These things chaunced in the yeare. 1355. after our common account, about the feaſt of the Purification of our Ladie, and by reaſon that the Engliſh men did ſo muche hurt at that tyme in thoſe parties by fyre, it was cleped euer after the burnt Candlemaſſe. 1355. The burnt Candlemaſſe.

Shortly after that King Edwarde was returned into Englande, William Dowglas of Middeldale recouered out of the Engliſhe mens poſſeſſion the landes of Galloway, and the landes of Dryſdale, were in ſemblable maner recouered by one Kyrkpatrike. Galloway recouered.

The ſame yeare on the. xx. day of Octobre, was the battaile of Poyctiers fought, where Edwarde Prince of Wales, otherwiſe named the blacke Prince, ouerthrew the armie of Fraunce, and toke king John priſoner, with his yongeſt ſonne Philip, and a great number of other of the French Nobilitie beſide. The battaile of Poyctiers. The French king Iohn taken priſoner.

There was at this battaile with king John, the Erle William Dowglas, and to the number of three thouſand Scots, hauing diuerſe knights and Gentlemen to their Captaynes, of whome there dyed in the ſame battayle Androwe Stewarde, Robert Cozdon, Androwe Holyburton, and Androw Vaus, knightes.

Archimbalde Dowglas taken priſoner.

The Erle of Dowglas eſcaped with life and vntaken, but Archimbald Dowglas, ſonne to ſir James Dowglas ſlaine in Spaine, was taken priſoner, albeit his taker ſuffred him to depart for a ſmal raunſom, by reaſon ỹ William Ramſey of Colluthy, who was alſo taken with him, made ſemblant as though the ſame Archimbald Dowglas had beene ſome poze ſlaue, cauſing hym to pull off his bootes, and to do other ſuch drudging ſeruice, as fell not for the eſtate of a man of any eſtimation or honeſtie, to the ende it ſhoulde not be knowne what he was.

A ſubtile policie.

Two kings priſoners in England at one time.

Thus the King of Englande at one tyme hauing two Kings vnder his captiuitie, ſatte crowned betwixt them at meate in the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, making (as the vſe is amongeſt the Engliſhe menne in that ſeaſon) a greate banket.

And this hee did (as is repozted) to the intent that the maner thereof might be vzged abzode to his high prayſe and glozious fame.

King Dauid within certaine yeares after was conueyed by the Earle of Mozthamton vnto Barwike, where the moſt part of all the Nobles of Scotlande aſſembled togyther to conſult with him touching ſome agreement to bee had for hys raunſome, but byeauſe they coulde growe to no certayne poynte therein, hee was brought backe agayne to London, and there remayned in priſon as before.

Roger Kyrkpatrike ſlaine.

In the meane time Roger Kirkpatrike was ſlaine by James Lyndſey, in a Caſtell where the ſayde James dwelled, and receyued the ſaid Roger as his gueſt.

This Lyndſey fledde vpon the acte committed, but yet being apprehended and brought to the gouernour Robert Stewarde, he ſuffred death for that offence.

Shortly after, that is to witte at Michaelmaſſe nexte enſuyng, after King Dauid hadde beene at Barwike, there was an agreemente made for his raunſome, whereuppon being deliuered, hee returned into Scotlande, in the eleuenth yeare after hys taking at Durham fielde.

King Dauid is deliuered.

It was agreed that there ſhoulde be payde for his raunſom one hundzed thouſand Markes ſterling, at ſundzie dayes of payment, as was accozded betwixt them.

Truce for. 14. yeares.

Truce alſo was taken for the ſpace of. xiiij. yeares betwixt both Realmes, and diuerſe Nobles of Scotlande were appoynted to lye as Hoſtages in Englande, tyll the money were payde, as is before mentioned. King Dauid was alſo bounde by couenaunt of agreement to raze certayne Caſtelles within Scotlande, whiche ſeemed moſte noyſome to the Engliſhe Borders, whiche couenaunt hee performed, for vpon hys returne into Scotlande, hee caſt downe the Caſtelles of Dalſwynton, Dunfreys, Moztowne, and Durydere.

Caſtels raſed.

He alſo called a Parliament, wherin he enacted ſundzie things for the puniſhment of them that fled from him at Durham fielde, and firſt for that hys couſin Robert Stewarde was one of them, beeing through meanes thereof a greate cauſe of the ouerthzowe, he procured that the act (by whiche the crowne was appoynted for want of iſſue of his bodie lawfully begotten, to deſcende vnto the ſayde Robert Steward was vtterly renoked and diſanulled, and John Sutherlande the ſonne of Jane his yongeſt ſiſter, appoynted heire apparant in place of the ſayde Robert. And all the Lordes of Scotlande were ſwozne to obſerue and keepe this ozdinance.

A Parliament.

Robert Stewarde diſinherited of the crowne.

Iohn Sutherlande made heyre apparant.

The Earle of Sutherlande, father to the ſayde John, in hope that his ſonne ſhoulde enioy the Crowne, gaue away the moſt part of his landes, deuiding the ſame amongeſt his friendes, as to the Hayes, the Sinclares, the Ogylbies, and Gozdones: But hee was neuertheleſſe deceyued of his hope, for ſhortly after his ſonne beeing one of them that was giuen in pledge to remaine in England, till the money for the kings raunſome was payde, dyed there of the Peſtilence, in ſuche ſozte as the moſte part of the other pledges likewiſe did.

The death of Iohn Sutherlande.

And ſhortlye after his deceaſſe, Robert Stewarde was reconciled to the Kings fauour, and ozdeyned heyre apparaunt to the crowne in ſemblable maner as he was before.

Robert Stewarde againe ordeined heire apparant.

The Cleargie of Scotlande condiſcended to giue the tenth pennie of all theyr fruites and reuenues towardes the payment of the Kinges raunſome.

The contribution of the Cleargie.

Not long after, King Dauid called an other Councell, wherein accozding to hys promyſe made to the King of Englande before hys deliuerance, he moued the Lozdes and Barons of Scotlande in a matter whereof hee wyſhed not to haue of them anye towardlye aunſwere, and that was thys: Whether they coulde bee contented, that after his deceaſſe, the crowne of Scotlande ſhoulde bee tranſferred vnto the King of Englandes ſonne, and to hys lawfull heyres.

A demaunde propoſed to the Lordes of Scotland.

The Lozdes hearing what was propoſed vnto them, aunſwered wythoute anye long ſtudie, that ſo long as anye of them were able to beare armour or weapon, they would neuer conſent thereto.

They refuſe.

King

King Dauid right ioyfull to heare them at this poynt, thought himſelfe diſcharged, for that he was not bounde to labour further in this ſuite, becauſe his promiſe made to the King of England touching this poynt, onely was, that if the Scottiſh Lordes would agree, then he ſhould entaile the crowne to his ſonne.

In the yeare next following which was from the Incarnation 1357. Queene Jane the wife of king Dauid went into Englande to ſee hir brother king Edwarde, and died there before ſhe returned, leauing no iſſue behinde hir.

King Dauid after hir deceaſſe maryed a yong luſtie Gentlewoman named Margaret Logy, daughter to ſir John Logy Knight, but wythin three Monethes after, hee repented him for that hee had matched himſelfe wyth one of ſo meane Parentage, to the diſparagement of his bloud.

And herevpon he baniſhed both hir and all other that had counſelled him to mary hir, confining them for euer out of all the parties of his dominions.

Shee hirſelfe went vnto Auignon, where as then the Pope wyth his conſiſtorie remained, and entring hir plaint there in the Court, followed the ſame with ſuch diligence, that in the ende ſentence was giuen on hir ſyde, that is to witte, that King Dauid ſhoulde receyue hir againe into his companie, and to accept and vſe hir as his iuſt and lawfull wyfe.

Thus ſhoulde the Realme of Scotlande haue runne in trouble and daunger of interdiction, had ſhe not departed out of this life by the way in returning homewardes.

King Dauid in the meane time repayred ſundrie places and ſtrengthes of his realme, and buylt a tower in Edenbourgh Caſtell, bearing the name after hym vnto thys day, called Dauids Tower.

After this, appeaſing certaine Rebelles that ſought to trouble the quiet ſtate of the Realme, he purpoſed to haue gone to Jeruſalem, but hauing prouided all thyngs neceſſarie for ſuche a iourney, he fell ſicke of a burning feuer, and died wythin the Caſtell of Edenbourgh, in the xxxix. yeare of hys raigne, and. xlvij. of hys age. Which was from the incarnation. 1370. The death of king Dauid.

His bodie lyeth in holy Rode houſe, where it was buryed in the yeare aforeſayde.

Sundrie marueylous thyngs were ſeene in the dayes of this king Dauid within the bounds of Albion. Straunge wonders.

In the. xlj yeare of his raigne, Crowes, Rauens, and Pyes, in the Winter ſeaſon brought forth theyr brode, and ceaſſed in the Sommer and Spring tyme, contrarie to theyr kynde.

All the Ewes in the countrey the ſame yeare were barren and brought no lambes. Ewes barren.

There was ſuch plentie of Myce and Ratte both in houſes and abrode in the fieldes, that they might not be deſtroyed.

In the. xxvij. yeare of hys raigne the Riuers and other waters roſe on ſuche heigth throughe aboundaunce of rayne that fell in the latter ende of Harueſt, that breaking forth of theyr common Chanelles, wyth theyr violent ſtreame manye houſes and townes were borne downe and deſtroyed. Great rayne.

About thys tyme lyued diuerſe notable Clerkes, as John Duns of the order of Saint Francis, Richard Middleton, and William Ocham, with other. Iohn Duns.

King Dauid being thus deade and buryed, the Nobles aſſembled at Lythquo aboute the election of hym that ſhoulde ſucceede in hys place. The aſſemble of the Lordes for the election of a new king.

The greater part of the Nobilitie, and ſuche as were of the ſounder iudgement, agreeed vpon Robert Stewarde, but William Erle of Dowglas being come thither with a great power, claimed to be preferred by right of Edwarde Ballyoll and the Cumyn, which right he pretended to haue receyued of them both, and there ought to be no doubt (as he alledged) but that the crowne appertcined by iuſt title vnto them, as all the worlde knewe, and therfore ſithy he had both their rightes, he mainteyned that he was true and indubitate inheritour to the crowne.

William Erle of Dowglas claymeth the crowne.

It appeared that the ſayde Earle Dowglas purpoſed to vſurpe the Crowne by force, if hee might not haue it by friendly and quiet meanes: But neuertheleſſe he was diſappointed of his purpoſe, by reaſon that George Earle of March, and John Dunbar Earle of Murrey, with the Lorde Erſkyne and others (of whoſe friendly furtherance hee thought himſelfe aſſured) gaue theyr voyces with the Stewarde, aſſyſting his ſide to their vttermoſt powers.

The Dowglas perceyuing hereby that hee ſhould not be able to mainteyne his quarel, reſigned thereupon his pretenſed title, which in effect was of no importãce, nor worthy the diſcuſſing.

He reſigneth his right to the Stewarde.

Robert.

Robert Stewarde is crowned king of Scotlande.

THen was Rob. Stewarde conueyed vnto Scone, and there crowned wt great ſolemnitie, and was called Robert the ſecõd. This came to paſſe in the .xlviij. yeare of his age, on our Ladye daye in Lent, called the Annuntiation.

Moreouer that the fyrmer amitie and friendſhip might continue and bee nouriſhed betwixt this King Robert and his ſubiect the Earle of Dowglas afore ſayde, it was accorded that Eufame eldeſt daughter to king Robert ſhould be giuen in maryage to James ſonne to the Earle of Dowglas afore ſayde.

The firſt comming of the Stewardes to the Crowne.

Thus ye may perceyue how the Stewardes came to the crown, whoſe ſucceſſion haue enioyed the ſame vnto our time. Queene Mary mother to Charles James that now raigneth being the viij. perſon from this Robert, that thus firſt atteyned vnto it.

He had to wife at the time of his atteyning to the crowne, Eufame daughter to ỹ Erle of Ros, by whõ he had two ſonnes, Walter and Dauid. But before he was maried to hir, he kept one Elizabeth Mure in place of his wife, and had by hir three ſonnes, John, Robert, and Alexander, with diuerſe daughters, of the which one was maried to John Dunbar Erle of Murrey, and an other to John Leon Lord of Glames.

Elizabeth Mure king Roberts concubine.

The Erledome of Murrey continued in poſſeſſion of the Dunbars onely during the lyfe of this Erle John and his ſonne, in whom the ſucceſſion failed touching the name of the Dunbars, in the inioying of that Erledome: for leauing a daughter behinde him that was maryed to the Dowglas, the ſame Dowglas came by that meanes to the ſayd Erledome of Murrey.

How the Dowglaſſes came the Erledome of Murrey.

King Robert after his coronation made ſundrie Erles, Lordes, Barons and Knightes. Amongſt other James Lindſey of Glenneſk was made Erle of Crawford.

Eufame the Queene deceaſſed.

His wife Queene Eufame deceaſſed the third yeare after hir huſband atteyned the crowne, and then incontinently hee maryed Elizabeth Mure his olde lemman, to the ende that the children which he had by hir might be made legitimate by vertue of the matrimonie ſubſequent.

Elizabeth Mure maried to K. Robert.

The preferment of the kings ſonnes to dignitie.

Not long after by authoritie of a Parliament aſſembled, he made his eldeſt ſonne John, begotten on Elizabeth Mure afore ſayde, Erle of Carrik: his ſecond ſonne begotte on hir Erle of Menteith and Fife: and his third ſonne Alexander begotten likewiſe on the ſame mother, he created Earle of Buchquhane, and Lorde of Badzenocht.

Hys eldeſt ſonne Walter, begotten on Eufame his fyrſt wyfe, was made Earle of Atholl, and Lorde of Brechin: his ſeconde ſonne Dauid, begotten on the ſame Eufame, was made Earle of Stratherne.

The ſayde Walter procured the ſlaughter of James the firſt, for that hee pretended a right to the crowne, as after ſhall appeare.

An Act for ſucceſſion of the Crowne.

Shortly after, he called another Parliament at Perth, where it was ordeyned, that after the death of King Robert, the crowne ſhould diſcend vnto John his eldeſt ſonne, and to his iſſue male, and for default thereof vnto Robert his ſeconde ſonne, and to his heyres male, and for default of ſuch heyres, to Alexander his thirde ſonne, and to his heyres male. And in default of them, to remayne to his ſonne Walter, begotten on Eufame his wife, and to the heyres male of his body begotten: and if ſuche ſucceſſion fayled, then it ſhoulde diſcende vnto his yongeſt ſonne Dauid the Erle of Stratherne, and to his heyres generall eyther male or female, and all the Nobles of the Realme were ſworne to perfourme this newe ordinance touching the ſucceſſion to the Crowne, and that in moſt ſolemne maner.

their neighbours goodes, through enuie of long peace and quietneſſe, vpon a quarell pyked, ſlue certaine of the houſholde ſeruauntes of George Earle of Dunbar at the Fayre of Roxbourgh, which as then the Engliſh men holde.

Earle George ſore offended herewith, ſent an Heralde vnto the Earle of Northumberlande Warden of the Engliſhe Marches, requyring that ſuche as had committed the ſlaughter might bee deliuered to receyue according to that they had deſerued: But when hee couldo get nought but dilatorie anſweres, full of deriſion rather than importing any true meaning, he paſſed ouer his diſpleaſure tyll more opportunitie of tyme might ſerue.

In the yeare following agaynſte the nexte Fayre to be holden at Roxbourgh aforeſayde, the ſayd Erle of March, with his brother the Erle of Murrey gathered a power of men ſecretely togither, and cõming to the ſayd towne toke it, ſlue all the Engliſh men founde within it, put theyr goodes to the ſack, and after ſet the towne on fire, and ſo departed.

Hereupon the Engliſh men hotly after enter with an armie into Scotlande, burning & doing much hurt vpon the landes of ſir John Gordon, for that they ioyned to the Erle of Marches lãds.

Sir John Gordoun right deſirous to reuenge this iniurie, came into Englande with an armie, and getting togither a great bootie of Cattell, returned therwith homewardes, but being encountred by the way at a place called Carran or Carram, by John Lilborne and other Engliſh men, there was a ſore fight betwixt them, the victorie for a time ſhewing it ſelfe ſo variable and vncertaine, that ſir John Gordon was ſore wounded, and the Scottes were fiue tymes that day had in chaſe, and as often got the like aduantage of their enimies.

In the ende the Engliſhe men were clearely diſcomfited, and theyr Captayne ſir John Lylborne, with his brother & diuerſe other brought priſoners into Scotlande.

To reuenge theſe diſpleaſures, Henrie Percie Erle of Northumberlande, entred into Scotlande with ſeuen thouſande men; and comming vnto Duns, there pyched downe his tents, but in the night following came the Herdes and other people of the countrey, hauing prepared certayne bagges made and ſowed togither of drie leather like to Bladders, into the whiche they had put ſmall pebble ſtones, and running vp and downe about the place where the Engliſh men were incamped, made ſuche a noyſe with thoſe bagges full of ſtones, that the Engliſhe mens Horſes breaking theyr Halters and Bridles, wherewith they were tyed, ranne from theyr maiſters and keepers, and were ſcattered ſo abrode in the countrey, that the Scottiſhe men got holde of them, and ſo in the morning the Engliſh men that had watched al night, for doubt to haue beene aſſayled by theyr enimies, perceyuing themſelues ſet on foote, returned home without any further attempt.

Neyther had the Scottes the better thus only on the Eaſt Marches, but alſo on the Weſt, where ſir John Johnſtoun had ſundrie ſkyrmiſhes with the Engliſh men, and went euer away with the vpper hande.

About this time, Pope Gregorie the xj. ſent a Legate from Auignion to king Robert, forbidding him in any wiſe to meddle with the goodes perteining to the Church after the deceaſſe of any Biſhop, perſon, or vicar.

On the .xxij. day of October, in the yere .1278. Dauid Stewarde was borne, which afterwards was made Duke of Rothſay, and on Saint Andrewes day next following, the towne of Barwike was taken by ſir John Gordon and .vj. or .vij. other knightes, but it was not long kept; for a number of Engliſh men entring by a poſterne of the Caſtell, recouered the towne eaſily againe out of the Scottiſh mens handes.

After this, William Erle of Dowglas came with .xx. thouſande men to the Fayre of Pennire within England, and ſpoyled all the goods found as then in the ſame Fayre, and ſo returned with great ryches into Scotlande: but the Scottiſhe men ſmally reioyſed at this gaynes, for with ſuch cloth & other wares as they brought away with them from the foreſayde Fayre, they brought into the Countrey ſuche a violent and ſore peſtilence, that the thirde part of all the people where it came dyed therof.

The Englishmen inuade the Scottish borders.

The Englishmen to reuenge the displeasure done by the Earle of Dowglas at Pennyie, rayséd a great army, and came with the same ouer Sulway, & inuading ỳ Scottish borders on that side most cruelly, spared neither fire nor sworde.

In the meane time, the Scots gathered to the number of fiue. C. men, and stood at a streyt, tyll the English men should come to passe by them, & then with such huge noyse and clamor they set on the Englishmen, that in giuing backe there was foure. way, and hereby was all the bootie of cattaile and goodes recouered againe by the Scottes, and the most part of it restored to the owners.

Ambassadours frõ the French king.

Charles the first as then French king, hearing of suche prosperous aduentures dayly chaunsing to the Scottes, sent ouer his Ambassadours vnto king Robert, exhorting him to followe his good fortune and occasion thus offered, to reuenge old iniuries agaynst the Englishe men, nowe that their heartes seemed to fayle them through losses susteyned diuerse wayes of late at the Scottishe mens handes.

The renuing of the league betwixt Scotlande and Fraunce.

In other cause of their message was also, (as the Scottes doe write) to renue the olde league and bande betwixt Scotland and France, which being done in solemne wise according to the maner, they returned into Fraunce, and with them went Ambassadors from king Robert vnto their maister the sayd King Charles, Walter Wardlaw, Cardinall and Bishop of Glasgew, with many other noble men, who in like maner there renued the same league and bond of friendship, to the high contentation of both the Princes. This was in the eleuenth yeare of King Robert hys raigne.

The Chauncelor of Scotland slaine.

In which yeare John Lion Chauncelor of Scotlande was slaine by James Lyndesay Erle of Crawford.

This John Lion grewe into so high fauour with king Robert, that he gaue to him his daughter the Ladie Elizabeth in mariage, with diuerse possessions and landes called Glammis. Of him the surname of the Lions is descended: and in memorie thereof they beare in their armes the Lion and Lillyes, with the tresse in fourme and fashion as the King of Scotlande beareth hys, saue that theyr Lions are placed in a blacke fielde.

Enuie and spite.

The cause why the Earle of Crawford thus slue the Chancelor, was only vpon enuy & spite, for that after he had maried the kings daughter, he attayned to such estimatiõ and authoritie, that he might do all things with the king according to his owne will and pleasure. For this offence the Erle of Crawford remayned in exile certaine yeares after, and durst not returne home, til finally through earnest sute made to the king by the Erles of Dowglas, and Marth, his pardon was begged, and then at length he was reconciled to the kings fauour.

The Earle of Crawford in exile.

His pardon is begged.

In the meane time Edward king of England the third of that name, departed this life, and Richard of Burdeaux, sonne to the blacke Prince, Edward, that was sonne to the said K. Edward, succeeded, in the fourth yeare of whose raigne being after the byrth of our Sauiour. 1381, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, with other Englishe Lordes came into Scotlande in Imbassade, to treate for the appeasing of the discorde as then continuing betwixt the two Realmes: and in the ende the matter was so handled, that a truce was concluded to endure for three yeares.

made by the commons of England againſt the nobles, hauing one Jacke Straw & others to their captaines, whervpon doubting to paſſe through his owne countrey till things were better appeaſed, he returned into Scotlande, & was conueyed by William Erle of Dowglas, and Archymbald Dowglas Lorde of Galloway, vnto holy Rode houſe beſide Edenbourgh, where he remayned till he heard that the rebels were ſuppreſſed, and their captaynes ſlaine or taken and put to execution.

As ſone as the truce was expyred, Archymbalde Dowglas Lorde of Galloway, diſpleaſed in his minde that the Engliſhmen lying in gariſon within the Caſtell of Lochmaben did daily harie and robbe the villages and country townes of Galloway & Annandall, rayſed a great power by ſupport of the Earles of Dowglas, & March, & therwith layd a ſtrong ſiege vnto the ſayd Caſtell of Lochmaben, and hauing lyen thereat the ſpace of ix. dayes, they fought with a number of Engliſh men that came out of Carleil to reſcue this caſtel, whom hauing put to flight, they gaue therewith alſo a ſharpe aſſault to the Caſtell, and put them within in ſuche feare, that ſir William Fetherſton then captaine thereof, and the reſidue conſented to yeeld the houſe vnto the Scots euen the ſame day without more ado, vpō condition they might depart with their goods in ſafetie into England. 1384

The caſtell of Lochmaben rendred to the Scottes.

But Fourdon writing of the winning of this Caſtell, ſpeaketh not of any ouerthrow giuen to thoſe that ſhould come from Carleil in maner as other write. For thus he ſayth. Whē Archimbald Dowglas had got knowledge that the ſame Caſtell was vtterly vnprouided both of men and vitails neceſſarie for the defence therof, he aſſembled an army togither with the helpe of the Earles of Dowglas & Dunbar, who ioining with him, enuironed the Caſtell about with a ſtrong ſiege, ſo that no ſuccour coulde enter to the reliefe of them within at any hande. Herevpon the captaine ſir William Fetherſton knight, ſent letters vnto the lord wardens of the Engliſh marches, requiring ayde, & letting them to vnderſtande in what daunger hee ſtode for lacke of men and vitayles. The wardens wrote to him again, that he ſhould do his beſt for viij. dayes to holde out, & if no ſuccor came within that terme, thē to do as he ſhuld ſee cauſe. Herevpon ſir William Fetherſton requyred a truce of the Scottiſh lords for the ſpace of thoſe viij dayes, within which terme if no ſuccor came to remoue their ſiege, he would yeeld the caſtel vnto them, the liues and goods of thē within ſaued. This was granted, & the Scots ceaſſed further to annoy them within by aſſaultes: and when the ix. day was come, and no ayde from Englande appeared, they receyued the caſtel into their poſſeſſion, according to the couenāt. And ſo the Scottes hauing thus wonne the Caſtell of Lochmaben, razed it quite downe to the earth.

It is raſed.

King Richard hearing that the Scots had atchieued this enterpriſe, appoynted the Baron of Grayſtocke with a certaine number of men to go with vitayles and munition vnto Roxbourgh, for doubt leaſt if the Scottes came to lay ſiege to that fortreſſe, & finding it vnprouided, they might peraduenture bring it into further daunger than would lightly be remedied.

As this Baron was come within a myle of Roxbourgh, he was takē by the Erle of March, and brought to Dunbar with all his prouiſion.

The Baron of Grayſtocke taken.

The king of England being informed alſo of this miſhap, appoynted two armies, one by ſea, & another by land, to inuade the Scots, ỳ Duke of Lancaſter hauing the general charge & conduit of thē both, who giuing order to thē that ſhuld paſſe by ſea what they ſhuld do, entred himſelf by land, and walking the coūtreys of March & Louthian, came to Edenbourgh, & toke ỳ town, but whereas his ſouldiours woulde haue ſpoyled and burned it, he compounded with the inhabitantes for a ſumme of money, and ſo returned without doing any more domage.

His nauie being as then arriued in the Forth, tarryed behinde, and firſt burning the Abbay of Saint Colmes Inche, a number of the Souldiers with their Captaynes landed in Fife, and ſpoyled diuerſe townes and villages there: but in the ende, Thomas and Nicholas Erſkynnes being brethren, Alexander Lindſey, and William Cunningham of Kylmauris, ſet vpon them, and ſlue the moſt part of them, ſo that few in number eſcaped againe to their ſhips, being purſued hard to the water ſide.

The Engliſh men diſcomfited in Fife.

The ſame yere the Erle of Dowglas recouered all the ſtrengthes of Tiuidale out of the Engliſh mens handes, which they had helde euer ſithe the battaile of Durham vnto thoſe dayes.

The ſtrengthes of Tiuidale recouered.

This Erle of Dowglas, one of the moſt valiãt perſonages in thoſe his dayes within the whole realme of Scotlande, died within his Caſtell of Dowglas, ſhortly after he had atchieued this enterpriſe, & was buried in the Abbey of Melros.

The Erle of Dowglas deceaſſeth.

After his deceaſſe, his ſonne James ſucceeded in the Erledome of Dowglas, a right fierce and hardie knight, the which ſhortly after appoynted by the king to haue the guyding of an armie, he paſſed with the ſame into Englande, and burnt the Countrey ſo farre as Newcaſtell. But being countermaũded home, he returned and came vnto Perth, where hee founde the Lorde John de Vian, Admirall of Fraunce and Earle of Valentinois, who about the ſame time was arriued in Scotlande with two hundred and. xl. ſhippes well and perfitely furniſhed for the warres, and in them two thouſand and fiue hundred armed mẽ, diuerſe of them beeing Lordes and Barons, beſides Gentlemen and others. Alſo there was amongſt them 400. Hagbutters, (as Valentine ſayth) and two hundred with Croſbowes: the reſidue bare pykes, halberts, & ſuch like weapons.

John de Vian Admirall of France.

26. Barons, 800. men of armes or knights. I. Fo.

I doubt whether there were any Hagbuttes vſed in thoſe dayes, though gonnes were ſomewhat before that time inuẽted.

They were payde theyr wages for one whole yeare aforehande, and had brought vitayles with them to ſerue them as long. They had brought alſo with them. 400. hundred payre of white Curets, foure hundred halfe lang ſwordes, and fiftie thouſande Frankes to to bee giuen among the Nobles of Scotlande, accordingly as king Robert ſhould appoynt and thinke expedient.

The Admirall and other the nobles of France, being thus come into Scotlande to make warres on the Engliſhe men, were highly feaſted by the king and Lordes of the Realme, as then preſent with him, and when the Erle of Dowglas was once come, by common conſent of them all there aſſembled togither in Counſell, it was ordeyned that an army ſhould be rayſed with al ſpeed, that ioyning with theſe French men they might paſſe immediately into Englande.

The Earle of Fife ſonne to king Robert was appoynted to bee generall of this armie, hauing with him the Earles of Dowglas, and Marche, Archymbald Dowglas Lord of Galloway, and diuerſe other of the Scottiſh nobilitie.

This armie when they were all togither, amounted to the number of fiftie thouſande men, the which entring into England, tooke the caſtels of Warke, Fourde, and Cornwall.

Caſtels woone.

After this, by robbing and ſpoyling the countrey betwixt Barwike and Newcaſtell, they did much hurt in all parties where they came, but through continuall rayne whiche fell as then in greate aboundaunce, they were conſtrayned to returne into Scotlande, where they pytched downe theyr fielde neare to the Caſtell of Rokelbourgh, purpoſing to haue aſſayed the wynning thereof, but foraſmuche as they coulde not agree in whoſe name it ſhoulde be kept, if it were won, they left that enterpriſe. For the French men requyred that if they wanne it, that then it might bee kept by them, in the name, and to the behoofe of the French King, wherunto the Scots would not agree.

The French men & Scots cannot agree.

Yet after this the French men willing to accompliſh ſome other enterpriſe, went to the weſt borders, where ioyning wyth Archymbalde Dowglas Lorde of Galloway, they paſſed ouer Sulway ſandes, and ſo entring into Cumberlande, did wonderfull muche hurte in that Countrey.

They inuade Cumberland.

At lengthy they determined to laye ſiege vnto Carleil, but being called frõ thence, they returned into Scotland, and then (as ſome authors write) and not before, they laid ſiege vnto Rokſbourgh, and rayſed from thence within. viij. dayes after, by reaſon of the variance before alledged.

At Alhallowentide next enſuing, the French men returned into Fraunce, hauing endured no ſmall trauail and paynes ſithy their firſt comming forth of their Countrey.

The French men returne into France.

After they were gotten a Shippe borde to returne homewardes, the Scottes againe enter into England with an armie, remayning there for the ſpace of two monethes, (as the Scottiſh writers ſay.) And in the meane time king Richarde aſſembled a mightie power, and inuading Scotland, paſſed through the Mers, and Louthian, putting all the townes, countrys and houſes vnto vtter ruine, as in the Engliſhe Hiſtorie more plainly it may appeare.

Amongſt certayne other things, found in rifeling and ranſacking of houſes in thys iourney, there was a Chartoꝛ found of certayne lands giuen by King Athelſtane in this foꝛme:

I Kyng Athelſtane gyues to Paullane, Odhiam and Rodhiam, als guid and als fayre, als euer yay mine wayre, and yarto witneſſe Malde my wife. By tenoure of whiche deede it may appeare, that our auncеſtoꝛs gaue moꝛe credite to the true meaning of a fewe woꝛds barely expreſſed in their wꝛitings, than that there needed ſo long pꝛoces and circumſtaunce as is nowe vſed with long ſtudie of penning, nothyng beeyng thought ſufficiente to aſſure the parties of theyꝛ couenaunted bargaynes, and concluded agreementes.

In this laſt iourney againſt the Engliſhmen, William Dowglas ſon to Archimbalde Dowglas Lord of Galloway, wanne greate fame and honoꝛ foꝛ his high pꝛowes and noble valiancie, ſhewed as well in certayne appꝛoches made vnto Carlile, as in diuers other ſkirmiſhes elſe where.

The King alſo herevpon began to fauour him in ſuch wiſe, that he thought him woꝛthy of ſome high aduancement: and therevpon gaue hym hys daughter in marriage named Giles, a Ladye of ſuch excellent beautie, as hir match in thoſe dayes was not to be found.

He begote on hir a daughter, whiche was after maried to the Erle of Oꝛkeney. This William Dowglas, as John Furdon noteth, was of a blackiſh oꝛ ſwart couloure, not ouercharged with fleſh, but bigge of bone, a mightie perſonage, vpꝛight and tall, valiant, curteous, amiable, full of liberalitie, mery, faithfull, and pleaſaunt in company, but herewith he was of ſuche ſtrength, that whome ſoeuer he ſtroke eyther with mace, ſwoꝛd, oꝛ ſpeare, downe he wente were hee neuer ſo well armed. At one time, as the ſame Furdon ſayeth, he hauing with him but eight hundꝛeth, foughte againſt thꝛee thouſand Engliſhmen, of whome, two hundꝛed he ſlewe in the fielde, and bꝛoughte fiue hundꝛed pꝛiſoners with him into Scotland.

In the yeere 1388. Roberte Earle of Fife, and Archembald Dowglas Lorde of Galloway, entred with a pꝛoude army into Englande, and in the meane time, came ſundꝛy Iriſhmen by Sea, to the coaſtes of Galloway, and landing in diuers places, fetched away great booties of Cattel, and other goodes of the inhabitauntes, whereof William Dowglas, ſonne of the ſaide Archembald being enfoꝛmed, gote a conuenable power of men togither, by ſuppoꝛte of his bꝛother in lawe, Robert Earle of Fife, and by licence of the King paſſed ouer with the ſame, ſhipped in certayne veſſels into Ireland, where being gote a lande, he layd ſiege to the towne of Carlingfoꝛd.

The townelmen doubting to be taken by aſſalt, purchaſed a truce foꝛ certayne dayes, pꝛomiſing to giue a greate ſumme of money to haue their towne ſaued: but in the meane time, they aſſembled the number of an eight hundꝛed menne, thꝛough help of an other towne not farre off, called Doundalke; and ioyning with them, they deuided them ſelues into two partes, one parte ſetteth vpon Robert of Duryſdeir, who hauing the conduit of the Earle of Fifes men, was gone abꝛoade into the Countrey to fetch in ſome pꝛay, and the other part aſſayleth William Dowglas, that lay ſtill afoꝛe the towne.

Neuertheleſſe, the ſayd Robert and William receyued the enimies with ſuche manhoode, that they put them in both places to flight, and immediately after, gaue aſſaulte to the towne, and entring the ſame perfoꝛce, put all the goodes founde therein to the ſacke, and then ſet it on fire, and bꝛenned it to aſhes.

The Iriſhmen put to flighte.

Carelingforde won by aſſalt.

This done, they toke thꝛeeſcoꝛe ſhippes whiche they found in diuers hauens and creekes there on that coaſt, and fraughting. xb. of them with ſuch ſpoyle as they had gote, they bꝛenned the reſidue, and then returning homewards, ſpoyled the Ile of Man by the way as they paſſed.

The Ile of Man ſpoyled.

Shoꝛtly after their returne home, the King of England ſent an Army into Scotlande, whyche did muche hurt in the Mers, in bꝛenning and ouerthꝛowing diuers towꝛes and houſes. Kyng Robert being certifyed hereof, as then remayning in the Noꝛth partes of Scotlande, aſſembled the Nobles of his Realme at Aberdene, and there by all their aduiſes it was concluded, that the whole puiſſance of the Realme ſhould be reiſed with all ſpede, to reuenge thoſe iniuries done by the Engliſhmen.

Herevppon were two Armies aſſembled, the one, wherein was a. xb. thouſande men, was cõmitted to the gouernaunce of the Earle of Fife, hauing with him the Earle of Menteith, Archembald Douglas Lord of Galloway, and Alexander Lindſay of Walcop.

Two armies of Scottiſhmen aſſembled.

The other containing the like number of men, was appointed to the guiding of the Earles of Douglas and March, hauing with them James Lindſay Earle of Crawfoꝛde, John Dunbar Earle of Murray, and the Lorde Hay the Conſtable ſtable of Scotlande, with diuers other of the nobilitie.

Cumberland inuaded.

Theſe two armies parting in ſunder at Jedworth, the Earle of Fyfe with his people entred into Cumberlande by the weſt marches, and the Earles of Dowglas and March with theirs, entred on the other ſide into Northumberland, paſſing throughy the countrey ſpoyling and waſting the ſame, till as farre as Durham, and on the other part, the Earle of Fife ſpared neyther fire nor ſworde, all the way as he paſſed.

At length both theſe armies met togither about a tenne miles from Newcaſtle.

Tenne thouſand of the choyſeſt men with the Earle of Dowglas.

Heere the Earle of Dowglas choſe forth ten thouſande of the moſt able men that coulde bee found amongſt all the numbers, with the whiche he went to Newcaſtle, to trie if by any meanes he might take the towne.

The aſſemble of the Engliſhmen at Newcaſtell.

There was gathered into Newcaſtell before hys comming thither, the moſt part of al the choſen men from Yorke to the bordures, with the Earle of Northumberland, who by reaſon of extreame age, was not able to ſturre abroade (any thing to purpoſe) him ſelfe, but he had with hym two of his owne ſonnes, the one named Henry, and the other Rauſe, very forwarde and luſty gentlemen.

Henry hotepurre.

This Henry beeing the elder, was ſurnamed for his often pricking, Henry hotſpure, as one that ſeldome times reſted, if there were any ſeruice to be done abroade.

The Earle of Dowglas encampeth faſt by Newcaſtle.

The Earle of Dowglas encamped with his people on that ſide the towne towards Scotland, and viewed the towne earneſtly, which way he might beſt come to giue aſſalt to winne it.

The Earle of Dowglas and Henry Percy runne togither

Henry Percy deſirous to ſhewe ſome proofe of his ſingular manhoode, wherein hee greatly truſted, required to fight with the Earle of Dowglas man to man, which requeſt the Earle graunting, togither they ranne mounted on two great courſers with ſharpe ground Speares at the vttearaunce.

The Earle of Dowglas in this encoũter bare himſelfe ſo well, that in the end he droue the Percy out of his ſaddle.

The Percy diſmounted beſide hys Horſe.

The Engliſhmen ẏ ſtoode without the gates made to the reſkew, recouered him on foote, and brought him forthwith backe into the towne.

An aſſalt giuen to Newcaſtle.

Incontinẽtly herevpon, ẏ Earle of Dowglas cauſed the aſſault to be giuen, and filling the ditches with hay and fagottes, came with ladders to the walles: but the Engliſhmen ſo well defended them ſelues, that the Scottes were beaten backe not withoute greate loſſe and ſlaughter of theyr people.

Froiſart ſomewhat varyeth from the Scottiſh writers.

Froyſart making mention of this enterprice thus made by the Scottes, varieth somewhat frõ the Scottiſh writers in this place, for he ſpeaketh nothing that the Dowglas and the Percy ſhould thus runne togither on horſebacke as before is ſpecifyed, but that in giuing aſſault to the towne, it chanced that as the Engliſhmen defended their barriers without the gate, the Dowglas fortuned to be matched hand to hãd with Henry Percy, and there by force plucked the Percyes ſtaffe from him, and in retourning hoyſted it vp on heigth, ſaying, he woulde carrie the ſame for hys ſake into Scotlande: and the nexte day after, hee reyſed his campe and departed homewardes toward the bordures, and comming to a place called Otterborne, about a twelue or fourtene miles from Newcaſtel, pitched downe his tentes there, that his ſouldiours might take ſome reſt and refreſhe themſelues after their greate trauell, for they had not reſted of all the day nor night before, nor to any purpoſe, ſith their firſte entring into Englande.

Dowglas encamped at Otterborne.

In

In the meane time the Engliſhe power was highly encreaſed at Newcaſtle, for a great number of the Countrey came, and entred into the Towne the ſame night that followed the day of the aſſault.

Henry Percy then perceyuing his number ſufficient to fyghte with the Dowglas, ſet them in order of battayle, and determined to iſſue forthe vpon the Scottes, and to giue them an encounter: but when he vnderſtode that they were gone homewardes, he followed them with all ſpeede, for he would by no meanes that they ſhould paſſe into Scotlande without battayle, truſting to recouer the diſhonor whiche he had ſuſteyned by loſing his ſtaffe at the barryers before the gate of Newcaſtell.

The Dowglas exhorteth hys men to fyghte manfully.

Earle Dowglas aduertiſed that the enimies were cumming to giue hym battell, exhorted his people with fewe wordes to remember their wonted manhode, that by gayning the victory, they might winne interminable fame and honor, with ſafegard to themſelues and their countrey.

The Percy with comfortable wordes, encourageth his men.

The Percy likewiſe for his part, encouraged his men, willing them to fyghte manfully in reuenge of the iniuries done to them and theyr friends by the Scottes, and herewith commaunding the Trumpettes to ſounde, he gaue the onſet fiercely.

The onſet is giuen.

Here both the armies ioyning togither, a right terrible encounter enſued, but bycauſe the nighte was at hand, before they began to ioyne, through want of light to ſee what was to doe, they were ſeuered in ſunder for that time: but remembring that the Moone would ſhortly ryſe, they determined ſo ſone as ſhe began to giue lighte, to renewe the battell againe.

As ſone therefore as the Moone began to appeare, they ioyned agayne with more malice than afore.

The Engliſhmen foughte ſo egrely, that putting the Scottes abacke, and cauſing them to giue ground, they had wonne the Scottiſh ſtanderts, and ſo by all likelihod gote the vpper hand, had not Patrike Hepborne with his ſonne, and ſuch other of his company as attended him, come to the reſkew, by whome the fight was begunne afreſhe.

Herewith alſo came the Earle of Dowglas, and with a great mace in his hand, layd ſuch fore ſtrokes round about him, that none came within his reach, but downe he went.

Finally, the whole number of the Scottiſhmē bare themſelues ſo manfully, that the Engliſhmē being broken and put to flighte, were ſlayne and borne downe.

The chaſe continued till the breake of the day with killing and taking, as in ſuche caſes is euer ſeene, though the more parte indeede were taken with their liues ſaued after they once fell in chaſe.

Raufe and Henry Percy taken priſoners.

Amongſt other, Raufe Percy and his brother Henry, were taken by Keith, the Merſhall of Scotland, ſomewhat before the Engliſhmen began to turne.

Other perſons taken.

There were alſo taken beſydes the two Percies, diuers other men of name, as Robert Ogill, Thomas Halberke, John Lilborne, William Wauchlute, Robert Heron, the Baron of Hiltō, John Colwell, and Patrike Louel Knightes.

The number of priſoners taken.

There were taken in all of Engliſhmen, to the number of a thouſande and fortie, and ſlayne what in the fielde and chaſe (as Froyſart reconneth) aboue an eyghteene hundred.

There were ſlayne but fiue hundreth Engliſhmen as Hector Boetius hath.

But yet the Scottiſh writers themſelues report, a leſſe number. Neyther did this victory chaunce to the Scottes without greate loſſe and ſlaughter.

The death of Iames Earle of Dowglas.

For amongſt other, the Earle of Dowglas himſelfe was thrice ſtriken through the body, and alſo also wounded so mortally on the head, that being borne to his tent a little before the end of the battell, he dyed of those hurtes immediately after, to the greate discomforte of all his armie, conceyuing more dolorous griefe for the losse of so worthy a chieuetayne, than ioy for the gayne of so greate a victory. His body was conueyed vnto Melros, and buryed beside his father Earle William in the Abbey church there. And bycause this Earle James had no heires of his body begotten, his Cousin Archembald Dowglas Lord of Galloway succeeded him in the Earledome.

See more of this matter in Englande.

Archimbalde Dowglas succeeded the Earle Iames of Dowglas.

The house of the Hepbornes (of the whyche this Patrike Hepborne that fought so valiauntly in this battell at Otterborne did discend) arose in Scotland after this wise.

It chanced in the dayes of King Dauid the thirde, there was an Englishman of that name taken prisoner in Scotland, who by chaunce being in place where the Earle of March was got vpon a young gelding vnbroken, the whiche playing the vnruly Jade in fetching and flinging aloft, put the Earle in greate daunger of his lyfe, and when all other that were presente there gaue backe, and durst not steppe in to make any shifte to help the Earle: this Englishman lept to hym, and boldly catching holde on the bridle reyne, held the Horse fast till the Earle was safely gote beside him.

The first aduancement of the Hepborns.

In rewarde of which benefite the sayd Earle gaue vnto this Hepborne certayn lands in Lowthiam, whose posteritie increased afterwardes in such power of landes and surname, that the same enioyed not only the Earledome of Bothwel, but was also deuided into sundry braunches, and many Knightes thereof haue risen of right worthy fame and estimation.

The Earles of Bothwell.

This battell of Otterborne was foughte on saint Oswaldes day, which is the fifth of August, in the yeere. 1388.

The Bishop of Durham approcheth the Scottes with an armie.

The Bishop of Durham was comming the day next following with a newe power to haue ayded the Percies, but hearing of the ouerthrowe, and beeing come within a little of the Scottishe camp, hee was enformed that the Scottes were as ready to defende, as hee was to assayle, and therevpon doubting the issue of his enterprise, if he shoulde giue battell, he turned backe to Newcastell, and suffered the Scottes to returne into their countrey without any further pursute.

He retireth.

A Parliament at Perth.

In the yeere following, a Parliamente was holden at Perth, in the whiche demonstratiō was made by King Roberte, that for asmuche as hee was broke by great age, and might not through feeblenesse occasioned thereof attende to his office in gouernemente of the Realme, it was necessay that some gouernoure shoulde be chosen, and therfore hee required that his seconde sonne Roberte Earle of Fife might enioy that office, considering his eldest sonne Iohn Earle of Carrike (by reason of a stripe which he had receyued on the legge by an horse of Sir James Douglas of Dalketh) was not able to trauell, but kept his bed, & might sturre no way forth abroade.

Robert Earle of Fyfe is chosen gouernoute of the Realme.

The Lordes consented to the Kings request, and so the Earle of Fife was constituted gouernour of Scotland, by common consente of all the Lords of the Realme.

Also the Earle Marshall of Englande, was sent by King Richard to the bordures, to remain there as Warden in the place of Henry Percye prisoner in Scotland. It is reported by ỹ Scottishe writers, that this Earle should make stoute bragges, that he woulde fighte with the Scottes the next time he mette with any power of them, whether he were like in number to them or not, but when it came to passe that Robert Steward the Scottishe gouernoure was entred into Northumberlande with an Army, he withdrewe into places of sauegard, and suffered the most parte of the Countrey to be harryed and brente. Indeede our English writers affirme, that the sayd Earle hauing with him but fiue hundred men of armes, he was not able to accomplish any great exploite auaylable against the greate multitude of hys enimies.

The gouernour of Scotland inuadeth Northumberlande.

The same yeere was a truce taken betwixte England and France, the Scottes (if they would so agree) being comprised therein.

A truce taken.

Herevpon came their Ambassadours for the of England, to vnderstād what the King of Scots would determine in that behalfe. By whome it was aunswered, that he woulde with good will stand to the same truce according as it was concluded.

English ambassadors sent into Scotland.

The King of Scottes agreeth to the truce.

Whilest things passed thus in Scotland, Alexander Stewarde Earle of Buchquhan brente the Cathedrall Church of Murray, the lanterne and ornament of all the north part of Scotland, vpon displeasure conceyued against the Bysshop of the same place. Whereat his father the Kyng toke suche indignation, that when his sonne the said Alexander was broughte to his presence, hee commanded him to be committed vnto straight prison, wherein he remayned till after hys fathers decease.

The Cathedrall Church of Murray brente.

The Earle of Buchquhane emprisoned.

The Realme being in this manner broughte to good tranquilitie, King Roberte falling into great infirmitie and feeblenesse, by reason of extreame age, without any manner of other accidentall sickenesse, deceased at his Castel of Dundonald, the nineteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere after our redemption. 1390. beeing as then aboue threescore and fifteene yeeres of age, and hauing reigned the space of nineteene yeeres, his body was buried at Scone before the high aulter.

The decesse of King Robert the seconde.

This

This Robert the ſeconde, though by reaſon of his great age, he wente not forth into the warres him ſelfe, yet was there neuer Prince afore hym that had more happie ſucceſſe by the conduit of his Captaynes whiche he ſente forth as Lieutenaunts vnder him, for they neuer lightly returned home but with victory.

He was a Prince of ſuch cõſtancie in promiſe, that he ſeldome ſpake the worde which he performed not.

Suche an obſeruer he was alſo of iuſtice, that when ſo euer hee remoued from any place, hee would cauſe proclamation to be made, that if any of his men or officers had taken vp any thing vnpayde for, the partie to whome the debte was due ſhould come in, and immediately he ſhoulde be ſatisfyed.

He willingly hearde the complaynctes of the poore, and was no leſſe diligent to ſee their wrõgs redreſſed.

After the deceaſſe of King Roberte the ſeconde, hys ſon John Steward Earle of Carricke was admitted to the Crowne, which hee receyued at Scone on oure Ladye the Aſſumption.

And for ſo much as John was thought to bee an infortunate name for Kings, they chaunged his name and called him Robert after his father, being now the third of that name.

About the ſame time, William Dowglas of Middeſdale was choſen by the Lordes of Pruſſen, to be Admirall of a nauy, conteyning two hundred and fortie ſhippes, whiche they had rigged, and purpoſed to ſet forthe againſte the miſcreaunt people of the Northeaſt partes, but being appealed by the Lord Clifford an Engliſhman, (who was there likewiſe to ſerue with the foreſaid Lords in that iourney) to fight with him in a ſingular combate. Before the day came appoynted for them to haue darreigned the battell, the Lorde Clifford lay in awayte for the Dowglas, and vppon the bridge of Danzke mette with him, and there ſlew him, to the great diſturbance and ſtay of the whole iourney.

Moreouer, ſhortly after the coronation of king Roberte the thirde, tidings came that Duncane Stewarde, ſonne to Alexander Stewarde the Kings brother afore reherſed, was entred into Angus with a greate number of men, and ſlewe Walter Ogilvy Shireſe of the countrey, that came forth with a power to reſiſt him from ſpoiling the people whom he miſerably afflicted, howbeit theſe his inſolent doings were not long vnpuniſhed, for the Earle of Crawford being ſent againſt him with an army, cauſed him to diſperſe his company, and to flee his wayes, but beeyng apprehended with the moſt part of his layd company, they were puniſhed according to their demerites.

The North partes of Scotland ſore diſquieted by two Clannes.

At this time alſo the moſt parte of the North countrey of Scotland, was ſore diſquieted by two Clannes of thoſe Iriſh Scots, cleped Kateranes, whiche inhabite the hye lande countreys, the one named Clankayes, & the other Clanquhattanes.

Wild Scots cleped Kateranes.

Theſe two being at deadly fude, robbed and waſted the countrey with continuall ſlaughter and reife.

A battell of thirtie againſt thirtie.

At length it was accorded betwixt ẏ parties, by the aduice of the Earles of Murray & Crawford, that thirtie perſons of the one Clan, ſhoulde fight before the King at Perth againſte thirtie other of the other Clannes men with ſharp ſwords to the vtterance, without any kind of armoure or harneſſe in triall and deciſion of the quarell, for the which the baryance betwixt them firſt roſe.

A deſperate fighte.

Both theſe Clannes right ioyfull of this appointmente, came to Perth with their number, where in a place cleped the North Inche, a little beſide the Towne in preſence of the King and other iudges aſſigned thereto, they foughte accordyng as it was agreed, and that with ſuch rage and deſperate furie, that all thoſe of Clankayes part were ſlayne (one onely excepted) who to ſaue his life after he ſawe all his fellowes ſlayne, lepte into the water of Tay, and ſwamme ouer, and ſo eſcaped.

There was a .xi. of Clanquhattanes ſyde that eſcaped with life, but not one of them vnwounded, and that very ſore.

At their entring into the fielde or liſtes where they ſhould darraigne ẏ battell, one of ẏ Clannes wanted one of hys number, by reaſon that hee which ſhould haue ſupplyed it, was priuily ſtolen away, not willing to be partaker of ſo deere a bargaine, but there was a Countrey felowe amõgſt the beholders, being ſory that ſo notable a fighte ſhoulde be paſſed ouer, offered himſelfe for a ſmall ſumme of money to fyll vp the number, though the matter apperteyned nothing to him, nor to any of his friends.

This battell was foughte betwixt theſe two Clannes, in manner as before is remembred, in the yeere .1396.

In the thirde yeere after a Parliamente was holden at Perth, wherein, beſides diuers conſtitutions and ordinances enacted for the aduaunce-ment of the common wealth, the King made his eldeſt ſonne named Dauid (that was as then about an eighteene yeeres of age) Duke of Rothsay, and his brother Roberte (that was Earle of Fife and gouernour of the Realme, as before yee haue heard) hee created Duke of Albany. These were the firste Dukes that hadde bin hearde of in Scotland, for till those dayes there was neuer any within ỳ Realm that bare that tytle of honor.

The firste Dukes that were created in Scotlande.

During the time that the peace continued betwixt the two Realmes of England and Scotland, there were sundry iusts and combates put in vre, and exercised betwixt Scots and Englishmen, for proofe of their valiant actiuitie in feates of armes, to winne thereby fame and honor.

Iusts and combates betwixte Scottes and Englishmen.

But amongst the residue that was most notable, whiche chaunced betwixt Dauid Earle of Crawford Scottishe, & the L. Welles English.

It was agreed betwixte these two noble men, to runne certayne courses on horseback, with speares sharp ground, for life and death.

The Earle of Crawford of Scotland, and the Lord Wels of England iusted for life and deathe.

The place appoynted for these iustes, was London bridge, and the day the three and twentie of Aprill, being the feast of Saint George.

At the place and day thus prefixed, they came ready to furnishe their enterprise, and being mounted on their mighty coursers, they ranne togither right egrely.

At the firste course, though they atteynted, yet kepte they their saddles withoute anye perill of falling.

The people beholding howe stiffely Earle Dauid sate without mouing, cryed that ỳ Scottishman was locked in his saddle.

He hearing this, lepte beside his Horse, and right deliuerly mounted by agayne into the saddle, armed as he was, to the greate wonder of the beholders.

This done, he toke another staffe, and so togither they runne againe right fiercely the second time, and yet without any great hurte on eyther part, but the thirde time, the Lorde Welles was borne out of the sadle, and sore hurt with the fall.

The Lorde Welles borne out of his saddle.

And bycause the Earle of Crawford thus vanquished his aduersarie on saint Georges day, he founded a Chanterie of seuen Priestes to sing in our Ladies Church of Dundee, in memorie of Saint George, which they did vnto our time, not withoute singular commendation of the sayde Earle. After this, hee remained three monethes in England, in sporting and feasting amongst the nobles, before he returned into Scotlande, highly praysed of all estates for his noble port and great liberalitie there shewed amongst them.

Prayse of the Earle of Crawfort.

Not long after, one Sir Roberte Morlay an Englishman came into Scotlande to trie hys manhoode in singular battel, with whome so euer woulde come againste him, hee vanquished one Archembald Edmounston and Hew Wallace, but at length, hee was ouercome by one Hewe Traill at Berwike, and dyed shortly after vppon displeasure thereof conceyued.

Sir Roberte Morlay.

The same yeere, Richard King of England maried Isabell daughter to the Frenche King, and sone after, went into Ireland to subdue such Irishe Rebells, as troubled the quiet state of the Countrey. But in the meane time, his Lords at home rebelled against him, and determined to depose him from the Crowne, so that vpon hys returne into Englande, hee was apprehended and put in ward, and shortly after, constreyned to renounce all his right to the Crowne, and adiudged therewith to perpetuall prison: yet at length, (as the Scottish Chronicle telleth) he gote forth of prison disguised in womans apparell, & came into Galloway, where hee fell in seruice with a Scottishman named Makdonald, but at ỳ last, being bewrayed and knowen what he was, and therevpon brought to King Robert, he was right honorably by him entertained, neuertheleſſe, knowing him selfe deposed from his royall estate, hee gaue himselfe wholly to contemplation, til finally he departed this world at Striueling, and was buried in the blacke Friers there within the same towne as the same Scottish Chronicles vntruely do report. But to the matter, Henry the sonne of John of Gaūt sometime Duke of Lancaster, after ỳ King Richard was deposed, was Crowned King of England at Westminster the .xiij. day of October, in the yeere. 1399.

In the yere next ensuing, that is to wit, 1400. King Robert in consideratiō of a summe of money to him aforehand payd, contracted couenants of mariage to be had and made betwixt his sonne the Duke of Rothsay, and the Earle of Marches daughter, but Archembalde Earle of Dowglas hauing indignation ỳ the Earle of March should be preferred before him, by support of the Duke of Albany, procured a counsel to be called, in ỳ whiche hee founde meanes to assure his daughter the Lady Mariory vnto the sayd Duke of Rothsay, and with al speede went about to consummate ỳ mariage betwixt them, to put the matter out of all doubt.

The occasion of the falling foorth betwixt King Robert, and the Earle of March.

The Earle of March perceiuing this dealing, came to the King, and required to know his pleasure, if he minded to performe the couenantes cōcluded, concerning the mariage betwixt ỳ prince & his daughter or not, making as it were a great complainte of that which was already done to ỳ breach thereof, and receyuing answere nothyng agreeable to his minde, hee departed in a greate fume, not sticking to say, hee woulde be reuenged on such vntruth ere it were long.

Shortly after he fled into England, leauyng his Castell of Dunbar, well stuffed of all thyngs necessary for defence, in the keeping of his sisters sonne named Robert Maitland, but when Archembald chembald Dowglas came thither in the Kyngs name, and required to haue the Caſtell rendred into his hands, this Robert Maitland obeyed the kings commaundemente, and deliuered the houſe to the ſayd Dowglas.

George Earle of March informed hereof, procured all his frendes to conuey themſelues into England, and determined with himſelfe to do all the diſpleaſure and miſchife he myghte inuente againſt his owne natiue countrey.

King Roberte ſore dreading, leaſt by thys Earles procurement ſome trouble might hap to folowe amongſt his ſubiectes, ſente an Herald at armes into England with letters vnto him, promiſing by the tenor of the ſame, not only to pardon him of all offences committed, but alſo to redreſſe all wrongs or iniuries which he hadde any wayes forth receyued, if hee woulde returne into Scotlande: for as much as the Earle of March refuſed this offer, the ſame Heralde according to inſtructions giuen him at his departure frō King Roberte, wente immediately to Henry King of Englād with other letters, earneſtly deſiring him to cauſe the Earle of March to depart out of hys Realme, and not to receyue any Rebelles out of Scotlande into his boundes, whereby the peace myghte bee violated, whiche as yet remayned betwixt the two Kingdomes.

Sent letters alſo vnto the King of Englande.

King Henry vpon reaſonable allegations as he pretended, refuſed to ſatiſfye King Roberts petitions in this behalfe, by reaſon whereof the peace brake betwixte them and their ſubiects, without any further tracting of time.

Henry Hoteſpurre and the Earle of March enter into Scotland.

For ſhortly after, Henry Percy ſurnamed as is ſaid, Henry Hoteſpurre, & the Earle of March entred into Scotland, and gote togither a greate bootie of goods and Cattell, but for returne therof, Archembald Earle of Dowglas hauing aſſem-bled a power of mē, came with the ſame towards the enimies, immediately whereupon they fledde, and left all their bootie behynd them, which beyng recouered by the ſaid Earle of Dowglas and his company, hee returned backe vnto Edynburgh, wher he ſhortly after being take wᵗ an hote feuer, departed out of this life, leauing behind hym an honorable memorie of his name for his high prowes and noble valiancie ſhewed in many and ſundry enterpriſes by him luckily atchieued for the wealth of his countrey.

He was named of his terrible countenaūce and dreadful lokes, the grimme Dowglas.

After his deceaſſe, his ſeconde ſonne that hight likewiſe Archembald, was made Earle of Dowglas, for his eldeſt ſonne William Dowglas dyed in the yeere afore his father.

Shortly after, Henry King of England came into Scotland with an Army, without doing any great domage to the people, for hee required no more of thē that kept any Caſtells or ſtrengths, but only to put forthe a Banner of his armes as he paſſed by.

At his comming to Hadington, he was lodged in the Munrie there, and ſhewed much bounteous humanitie towards the Nunnes, and al other of that houſe, not ſuffering any manner of thing to be done preiuditiall to the ſame.

The like gentleneſſe he ſhed towardes them of the holy Rode houſe at his comming to Edynburgh, wherein he likewiſe lodged.

It is thoughte, that in memory of the friendly entertainemente, whiche his father the Duke of Lancaſter founde in theſe Abbeys, at the time of his being in Scotland, when the rebellion chaunced in England, through Jacke Strawe and his complices, he ſhewed ſuche fauor towardes them at this preſent.

To

To bee briefe it shoulde appeare, that King Henry came into Scotlande, as it were enforced, more through counsell of his nobles, than for any hatred he bare towardes the Scottes, as hee well shewed in returning backe againe, without doing them any further iniurie.

The death of Queene Annabell.

In the yeere after, deceassed the Scottishe Queene Annabell Drommond, after whose decesse hir sonne Dauid the Duke of Rothsay that vnder hir gouernemente had bin well and vertuously broughte vp, hauing nowe gote once the reyne at liberty, fell to al kind of insolent outrage, seeking to defyle Wiues, Virgines, Nunnes, and al other kind of woome in al places wher he came.

The insolent outrage of the Duke of Rothsay.

At lengthe, his Father perceyuing his sonnes youthful nature to rage after that manner in vnbrideled lust beyond the tearmes of all measure, to the great reproch of them both, wrote to his brother the Duke of Albany, requiring him to take his sonne, the said Duke of Rothsay into his custody, and to see him so chastised for his wanton behauiour, as he might learne to amend the same.

Here is to be noted, that the Duke of Albany had of long time before, desired to see the Duke of Rothsay dispatched out of the way, as the person whome hee most doubted, and therefore hauyng commission thus from the King to take him, hee reioyced not a little, trusting thereby, to compasse his purpose without daunger.

And hereuppon, taking the Duke of Rothsay betwixt Dundee and S. Andrewes, hee brought him to Faulkland, where he shut him vp in straite prison, and kept him without al manner of meate or drinke, so to famish him to death.

The Duke of Rothsay committed to prison.

It is sayde, that a woman vnderstanding the Duke of Albanies intention, and taking ruth of the others pitifull case, found meanes to let meale fall downe through a rift of the loft of that towre wherein he was enclosed, by meanes whereof, hys life was certayne dayes sustayned, but after thys was once knowne, incontinently was the woman made away.

On the same maner, another woman through a long reede, fedde him with milke of hir owne breests, and was likewise dispatched as soone as hir doings were perceyued.

Then after this, the Duke destitute of all worldly sustenaunce through very famine, was constreyned to eate not only all suche filth as hee could finde within the Towre, but also in ỹ end, hee gnawed off his owne fingers, and so finally in this miserable state of Martirdome (as I may call it) ended his wretched life, and was buryed in Lundonis, where (as the fame went) many fayre miracles were done neere to his graue, till tyme that James the first began to punish the murtherers, for sithens that time such miracles ceassed.

The Duke of Rothsay famished to death.

Miracles.

About the same time, George Earle of March did many displeasures to the Scottes, makyng sundry rodes into their countrey, greatly to hys profyte.

The displeasures done by George Earle of March.

The Earle of Dowglas that had the gouernmente of Lowthian in those dayes, tooke order, that certayne Captaines of that Countrey, shuld euery one for his turne, with a competente numbre assigned to him for the time, rode into England, to reuenge such displeasures.

The Earle of Dowglas gouernoure of Louthian.

The first that went, was Thomas Halyburton, who returned in safetie with a great pray taken of Englishmens goodes.

Thomas Halyburton.

Next vnto him, was Patrike Hepborne of the Halis the yonger, appoynted to goe forthe as Captayne generall with a certaine number who entring into Englande, gote a great bootie together, but the Englishmen following thereuppon to recouer it, encountred with hym at Melbet in the the Mers, and there not onely ſlew him, but alſo diſtreſſed his people.

Beſides them that were ſlayne with theyr Captayne, there were alſo many that were taken, as John and William Cokburne, Roberte Lawder of the Bas, John and Thomas Haliburton, with many other.

Almoſt all the floure of Lowthian (as Johannes Maior writeth) periſhed in this battell, whiche was fought the. xxij. of June, in the yere. 1402.

Archembald Earle of Dowglas ſore diſpleaſed and wonderfully wroth in his minde for this ouerthrowe, gote commiſſion to inuade Englande with an army of tenne thouſand men, and hauing the ſame once ready with all thynges neceſſary for his voyage, hee ſet forwarde, and entring into Englande, brente and harried the countrey, not ſtaying till hee came as farre as Newcaſtell.

The Nobles of Scotland in this army.

In this army there was with the Dowglas Murdock eldeſt ſonne to Duke Robert Earle of Fife, Thomas Earle of Murray, George Earle of Angus, with many other Lords and nobles of Scotlande.

At the laſt, when they were returning homewards with a pray of infinite goodes and riches, Henry Hotſpurre, and George Earle of March, with a great power of men, met them, and aſſayled them ſo, with ſuch inceſſant ſhot of arrowes, that where the Earle of Dowglas with his army had the aduantage of an hill, cleped Homyldon, he was conſtreyned to forſake the ſame, and comming downe vppon the Engliſhmen, was neuertheleſſe put to the worſe, the moſte parte of his people being eyther taken or ſlayne.

Henry Hotſpurre and the Earle of March aſſayle the Scottes at Homyldon.

It is ſayde, that after the Scottes were once put to flight, they gathered agayne, and renewed the battell by the exhortation of Adham Gordon and ſir John Suynton, but that dyd little auayle them, for they were ſtill beaten downe and ſlayne.

Amongſt other of thoſe that were ſlaine, were the ſame ſir John Swynton and Adham Gordoun: Alſo John Leuynſton of Kalendare, Alexander Ramſay of Dalhowſy, with ſundry other gentlemen and nobles of Scotland.

Archembald Earle of Dowglas, Mayor Stewarde eldeſt ſonne to Duke Robert the gouernour, George Earle of Angus, Roberte Erſkyn of Alloway the Lorde Saulton, James Dowglas maiſter of Dalkeith, and his two brethren John and William, with the moſt part of all the Barons of Fyfe and Lowthian were taken priſoners.

This battell was fought on the Rode day in Haruell, in the yeere. 1403. vpon a tuiſday.

H. B. 1402

Henry Percy righte proude of this victory, came with the Earle of March vnto the Caſtell of Cokclauis in Teuidale, and layde ſeege to the ſame, but John Greynelow Captayne thereof defended it ſo manfully, that they gote no greate aduauntage, yet at length he fell to this compoſition with them, that if he had no reſkewe within the ſpace of three moneths, the Caſtell ſhoulde be then rendred into their hands.

The Caſtell of Cocklauis beſeeged.

A compoſition.

When the gouernour of Scotlande was enformed what agreement the Captayne of Cokclauis had made, he aſſembled the Lordes in counſell to haue their aduice for the leuying of an army againſt the time appoynted.

There were many of this opinion, that it was better to loſe the Caſtell than to iooperde the liues of ſo many men as were neceſſary to furniſh that enterpriſe for the ſauing of it: but ỹ gouernor ſhewed, that hee weyed the loſſe of it ſo much, that if none of the nobles would paſſe with him to the reſkew thereof, he would yet goe himſelfe to doe what in him might lie to ſaue it. But in the meane time, ſuch trouble roſe in England, that there needed no power to be leuied for the defence of Cokclauis. For by a conſpiracie practiſed agaynſte Kyng Henry, certayne of the Engliſh nobilitie were alyed togither to haue deſtroyed hym, but amongſt the reſidue, the Percies were as chiefe.

A conſpiracie againſt Kyng Henry by the Percies and other.

They fought togither at Shrewelbury a right bloudy battell, where the King gote the victory, and ſlewe the Lorde Percy ſurnamed (as before ye haue heard) Henry Hotelſpurre.

Shrewesburie fielde.

At this battell was alſo the Earle of Dowglas, with a greate company of Scottiſhmen on the Percies ſide, for being taken priſoner at the battell of Hommyldoun (as before is ſayde) it was accorded betwixte hym and the ſayd Henry Hotelſpurre, that ayding hym and other his complices againſt King Henry, if it chaunced the ſaid Kyng Henry to be vanquiſhed and put from the Crowne, according to their intente and purpoſe, then ſhould the ſayd Earle Dowglas be releaſed of his raunſome, and haue the towne of Barwike rendred vnto hym in reward of hys ayde and aſſiſtaunce.

The Earle of Dowglas at Shrewesburie field in ayd of the Percies.

He fought (as is reported) with ſingular manhode, and hadde the forewarde on the Percies ſide.

He led the forewarde ther.

He ſlewe that day with his owne hands three gentlemen arrayed in the Kings coate armour, and finally when the battell was loſt, he was taken in the chaſe and ſaued aliue, where not one more of all his retinue of Scottes eſcaped with life, but were all ſlayne out of hande.

He is taken priſoner.

Neyther was this victory gotten by Kyng Henry without greate ſlaughter of thoſe that were on his parte, for he loſt foure right valiaunt Knights, as Staluart, Blont, Maſſie, and Pottok, with ſeuen hundred other ſouldiers and men of warre, as the Scottiſhe writers haue, but the Engliſh authors name a farre greater number, as ſixteene hundred at the leaſt.

King Henry (as the ſame Scottiſhe writers doe recorde) vſed the counſell & aduice of ỹ Earle of March in the obteyning of this victory, being fled lately before from the Rebelles ſyde vnto him.

The Earle of Dowglas in reſpect of his noble parentage and high valiancie, was right tenderly cheriſhed by King Henry, who for that hee hadde ſeene him doe ſo valiantly in the day of that battell, reputed hym worthy of all honor.

This Earle of Dowglas yet was righte infortunate in moſt of his enterpriſes, ſo farre forth that he neuer wanne battell wherein he chaunced to be, & was therefore named Archebald Tinneman, though there was no default to be found at any time in his owne perſon, for he euer foughte with great manhode.

At the battell of Hommyldoun he loſt one of his eyes, and at this battell of Shrewelburie he loſt one of his ſtones.

The olde Earle of Northumberland, hearing what euill ſucceſſe his ſonne and other his kinſmen had founde in their rebellious enterpriſe at Shrewelbury, with one of his Nephewes (that was his ſiſters ſonne) and other of his friends and kinſmen withdrew into Scotland, where he was receyued by Henry Wardlaw biſhop of Sainte Andrews, and lodged with him at his eaſe and in good ſurtie within his Caſtell of Sainte Andrews aforeſayde.

The Earle of Northumberland fled into Scotlande.

About the ſame time, King Robert was aduertiſed, that his ſon the Duke of Rothſay was pyned to deathe in Falkland (in maner as before is expreſſed) which newes were ſo greeuous vnto him, that he grewe eache day more and more in ſorowe and melancoly.

The death of the Duke of Rothſay commeth to the knowledge of his father.

The Duke of Albany kepte it so long as was possible from the Kings knowledge, and beeing nowe sente for by the Kyng to aunsweare hym for suche treasonable slaughter of hys sonne, hee came and so excused the matter with a fayre paynted tale, as though hee had bin nothing giltie in the cause, and for further declaration of his innocencie, he promised if it might please the Kyng to come vnto Edynburgh, hee woulde bring in the offendors which were culpable of the murder.

The Kyng as then remayning in Bute (where for the most part he euer soiourned) though hee were not well able to trauell by reason of long sickneſſe, yet in a chariot hee came vnto Edynburgh, vpon the earnest desire he had to see his sonnes death punished. And at his comming thither, the Duke of Albany deliuered vnto hym certayne naughty persons, and suche indeede as for their haynous actes and vngratious conditions deserued well to die (though not for thys matter) whiche neuertheleſſe by vntrue suggestions and forged accusements, beeyng brought afore corrupt iudges, (and suche as the Duke of Albany had prouided for his purpose) were condemned as giltie of his deathe, whome in al theyr lyfe time they neuer sawe.

Though thys matter was handled as finely as was possible, and made so sounde and cleere as coulde bee deuised, yet was not the Kyng so satisfyed in hys mynde, but that hee hadde a greate suspicion in the Duke of Albany as authour of hys sonnes deathe: but for so muche as the Duke had all the Realme vnder hys obeysance, partly by policie, & partly by authoritie of his office, beeyng gouernour therof, ẏ King durſt not attempt any thing agaynſte hym, but rather doubted, leaſt hee hauing an ambitious desire to the Crowne, woulde compaſſe also to haue the lyfe of his seconde sonne named James as then Prince of Scotlande, and therefore by the faithfull helpe and good aduice of Walter Wardlawe the Bishop of Sainte Andrews, he prouided a Shippe, and sente the sayde Prince forth in the same to passe into Fraunce, deliuering hym also a letter written and directed vnto the King of England in his fauoure, if he chaunced to fall at vnwares by any fortune into the Englishmens handes.

Henry Lorde Synclare the seconde Earle of Orkney, was appoynted to haue the conuoye of hym, who hauing all his purueyance ready, toke the Shippe that was appoynted for them at the Bas, where it lay at ancre, and lewsing from thence, they sayled forwarde till they came to Flamburgh heade, where (as some saye,) they were taken on the Sea by Englishmen, the whiche hearing howe the Prince of Scotlande should passe that wayes, lay in awayte for hym.

Other write, that his desire was to be set on land there, because he might not away with the ayre of the sea, being brought farre out of quiet in hys head and stomacke therewith. But how soeuer it was, the troth is, taken he was in the .ix. yeere of his age the .xxx. day of March in the yere after the incarnation .1406. and was kept in captiuitie of the English men by the space of eighteene yeers.

James Prince of Scotland taken by the Englishmen. H. B. 1404

At his comming to the presence of King Henry, he deliuered vnto him the letters directed from hys father Kyng Robert, the tenor whereof here ensueth, as in Scottish they be written.

The tenor of a letter as it is written in the Scottish tong.

Robert King of Scottes to Henry Kyng of Englaund greeting. Thy greate magnificence, humilitie, and iuſtice, are ryghte patente to vs, by gouernaunce of thy laſt army in Scotlande, howbeit sic things had bene vncertayne to vs afore. For though thou seemed as enemie with moſt awfull incurſions in our Realme: zit wee faund mair humanities and plealyres than damage (be thy cūming) to our subdittes. Specially to yame that receyuit thy noble father ẏ Duke of Longcaſtell the time of his exill in Scotlande. We may not ceys yairfore, whyle wee are on life, bot aye lupf and loif thee as maiſt noble and worthy Prince, to ioys thy Realme. As to vs we will meis all occaſion of battell, quhare any occurres at thy pleaſure. Forther, because we haue na leſſe sollicitude in preſeruing our childzen fra certayne deidly enimies, than had sometime thy nobill fader, we are conſtreyned to seeke suppoze at vncowth Princes hands. Howbeit, the inuaſion of enimies is sa greate, that ſmall defence occurres agaynſte yame without they be preſerued by amitie of nobill men. For the warld is sa full of peruerſit maſice, that na crueltie nor offence may be deuiſit in erd, bot the famine may be wrocht be motion of gold and syluer. Heirfore, because we knawe thy hieneſſe full of mony nobill vertues, with ſic pyſſaunce and riches, that na Prince in our daies may bee compard thairto. We desire thy humanitie and suppoze at this time.

We traiſt it is not vnknowen to thy Maieſtie, howe oure eldeſt sonne Dauid is slayne miſerably in Priſon be oure Brothir the Duke of Albany, quhome wee cheſit to be gouernoure (quhan wee were fallen in decrepit age) to oure subdittes and Realme, beſeekand thy hienes thairfore to be sa fauorable, ẏ this bearer James Zit we requeſt ane thyng quhilk was ratifijt in our laſt trewes and condition of peace, that ỳ ſupplication made be ony of the two Kings of Ingland and Scotland ſall ſtaund in manner of ſauiconduct to the bearer. And thus we deſire to be obſeruat to this our allanerly ſonne, And the gratious God conſerue thee maiſt noble Pꝛince.

After that King Henry had cauſed theſe letters to be opened and redde, hee aduiſed himſelfe thereon with great deliberation, but in the end, he determined to ſtay this James Pꝛince of Scotland as his lawfull pꝛiſoner, foꝛ that he was thus taken in time of warres, and that mozeouer, there were diuers Rebelles of Englande ſuccoured within the boundes of his fathers dominion, to the high diſpleaſure of the ſayde Kyng Henry.

But ſuch was the fauour ſhewed in his bꝛinging vp, that his captiuitie turned moze to hys honoꝛ, pꝛofite, and commoditie, than any other woꝛdly hap that might by any meanes haue otherwiſe chaunced vnto him.

He had ſuch perfect inſtructoꝛs to teach hym, aſwell the vnderſtanding of tongs as the ſciences, that he became right experte and cunning in euery of them.

He was taughte alſo to ride, to runne at the tilt, and to handle all kind of weapons conuenient to be vſed of ſuch a perſonage, wherevnto hee was ſo apt and ready, that fewe in any poynte of actiuitie might ouermatch him.

He had good knowledge in muſike, and coulde play on ſundzy inſtruments right perfectly.

To be bꝛiefe, it appeered in all his behauioure and manners, in what company ſo euer he came, that his bꝛinging vp had bin accoꝛding to hys nature, neyther of them differing from his birth, and the qualitie of a noble and moſt vertuous pꝛince.

After it was ſignifyed vnto his father Kyng Roberte, that his ſon was thus arreſted in England, he made full great and dolozous mone, foꝛ lamenting that euer he matched himſelfe in mariage w... a woman of ſo meane degree (to the diſpeꝛagement of his bloud) as was Queene Annabell, on whome he begate his ſonnes, whiche (as he toke it) was the onely cauſe why aſwell foꝛayne Pꝛinces as his owne ſubiectes had hym thus in contempt.

He toke this matter ſo ſoꝛe to hart, that within thꝛee dayes after the newes came vnto hym, he departed this woꝛld thꝛough foꝛce of ſickneſſe, now encreaſed by melancoly, whiche had vexed hym a long time befoꝛe.

He dyed in the ſixteenth yeere of his raigne cõplete, and from the incarnation. 1408.

His body was buryed at Paſley, with hys wife Queene Annabell befoꝛe reherſed.

He was a man of a mighty ſtature, very liberall and gentle, ſo that if he had not bin maymed with an Hoꝛſe, and thereby grewe lame, that hee might not trauell about the affayꝛes of ỳ Realm himſelfe, it was thoughte the common wealthe ſhould haue pꝛoſpered vnder his gouernemente, as much as euer it did vnder any of his pꝛedeceſſoꝛs.

The gouernour Robert Duke of Albany, after the deceſſe of his bꝛother King Roberte, was by new election choſen, oꝛ rather confirmed in his office of gouernoure, which he exerciſed moze vpꝛightly, and with better iuſtice now after his bꝛothers death, than befoꝛe.

In the meane time, the Caſtell of Jedwoꝛth (whiche the Engliſhmen had helde euer ſith the battell of Durham) was taken by Tyndale men, and raſed downe to the earth.

Archembald Earle of Dowglas, as yet remayning captiue in Englãd, after he had knowledge of King Roberts death, made ſhift to agree foꝛ his raunſome, and ſo being ſet at libertie, returned with all ſpeede nowe at lengthe into Scotlande.

Shoꝛtly after, there was a councell called, wherein was a motion made foꝛ the reſtoꝛing of George Earle of Marche to his countrey, lands, and bloud.

After long debating of the matter, and harde bold tw and fro both with him and againſt him, it was in the end cõcluded, that he ſhould returne into Scotland, and be receyued as a true Scotiſhman, but vnder this condition, that he ſhould foꝛgoe his lands of Annerdale, and Lochmaben, which ſhould foꝛ euer remayne to the Dowglas, and to his heires.

All his other landes and poſſeſſions, it was accoꝛded, that he ſhoulde enioy as in his foꝛmer righte and eſtate. And thus was the Earle of Marche pardoned of all paſſed offences committed againſte the Crowne of Scotlande, and and receyued home, to the greate comfort of hys friendes.

Abont the ſame time, there roſe greate trouble in Scotlande, by the Rebellion of Donald of the Iles, who clayming by ryght of his wife, a title to the Earledome of Ros, was defeated of the ſame, by practiſe of the gouernoure, hauyng by ſubtill conueyance, aſſured the ſayde Earledome vnto his ſecond ſonne the Earle of Buchquhane that hight Iohn.

The foreſayde Donald, by way of ſupplication, beſoughte the gouernoure to doe hym reaſon, but he receyued nought, except it were frowarde ſpeeche, wherewith hee toke ſuche diſpleaſure, that raiſing all the power of the Iles, he came into Roſſe, and ſubdued the ſame at his pleaſure, but not ſatisfyed with this, hee paſſed thorough Murray, Bogheual, and other boundes thereaboutes, till hee came into Garioch, purpoſing to brenne Abyrdene. Donald ſubdewed Ros.

But Alexander Stewarde Earle of Mar, hauing gathered a power with all diligence to reſiſt this Donalde, mette with him at a Village called Harlow, and incontinently not ſtaying for more ayde that was commyng towardes hym, ſet on the enimies more raſhly than orderly, and more fiercely than diſcretely, not paſſing for keeping any accuſtomed aray of battell as The Earle of Mar. There was ſlayne on Donaldes parte nine hundred menne, with Makclane and Makyntyos.

On the Earle of Mars ſyde, there dyed Alexander Ogiluy Sherife of Angus, with ſeuen Knightes of name, and dyuers other gentlemen, with Commons, to the number of fyue hundred.

This battell was ſtryken on Saint Iames euen, in the yeere. 1411.

Donald of the Iles, after this bickering wholy graunted the victory to his enimies in fleeyng all the night long after the battell towards Ros, and from thence with like ſpeede hee paſſed ouer into the Iles.

In the yeere nexte following, the gouernoure prepared to make a iourney into the Iles, to chaſtiſe the foreſaid Donald, but he thorough feare of further domage, ſubmitted him ſelfe, and was ſworne neuer to procure any trouble to ẏ Realm in tyme to come. Donald of the Iles ſubmitteth himſelfe.

Not long after the battell of Harlow, Patrike Dunbar, ſeconde ſonne to the Earle of Marche, with one hundred of hardy perſons, came early one morning ſomewhat before the breake of day to Faſt Caſtell, and wanne the ſame, takyng the Captayne priſoner, whoſe name was Thomas Holdon. Faſt Caſtell wonne.

At the ſame time, was ẏ bridge of Roxburgh broken downe, and the towne brent by William Dowglas of Drumlanerike, Gawayn Dunbar, another of the Earle of Marches ſonnes, and diuers other. The bridge of Roxburgh broken down.

Amongst sundry other expert men in all sciences which he brought into Scotlande, there were eighteene Doctors of Diuinitie; and eight Doctors of the law Canon.

The Earle of Stratherne slayne.

Muchwhat about ỳ same time, John Drummound slewe Patricke Graham Earle of Stratherne, by a trayterous meane, and thereupon fled into Ireland: but as he was about to haue passed from thence ouer into England, the vessel wherein he sayled, was driuen on the coast of Scotlād, where hee was taken, and shortly after lost hys head for the sayd offence.

Warres betwixt England and Fraunce.

Shortly after also, there rose great warres betwixt Englād and France, as in the Histories of those Realmes may more playnely appeare.

Rebellion in Wales.

There was also a greate Rebellion reysed in Wales against Henry the fifth King of England, whiche was the sonne of Henry the fourth lately deceassed.

We finde in the Scottishe Chronicles, that this Henry the fifth at hys returning forthe of Fraunce, after his first iourney thither, hauyng in the same wonne the Towne of Harflete, & discomfited the whole power of Fraunce at Agincourt) was constreyned to goe against ỳ Welchmen, and encountring with the Prince of Wales, was discomfyted, and lost tenne thousand of hys men, but after this, hee reenforced his power, and came agayne into Wales, not ceassing, til he had brought the Welchmen subiect at his pleasure, but the English writers make no mention of any suche matter.

Henry the fifth discomfited by the Welchmen. He subdueth them.

The Castell of Werke wonne.

Whilest things passed thus in Englande, William Halyburtoun wanne the Castell of Warke, and slew all such as he found within it, howbeit, small while endured the ioy of thys fortunate successe to the Scottes: for sundry Englishmen that knewe all the secretes of the house, found meanes to enter through a gutter, that serued in manner of a Sinke, to auoyde al the filthe of the Kitchin into the Riuer of Tweede, breaking downe a pane of an olde wall, and so made entrie for the residue of their fellowes, by reason whereof, they easily recouered the Castell, and in reuenge of them that were slayne there when the Scottes wanne it, they likewise slew al those whiche were as then within it, without any respect of one or other.

It is againe recouered.

After this, in the yeere. 1419. the thirde daye of September, Robert Duke of Albany, that hadde bin gouernour of Scotlande for the space of. xv. yeeres, after the death of King Robert the thirde, departed out of this life, hauing borne hymselfe in all his time, as a right valiaunte and noble Prince.

An army of Scottes sent into Fraunce.

Whereupon shortly after by decree of councell it was ordeyned, that Iohn Steward Earle of Buchquhane, second sonne to Duke Robert, and Archimbald Dowglas Earle of Wigton, should passe into Fraunce with. vij. thousande armed men.

The King of Englande to preuent the Scottes, sent his Ambassadors into Scotland, to forbid all his subiectes to trade into Scotland, and to warne the Scottes to keepe their owne at home, menaced to inuade Scotland with a puissant army, and that in all hast. Whiche rumor beeyng spred ouer all the boundes of his Realme, caused the Scottes for doubt thereof, to lie all the nexte sommer on the bordures: but in the meane tyme, King Henry passed ouer into Normandy, to pursue his Warres agaynste Fraunce with all diligence.

At length, through procurement of the Duke of Burgoine, vnder certayne conditions and couenauntes of agreemente, King Henry toke to Wife the Lady Katherine daughter to the French King.

And amongst other Articles of the same agreement it was concluded, that after the deceasse of Charles the Frenche King, the Crowne of Fraunce should immediately descend vnto King Henry, as lawfull inheritour to that Realme, without all contradiction, by reason whereof, Charles the Dolphine and sonne to the sayde King Charles, was cleerely excluded from all clayme to the same: but this notwithstandyng, the Dolphine did not only refuse to surrender hys title, but also sought to maintayne the warre against King Henry, as his aduersarie and open enimie to the Realme.

In the meane while also, the Earles of Buchquhan and Wigton with Alexander Lindsay brother to the Earle of Crawford, and Thomas Swyntoun Knightes, accompanyed with seuen thousand well armed men, arriued in Fraunce, to the greate reioycing of the Dolphine, as hee well declared in the thankfull receyuing and most hartie welcomming of them. Finally, the towne & Castell of Chatelone in Touraine was deliuered to them, that they might haue a place at all times to resorte vnto, at their owne will and pleasure.

Shortly after, they were employed in seruice at the battell of Bauge, fought on Easter euen, where ỳ Duke of Clarence brother to the King of Englād, the Earle of Riddisdale, otherwise called the Earle of Angus, the Lord Rosse, ỳ Lorde Gray, & diuers other great Barons were slayne, beside other of the meaner sort, in all to the number ber of ſixteene hundred.

There wer alſo a great company of priſoners taken at the ſame iourney, amongſt whome as principall were theſe, the Earle of Huntington, and the Earle of Sommerſet, with his brother, both of them being breethren to the Lady Jane that was after married to King James the firſt, King of Scotlande. For the high valiauncie of the Scottiſhmen ſhewed in this battel, the Dolphin created the Earle of Buchquhan high Conneſtable of Fraunce, & gaue him ſundry townes, Caſtels, and Lands, therwith the better to maintayne his eſtate.

The King of Englande ſore moued for the death of his brother, came ouer with all ſpeede into France with a mighty hoſt, and had with him James the Scottiſhe King, or rather Prince of Scotland, for all this while the Scottes reputed him not as King, for ẏ he was not as yet crowned, nor ſet at libertie out of the Engliſhmens hands, into the which as before ye haue heard, he chaunced to fall by his fathers life time.

The cauſe why King Henry did take thys James ouer with him at ẏ preſent into Fraunce was, for that he hoped by his meanes to procure all the Scottiſhmen that were in ſeruice with the Dolphin to forſake him, and to returne home into their owne countrey: but when he had broken thys matter vnto the ſaide James, and promiſed, that if he could bring it to paſſe, he woulde not only remitte his raunſome, but alſo ſend hym into Scotlande highly rewarded with greate riches. James aunſwered herevnto, that hee marueiled much, why he did not conſider how he had no auctoritie ouer the Scottes ſo long as he was holden in captiuitie, and as yet had not receyued the Crowne, but (ſayeth he) if it were ſo that I might be ſet at libertie & had receyued ẏ Crowne according to the accuſtomed manner, togyther with the othes and homages of my ſubiectes, I could thē in thys matter do, as ſhould be thought to ſtande with reaſon, but in the meane time I ſhall deſire your grace, to holde mee excuſed, and not to will mee to doe that whiche I may in no wiſe performe.

King Henry marueiling at the high wiſedome which appeared to be planted in the head of that yong Prince, left off to trauell with hym any further in this matter.

In the meane time the warres continuing betwirte the King of Englande and the Dolphin of Fraunce, many townes were beſieged, wonne, and ſacked, and ſundry light bickerings and ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixte the parties as occaſion ſerued.

But the Engliſhmen ſhewed themſelues to beare ſuche hatred towarde the Scottes, that ſo many as fell into their handes neuer needed to ſtrayne their friendes for their raunſomes, which crueltie they put not in practiſe againſt their enimies being of any other nation.

The death of Henry King of Englande.

At length, King Henry fell into a greeuous diſeaſe, whiche in ſhorte time made an ende of hys lyfe, notwithſtandyng all the helpe that eyther by Phiſicke or otherwayes, myght be miniſtred vnto him.

1422

The ſame yeere, that is to witte, 1422. the French King Charles the ſyxt of that name deceaſſed, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Charles the ſeuenth, before named the Dolphin, as the cuſtome there is.

The death of Charles the French King.

By the death of theſe Kings, the warres were not altogither ſo earneſtly followed as before, wherevppon the Earles of Buchquhane and Wigtoun returned into Scotlande, and ſhortly after was an army leuyed, and ſiege layde, both to Roxburgh and to Barwike, but for that they lay long abroade and did no good, returnyng home withoute gayne, this iourney in derriſion was called the durty rode, or as the Scots terme it, the dirtin rayde.

Roxburgh and Barwike beſeeged.

The Dyrtin rayde.

But now to ſpeake ſomewhat, concerning the order of the common wealth in Scotlande, yee ſhall vnderſtande, that after the deathe of Roberte Duke of Albany, his ſonne Mordo Steward Earle of Fife and Menteith, was made gouernoure, continuing in that office for the ſpace of foure yeeres, though (to confeſſe the trouth) hee was farre vnmeete thereto, differyng muche from the wiſedome and manhode of hys Father, for in him remayned ſundry vices, greatly variable and contrary one to another.

Mordo Steward Earle of of Fyfe elected gouernour of Scotlande.

The repugnaunt vices reigning in Mordo Steward.

In time of any aduerſitie hee ſhewed hymſelfe as a man deſpayring of all comforte or helpe: In proſperitie ſo lifte vp in careleſſe inſolencie, that he hadde no ſtay of himſelfe, by reaſon whereof, ſometymes he ſuffered haynous offenders through dread of theyr puiſſant friendes (a thyng not to bee ſuffered in Scotlande) to eſcape vnpuniſhed, and at other tymes agayne, hee ſhewed hymſelfe more ſeuere and cruell in executyng of iuſtice than the matter required.

Thus was hee ſtill in extremities, keepyng no temperaunce nor laudable meane in any of hys doings. Heereto was hee ſo negligente in chaſtiſing hys ſonnes Walter and Alexander, (whether through ſoftneſſe and lacke of witte, or by reaſon he bare ſuche a fonde and tender fatherly loue towardes them) that they hauyng hym in ſmall regarde, played many outragious partes, to the ſore offendyng of a number. At length, one of them taking diſpleaſure with hys Father, for that hee woulde not gyue hym a Faulcone, the whyche hee hadde long before greatly deſyred, ſtepped to hym, and plucking hir beside his fist, wrung hir necke from hir body euen presently before his face. Whereupon the father somewhat kindled with this presumptuous deede of the son: Walter (said hee) for so was his name that had thus misused him, sith it is so that thou and thy brother will not be ruled by my soft and gentle gouernemente, I shall bring him home ere ought long, that shall chastise both you and me after another manner. And after this, he rested not to trauell still for the redeeming of James the first out of captiuitie, till at length hee brought hym home indeede, to the greate wealthe, ioy, and good happe of all the Scottishe nation.

The words of Duke Murdo to his sonne.

Duke Murdo trauelleth for the redeeming of Iames the first.

In the meane time, ỳ French King Charles the seuenth, beeing sore vexed with warres by the Englishmen, sente to the Earle of Buchquhan his connestable, requiring him to returne againe with all speede into Fraunce, and to bring so many Scottishmen with him, as hee conueniently myghte.

This Earle therefore, founde meanes to perswade Archimbald Earle of Dowglas father to the foresaide Earle of Wigtoun to passe with him into Fraunce, whiche two Earles with an army of fiue thousand mẽ (or after some writers tenne thousand) tooke the Seas, and arriued with prosperous winde and weather at Rochell, and comming to the Frenche King, were receyued of him with all ioy and gladnesse.

The Earle of Buchquhan returneth into Fraunce.

The Earle of Dowglas was made incontinently Duke of Tourayne, thereby to aduance him in further honor.

The Earle of Dowglas made Duke of Tourayne.

But shortly after, at the battell of Vernoill, both the Earle of Buchquhan, the connestable of Fraunce, and this Duke of Touraine, with his sonne the Earle of Wigtoun, and the most parte of all their retinewes were slayne by the Englishe puissance, as in the French and Englishe histories more plainely may appeare.

The slaughter of Scottes, at the battell of Vernoill.

The Scottish Chronicles declare, that ỳ losse of this fielde, chaunced specially through enuy & discorde, which reigned amongst ỳ chieftaines.

Enuy and discorde.

For the Duke of Alanson enuying that the Scots shuld dayly rise in honor within Fraunce, kept himselfe backe, till time the Scottes were ouerthrowen and brought to vtter destruction.

Againe, euen vpon the ioyning, ther rose great strife and contention betwixt the Connestable & the Duke of Tourayne, who shoulde haue the supreme rule of the Scottishe legher, the one disdayning to giue place to the other.

Thus yee may perceyue, how the Scots with losse of many of their liues, and much bloudshed, supported the syde of Charles King of Fraunce, agaynste the Englishmen. And though there came dayly newes of dyuers great ouerthrowes giuen by ỳ Englishmen vnto such Scottishmen and other as serued the sayde King Charles, yet did not the Scottes therefore stay at home, but at sundry times, and vnder sundry Captaynes repayred into Fraunce: as amongst other one Robert Patillock of Dundee, with a newe power of Scottes, went ouer to King Charles the seuenth aforesayde, shewing suche proofe of his singular manhode and valiancie in those warres, as in recouerie of the Realme of France out of ỳ Englishmens hands, his seruice stode King Charles in notable steede.

Robert Patillock Captaine of a power of Scottishmen sente into Fraunce.

Chiefely, his diligence and prowes well appeared in reducing the parties of Gascoigne vnto the Frenche subiection, whiche hadde remayned a great number of yeeres vnder the dominion of the Englishe Kings.

And herevpon was he called by the inhabitãts euer after, Le petit roy de Gascoigne.

Robert Patillock cleped Le Petit roy de Gascoigne.

But now to returne to the businesse of Scotland as the same passed in this meane time, here is to be noted, that after the slaughter of Archimbald earle of Dowglas and Duke of Towrain, his sonne Archimbald the third of that name, succeeded in the Earledome of Dowglas.

Archimbalde the third, Erle of Dowglas.

This Earle of Dowglas, and William Hay Connestable of Scotlãd, with Henry Bishop of Abirden, were sente Imbassadours into England, to make sute for some agreement to be had, concerning the redemption of King James.

Scottishe Imbassadours sent into Englande.

These Imbassadours behaued themselues so sagely in this matter whiche they had in charge, that in the end, they brought it to good conclusiõ: As thus, Firste it was agreed, that King James shoulde be set at libertie, and to pay for his raunsome, ỳ summe of one hundreth thousand marks sterling, the one halfe to be payd in hand, and for the other halfe, to leaue sufficient pledges behinde him, till it were payde.

The raunsome of King Iames

Albeit some writers alledge, that leauing pledges for the payment of the one halfe, he was discharged of the other, in consideration that hee toke to wife the Lady Jane, daughter to ỳ Earle of Sommerset.

Iane daughter to the Earle of Sommerset married to King Iames the fiftie.

The saide Earle, and the Cardinall of Englande hys brother, conueyed hym with hys Queene their neece, vnto the borders of both the Realmes.

And at their taking leaue eache of other, there was presented vnto King James and to the Queene hys wife, besides a Cupborde of massie plate, sundry faire clothes of rich and costly arras by his wiues friendes, with many other iewelles and things of great price and valure.

Giftes giuen to king Iames by his wiues friendes.

King James then departed on this wise from his wiues brethren, and other suche his deere friends as his vertue and princely behauiour had procured him during his abode here in England, entred into Scotlande, and came to Edynburgh on Care ſunday, otherwiſe called Paſſiõ ſunday in Lent, where he was receyued with all honour, ioy, and triumph that might be deuiſed.

AND after ý, aſſoone as the ſolemnitie of ý feaſt of Eaſter was fynished, hee came to Perth, and ſhortly after to Scone, where he was crowned king, and his wife Queene, by Duke Murdo the gouernor, and Henrie Biſhop of S. Andrewes, the xxj. day of May, after the incarnation. 1424.

There came forth of Englande with thys James the fyrſt, diuerſe Engliſhe Gentlemen, which remayning euer after in ſeruice with him, were aduaunced to certaine landes, poſſeſſions, and liuings in Scotlande. Amongſt whome (as one of the chiefeſt) was Andrew Gray, who afterwardes by the Kings ayde and good furtherance, got in maryage the daughter and heyre of Henrie Mortimer of Foulis, named Helen, and by that meanes came the Lordſhip of Foulis vnto the handes of the Grayes, whoſe ſurname and poſteritie continueth yet in Scotlande, inueſted with great landes and dignities, both in Gowry and Angus.

King Iames keepeth an audite.

King Iames after his coronation returned from Scone to Edenburgh, where he called afore him all thoſe that bare any authoritie in the adminiſtration of the common wealth during the time of the gouernours Duke Robert, and Duke Murdo, namely the Chancellour, the Treaſurer, the Clearkes of the Regiſter, the Comptroller, the Auditors, and Receyuers, with all other that had borne offices, or had any thing to do concerning the kings rents.

At length, when hee perceyued by theyr accompts made, that the moſt part of all the lands, rents, and reuenues perteyning to the Crowne, were waſted, beſtowed, alienes, and tranſported by the two foreſayd gouernors, vnto their friends and fautours, contrary to all right or good conſideration (the cuſtomes of Burrowes and good townes onely excepted) hee was not well content herewith, though for the tyme he paſſed ouer his diſpleaſure, in ſhewing outwardly no ſemblaunce, but as if hee had lyked all things well.

A Parliament at Edenburgh.

In the meane tyme, he aduiſedly peruſed all euidences, rolles, and Charters perteyning to the Crowne, and ſhortly thereupon called a Parliament a Edenbourgh, in the which, by aduice of the three eſtates, a generall taxe was ordeyned and graunted, to be rayſed through the Realme: as xij. pence of the pounde to be payed of al lands within Scotlande, both ſpirituall and temporall, and foure pence for euery Cowe, Oxe, and horſe, to be payde for the ſpace of two yeares togither.

This payment was leuyed the fyrſt yeare without any trouble, but the ſeconde yeare there roſe ſuch murmure and grudging amongeſt the poore commons about the payment thereof, that hee remitted the reſidue that was behinde, and toke neuer any talke after of hys ſubiectes, tyll hee maryed his daughter with the Dolphyn of Fraunce.

Bylles of complaynt exhibited againſt the ſonnes of duke Mordo.

Amongeſt other bylles put vp in this laſt mencioned Parliament, there were diuerſe complaynts exhibited by the people, for ſundrie oppreſſions vſed and done by the ſonnes of Duke Murdo, and other great Peeres of the Realme, before the kings returne into Scotlande.

Walter Stewarde put in priſon.

Whereupon Walter Stewarde one of the ſonnes of the ſayde Duke Murdo, was arreſted, and sent to a Castell situated vpon a rocke within the sea called the Bas, there to remaine in safe keeping.

Also Malcolme Flemming of Cumernalde, and Thomas Boyd of Kylmarnoke, were committed to warde in Dalkeith, but these two at the intercession of diuerse noble men were pardoned of all offences for an easie fine, with condition, that they shoulde satisfie all such persons as they had in any wise wronged.

The othe of king Iames.

In the foresayd Parliament also, king James toke a solemne othe, to defende as well the liberties of his Realme, as of the Church, during the course of his naturall life.

The like othe by his ensample did all the residue of the Barons take at the same present time.

A Parliament holden at Perth.

Not long after, an other Parliament was called & holden at Perth, in the which Duke Murdo with his sonne Alexander, were arested and committed to ward. So was also Archymbalde Earle of Dowglas, with his brother William Earle of Angus, George Earle of Marche, Adam Hepborne of Hales, and many other great Barons of Scotland, euery of them being put in sundrie Castels and strengthes to remaine there vnder safe keeping.

Duke Murdo and his sonnes arested.

Duke Murdo was sent to Carlaurok, and his Duches was put in Temptalloun.

1425

In the yeare following, on the holy Rode day called the Inuention of the Crosse, James Steward the third sonne of Duke Murdo moued with great yre, for that his father & brethren were holden in prison, came with a great power to the towne of Dounbrytaine, and brunt it after he had slaine John Steward of Doundonalde and .xxxij. other persones which were found in the same towne, but the king kindled in greate displeasure for this attempt, pursued this James so fiercely, that he was faine to flee into Irelande, where he afterwardes deceassed.

The towne of Dunbrytaine burnt.

1426

In the yeare next ensuing, king James called a Parliament at Sterling, in the which he himselfe sitting with scepter, sworde, and crowne in place of iudgement, Walter Steward with his brother Alexander were condemned, and incontinently were led forth to a place before the Castell, and there beheaded.

Walter and Alexander the sonnes of duke Murdo beheaded.

On the Morrow after, Duke Murdo himselfe, and Duncane Steward Earle of Lennox were conuicted of highe treason, and beheaded afore the Castell in semblable maner.

Duke Murdo and Duncane Steward Erle of Lennox beheaded.

Thus by the attainder of Duke Murdo and his sonnes, the Erledomes of Fife, Menteith, and Lennox came into the kings handes.

The residue of the Lordes and Barons remayning as then in prison, and abyding the kings pleasure, were sore afrayd when they heard what rygorous iustice had beene executed on Duke Murdo and his sonnes: notwithstanding within a twelue monthe after they were all set at libertie, and receyued into the kings fauour, on promise of their loyall demeanour and duetifull obedience euer after to be shewed during their naturall lyues.

In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation. 1427. Alexander Lorde of the Iles, was arested by the king at Inuernes, for that he was accused to be a succorer & mainteyner of theeues and robbers in the countrey: but forasmuch as he promised in tyme comming to reforme his former misdemeanors, he was pardoned and set at libertie, whereof ensued greate trouble immediatly after.

1427 Alexander Lorde of the Iles arested.

He is set at libertie.

He rebelleth.

For shortly vpon his deliuerance, he gathered a power of wicked reapethriftes, and with the same comming vnto Inuernes, burnt the towne, and besieged the Castell, enforcing with all diligence to wynne the same, tyll he was aduertised, that the king was comming towardes him with a great power, whereupon he fledde incontinently to the Iles, and finally hauing knowledge that a great number of people lay dayly in awayte to take him, that they myght presente him to the kings handes, he came disguysed in poore aray to the holy Rood house, and there fynding the king on Easter dare deuoutly in the Churche at hys prayers, he fell downe on hys knees before hym, and beseought hym of grace for hys sake that rose as that day from death vnto lyfe.

The towne of Inuernes burnt.

Alexander of the Iles commeth to the king and asketh pardon.

At request of the Queene, the King pardoned him of lyfe, but he appoynted William Dowglas Erle of Angus to haue the custodie of him, and that within the castel of Temptalloun, that no trouble should rise by his meanes thereafter.

His mother Eufame, daughter to Walter sometime Earle of Ros, was also committed to warde in Saint Colmes Inche, bycause it was knowne that she solicited hir sonne to rebell in maner as is aforesayd against the king.

Not long after, Donald Ballocht, brother to the sayd Lord Alexander of the Iles, came with a great power of men into Lochquhaber.

Donalde Ballocht inuadeth Lochquhaber.

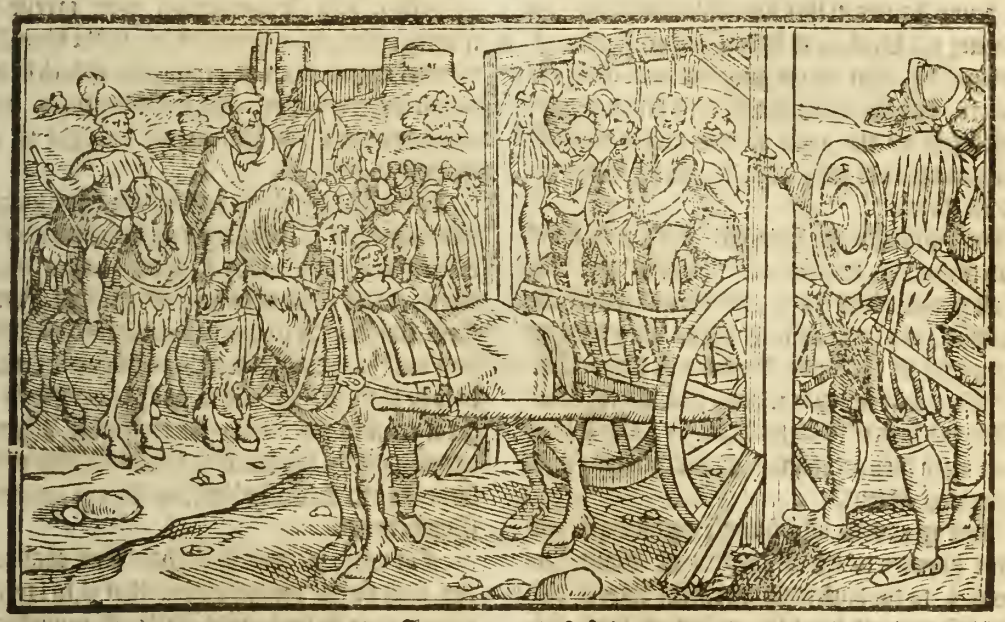
The Erles of Mar and Cathnes, came with such number of their people as they could rayse to defend the countrey against the inuasion of those Islandmen, and fought with the said Donald at Inuerlochtie, where the Erle of Cathnes was slain, and the Erle of Mar discomfited.

The Earle of Cathnes slaine.

Herewith did Donald returne with victorie & a great pray of goodes and riches into the Iles.

Donalde Ballocht returneth with victorie & spoile into the Iles.

The king sore moued with the newes hereof, came with a great armie vnto Dunstafage, purposing with all speede to passe into the Iles.



The Clannes and other chiefe men of the said Iles aduertised hereof, came to Dunstafage, and submitted ſubmitted themſelues vnto the King, excuſing their offence, for that (as they alledged) the ſayde Donald had conſtreyned thē againſt their willes to paſſe with him in the laſt iourney.

All thoſe Clannes vpon this their excuſe, were admitted to the kings fauour, and ſworne to purſue the ſayd Donald vnto death.

Shortly herevpon, this Donald fled into Irelande, where he was ſlaine, and his head ſent by one Odo a great Lorde of Irelande (in whoſe countrey he lurked) as a preſent to the king that lay as then at Sterling. Donald fleeth into Ireland. His heade is ſent as a preſent to the king.

There were alſo three hundred of his adherents taken, and by the kings cōmaundement hanged for theyr offences within three weekes ſpace, after his fyrſt fleeing into Irelande. Three hundred of Donalds complices hanged.

This trouble being thus quieted, king James paſſed through all the bounds of his Realme to puniſh all offenders and miſruled perſons, which in any wiſe wronged and oppreſſed the poore people.

He allowed no pardon graunted afore by the gouernour, alledging the ſame to be expyred by his death. For he thought indeede it ſtode neyther with the pleaſure of God, nor wealth of the Realme, that ſo many ſlaughters, reiffes, and oppreſſions, as had beene done afore in the countrey, ſhoulde remayne vnpuniſhed through fault of iuſtice.

It is ſayde, that within the fyrſt two yeares of his raigne, there were three thouſande perſons executed by death, for ſundrie olde crymes and offences.

And though ſuch extreeme iuſtice might haue bene thought ſufficient to giue enſample to other to reforme their naughtie vſages, yet one Angus Duke of Strathern nothing afrayd therof, came with a company of theeues and robbers, and toke a great pray of goodes out of the countreys of Murray and Cathnes: for recouerie whereof, one Angus Murrey followed with a great power, and ouertaking the ſayde Angus Duke neare to Strachnauern, fiercely aſſayled him. Who with like manhode made ſtoute reſiſtance, by reaſon whereof, there enſued ſuche a cruell fight betwixt the parties, that there remayned in the ende but onely. xij. perſons aliue, and thoſe ſo wounded, that they were vneth able to returne home to theyr houſes, and lyued but a few dayes after.

About the ſame tyme, there was alſo another notable theefe named Makdonalde Ros, whiche grew with ſpoyles and robberies to great riches. Makdonalde Ros, a notable robber.

This wicked oppreſſor ſhod a poore widowe with horſe ſhone, becauſe ſhe ſayd ſhe would go to the king, and reueale his wicked doings. He ſhodde a wydow.

As ſoone as ſhe was whole and recouered of hir woundes, ſhe went vnto the king, and declared the cruelties done vnto hir by that vngracious perſon Makdonalde.

The king made ſuch diligent ſearche to haue him, that in the ende hee was taken with. xij. of his complices, and put to moſt ſhamefull death, as they had well deſerued. He was taken and executed.

In the thirde yeare after, which was from the incarnation. 1430. on the .xj. day of October, Jane the Queene of Scottes was delyuered of two ſonnes at one byrth, Alexander and James. 1430 The Queene deliuered of two ſonnes at one byrth.

The firſt deceaſſed in his infancie. The other ſucceeded after his fathers deceaſſe in the kingdome, and was named James the ſeconde.

At the baptiſme of theſe two infantes there were fiftie knightes made. Fiftie knights dubbed.

Amongſt the which, and firſt of all other was William the ſonne of Archembalde Earle of Dowglas, that ſucceeded his father in the Earledome of Dowglas.

His father the ſayde Archymbalde Dowglas ſomewhat somewhat before this time, or as other Authors haue, in the yeare nexte ensuing, was arested by the Kings commaundement, and put in warde, remayning so a long time, till at length by supplication of the Queene and other Peeres of the Realme, the king pardoned him of all offences, and set both him and also Alexander Erle of Ros at libertie.

Archymbaldie Earle of Dowglas, arrested and put in prison.

King James in this sort did what in him lay to bring the Realme of Scotlande in such quiet tranquilitie, that (in purging the same of all offenders, and suche as lined by reife and robbing) passengers by the highe wayes might trauaile without dread of anye euill disposed persons to molest them.

King Iames desirous to purge his realme of vnruly persons.

He caused also the Baylyes and Prouosts of good townes to see that iust measures were vsed by all maner of buyers and sellers, and none to be occupied, but suche as were signed with the note and marke of the sayde Baylikes or Prouostes.

An ordinance for measures.

Moreouer he repayred and fortified the Castelles and fortresses of his Realme, and stuffed them with such ordinance and munition as was thought expedient.

Castels repayred and munited.

Hee graunted also sundrie priuiledges and great liberties to the vniuersitie of Saint Androwes, to the high aduauncement thereof, and was oftentymes himselfe present at theyr disputations, taking great pleasure therein.

Priuiledges graunted to the vniuersitie of S. Androwes

Suche as were knowne to bee learned men, and were presented to him by the Vniuersitie, he preferred to great benefices and other ecclesiastical lyuings, still as the same chaunced to bee vacant.

By suche meanes, all maner of vertue and good learning encreased dayly through the realme during his time, and namely Musicke was had in great price, which he appoynted to bee vsed in Churches with Organes, the which before hys time were not muche knowne amongest the Scottish men.

Organes brought into Scotlande.

Much what about the same time, there was a Parliament holden at Perth, in the which Henrie Wardlaw Bishop of Saint Androwes, in name of al the three estates there assembled, made a long and right pithie Oration to this effect, that where by the highe policie and prudent diligence of the kings Maiestie there present, iustice, and all maner of due administratiō of lawes and good ordinances were so reuiued, that nothing seemed to be ouerpassed that might aduaunce to the profite and cōmoditie of the common wealth, yet was there one wicked vsage crept in of late, increasing so fast, that if spredie remedie were not had in time, all those commodities brought into the Realme by his comming, shoulde be of small auaile, and that was suche superfluous ryot in banketting cheare, and numbers of costly dishes, as were then taken vp and vsed after the English fashion, both to the great hinderaunce of mans health, and also to the vnprofitable wasting of their goodes and substance.

A Parliament at Perth.

Bishop Wardlaw inueyeth agaynst superfluous fare.

If the laudable temperancie vsed amongest the Scottishe men in olde time were well considered, nothing might appeare more contrary and repugnant thereto, than that new kinde of gluttonie then vsed, by receyuing more excesse of meates and drinkes than sufficith to the nourishment of nature, through prouocatiō of such daintie and delicate dishes, confectioned sawces, and deuised potions, as were nowe brought in amongst them.

As for such gentlemē as the king had brought with him forth of England, they were worthie indeed to be cherished and had in high fauour, neyther was this abuse to be so greatly imputed vnto them, considering it was appropriate to their nation: but the Scottishmen themselues were chiefly to be blamed, that had so quickly yelded to so great an inconuenience, the enormitie whereof appeared by the sundrie vyces that followed of the same, as excesse, sensual lust, slouth, reif, and wasting of goodes.

Vices following delicate fare.

For if temperancie be the nourisher of al vertue, then muste the contrarie, that is to say, intemperance, be the bringer forth and prouoker of all vice.

If it might therfore please the kings highnesse to shewe his accustomed wisedome and prouidence in repressing this abuse of costly fare, so much domageable to his people, he shoulde do the thing that was meritorious before God, and no lesse profitable & necessary for the publike weale of all his subiects.

By these and many other the like perswasions, Bishop Wardlaw vsed to dissuade the king and his people from all superfluous courses of delicate dishes and surfetting bankets. Insomuch that euen then there was order taken, that fewer dyshes and more spare dyet should be vsed through the Realme, licencing Gentlemen only, and that on festiuall dayes, to be serued with Pies, the vse of them not being knowne in Scotland till that season.

Order taken for suppresin of costly fare.

Vse of bake meates in Scotland when it began.

Neuertheless, such intemperancie is risen in processe of time following, that the greedie appetite of gluttons in this age may be satisfied with no competent feeding, till their bellies be so stuffed with immoderate gurmandice, that they may vneth fetch breath, through which their noysome surfetting, they fall dayly into sundrie straunge and lothsome kindes of diseases, being oftentimes killed by the same in their flourishing youth, as by dayly experience plainly appeareth.

The greedie appetite of gluttons not satisfied.

clocke at after nowne, the day being darkned ouer heade for the space of one halfe houre togither, as though it had beene night, and therevpon it was called the blacke houre.

At the next Lammas after, the king rayſed an armie, and came with the ſame to Rorburgh, beſieging the Caſtell for the ſpace of. xv. dayes togyther. Roxbourgh beſieged.

He had in this armie (as the repoꝛt went) the number of two hundꝛed thouſande men, accounting caꝛyage men and all other ſuch as followed the campe: yet notwithſtanding all this huge multitude, hauing waſted his powder and other munition befoꝛe he coulde doe any great hurt to his enimies, hee was conſtreyned to rayſe hys fielde, and leaue the Caſtell in the Engliſh mens handes as he found it.

After this, King James percеyuing how the knowledge of handicraftes and manuall occupations was decayed in Scotlande, thꝛough continuall exercиſe of warres, ſithe the dayes of Alexander the thirde, to the further aduauncement of the common wealth, and that his ſubiects might haue occaſion to auoyde ſlouth and ydleneſſe, the rote of all miſchiefe) he bꝛought a great number of cunning craftſmen out of Germanie, France, and other parties, to inſtruct his people in theyr artes and faculties.

Not long after, one Paule Craw a Bohemian boꝛne, was burnt at Saint Andꝛowes, foꝛ preaching and ſetting foꝛth the doctrine of John Hus, and John Wikclife.

John Fogo beeing one of them that helped chiefely to condemne him, was made foꝛ his great and earneſt diligence therein ſhewed, Abbot of Melros.

About the ſame time was the Abbay of Chartrare Monkes founded beſydes Perth, by king James, with great coſt and magnificence.

Alſo the Lord Scrope and other aſſociat with him, came in Ambaſſade from Henrie the ſixte, king of England.

The effect of whoſe meſſage was, to haue the auncient league betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen diſſolued, pꝛomiſing that if the Counceil of Scotland would conſent thereto, and ioyne in league with the Engliſhe men, that both the towne and Caſtell of Berwike with all the lands lying betwixt Tweed and the Recroſſe (as the Scots wyll) ſhoulde be deliuered into the Scottiſh mens handes. The offer of the Engliſhmē to haue the Scots to ioyne with them in league.

King James hauing ſmall credite in ſuche fayre pꝛomiſes, percеyued the ſame to tende only to this ende, that the league betwixt the Frenche men and Scottes might be once clearly bꝛoken, and then to vſe the matter as occaſion ſhoulde ſerue their turne.

This matter therefoꝛe being pꝛoponed befoꝛe the Counſell, it was concluded that in no wyſe the ſayde league betwixt the Frenche men and Scottes ſhould be diſſolued, and ſo therevpon the Engliſh Ambaſſadoꝛs were diſpatched without moꝛe talke concerning that matter.

In the ſame yeare, that is to wit. 1422. the king cauſed George Dunbar Earle of March, ſonne to that Erle which rebelled agaynſt his father King Robert the thirde, to be arreſted and put in ſafe keeping within the Caſtell of Edenbourgh. 1433

George Erle of March arreſted and put in warde.

He ſent alſo the Earle of Angus with his Chancelloꝛ William Creichtoun. and Adam Hepboꝛne of Hales to the Caſtell of Dunbar, deliuering them letters ſigned with his hande, and directed to the keepers of the ſayde Caſtell, that they ſhould deliuer vp the houſe immediatly vpō ſight of thoſe his letters vnto the bringers of the ſame. The keepers durſt not diſobey his commaundement, but ſuffered them to enter accoꝛding

A Parliament at Perth.

Within a twelvemonth after a Parliament was holden at Perth, where the foreſayd George Earle of March was diſinherited of al his landes and huings for his fathers offence committed agaynſt king Robert the thirde.

The Erle of March diſinherited.

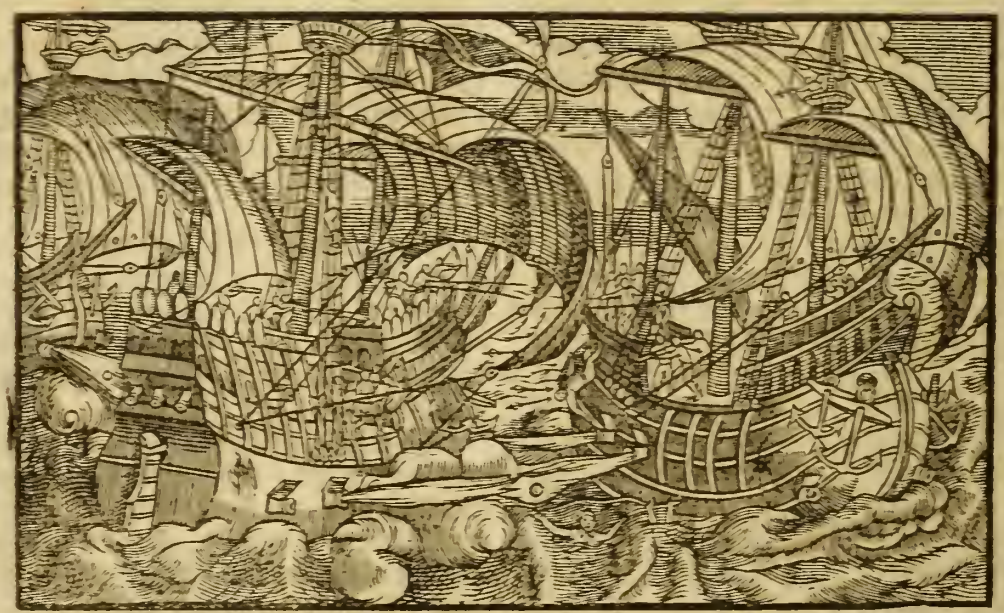
The Erledome of Buchquhan geuen to George Dunbar.

The king yet moued with ſome pitie toward ſo noble a linage, within ſhort time after gaue the Erledome of Buchquhan to the ſaid George, and after the Kings deceaſſe, the Lordes of the Councell thinking the ſame to little, aſſigned forth to him and to his ſonne Patrike, the ſumme of foure hundred markes yearely, to be receyued out of a parcell of his owne auncient inheritance, of the Erledome of March, to enioy the ſame till Iames the ſecond came to full age.

1435 The death of Alexander Stewarde Earle of Mar.



In the yeare. 1435. Ilexander Steward Erle of Mar departed out of this life.

This Ilexander was a Baſtard ſonne of the Erle of Buchquhan, that was one of the ſonnes of king Robert the ſeconde. He was a man of right ſingular prowes, and in his youth following the warres, was with Philip Duke of Burgoigne at the ſiege of Liege, or Luik, where he bare himſelfe ſo manfully, that few wanne the like honor at that iourney. Leodium.

Not long after, to his high aduauncement, he got in mariage the Ladie Jacoba Countes of Hollande: Notwithſtanding, he continued but a while with hir, being enforced to forgo hir companie, eyther for that ſhe had an other huſband, either for that the inhabitants woulde not ſuffer a ſtraunger to raigne ouer them.

Warres betwixt the Scottes of Mar and Hollanders.

After his returne into Scotlande, he ſent meſſengers into Hollande, requyring to haue the iſſues and profites of ſuch landes as were due vnto him in right of the ſayde Counteſſe his wife, but receyuing nought but a frowarde anſwere, he prouided him of ſhippes, and made ſore warres on the Hollanders by ſea: firſt being put to the worſe, but at length he toke a nũber of their ſhips laden with Marchandize, as they were returning homewardes from Dantzicke.

The Marriners were drowned, and the ſhips burnt. Through which loſſe, the Hollanders being ſore abaſhed, fell to a compoſition wyth him, and toke truce with the Scottes for an hundred yeares.

Truce betwixt the Scots and Hollanders for terme of one hundred yere.

This Earle of Mar ſo long as he lyued had the gouernaunce of the North partes of Scotlande vnder king Iames the firſt, for he was a right prudent perſon, aſwell in warlike enterpriſes, as in ciuill adminiſtration.

Stood Mares brought out of Hungarie into Scotlande for breede.

He brought forth of Hungarie ſundrie great Horſes and Mares for generation, that by ſuche meanes the countrey might be prouided of great horſes of their own race, where til that time there was none bred within Scotland, but ſmal nags, more meet to ſerue for iourneying hackneis than for any ſeruice in the warres.

Not long before this time, there came an Imbaſſade from the King of Denmarke vnto king Iames, requiring him to make payment of ſuch yearely tribute as was due to the ſayde king of Denmark, being alſo king of Norway, for the weſterne Iles, according to the promiſe and agreement made by Ilexander ſometime king of Scotland, the thirde of that name, vnto his predeceſſor Magnus, at that time king of Norway.

Imbaſſade out of Denmarke.

Their requeſt.

The Imbaſſadours that came with this meſſage, were honourably receyued, and in like ſort entertayned by king Iames, who at their departure gaue to the ſundry rich gifts, and appointed

for

ſir William Creichtoun to goe with them into Denmarke, Ambaſſadour from him, to the king there, who bled himſelfe ſo ſagely in this buſineſſe which he thus went about, that renuing the olde league betwixt the two Reelmes of Denmarke and Scotlande, ſtedfaſt peace and aſſured amitie without any moze ado therof enſued.

Much what about the ſame time, there came Ambaſſadozs from the French king Charles the vij. not onely deſiring to haue the olde league betwixt France and Scotland to be ratified at that preſent by a new confirmation, but alſo to confyrme the ſame with better aſſurance, Margaret eldeſt daughter to King James, at requeſt of the ſayde King Charles, was giuen in mariage vnto Lewes the Dolphin, and eldeſt ſonne to the ſayde king Charles.

Many great Lozdes of Scotlande were appoynted to haue the conueyaunce of hir into Fraunce, and great prouiſion of ſhippes made foz that voyage, bycauſe the king was aduertiſed that the Engliſh men had a fleete abzode on the ſeas, to take hir if they might meete with hir by the way. But as the hap fel, it chaunced the ſame time, as the Scottiſh ſhippes ſhoulde paſſe, there appeared on the coaſt of England, a great fleete of Spaniardes, which the Engliſh men ſuppoſing to be the Scots, they came vpon them with lxxx. veſſels of one and other, thinking verely to haue had theyr wiſhed pray, euen accozding to theyr expectation: but beeing receyued with as hote a ſtozme as they bzought, they quickly vnderſtode how they were in a wzong boxe, and ſo ſhrewdly amazed (as Hector Boetius hath) they ſuſteyned great loſſe both in men and ſhips, and in the meane time the Scottiſhe nauie paſſed by quietly without domage, encountring not one ſhippe by the way that ſought to impeache theyr paſſage.

There went. Cxl. Ladies and Gentlewomen fozth of Scotland to attende this Ladie Margaret into France, amongeſt which number there were fiue of hir owne ſiſters.

Henry Percie inuadeth Scotlande.

In the meane time, whileſt ſuch things were a doing, Henry Percy of Nozthumberland inuaded Scotland with foure thouſande men, not being knowne whether he had commiſſion ſo to do from the king of Englande, oz that he made that enterpziſe of himſelfe.

William Dowglas Erle of Angus to reſiſt this inuaſion, gathered a power of choſen men, amongſt whom were Adam Hepbozne of Hales, Alexander Ramſey of Dalehouſy, and Alexander Elphingſton, with other.

The battayle of Pyperdene ſought betwixt Henrie Percie and the Earle of Angus.

The Erle of Angus being thus aſſociat, met the Percie at Pyperdene, where a ſoze battaile was foughten betwixt them, with great ſlaughter on both ſides, but at length the victozie fell to the Scottes, though there were ſlaine togyther with Alexander Elphynſton two hundzed Gentlemen and commons of Scotlande: and of the Engliſh part, there dyed Henrie of Clyddeſdale, John Dgyll, and Richarde Percie, with. xv. C. other of Gentlemen and commons, of the which Gentlemen. xl. were knightes.

Priſoners taken.

Shoztly herebpon king James rayſed a mighty armie, and beſieged the Caſtel of Roxbourgh, but when he had almoſte bzought his purpoſe ſo neare to paſſe, that thoſe within began to fall to communication foz the renozing of the place, the Queene came to the campe in great haſt vnto him, ſignifying that there was a conſpiracie begon againſt him; ſo that if he toke not the better heed, he was in great danger to fal into the hands of thoſe that ſought his life.

The king informed of a conſpiracie made againſt him, raiſeth his ſiege.

The king doubting the matter, raiſed hys ſiege and returned home to prouide the better for his owne ſuretie: but that preuayled little, for Walter Stewarde Earle of Athole, and heade of the whole conſpiracie, pretending euer a right to the Crowne, by reaſon that hee was procreate by king Robert the ſeconde on his firſt wife, procured his nephew Robert Stewarde, and his couſin Robert Graham, to ſlea the King by one meane or other, which finally they accompliſhed in this wiſe.

The Earle of Athol head of the cõſpiracy.

Robert Graham.

This Robert Graham for diuerſe wicked acts before committed, contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of the Realme, was driuen to an outlawrie, ſo that if he were taken, he looked for nothing but preſent death, and therefore hated the king moſt deadly: and though by the Queenes diligence both his and other of the conſpirators purpoſes were now diſappointed, hauing continued to diſpatch the king at ỹ ſiege of Rorbourgh, yet forſomuch as their names were not knowne, they hoped ſtill to finde occaſion to atchieue their deteſtable intention, ſith they were no more miſtruſted than the others.

Robert Steward and Robert Graham murtherers of the king.

Herevpon the ſayde Stewarde and Graham came one Euening to the blacke Friers of Perth where the king as then was lodged, and by lycence of the Porters comming into the houſe, entred vp into the Gallerie before the kings chãber dore, mynding to haue ſtayed there till one of the kings ſeruants that was priuie to their diueliſh purpoſe ſhould come, by whoſe helpe they were promiſed to haue entrie into the Chamber. But before the comming of this Judaſlike traytor, an other of the kings ſeruants named Walter Strayton came forth of the chamber dore to haue fetched wine for the king: but being aduiſed of theſe two traytors ſtanding there at the dore, either of them hauing a long ſworde gyrded to him, he ſtept backe, and cried treaſon: but ere hee could get within the dore to haue made it faſt, they leapt vnto him, and ſlue him there outright.

Walter Strayton is ſlaine.

Whileſt this was a doing, not without great noyſe and rumbling, a yong virgin named Katherin Dowglas (that was after maried to Alexander Louel of Bolunny) got to the dore, & ſhut it: but becauſe the barre was away that ſhoulde haue made it faſt, ſhe thruſt hir arme in the place where the barre ſhoulde haue paſſed, ſhe was but yong and hir bones not ſtrong, but rather tender as a griſtle, and therefore hir arme was ſone craſht in ſunder, and the dore broken vp by force. Herewyth entring the Chamber, they ſlue ſuch of the ſeruaunts as made defence, and then the King himſelfe with many cruell and deadly woundes.

Patrike Dunbarre wounded and left for dead in the kings defence.

Patrike Dunbarre, brother to George ſometime Earle of March, was left for deade on the flore, by reaſon of ſuch woundes as he receyued in the kings defence, doing moſt manfully his vttermoſte deuoire to haue preſerued him from the murtherers handes.

Iames the firſt murthered.

Thus was Iames the firſt murthered the. 21. day of Febꝛuarie, the. xliiij. yeare of his age, the xiij. of his raigne, and from the Incarnation of Chriſt. 1436.

His ſtature & forme of bo.

His bodie was buried in the houſe of the Charterares at Perth, which he founded in hys lyfe time, but had not as yet throughly finiſhed it.

This Iames the firſt was of a meane ſtature, with brode ſhoulders, and ſmal in the waſt, all other his members ſo well proportioned thereto, that nothing wanted to comlineſſe of perſonage that might be giuen by nature.

An vpright iuſticier.

How vpright a iuſticier he was, and bertuous in all his demeanours, it maye appeare by that which which before is wrytten of hys gouernment.

The Nobles and Peeres of the Realme right ſorrowfull for his death, aſſembled togyther, and made ſuche earneſt and diligent ſearche for the Traytours before mentioned, that at the length they were apprehended and brought to Edenbourgh, where they were executed on thys maner.

The Earle of Athole, whiche was not onely principall in practiſe of thys treaſon concerning the kings death, but alſo in tymes paſt was chiefe of counſell with Robert Duke of Albanie in the making awaye of Dauid the Kings eldeſt brother, and after the Kings returne forth of Englande, did moſte earneſtly ſolicite him to put Duke Murdo to death, with all other of hys lynage, truſting that when they were diſpatched, he ſhoulde finde meanes to rid the King alſo, and his children out of the way, and ſo at length atteyne to the crowne without any obſtacle. This Earle (I ſay) was firſt ſtripped of all his clothes, ſaue only his ſhyrt, and then was an inſtrument of wood made like to the drawer of a well, ſet faſt in a Cart with a frame.

At the one ende of whiche Inſtrument, was the Earle faſtened and bounde, and ſo caryed aboute the towne, ſometyme rayſed on high, that the people might ſee hym aloft in the ayre, and ſometyme let fal againe with a ſway downe vpõ the pauement.

After this, being brought to an open place, where moſte reſort of people was, they crowned him with an hote Iron, for that (as was ſayde) a Witche had tolde him, that before hys death he ſhoulde be crowned openly in ſight of the people. Through whoſe illuſion being deceyued, hee lyued vnder vayne hope to attaine the Crowne, dyrecting all hys ymaginations to compaſſe the meanes thereto. Thus was hee ſerued on the fyrſt day.

On the ſecond, he was drawne with his complyces layde on Hyrdels, rounde about the towne at an horſe taple.

The thirde day, hys belly was rypt, and his bowelles taken forth, and throwne in the fyre flickering before hys eyes, and then was hys heart pulled forth of his bodie, and throwne likewiſe in the fire: and laſt of all, his heade was cut off, and his bodie deuided in foure quarters.

His nephew Robert Stewarde was not altogither ſo cruelly executed: But Robert Graham, for that it was knowne that he ſlue the king wyth his owne handes, was put into a Carte, the hande that did the deede being faſtened to a payre of Gallowes, whiche were reared vp in the ſame Carte, and then were three perſons appointed to thruſt him through in all partes of his bodie wyth hote Irons, beginning firſte in thoſe places where it was thought no haſtye death woulde thereof enſue, as in the legges, armes, thighes and ſhoulders, and thus was hee caryed through euery ſtreete of the towne, and tormented in moſt miſerable wiſe, and at length had his belly ript, and was bowelled and quartered as the other were before.

Chriſtofer Clawn alſo, and other that were of counſayle in the conſpiracie, were putte to moſte ſhamefull kyndes of deathes, as they had iuſtlye deſerued, fewe or none lamenting theyr caſe. Chriſtopher Clawn.

In the dayes of King James the firſt, ſundrie ſtraunge and monſtruous things chaunced in Scotland. Straunge ſightes.

At Perth there was a Sowe that brought forth a lytter of Pygges with heades lyke vnto Dogges. Pigges with heades like to Dogges.

A Cow alſo brought forth a Calfe, hauing a head like a Colt. A Calfe with a heade like a Colte.

In the Harueſt before the Kings death, a blaſing Starre was ſeene wyth long ſtreaming beames. A blaſing ſtarre.

And in the Winter following, the froſt was ſo vehement, that Ale and Wine were ſolde by pounde weight, and then melted againſt the fire. A great froſt. Ale and wine ſold by pound weight.

A Sworde was ſeene glyding vp and downe in the ayre, to the no leſſe dreade than wonder of the people. A ſword ſeene in the ayre.

IAmes ỹ firſt made away through the traiterous practiſe of the Erle of Athole, (as before is ſpecified) hys eldeſt ſon James the ſecond of that name being as then but ſixe yeares of age ſucceeded to the crowne, as lawful heyre to the ſame, and by his mother and the Nobilitie of the Realme, was brought to Scone, where by the vniuerſall conſente of the three eſtates he was crowned king of Scotlande, being the. 102. King of that realme from Ferguſe the firſt. He was ſurnamed James with the fierie face, by reaſon of a broade red ſpot which he had in one of his cheekes.

This James at his comming to mans ſtate proued a ſtoute Prince, and maried the daughter of the Duke of Gelderlande as after ſhall appeare.

The daughter of the Duke of Gelderland maried to Iames the ſeconde.

In the beginning he had ſome trouble and buſineſſe, by reaſon of the great authoritie and rule which the high Barons of the Realme ſought to beare and maintaine, as the Dowglaſſes and other, but in the ende he ſubdued them all.

Shortly after his coronation, becauſe he was not of himſelfe able to gouerne by reaſon of his tender age, the nobles and eſtates of the Realme choſe ſir Alexander Leuingſton of Calender knight, gouernor of the king and realme, and ſir William Creichton knight, was confyrmed in his office to enioy the ſame as before he had done, the king being committed to his keeping, togyther with the Caſtell of Edenbourgh. Archebald Erle of Dowglas remayned in his countreys of Dowglas & Annandale, and would neither obey gouernor nor Chancellor, whereby great trouble was rayſed within the realme. Within a ſhort time alſo the gouernor and chancelor were deuided. The gouernor with the Queene remayned at Striueling: but the Chancelor had the K. ſtill with him in the Caſtel of Edenburgh, & what the one cõmaũded to be done, the other forbad: wherby neither of them was obeyed, nor any executiõ of iuſtice put in practiſe, ſo that through all the countrey, reif, ſpoyles, and oppreſſion were exerciſed without feare of puniſhment. The Queene perceyuing ſuch miſchiefe to raigne throughout all parties of the realme, deuiſed a meane to aduance the gouernors ſide, and hereupon with a ſmall companie repayred to Edenbourgh, where ſhe to bring hir purpoſe to paſſe, did ſo muche by great diſſimulation, that ſhe perſwaded the Chãcellor to ſuffer hir to enter the Caſtell, and to remaine with the king: but within three dayes after, ſhe feyned one morning to go on pilgrymage vnto the white Kirke, and cauſed the king hir ſon to be handſomly couched in a Trounke, as if he had beene ſome fardell of hir apparell, and ſo packed vp, ſent him by one of hir truſtie ſeruauntes layde vpon a Sumpter horſe vnto Lieth, from whence he was conueyed by boat vnto Striueling, where of the gouernor he was ioyfully receyued, commending the Queene highly for hir politike working, in deceyuing ſo wiſe a man as the Chauncelor was. Then rayſed hee a great power of his friendes and well willers, and beſieged the Chauncellour in the Caſtell of Edenbourgh.

A policye wrought by the Queene.

The king was conueyed vnto Striueling.

The Byſhop perceyuing in what daunger he ſtood through the womans deceyt, ſent to ỹ Erle of Dowglas, deſiring his aſſyſtaunce againſte the Queene and gouernor. But the Earle refuſed either to helpe the one or the other, alledging that they were both ouer ambicious in ſeeking to haue the whole gouernment of the Realme in their handes.

The Chauncellor then perceyuing himſelfe deſtitute of all helpe, made agreement with the gouernor, vnder certain conditions, that he ſhould retaine ſtill the Caſtell of Edenbourgh in hys poſſeſſion, and likewiſe continue ſtill in his office of Chancellor.

An agreement made.

Shortly after the Earle of Dowglas deceaſed at Leſtelrig, in the yeare. 1439, againſt whõ aſwell the gouernor as Chancellor had conceyued great hatred.

The Earle of Dowglas departeth this life at Leſtelricke. 1439

He left behinde him a ſonne (begot of the Erle of Crawfords daughter) named William, a child of fourtene yeares of age, who ſucceeded hys father in the Earledome of Dowglas, appearing at the firſt to be well inclyned of nature, but afterwardes by euill companie hee waxed wylde and inſolent.

About this ſeaſon, James Stewarde ſonne to the Lorde of Lorne, maryed the Queene Dowager, and fauoured the Earle Dowglas in his vnruly demeanor, wherevpon both the ſayd James and his brother William, with the Queene, were committed to priſon in the Caſtell of Striueling by the gouernors appoyntment, but ſhortly after they were releaſed by the ſute of the lord Chancelor Sir William Creichton, and Alexander Setõ of Gurdun, who became ſureties for their good abearing, vnder greate forfeyture of ſufficient bande.

The Queene imprisoned.

About the ſame time, or rather ſomewhat before, Alane Steward Lord of Dernlye was ſlain at Palmais thorne, by ſir Thomas Boyd. And in the yeare following, the ſame ſir Thomas was ſlaine by Alexander Steward of Bolmet and his ſonnes, wherethrough there roſe great troubles in the weſt partes of Scotland. William Erle of Dowglas ſent Malcolm Flemming of Cumernald, and Alane of Lowder, vnto Charles the ſeuenth, king of France, to obteyne of him the Duchie of Towraine, which was giuẽ to Archebald Dowglas at the battaile of Vernoile in Perch, & the laſt Erle, father to this Erle Williã, had enioyed the ſame all his life time, wherevpon that ſute was the ſoner obteyned: which made ỹ yong Earle more inſolent than before. He kept ſuch a port, and vſed to haue ſuch a traine attending vpon him, ſpecially when he came to the court, that it might ſeeme he had the king in ſmal regard, for he thought himſelfe ſafe ynoughe in mainteyning the lyke ſtate and porte, or rather greater than euer hys father at anye tyme had mainteyned before hym. Inſomuche as hee would ryde with two thouſande horſe, of the whiche number there were diuers errant theeues and robbers, that were borne out in their vnlawfull and wicked wicked practiſes by the ſame Erle.

Certaine Captaines of the Iles, as Lachlan, Makclayn, and Murdac Eyſon, with a wicked number of the inhabitants of the ſame Iles, haried ſpoyled, and burnt the countrey of Lennox, and ſlue Iohn Colquhoun laird of Lute vnder aſſurance. They alſo ſlue women and children, without reſpect to age or ſexe.

This yeare chaunced a great dearth in Scotland, the like was neuer heard of before, and ſuch a death by peſtilence, that few eſcaped that were taken therwith, and ſo the Realme was plagued with reif, oppreſſion, dearth, and death of people.

This yeare alſo the gouernour toke the whole adminiſtration vpō him, wherwith the Chancellor was diſpleaſed, and leauing the king and him in Striueling, repayred to Edenbourgh, where he deuiſed the way how to recouer the king from the gouernor, & ſo one morning toke .xxiiij. men with him, & rode to the parke of Striueling where the king was then hunting, and the gouernor abſent at Perth, ſo that the Chancellor did ſo much that he perſwaded the king to goe with him to Edenbourgh. The Chancellor (as Hector Boetius hath) had cauſed the number of foure thouſande horſemen of his ſeruants, tenants, and friends, ſecretly to be readie that morning about the towne of Striueling, to reſiſt his aduerſaries if they ſhould haue vſed any force againſt him, and now vnderſtanding of the kings going thus with the Chancellor, they came to him on the way, and attending him, brought him ſafely and without further trouble vnto Edenbourgh.

The gouernor when he was aduertiſed hereof, was grieuouſly diſpleaſed: but becauſe he knew not how to remedy the matter, he went to Edenbourgh, & there got Iohn Iunes Biſhop of Murrey, and Henrie Lichton Biſhop of Abirdene, to labour ſome agreement betwixte him and the Chancellor: which they did in this wiſe. The king to remaine in keeping of the Chancellor, and the gouernor to continue his office. And ſo by this accord they were made friendes.

The gouernor and Chancellor being thus agreed, called a counſell of the nobles of the realme to be holden in Edenbourgh caſtell, to the which amongſt other came the Erle of Dowglas, and as they were ſet to dinner, the meate was ſodenly remoued, and a Bulles head preſented to the Erle of Dowglas, which in thoſe dayes was a token of execution. And immediately therevpon the ſayde Earle with his brother Dauid, and Malcolme Flemming of Cumernald, were beheaded before the caſtell gate.

After the death of the ſayde Earle, the ſtate of the realme became more quiet, for his vncle Iames Dowglas Baron of Abircorne that ſucceeded him, being a man of great ſtature, and verie fat, gaue himſelfe to quietneſſe, and liued but three yeares after. The foreſaid William had but one ſiſter, that was called the fayre mayden of Galloway, and was maried vnto one William Dowglas, ſonne to this erle Iames before his deceaſſe, that the heritage ſhoulde not be deuided, becauſe the Earledome of Dowglas was entayled vpon the heyres male, and the landes of Wigton, Balwanye, Annardale, and Dzmont remayned to hir as heyre generall.

This Earle William, after the deceaſſe of his father Erle Iames, began to wax vnruly, and to followe the maners of the other William Earle Dowglas lately beheaded (as before ye haue heard) ſo that by ſupport many diſobedient perſons wold not obey the gouernor & Chancellor, whervpō ſundry great ſlaughters & oppreſſions were cōmitted

The king will rule himſelfe.

The king after he came to the age of .xiiij. yeres woulde not any longer be vnder the gouernment of others, but toke the rule vpō himſelf. The Erle of Dowglas enformed thereof, came vnto him at Striueling, and put himſelfe and all he had, to remaine at his pleaſure: wherevpon the king receiued him, pardoned all his paſſed miſdemeanors, and admitted him to be one of his ſpeciall friends and priuie Councellers in al his affayres. By his perſwaſion ſhortly after, ſir Alexander Leuingſton, and William Creichton being diſcharged of their offices, were alſo put of, from the Counſell, and all their friends baniſhed the Court, and they themſelues were ſommoned to appeare before the king, which becauſe they refuſed to do, they were proclamed rebels, and put to the horne. The Erle Dowglas then for the olde grudge he bare them, rayſed an army & haried their lands. In reuenge wherof, ſir William Chreichton ſpoyled the Erle of Dowglas his lands, ſo that great trouble was rayſed through the whole countrey, & the lands of Strabroke, Abircorn, & the towne of Blackneſſe were burnt & deſtroyed. The Earle of Dowglas ruled wholy about the king, & made Archebald his brother Erle of Murrey, by ioyning him in mariage with a Lady of the houſe of Dunbar heretrix therof. Moreouer Hew Dowglas was made erle of Dzmont. Thus the Erle of Dowglas aduanced his name, & ioyned in friendſhip with the Erle of Crawford, & Donald Erle of the Iles, & with the Erle of Ros, to ẏ end that ech of thē ſhould be aſſiſtāt to others. In this meane time the Erle of Crawford at the requeſt of the Erle of Dowglas toke a great pray of goodes forth of the Biſhop of S. Androws lands in Fife, which Biſhop hight Iames Kenedy, ſiſters ſon to K. Iames the firſt, where through the Erle of Crawford on the one part, and the Earle of Huntley with the Ogyluies on the other, met at Arbzothe in fette battaile, where the Erle of Crawford was ſlain, and diuerſe Barons on his ſide, although the victorie and field remayned with his ſonne the maiſter of Crawfoꝛde, who ſucceeded his father, and was called Earle Beirdy. On the Erle of Huntleys ſyde were ſlaine, Iohn Foꝛbes of Petſlege, Alexander Berckley of Gartulye, Robert Maxwell of Telyne, William Surdun of Burrowfielde, Sir Iohn Oliphant of Aberdagie, and fiue hundꝛed moꝛe on theyꝛ ſyde: and one hundꝛed of the victoꝛers were alſo ſlaine, as Hectoꝛ Boetius hath.

Who likewiſe repoꝛteth that the occaſion of thys battayle dyd chaunce thꝛough the vary-aunce that fell oute betwixt the Earle of Crawfoꝛdes eldeſt ſonne Alexander Lyndeſey, and Alexander Ogilbye, oꝛ Ogiluie, (as ſome wꝛite him) aboute the office of the Baliſewike of Arbꝛoth, the which the Maiſter of Crawfoꝛde enioying, was diſplaced and put out by the ſayde Ogiluie. Wherevpon the Maiſter of Crawfoꝛde to recouer his right (as he toke it) got a poꝛer togither with helpe of the Hamiltons, and with the ſame ſeaſed vpon the Abbay, and Ogiluie with helpe of the Erle of Huntly, came thither with an armie to recouer the place againe out of his aduerſaries handes, and ſo vpon knowledge hereof gyuen vnto the Earle of Crawfoꝛde, he himſelfe comming from Dundee vnto Arbꝛoth at the very inſtant when the battails were readie to ioyne, cauſed firſt his ſonne to ſtay, & after calling foꝛth ſir Alexander Ogiluie to talke with him in purpoſe to haue made peace betwixt him & his ſonne, was thꝛuſt into the mouth with a ſpeare, by a cõmon ſouldier that knewe nothing what his demaund ment, ſo that he fel downe therewith, and preſently died in the place: wherevpon togither the parties went incõtinently without moꝛe pꝛotracting of time, and ſo fought with ſuch ſucceſſe as befoꝛe ye haue heard. The Caſtell of Edenbourgh beſieged.

This yeare alſo, oꝛ (as Hectoꝛ Boetius hath in the yere next inſuing) the caſtell of Edenburgh was beſieged by the ſpace of .ix. monethes by the king & the Erle of Dowglas, ſir Willã Creichton being within it. At length it was giuen ouer vpon certain cõditions, & the ſaid ſir William reſtoꝛed to the office of Chancelloꝛ againe: but hee would not meddle with the oꝛdering of the kings buſineſſe, ſtaying foꝛ a time moꝛe conuenient.

Sir James Stewarde ſurnamed the blacke knight, huſband to the Queene the kings mother, was baniſhed the realme foꝛ ſpeaking woꝛdes againſt the miſgouernment of the king & realme, wherwith he offended the Erle of Dowglas. As he paſſed the ſeas towards Flanders, he was take by the Flemings, & ſhoꝛtly after departed this life. The queen his wife being aduertiſed of his death, died alſo within a while after, & was buried in the Charterhouſe of Perth the .xv. of July in ỹ yeare 1446. Hir name was Jane Somerſet, daughter to the Erle of Somerſet. James the firſt maried hir (as befoꝛe ye may reade) in England. She had by him .viij. childꝛẽ, two ſonnes, & .vj. daughters, which were all honourably maried, the firſt named Margaret, to the Dolphin of Fraunce: the ſeconde Eleanoꝛe, to the Duke of Bꝛytayne: the thirde, to the Loꝛde of Teruuer in Zelande: the fourth, to the Duke of Auſtrich: the fifth, to the Earle of Huntley: and the ſixth, to the Earle of Moꝛton. And by James Stewarde hir ſeconde huſbande ſhe had thꝛee ſonnes: Iohn Earle of Athole, James Erle of Buchquhan, and Andꝛow Biſhop of Murrey. Soone after, ſir William Creichton, with the Biſhop of Dunkelde, & Nicholas Oterburn a Canon of Glaſgew were ſent in ambaſſade vnto the duke of Gelderland foꝛ his daughter called Marie, to be ioyned in mariage with K. King Iames maryed a daughter of Gelderland.

At hir arꝛyuall ſhee was receyued by the king king with great triumph, and the mariage solemnized by the assistaunce of all the Nobles of Scotland, with great banketting, ioyfull mirth, and all pleasant intertainment of those strangers that might be.

In the yeare. 1447. ther was a Parliament holden at Edenbourgh, in the which sir Alexander Leuingston of Calender late gouernor, Iames Dundas, and Robert Dundas knightes, at the pursuite of the Earle of Dowglas were forfalted and condemned to perpetuall prison in Dunbryton, and James Leuingston his eldest sonne, Robert Leuingston Treasurer, and Dauid Leuingston knights, lost their heades.

Iames before his execution made a very wise oration to the standers by, declaring the instabilitie of fortune, & chaūge of court, exhorting al persons to beware thereof, sith enuye euer followed high estate, and wicked malice neuer suffred good men to gouerne long. In the same Parliament sir William Creichton was also forfalted for diuerse causes, but principally for that his seruants would not deliuer the house of Chreichton to the kings heralde, who charged them so to do. This forfalture was cōcluded in parliament by vertue of an act which the saide William (when he was Chancellor) caused to be made, & so being the first inuenter, was also the first against whom it was practised. The yeare next ensuing were sundrie incursions made betwixt Scots and Englishmē on the borders, Dunfreis was burnt, and likewise Anwike in Englād: but shortly after a truce was concluded for. vij. yeres, great offers of friendship made by the English men for to haue the warres cease on that side, because the warre betwixt thē & Fraunce was very hotely pursued, and ciuill dissention disquieted the state of Englād which was raysed betwixt ỳ two houses of Lācaster & Yorke.

The English borderers of the west Marches fetched a great bootie of cattell out of Scotlande, notwithstanding the truce, in reuenge whereof, the Scots inuading England, wasted the countrey, burnt townes and villages, slue the people, and with a great praye of prisoners, goodes, and cattel, returned home into Scotland. Herewith followed dayly rodes and forrayes made on both sides betwixt the Scottes and English men, and that with such rage and cruelte, that a great part of Cumberland was in maner layde waste: for on that side the Scots chiefly made their inuasions, bycause that from thence the first occasion of all this mischiefe might seeme to haue had the beginning. Whē such things were certified to the king of Englandes counsell, an army was appointed forthwith to inuade Scotlād, under ỳ leading of the Earle of Northumberland, & of one Magnus surnamed redbeard, a captain of great experience, as he that had bene trayned vp from his youth in the warres of Fraunce. The Scottes bycause of his long red beard, called him in scorne and derision, Magnus with the red mane.

The English men passing ouer the riuer of Sulwey & Annande, came to another riuer called Sare, and there pight downe their tentes. And on the next day they began to robbe and spoyle the countrey on eche syde: but aduertised that the Scots were at hande with an army, they that were thus gone forth, were with all speede called backe to the campe by sounde of trumpet, and forthwith theyr army was brought into order of battail. The Scots herewith seeme to be so encouraged that they rushed forward with great egernes vpon the right wing of the English men, where Magnus stood, & so laid about them with speares, axes, and such like hand weapons, that with great slaughter they driue the Englishe men to breake aray and to flee: Magnus herewith being more chafed than afrayde as should appeare, preassed forward vpon Wallace with great violence, and seeking to approch vnto him that he might haue wroken his grief vpon him, was inclosed among the Scottish troupes & slaine with a few other of his friends and seruants that followed him. The slaughter of this man in whom consisted no smal hope of victorie on the English part, put the residue of their army in such feare that they were not able longer to resist the Scottish mens violent impression, but turning their backes fled amain, who the Scots pursued in chase right fiercely, so that many of the English men died in the battail, but more now in the chase, for the tide being come in, slayed many of them that made their course to haue escaped through ỹ riuer, wherby diuerse that ventured into the water were drowned, and other that durst not take the water were oppressed by the Scottes that followed them.

The Erle of Dzmond hauing got this honorable victozie, conueyed the chiefeſt of the priſoners to the caſtel of Lochmaben, and after repayred to the court, where he was of the king ioifully receiued, honozably feaſted, and highly rewarded.

After this, the Scottes that dwelled vpon the bozders, liued foz a ſeaſon in better quiet: foz although the Engliſh men wiſhed to haue bene reuẽged of this loſſe and ouerthzow of their people, yet by reaſon of ciuil warres that ſhoztly after followed, they were conſtrained to fozbeare to make any further warres againſt the Scots, till better occaſion might ſerue. And foz the auoyding of danger that might enſue in time of this inteſtine trouble by fozraine enimies, they ſued to haue a truce with the Scots, which foz ẏ terme of three yeres was granted. In this yeare, William Erle of Dowglas, with a great cõpanie of nobles and gentlemen, as the Lozds Hamilton, Gray, Salton, Sciton, & Oliphãt. Alſo, Calder, Urquhart, Cambel, Fraſier, and Lauder, knights, went into Italy, & was at Rome in time of ẏ Jubile which was kept there that yeare. He left behinde him to gouerne his landes in Scotlande, Hugh Earle of Dzmõt that was his bzother: but in his abſence (thzough coũſel of ſuch as were about him) the k. ſommoned the Erle to appeare befoze him within. xl. dayes, and by cauſe he came not within that preſixed time, he was put to the hozne, & his lands inuaded & ſpoiled. The caſtel of Dowglas bicauſe they that kept it defended themſelues & the place right ſtoutly againſt the king, was razed & bzoken downe. But Lochmaban being yelded, was furniſhed with a gariſon of the kings friends.

The Earle aduertiſed of theſe things, with all ſpeed returned home, comming thzough Englãd, & ſent his bzother James vnto the king, to know his pleaſure: who cõmaunding the Erle to ſee his countreys (namely Annandal) purged of theeues and robbers, pardoned him of all offences, and receyued him into fauoz againe, ſo that he was alſo eftſoones proclaimed the kings lieutenant: but ſhoztly after going into Englãd wꝫout the kings licence, to cõmen with the king of Englande about the recouerie of loſſes ſuſteined by the Engliſhmen by certain inrodes (as he alledged) the K. toke the matter in very euil part, foz that he ſhuld ſeme ſo to be had in cõtempt of the Erle: & withal he miſtruſted alſo, leaſt there were ſome ſecrete practiſes in hande to the preiudice of him and hys realme: ſo that he ſtozmed not a little towards the Erle, who being thereof aduertiſed, came in hũble wiſe to the king, & beſought him of pardõ, if he had in any wiſe offended him, aſſuring him that from thencefozth he would neuer commit any act that might tend to his Ma. diſpleaſure. Herewith the Queene alſo & other noble men, made ſuite to the king foz the Earles pardon, ſo that in the ende he was receiued again into fauoz, but yet diſcharged of bearing any publike office, which pinched him ſo ſoze (namely foz that his aduerſaries William Chzeichton lozd Chancellor, & the Erle of Dzkney ſeemed to beare all the rule about the king) ẏ he ſought to diſpatch the Chancellor, procuring certaine of his ſeruants & friendes to aſſault him one mozning as he was cõming fozth of Edenburgh, but yet he eſcaped to his caſtel of Chzeichton, although wounded indeed right ſoze, & within few dayes after, gathering a power of his kinſmen, friends, and allies, he returned againe to Edenburgh, and had deſtroyed (as was thought) the Earle of Dowglas at that preſent, if hee had not ſhifted awaye the moze ſpedily, who being thus to his great griefe, & no ſmall diſhonoz chaſed out of Edenbourgh, deuiſed whiche way hee might beſt be reuenged: and foz the moze eaſie accompliſhment of his purpoſe, he procured the Erles of Crawfozd and Roſſe to ioyne with him in that quarell againſt Chzeichton and other his complices, by fozce of which confederacie, they couenanted to aſſyſt one another againſt the malice of the ſayde Chzeichton, and all other theyz aduerſaries.

The Earle of Dowglas hauing concluded this bond of confederacie, bare himſelfe very highe, in preſuming further therof than ſtood with reaſon: and this was one great cauſe of the kings diſpleaſure nowe paſſingly increaſed againſt the ſayde Erle. An other cauſe was this: a ſozt of theeues and robbers brake into the landes of the Lozde John Herres, a noble man, and one that had continued euer faythfull to the king, taking with thẽ out of the ſame landes a greate bootie of Cattell. And whereas the ſayde Lozde Herres complayned vnto the Earle of Dowglas of that wzong, bycauſe the offendours were inhabyting within his rowmth, and yet coulde haue no redzeſſe, he attempted to fetche oute of Annardale ſome praye, wherewith to ſatiſfie in parte the wzong which had bene offred him by thoſe lymmers and robbers. But ſuch was his euil happe, that taken he was with his retinue, and committed to pryſon, and ſhoztly after by commaundement of the Earle of Dowglas, he was hanged as a fellon, notwithſtanding that the king by an Herald cõmaunded the contrarie.

The king being ſoze offended herewith (as he had no leſſe cauſe) paſſed ouer his diſpleaſure with ſilence, til he ſaw time and opoztunitie to reuenge the ſame: but in the mean ſeaſon many an honeſt man bought the bargain right dearly, being ſpoyled of that he had, & otherwiſe euil entreated, and yet durſt not the meaner ſozt once complaine, foz feare of further miſchiefe, where the higher powers alſo ſoze lamented the great diſozders dayly increaſing, and were not able yet in anye wyſe to reforme the ſame, inſomuch as it was greatly doubted, leaſt the Earles of Dowglas, Crawforde, Roſſe, Murrey, and other of that faction, ment to put the king beſide his ſeate: which doubt being put into ỹ kings head, brought him into no ſmal perplexitie, wherupon by courteys meſſages he ſent for the Earle of Dowglas, wylling hym to repayre to his preſence, ſoiourning then in Striueling Caſtell, which he refuſed to do, till he had aſſurance vnder the kings great ſeale for his ſafe cõming and going (as ſome haue ſaid.) And then about Shrouetide in the yeare. 1451. he came to the court at Striueling, where the king toke him aſide, and in ſecret talk moued and requeſted him to forſake the league and bonde of friendſhip betwixt him and the Earle of Crawford, and other ſuch his confederates.

There was a ſecrete murmuring amongeſt a number, that this Erle of Dowglas purpoſed to make a proke one day to get the garlande beſyde the kings heade.

In deede by reaſon of his kinneſmen and allyes, he was of more puiſſaunce in the Realme, than (as it was thought) ſtoode wyth the ſuretie of the Kings eſtate, vnleſſe hee were the more faythfull.

He had at the ſame time two brethren that were alſo Earles, as Archymbalde Erle of Murrey, and Hugh or (as other haue) George Erle of Ormont, beſyde the Earle of Angus, and the Erle of Wortoun, that were of his ſurname and bloud, with a great nũber of other lords, knights, and men of great poſſeſſions & liuings, all of the ſame ſurname, and linked in friendſhip & aliance with other the chiefeſt linages of all the realme.

Earles of the ſurname of the Dowglaſſes.

The lynage and great aliance of the Dowglaſſes.

Hereto by reaſon there had bene ſo many valiant men and worthie Captaines of the Dowglaſſes one after another, as it had beene by ſucceſſion, the people and cõmons of Scotland bare ſuch good will and fauour towardes that name, that they were ready to ride or go with thẽ, they cared not whither, nor againſt whom.

The loue that the people bare towarde the name of the Dowglaſſes.

It is ſayde, that the Earles of Dowglaſſes might haue rayſed. xxx. or. xl. thouſande warlike perſons readie at theyr commaundement, whenſoeuer it had pleaſed them to call.

In deede the Dowglaſſes had euer the gouernment of al matters perteyning to the defence of the realme, ſo that the men of warre had them ſtill in all the eſtimation & honor that might be.

But nowe to the purpoſe touching the conference had betwixt king James the ſeconde, and the Erle of Dowglas: It chaunced in the ende (vpon what occaſion I knowe not) that the Erle anſwered ỹ king ſomwhat ouerthwartly, wherwith the king toke ſuche indignation, that the Erle herevpon was ſlaine by him and ſuch other as were then about him on Shroue euen.

The Earle of Dowglas anſwereth the king ouerthwartly, and is ſlaine.

Then after the Earle was thus made away, his brethren made open warre againſt the king, and ſlue all ſuch of his friendes and ſeruantes, as they might encounter with: Inſomuch that thoſe which trauailed by the high wayes were in doubt to confeſſe whether they belonged to the king, or to the Dowglaſſes.

His brethren make warre againſt the king.

The Lorde of Cadzow beeing in the towne of Striueling, with a great companie of the Erle of Dowglaſſes friendes, in reuenge of his death incontinently burnt that towne, and did many other great diſpleaſures to the King and hys ſubiectes, ſetting forth Proclamations againſt the King and his Councell, for the violating of the aſſurance graunted (as before is ſayde) to the Earle of Dowglas. Whereby the King was put ſo to his ſhiftes, that hee was determined to haue left the Realme, and to haue fledde by Sea into Fraunce, had not James Kenedee the Byſhop of Saint Andrewes cauſed him to ſtay, on the hope he had of aſſyſtaunce onely by the Earle of Huntley, whiche Erle hearing that the Dowglaſſes had gathered an armie in the South againſte the King, rayſed another armie in the North to ayde the king.

Striueling is burnt.

The king would haue fled.

On the other ſyde, the Earle of Crawford hauing aſſembled a great power, encountred him at Brechin, in purpoſe to ſtoppe the Earle of Huntleys paſſage, where betwixte them was fought a ſore battayle, and the Earle of Crawford chaſed into Fynnewyn, ſo that many noble men, gentlemen, and commons were ſlaine, and amongſt other, the Erle of Crawfordes brother was one.

Hector Boetius writeth, that John Cullace of Bannamwin, whom the Erle of Crawford had appointed to lead thẽ that bare ỹ battail Axes, or as I may terme them, the Bilmen, in the left wing of his armie, fled of purpoſe in the hotteſt of the fight, and ſo left the middle ward naked on the one ſide of the chiefeſt ayde ỹ the ſaid Erle had, & ſo the victorie by that meanes only inclined to the kings ſtandard, which the Earle of Huntley had there with him. But howſoeuer it was, the ſayd Erle of Huntley had the honor of the fielde, who neuertheleſſe, loſt diuerſe of his men alſo, though nothing ſo many as his aduerſaries did.

The Earle of Huntly the ſame day before the battails ioyned, gaue lãds to the principal men of thoſe ſurnames that were with him, as to ỹ Forbeſſes, Leſlies, Iouings, Ogilbies, Grantes, & diuerſe other. Which beautifulnes of the Erle made thẽ to fight more valiantly. In recõpence wherof the king gaue to the ſaid Erle the lands of Badzenot, & Lothquhaber. In the meane time, Archbalde Dowglas Earle of Murrey, brent the peill of of Straboggy, perteyning to the Earle of Huntley, and harried the lands there abowtes. In reuenge whereof, the Earle of Huntley at his returning backe, brent and harried all the landes of the Earledome of Murrey. In the meane time, at a Parliament holden at Edynburgh, the Erle of Crawford was denounced a traytor, and all his lands and goodes deemed to be forfeyted into the Kings hands. James Earle of Dowglas, James Lord Hammilton, the Erles of Murrey, and Ormont, the Lord of Balnay, and many other of that faction, were by publike Proclamation made by an Herault, commaunded to appeare by a day to vnderly the law: but in the next night that followed the day of this Proclamatiō, certayne of the Dowglasses seruantes that were sent priuily to Edynburgh, to vnderstande what was done ther, fastned writings vpō the Church dores, sealed with the Dowglas his seale in this fourme. The Earle from henceforth will neyther obey citation nor other commaundement. Beſyde this, in the same writings, they charged the King with many haynous crymes, callyng hym a murtherer, periured, false, and a bloudsucker. The King therefore assembled an army, and went forth against them: but bycause the tyme of the yeere was contrary to his purpose, he could do no great hurt to his enimies, although he burnt vp their corne, and droue away their cattell. But the Dowglas seemed to passe little for the kings malice, and the Earle himselfe married his brothers wife the Countesse Beatrice, and sente to Rome for a licence to haue that marriage made lawfull: but by the Kings agents in that Court, the Earles suite might not be obteyned. Neuertheleſſe, hee kepte hir still in place of his wife, and continuing in Rebellion againſte the King; the nexte spring, and for the more part of the whole tearme of two yeeres nexte ensewing, he harried and spoyled the Kings poſſeſſions, and the King on the other part, wasted Annandale, and all other the landes and poſſeſſions that belonged to the sayde Earle of Dowglas or his friendes: but shortly after, as the King passed through Angus, to goe into the Northe partes of the Realme, the Earle of Crawford came and submitted himselfe vnto him, craning mercy in moſt humble and lamentable wise, and obteyned the Kings pardon, through mediation of James Kenedie Biſhop of Saint Androwes, and sir William Creichton, but the saide Earle lyued not paſt sixe monethes after, departing this life by force of a hote Agewe in the yeere. 1454. The same yeere, the King called a Parliament at Edynburgh, in the whyche James Earle of Dowglas, and his brothers wife the Countesse Beatrice (whome hee hadde taken to him by way of a pretensed and fayned mariage) Archbald Dowglas, Erle of Murrey, George Dowglas Earle of Ormont, and John Dowglas Baron of Balnay, were forfalted and condēned of Treaſon. The Earledome of Murrey was giuen vnto sir James Creichton, or rather reſtored to him, frō whome it had bin wrōgly taken by the vniuſt sentence of William Erle of Dowglas, who had procured it to be aſſigned vnto his brother the forsaide Archebalde, although the right remayned in the sayd sir James Creichton. But yet when the sayd Sir James Creichton could not kepe that Earledome without enuy of diuers and sundry persons, hee handled the matter so, that shortly after it returned agayn to the kings hands. Moreouer, at this Parliamente, George Creichton was created Earle of Cathnes, William Hay Conestable of Scotlād, was made Earle of Errolle. Ther were also diuers created Lordes of the Parliamente, whose titles were as follow, Darley, Halis, Boyd, Lyle, and Lorn. After the breaking vp of the Parliament, the King made a iourney againſt his aduerſaries into Galloway, and with small adoe, brought all the Caſtels of that Countrey into his poſſeſſion, and then turning into Dowglas dale bycause the inhabitants thereof would not obey him, hee abandoned the spoyle thereof vnto his souldiers, who practiſed no small cruelties againſt the inhabitants. Herevpon, ẏ Dowglasses beeing driuen to their shiftes, the Lorde James Hamilton of Cadzow was sente from them into England to seeke for ayde, but in vayne, for none there would be graunted: whereupon, returnyng to his friendes, he counſelled the Earle of Dowglas to truſt to his owne forces, and sith the same were farre ſuperior in number of men, to ẏ kings power, he gaue likewise councell without delay, to set vpon the King, that the matter might bee tryed by chaunce of battell, the only meane to aſſure them of their liues and eſtates, for otherwise he saw not how any vnfayned agreement might bee concluded, the matter beeing nowe passed so farforth to an extremity. But ẏ Earle of Dowglas vtterly (as some write) refuſed to fight againſt his soueraigne and true liege Lord, if any other meane might be founde: whereupon diuers great Lordes whiche were with him there on his side, being men of greate witte and no leſſe experience, aduiſed him yet to keepe togither his hoſt, till by their trauell and aſſiſtaunce, a peace were concluded and pardon obtayned for all partes: for if the army were once broken vp, all hope was then paſt (as they alledged) for any indifferente conditions of peace to be obtayned.

Herewith also, the Lorde Hamylton beeing wiſer than the reſidue, bad the Dowglas farewell, and so departed, concluding that hee ſhould neuer see so faire a day agayne, wherein he might haue caſt the dice for the whole Kingdome. And Specially Donalde, Lord of the Iſles and Earle of Roſſe, who hadde before ioyned hymſelfe in confederacie with the Earles of Dowglas and Crawfort agaynſt the King, and had taken into his hands the Kyngs houſe, and caſtel of Inuerneſſe (as before ye haue heard) naming hymſelfe King of the Iſles. Neuertheleſſe, he was now at length reconciled to the King, and gaue pledges for his good demeanor, and afterwards brought to the King three thouſand men in ayde at the ſeege of Roxburgh. In this meane while greate diſſention roſe in Englande betweene the two houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, the King being principall of the houſe of Lancaſter, was taken himſelfe at the battell of Saint Albons. But the Queene with hir ſonne the Prince, and Henry the yong Duke of Sommerſet, and diuers other, fled into ỳ North parts of England, and ſent to the King of Scotlande to deſire him of ayde, who vppon good aduice taken with his counſell, for that King Henry hadde euer kept well ỳ peace with the Realme of Scotland, and alſo for reuenge of his vncle the Duke of Sommerſet his deathe, prepared an army of twentie thouſande men to paſſe into Englande, and in the meane time all the North partes of England, hearing that King James was ready to ſupport the Queene of England, ioyned with hir, and paſt forward into the South partes, conſtrayning the Duke of Yorke to flee the Realme, and ſo king Henry enioyed the gouernemente of his Realme agayne, and for that time concluded an agreemente with the Duke of Yorke his aduerſarie whiche laſted not long. The Duke of Yorke remembring how ready king James was to prepare an armie in ſupporte of his aduerſarie King Henry, procured the borderers to make incurſions vpon the Scottiſh ſubiects, and woulde ſuffer no redreſſe to be had nor dayes of truce kept on the borders, as in time of peace the cuſtome was. Wherevpon king James reyſed a power, and in perſon entred with the ſame into Englãd, doing great hurt by deſtroying diuers Townes, Caſtels and Pyles in Northumberland, the Biſhoprike and other partes, till at length vpon faire promiſes made by the Engliſhmen, hee returned into his owne countrey.

King Iames inuideth Englande.

1458 After this, King Henry of Englande, perceyuing that the Duke of Yorke by the counſell of the Earle of Warwike, ceaſſed not to practiſe conſpiracies againſt him, ſent eſtſones to kyng James, requiring him of ayde againſt them, and promiſed therefore to reſtore vnto the King of Scotland, the Lands in Northumberlãd, Cumberland, the Biſhoprike of Dureſme and ſuche like, which the Kings of Scotland had helde before. This offer was accepted, and by treaties and contracts accorded, ſealed, and enterchanged betwixt the two Princes, as the Scottiſhmen alledge.) The yeere next following, at the Queene of Englandes deſire to ſuppoꝛte hir againſte the houſe of Yorke, King James with a great army entred England, but after that the Queene in the meane time had ſlayne the Duke of Yorke, and gote the vpper hande of hir enimies, at the ſame Queenes requeſt, hee retired into Scotlande againe. Neuertheleſſe ſhortly after, when ỳ Erles of March and Warwike ſought ſtill to maynteyne their quarrell againſt the Queene of Englande, ſhe was conſtreyned to withdraw into the North partes, and to deſire King James to approche eſtſones with his armie vnto the borders whiche he did, meaning to winne the Caſtels of Roxburgh and Warke, whiche were amongſt other things promiſed to bee deliuered vnto him by King Henry: and ſo comming to Roxburgh, laide his armie round about that Caſtell, and planted his ſeege in full warlike manner. Here the King hauing greate experience in knowledge of ſhoting greate artillerie, departed from his campe, accompanyed with the Earle of Angus and others, and came to the trenches where the great ordynaunce was planted, which he cauſed to be ſhot off. And here by great miſfortune, this worthy Prince James the ſeconde, was ſlayne by the flice of a great peece of artillerie, which by ouercharging chanced to breake, and ſlewe not only the King ſtanding ſomewhat neere it, but alſo hurte the Earle of Angus with other, being a notable preſident from henceforth, how ſuch great Princes approch ſo neere within daunger of ſuch peeces of ordynance when they are ſo ſhotte off.

But the King vſing the aduiſe of his kinſman James Kenedie Archbiſhop of Saint Androws, compaſſed his purpoſe in the end, diſpatching out of the way all ſuche as he any wayes ſoythe miſtruſted, of which nũber namely were the Dowglaſſes, whoſe puiſſance and authoritie not without cauſe he euermoze ſuſpected.

Many haue repoꝛted (as befoꝛe is ſaid) that in the beginning, King James the ſecond, thꝛough feare of ẏ great power of theſe Dowglaſſes, was in mind to haue fled the Realme, but being recõfoꝛted by the counſell and authoꝛitie of the ſayde Biſhop James Kenedy, he aduaunced his ſtudie to matters of greater impoꝛtaunce.

The ſayde Kenedy turned the Earle of Angus being of the ſurname of the Dowglaſſes and bꝛother to him by his mother, to take parte with the King.

He pꝛocured alſo diuers other of ẏ ſame bloud and ſurname, to reuolte from the other confederates, and to ſubmitte themſelues vpon pꝛomiſe of pardon vnto the Kings mercie, and ſo enfeobling the foꝛces of ſuch as were aduerſaries to the King, in the ende, he had them all at his pleaſure.

It was thoughte, that foꝛ ſo muche as the Dowglaſſes had their lãds lying ſo vpon ẏ weſt and middle Marches of the Realme (that no mã might beare any rule in thoſe partes, but onely they them ſelues,) if they had happily ioined with the Engliſhmen, conſidering the greate intelligence beſide which they had in all other partes of the Realme, what by kindꝛed and aliaunce, the Realme mighte haue falne into greate perill: foꝛ truely it is a daungerous thing (as Johannes Maioꝛ ſaith) foꝛ the eſtate of a Realme to haue men of greate power and authoꝛitie, inhabiting on the boꝛdures and vttermoſt partes thereof, foꝛ if they chaunce (vpon any occaſion gyuen) to renounce their obedience to their naturall Pꝛince and ſupꝛeme gouernoure, the pꝛeiudice may bee greate and iꝛꝛecouerable, that oftentimes thereof enſueth, as well appeareth in the Erles of March and other befoꝛe mentioned in this hiſtoꝛy: and likewiſe in Fraunce by the Dukes of Burgundy, Bꝛytayne, and Noꝛmandy: foꝛ till thoſe cõtreys were incoꝛpoꝛate and annexed vnto the Crowne of Fraunce, the Kings of that Realme were oftentimes put to great hinderance thꝛough Rebellion by them whome they accompted foꝛ their ſubiects.

But nowe to returne where I lefte, after the Dowglaſſes were once diſpatched, and thyngs quieted, King James the ſeconde began then to raigne and rule really, not doubting the controlement of any other perſon. Foꝛ then he oꝛdeyned lawes foꝛ his people as ſeemed beſt to his lyking, commaunding the ſame to be kept vnder greate penalties and foꝛfeytures. And being counſelled chiefly by the Biſhop of S. Androwes, James Kenedie that was his vncle, and the Earle of Oꝛkney, hee paſſed thꝛough all the partes of hys Realme, graunting a generall pardon of all offences paſſed. And ſo hee ruled and gouerned hys ſubiects in greate quietneſſe, and cauſed iuſtice ſo duely to be miniſtred on all ſides, that it was ſaid in his days, how he cauſed the raſhe bully to keepe the Cowe.

In the yeere. 1455. the King helde a Parliamente, in whiche were many good lawes made and eſtabliſhed foꝛ the weale of all the Realm, as in the bookes of ẏ actes of Parliamẽt is cõteyned.

Wherevpon king James reysed a power, and in person entred with the same into Englãd, doing great hurt by destroying diuers Townes, Castels and Pyles in Northumberland, the Bishoprike and other partes, till at length vpon faire promises made by the Englishmen, hee returned into his owne countrey.

After this, King Henry of Englande, perceyuing that the Duke of Yorke by the counsell of the Earle of Warwike, ceassed not to practise conspiracies against him, sent ettsomes to kyng James, requiring him of ayde against them, and promised therefore to restore vnto the King of Scotland, the Lands in Northumberlãd, Cumberland, the Bishoprike of Durelme and suche like, which the Kings of Scotland had holde before. called John, was made Earle of Mar.

The eldeſt of his daughters the Hamilton had in mariage, as before is, and alſo after ſhall bee mentioned.

Some ſtraunge ſightes there appeared before the death of this King James the ſecond, for the day before he was ſlayne, a blaſing Starre was playnely ſeene, which ſignified as was thought, the death of the ſayd King.

In the yeere before the ſeege, there was in Dundee an Hermophrodite, that is, a perſon with both ſhapes, but eſteemed for a woman onely, till it was proued, that lying with hir maſters daughter nightly where ſhe dwelt, ſhe had gote ẏ yong Damoſell with childe, for the whiche acte, bycauſe ſhe had counterfeted hir ſelfe a woman, and yet had wrought the part of a man, ſhe was condemned to be buried quicke, and ſuffered according to that iudgement.

About the ſame time, there was a certayne theefe, that with his familie, liued apart from the company of men, remayning ſecretely within a denne in Angus called Fenſoen, who vſed to kill yong perſons, and to feede on their fleſh, for the whiche abhominable offence, being apprehended with his wife & all his familie, they were burnt to death, one of his daughters that was vnneth. 12. monethes of age, only excepted, the which being preſerued and brought vp in Dundee, before ſhee came to the age of twelue yeeres, ſhee was taken in the like crime for the whiche hir father dyed, wherevpon ſhee was iudged to be buried quicke: and going to execution, when the people in great multitude followed hir, in wondering at ſo horrible an offence committed by one of hir age and ſexe, ſhee turned to them that thus deteſted hir wicked doing, and with a countenance repreſenting hir cruell inclination, ſayde to them: what neede you thus to raple vpon me, as if I had done an heynous acte contrary to the nature of man? I tell you, that if you knew how pleaſant mans fleſhe is in taſt, there would none of you all forbeare to eate it. And thus with an impenitente and ſtubborne minde, ſhe ſuffered the appoynted execution.

Hir words going to execution.

After the Deathe of James the ſecond, his ſonne James ẏ third a childe of ſeauen yeeres of age ſucceeded him, & forthwith was ſent for to the ſeege of Roxburgh, whither he was conueyed by the Queene, a woman of a ſtout ſtomacke, repreſenting the manlike race of hir countrey Gelderland, of the which ſhe was diſcended. For comming with hir ſonne thus to the ſeege, ſhe ſpent not time in lamenting and womaniſh bewayling the irrecouerable loſſe of hir huſbād, but rather in comforting ẏ Lords, whoſe parte had bin to haue comforted hir: and aboue al things ſhe exhorted thē with al diligence to imploy their whole indeuours and forces to ẏ winning of that Caſtel. Whoſe words ſo encouraged the Captaynes and whole army, that the ſeege was continued till the Caſtell was wonne, raced, and beaten downe flat to the grounde: and the yong King was Crowned at Kelſo, with the vniuerſall conſente and great reioycing of all the noble men, and other being there preſente in the army. This done, they beſeeged the Caſtell of Warke, whiche likewiſe they toke, and threwe downe, and afterwardes the King with the nobles of his Realme, came to Edynburgh, to take order order for the quiet gouernemente of the Realme, and bycause the King was yong, there were chosen seauen regentes to gouerne both King and Realm, as these, the Queene his mother, James Kenedie Bishop of Saint Androwes, that was sisters sonne to James ỳ first, the Bishop of Glasgow, the Earles of Angus, Huntley, Argile, and Orkney. These so long as James Kenedy liued, agreed well togither about the gouernemente of the Realme, but within a while after his decesse, they fell at square, or rather before as appeareth by Hector Boetius, who sayeth, that in the second yeere of this Kings raigne, there was discorde in brewing, betwirte the Queene and the Archbishop Kenedie, who perceyuing that the woman sought to vsurp wholly the gouernemẽt vnto hir selfe, withstode hir in that behalfe, in so much that it was doubted least the matter would haue broken forth into some ciuill warre, if the Bishops of Glasgow, Dunkelde, and Abirden, & certayne Abbots had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt the parties for an atonement, who dyd so much in the matter, that they compounded the variance in this wise. The Queene mother was appoynted to haue the charge of the Kings person, and of his brethren, Alexander Duke of Albany, and John Earle of Mar, and likewise of his two sisters, but as for the administration and gouernance of the Realme, she shoulde leaue it vnto the peeres. There were therefore elected by common consente as rulers, the Bishops of Glasgow and Dunkeld, the Earle of Orkney, the Lorde Graham, Thomas Boyd, and the Chancellor. About the same tyme, one Alane Keir, in hope to get the heritage of his brother John Laerd of Lorne toke him, and kept him in prison. But Colen Cambell Earle of Argile, taking great indignation with so presumptuous a parte, gathered a power, and comming agaynste Keir, toke him, and set his brother at libertie, and brought the offendour vnto Edinburgh, where he dyed in prison.

Seuen gouernours chosen.

Moreouer, shortly after Donald Lord of the Iles and Earle of Rosse, who had serued obediently in the army at Roxburgh and was (as outwardly appeared) well reconciled, began of newe to vse his olde manners, spoyling and harrying the whole countrey of Athole, and toke the Earle thereof, and the countesse his wife captiues with him into the Iles. To represse his iniurious attemptes: the Regents were preparing an army, but therewith came true aduertisements, that the sayd Lord of the Iles, and other the principall offendors of his company, were striken through the hand of God with a certayne frentie or madnesse, and had lost all their shippes and spoyles in the sea, so that ỳ Earle of Athole and his Lady were restored, and those frentike persons were brought vnto Saint Brides Kirke in Athole, for the recouery of their health, but it would not be. Donalde him selfe was afterward slayne in the Castell of Inuernes by an Irishman that was a minstrell.

The Queene with hir son went into France, to trie what purchase for ayde & support againste hir husbandes enimies, she might make there amongst hir owne friendes and kinsmen.

The Queene went into Fraunce for ayde.

The same time, King Henry deliuered the towne and Castell of Barwike into the Scottishmens hands, whether by couenant thereby to haue the forsaid safecunduct graunted, or of his owne voluntary will, to the ende he might haue the more support and fauoure amongst them, it is vncertayne by the variable reporte of writers.

Barwike deliuered to the Scottishmen.

Neuertheless, shortly after a truce was taken betwixt King James and King Edwarde, for the tearme of fifteene yeeres, vpon what conditions or promises made on King Edwardes parte I fynde not.

This truce was concluded in the Moneth of May, in the yeere. 1462. at the Citie of Yorke, whither had bin sente the Bishop of Glasgo, the Earle of Argile, keeper of the priuie seale, the Abbot of holy Rode House, Sir Alexander Boyde, and sir William Crawston Knightes, Ambassadors and commissioners for King James. 1462

All thyngs in thys season were ordered in Scotlande by the aduice and counsell of James Kenesy Bishop of Saint Androwes, a man of greate wisedome and policie, as well appeared in hys prudente and sage gouernemente of the Realme, aswell during the minoritie of thys James the thirde, as also in the dayes of hys father King James the seconde.

Pierre de Brezey, otherwise called le Seigneur de la Varenne, great Seneschal of Normãdy, was sent by the French King Lewes the eleuenth, with two thousande fyghting men to ayde the parte of Kyng Henry agaynste King Edwarde.

Monsieur de la Varenne sent fourth of Fraunce to ayde the parte of Margaret Queene of Englande.

This Brezey was one, that was most in fauoure with King Charles the seuenth, father vnto the sayde Kyng Lewes, and therefore (as many dyd suppose) hee was appointed by Kyng Lewis

Lewis (who greatly loued him not) to be chiefe in this tourney, to the end his life might be put in hazarde and aduenture, notwithſtanding after ſome danger both of tempeſt on the Sea, and alſo of the enimies handes, hee wanne the Caſtels of Bamburgh and Dunſtanburgh which he caſt to the grounde, and after toke in hande to keepe the Caſtell of Anwike, and beeing beſeeged therein, ſent for ayde to the Scottes.

George Dowglas Earle of Angus as then Warden of the Marches, immediately reyſed a power of. 23000. men, and comming with the ſame to the bordures, choſe forth of all his numbers fiue thouſande of the moſt able horſemen in al his army, and comming with them to the Caſtell about the middeſt of the day, toke the Frēchmen away with him into Scotlande, the Engliſh army whiche lay there at ſiege beholding the manner, and not once making proffer to fyghte with him. Some Engliſhmen there were, that woulde fayne haue foughten with the Scottes, but other (whoſe counſell was followed) were otherwiſe minded, alledging, that better it were to let them paſſe without encounter, ſith they left the Caſtell voyde, than to ieopard vpon the doubtfull chance of battell, for though their number were not greate, yet were they piked and choſen men, able to atchieue a great enterpriſe.

After this, the ſixteenth of Nouember, in the yeere. 1463. the Queene of Scottes, mother to James the thirde, dyed at Edynburgh, and was buryed in the Colledge of the Trinitie, which ſhe hir ſelfe had founded.

This woman, after the deceſſe of hir huſband James the ſeconde, liued ſomewhat diſſolutely, procuring Adam Hepborne of Hales a married mā to keepe hir ſuch familiar company, as ſounded greatly to hir diſhonor, for that ſhe could not within the whole Realme fynde ſome ſingle man amongſt all the nobilitie, with whome ſhe might haue married, and ſo in parte to haue auoyded the greater open ſlander and infamy.

The ſame yeere, Alexander Duke of Albany, and brother to the King, was taken on the Sea by the Engliſhmen in the mouth of June, as hee was returning from his Graundfather the Duke of Gilder: but the Biſhop of Saint Andrewes Iames Kenedy, cauſed both the ſayde Duke and alſo the Ship with all the goodes there inbeing, at the time of the taking of it, to bee reſtored, for otherwiſe as hee flatly proteſted, hee woulde not haue kept the truce any longer concluded betwixt the two Realmes.

The Duke of Sommerſet, in hope of great fauor which he ſhuld finde in England, perſwaded King Henry to paſſe thither, and with a greate company of Scottiſhmen he entred Englande, and many of the North parts reſorted vnto him, but at length, at his comming to Exam, ỹ Lord Montague with a greate power was ready to giue him battell, and there diſcomfited hym and his whole army. the Lords Hungerford and Roſſe, were taken & put to death, the Duke at Exham, and the Lords at Newcaſtell. King Henry eſcaped very hardly into Scotland againe, and there remayned a certayne ſpace after, till at length he thought to returne into Englande in ſuche ſecrete wiſe, as hee ſhould not haue bin once knowen, till hee mighte haue gote amongſt his friendes, whiche woulde haue ſupported him: but ſuch diligent watch was layde for him all alongſt the bordures, that hee was eſpyed taken and deliuered to King Edward his aduerſarie, who ſhut him vp in ỹ Tower of London till he was at length therein made away, as in the Hiſtory of England ye may ſee more at large.

In the yere. 1466. that famous Biſhop Iames Kenedie departed this life, and was buried in the Colledge of S. Sauiour, foūded by him within ỹ town of S. Andrewes in moſt ſumptuous wiſe.

This Prelate in prudent policie excelled al other Scottiſh Biſhops, of whom any writer maketh mentiō. He kept ỹ Realme in good quiet, and obſerued ỹ truce concluded with ỹ Engliſhmē, to ỹ great weale and cōmoditie of ỹ poore commōs.

1459 The mariage of Iames the thirde.

In the yeere. 1469. on the tenth day of July, king Iames the third being as then about twentie yeeres of age, married in the Abbey of Holy Rode house neere Edynburgh, the Lady Margaret, daughter to the King of Denmarke and Norway, whiche Lady was at the same tyme not past twelue yeeres of age, some say sixteene.

The King of Norway resigneth his title to the out Iles.

Hir father the King of Denmarke and Norway, in name of hir dower, transported and resigned to King Iames all his right, title, and interest which he pretended to the out iles. The Ambassadours that were sent into Denmarke to conclude this mariage, and to conuey the Bride into Scotland, were these: Andrew Dudeir Bishop of Glasgo, the Bishop of Orkney, the Lorde Auandale Chancellor of Scotlande, and Thomas Boyd Earle of Arrane, who had married the kings sister, and was now in his absence runne into the Kings displeasure, whereof his wife hauing intelligence, hearing of hir husbands arriual with ẏ other in the forth, gote out of Edinburgh, and comming a shipborde vnto him, gaue hym to vnderstande what displeasure the King hadde conceyued against him: who perceyuing himselfe in what daunger he stode if he toke lande, returned backe into Denmarke, taking his wife with him. The King herewith was so offended, that he caused both the sayd Earle and his father to be attaynted of high treason, and sente for his sister backe into Scotlande, causing a diuorse in absence of hir husbande to be sewed and gote betwixt them, marrying hir afterwardes to the Lord Hamilton, to whome hee gaue the Earledome of Arrane, which hir former husband had in gift before. Of this marriage, those of the house of Hamilton are discended, & are neerest of bloud to ẏ Crowne of Scotland as they pretend.

But nowe to shewe further what wee finde written concerning the manner and cause of the banishmente of the afore remembred Thomas Boyd, Giouan Ferrerio, in his appendix of the Scottish historie annexed vnto Hector Boetius lastly imprinted at Paris anno. 1574. agreeth not with that which ye haue red before, for as hee telleth the tale, the sayd Lord Boyd being one of the gouernours of the Realme, elected thereto (as before ye haue heard) within shorte time grewe so farre in fauoure with the King, that he might do all things with him at his pleasure, although hys associates in authoritie did neuer so much goe about to hinder his deuises, by reason whereof, hee seemed to vsurp the whole rule and administration of the Realme into his owne handes, sore to the greefe of those his said associates being ioyned with him in like office.

Giouan Ferrerio in hys appendix of the Scottish history.

The Lorde Boyd beareth all the rule about the King.

Hereof the state of the commō wealth through the dissention thus bred among the gouernours, was brought into a miserable plighte: for iustice in most places wāted hir due course, so as theeues and robbers taking boldnesse thereof not only vpon the borders, but also elsewhere, beganne to exercise greate outrage, to the breache of publike peace, and namely ẏ inhabitants of the out Iles fell to their wonted trade of pilfering, so that passing ouer in their long boates or Barges, and landing here and there on the shore, they toke prayes of Cattell and other goodes, greatly to their profite, and no lesse domage of the people that inhabited on the coastes ouer against thē.

Through default of agreement in the gouernors, euill disposed men ware bolde to work mischiefe.

In the North parts also, seditious tumults amongst the nobles gentlemen and people, were reysed, to the great disquieting of the whole countrey. Suche disorders continued no small time, and bycause the sayde Thomas Lord Boyd bare greatest rule about the King, the blame (as it cōmonly happeneth) was imputed to him. At length when the King was growen to ripe yeeres, and able to see to the administration of the common wealth him selfe, he was admonished by certaine graue personages to haue some regard, that suche misorders as disquieted the whole state of the Realme, might be reformed. Whereupon he called a Parliament, in the which whether through enuy that the Lordes had conceyued against the Lord Boyd, or for that his doings no lesse deserued such complaynte, was exhibited by generall voyces of the estates against him, that it was decreed by authoritie of the whole assembly, that he should come to aunswer in iudgemēt such crimes wherewith he was charged: but when hee refused so to do, and in contempt of the Kings authoritie gote togither a power of armed men, to defende him frō iniurie that might seeme (as he pretēded) to be offered him. At length the King was driuen of necessitie to make preparation for the leauying of an army to apprehende him by force. Whereof Boyd being aduertised, fled into England, bycause he perceiued himselfe not able to resist the Kings power. The King assured that hee was thus auoyded out of his Realme, banished him for euer, and seased vpon his lands and goods as forfeted. After this, when the sayd Boyd sawe no hope to returne againe into the Kings fauor, and finding no great comfort among the Englishmen, he passed from thence into Denmarke, where he remayned till the mariage was concluded betwixt the King and the Lady Margaret, daughter to the King of Denmarke, as yee before haue heard: and then in hope by occasion of thys ope marriage to obtayne pardon, returned nowe in company of the Bride, and of thoſe Imbaſſadors that were ſent to haue the conueyance of hir into Scotlande: neuertheleſſe, vnderſtanding by hys wife that came to him a ſhipborde before he ſet foote on land, that the kings diſpleaſure continued ſtill towardes him ſo greatly, that if he came a land, he ſhuld be ſure to loſe his head, he returned into Denmarke, and toke his wife with hym (as before is mẽtioned.) Finally he went into Italy, where at length he was murthered by one, whoſe wife he went about to allure for the ſatiſfying of his ſenſuall luſt. Before he was diuorced frõ hys wife the kings ſiſter, he begate on hir a ſonne, the which in the dayes of king James the fourth, in a priuate quarrell that roſe betwixte him and an other noble mã, chanced to be ſlayne. This much touching the Lord Thomas Boyd of Kalmarnock out of Ferrerio: who alſo in report of ẏ matter touching the marriage betwixt the king and the daughter of Denmarke, ſomewhat varieth from and other that write thereof.

The Imbaſſadors ẏ were ſent vnto Chriſtren King of Denmarke and Norway in the yeere 1468. as ẏ ſaid Ferrerio affirmeth, were theſe, Androw Biſhop of Glaſgow, William Biſhop of Orkney, Androw Lorde of Iuandale, Chancellor of the Realm, Martine Wane the great aulmoner, and the kings Confeſſor, Gilbert de Kerick Archdeacon of Glaſgow, Dauid Creichton of Crauſton, and John Shaw of Haly. Theſe Imbaſſadors beeing diſpatched into Denmarke in July, in the yeere aforeſaid, came at length vnto Haffnen, where king Chriſtierne then remayned, and were of him ioyfully receyued and well heard concerning their ſuite, in ſo much at length after he had propoſed the matter to his counſell about the eighte of September, it was agreed in this ſorte, that the Lady Margaret, daughter to the ſayd king Chriſtierne, ſhould be giuen in mariage vnto king James of Scotland, and that ẏ Iſles of Orkney, beeing in number. 28. and likewiſe the Iſles of Shetland, of which there are. 18. ſhuld remayne in poſſeſſion of the kings of Scotland, till eyther the ſayd king Chriſtierne or hys ſucceſſors in name of the marriage money ſhould pay vnto King James, or to his ſucceſſors, the ſumme of. 50. thouſand Florens of the Rheine. This marriage was thoughte, by reaſon of thys engaging of thoſe Iſles, right profitable vnto the Realm of Scotland, becauſe of the controuerſie and variance whiche had continued long before thoſe dayes betwixt the Kings of Scotlande and Denmarke, about the righte of poſſeſſing thoſe Iſles. In the moneth of Nouember next enſuing, after the marriage had bin conſummate in July before, within the Abbey Churche of Holy Rode houſe (as before ye haue heard) or in Saint Giles Church in Edenburgh (as other write) the three eſtates were called to aſſẽble in Edenburgh, where the Queene was Crowned, and the Parliamente holden, the moſt parte of the Lordes remayning ſtill in Edenburgh all the next Winter: And in the Sommer following, the king and Queene made their progreſſe into the Northe partes, and were honorably receyued in the principall cities and townes where they came, & likewiſe by the Nobles of the countrey, to the greate reioycing of the whole Realme. After their returning to Edenburgh, the king called a Parliament in the moneth of May. 1471. in the whyche amõg other things it was ordeyned, that Lords, Barons, and the burroughes of the Realme ſhoulde builde Shippes and boates, and prouide nettes for fiſhing. Alſo it was ordeined, that none ſhould weare ſilkes in doublet, gowne, or cloake, except Knights, Miniſtrels and Heralds, excepte they might diſpende one hundred pounds in lands by yeere: and that ẏ footeball and other vnlawfull games ſhoulde be debarred, and the exerciſe of ſhooting mainteyned. James eldeſt ſonne to king James the thirde, was borne ẏ tenth day of March, in the yeere. 1472. who afterwards ſucceded his father, and was called James ẏ fourth. Chriſtierne king of Denmarke, to congratulate the happie birth of this yong Prince beeing hys Nephewe by his daughter, releaſed all the righte, title and clayme which he or his ſucceſſors might haue to the Iſles of Orkney and Shetland.

This yere was a greate death in the Realme of Scotland, so that where a Parliamēt was called in Septēber, it was prorogued vntil ẏ twelfth day after Chrisimas. In January ẏ Parliament was holdē at Edēburgh, in which John Lord of the Iles & Erle of Rosse, was attaynted partly for his own euil deedes, but most specially, for ẏ defaultes of his father Donald Lord of the Iles. In May in the yere. 1477. the king rayled a puissant army of the most able mē vpō the North side of the water of Forth, to pursue the Lord of ẏ Iles both by sea & land. The Erle of Crawforde was made Admirall of the army by Sea, and the Erle of Athole, the kings vncle by his father, was Lieutenant of ẏ Army by land. But such means was vsed by ẏ Erle of Athole, that the Lord of ẏ Iles humbled himselfe to the kings pleasure vpon certayn cōditions, & therupon in the beginning of July next ensuing, the said lord of the Iles came to ẏ Parliament vnto Edenburgh, & there was ẏ agreement made & confirmed betwixt the king & him: he resigned into the kings hands all his right which he had to the Erledom of Rosse, ẏ lands of Cantyre & Knapden, which Earledome the king annexed to ẏ Crowne, & pardoned him & his seruants of al offences & transgressions before ẏ day committed, & inuested him of new in ẏ Lordship & Seigniorie of the Iles, & other his lands not released, to holde ẏ same of the king by the seruice of warde and relieke. this yere sent by Pope Sextus into Scotland, to examine by vertue of his cōmission Patrick Graham Archbishop of S. Androwes, whose examination and proues being sent vnto the Pope, hee pronounced him an Heretike, Scismatike, & Symoniake, & declared him accursed, condemning him to perpetual prison: and so he was degraded from all orders, cure, & dignitie of Ecclesiasticall office, and William Schewes Archdeacō of the same sea, was promoted in his place, to whom he was also committed to see him safely kept in prison. He was first sent vnto Saint Colmes Ins, and from thence to Dunfermling, and lastly to Lochleuin, where he dyed, and was buried in S. Sarfis Ile in Lochleuin. The sayd William Schewes was consecrate Archbishop of Sainte Androwes on passion Sunday in Lente, within Holy Rode house, the king being present, & many of the nobles of the Realm. And there ẏ sayde Archbishop receiued ẏ pall, as a signe of his Archbishops dignitie, & so was cōfirmed primate & legate of ẏ Realm, notwithstāding ẏ impediment made against Graham before by the Bishops about ẏ same. This yere also, Alexander Duke of Albany was committed to prison by the king his brother, within ẏ Castel of Edenburgh, through euil counsel, but he brake out & escaped to Dūbar, wher he caused the Castel to be furnished with al necessaries, & leauing his seruants within it, passed himself into France, & was there of ẏ king honorably receyued and louingly intreated. In the beginning of May following, the king besieged ẏ Castel by his Lieutenant the Erle of Auendale, who lost at that siege. 3. good knights, the Lord of Lute, sir John Schaw of Sauche, & the Lorde of Cragiwallace, with ẏ shot of a gun, & John Rāsay was slain with a stone cast by hād. Whē they within saw they could not lōg endure, they left ẏ Castel & fled away by sea, & the Erle of Auandale entred & found it void of al things wherof any accōpt was to be made. make ſuite to haue the Lady Cicill daughter to king Edward, ioyned in mariage with his ſonne Iames ẏ Prince, which was grãted, and ẏ mariage concluded to be ſolemnizate, when ẏ prince of Scotland ſhould come to perfect age: as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it more playnely appeareth.

Doctor Irelande, with a knight, and another religious man, came againe to king James from the French king, to perſwade him to make warre againſt England: and at length, King James & his nobles condiſcended to breake the peace, wherewith Thomas Spens Biſhop of Abirdene that was full tenderly beloued of king Edwarde, and had bin euer a mediator for peace betwixte the kings of England, France, and Scotlãd, and the Duke of Burgoingne, when he heard that warre would folow, he dyed through griefe of mind and melancoly at Edenburgh, in the moneth of Apprill. The king ſente two Heraldes vnto King Edwarde, requeſting him not to ayde the Duke of Burgoingne, nor any other againſt ẏ King of France: for if he did, hee muſt needes ſupporte the Frenchmen by reaſon of ẏ league betwixt France & Scotland, but king Edward would not admit thoſe Heraldes to his preſence, but kept them ſtill without anſwer, till he had ſent forth a nauie of Ships into ẏ Forth before Lieth, Kingorne, and Pettenweme, & thẽ were the Heralds licenſed to returne. The Engliſhe fleete entring the Forth, toke eight great ſhippes which they found in that riuer, and landing at Blacknelle, brent ẏ towne, and a great Barge that lay there at rode, and ſo returned. The king aſſembled an army from all partes of the Realme, and amongſt other, ẏ Lord of the Iles came with a great cõpany: and nowe the king being ready to enter into England, there came to him a meſſenger of king Edward, ſente from a Cardinall Legate that was reſidente as then in England, commanding king James by authoritie apoſtolike, not to proceede any further in his purpoſed iourney, to the ende that peace being obſerued, all Chriſtian Princes might bende their powers againſte the Turke and Infidels. This commaundemente did king James obey, and ſo diſcharged his army, notwithſtandyng, that king Edwarde ſent forth his nauie agayne into the Forth, vnto the Ile of Ins Keith, but they did no hurt, for the countreymen kept them off. The Scottiſh borderers inuaded ẏ Engliſhe marches, deſtroyed townes, and led many priſoners away with them into Scotland. The king of Englande cauſed Berwike to be aſſieged both by ſea and lande all the winter ſeaſon, and ouerthrew a wall that was newly made about it for defence thereof: but the Scottes within it defended the towne for that time ſo ſtoutly, that the enimies might not winne it from them.

The Duke of Albany after his wife was dead which he had married in France, perceyuing him ſelfe not ſo well entreated as before, came ouer into Englande, where king Edwarde receyued him righte honorably, promiſing as ſome haue written, to make him king of Scotlande: & thereupon aſſembled an army of thirtie thouſand mẽ, with a great nauie by Sea to inuade Scotland, and appoynted Captaynes and leaders of the army by land, his owne brother ẏ Duke of Glowceſter, the Duke of Albany and others. The king of Scottes hearing of their approche to inuade his Realme, reiſed a puiſſant army to reſiſt them, and came forward with the ſame vnto ẏ towne of Lowder, where being encamped, the principall nobles of his Realme, as Archembalde Earle of Angus, George Erle of Huntley, John Erle of Lenox, Iames Erle of Buchquhã, Androw lord Grey, Robert Lord Lile, and diuers other, beeing armed, entred the kings lodging, where they accuſed him of diuers things done and practiſed by him contrary to his honor & the common weale of his Realme, and ſpecially, becauſe he vſed yõg counſell of lewde perſons, but worthy and baſe of birth, ſuche as Thomas Cochram, whome of a Maſon, he had made erle of Mar, through whoſe deuiſe and counſell, hee had cauſed to bee coigned certayne money of copper, not conuenient to bee currant in any Realme, which the people refuſed, and ſo great dearth & hunger was reyſed through the countrey. Moreouer, that he would not ſuffer the noble men to come neere his preſence, nor to take their counſell in gouerning the Realme, but geue himſelfe to voluptuous pleaſure, ſetting nought by ẏ Queene his lawfull wife, keeping a naughty hailot called the Dayſie in hir place.

Alſo they layde to his charge, ẏ he had put hys brother the Earle of Mar vnto death, & baniſhed his other brother the Duke of Albany, & therefore they could not ſuffer him and the whole Realme to be longer miſledde by ſuche naughty perſons. And herevpõ they toke Thomas Cochram Erle of Mar, William Roger, and Iames Hommill Taylor, who with others being conuict, were hanged ouer the Bridge at Lowder. Only John Ramſey a yong man of eyghteene yeeres of age, for whome the king made great inſtaunce, was pardoned of life. This done, they returned to Edenburgh, and appoynted the king himſelfe to bee kept in the Caſtel by the Erle of Athole, and in ẏ meane time, the ſecond of Auguſt, they ſente Androw Steward elect Biſhop of Murray, & John Lord Darneley, to the Engliſh army lying then at Tuyder, to take truce for three moneths: but ẏ Dukes of Glowceſter and Albany came forward vnto Reſtalrig, where they encamped without any reſiſtance. The Engliſh nauie lying alſo in the Forth, was readie to aſſiſt their fellowes by land. Herevpon certaine noble men of Scotland,

He was proclaymed also generall Lieutenant to the King: And so the Englishmen returned homewards, and came to Berwike where they hauyng wonne the towne as they passed that wayes into Scotlād, had left the Lord Stanley and sir John Eldrington with foure thousand men, to keepe a siege before the Castell, and nowe they enforced the same: but the Lorde of Halis then Captayne within that Castell, defended it right manfully, sending to the Duke of Albany and other the Lords of the counsell, for reliefe to reise the siege.

The king remaynyng as prisoner in Edenburgh Castell, all things were ordered by the Duke of Albany, Androwe Stewarde Lord of Iuendale Chancellor, & others, till the sayd Duke, ẏ Archbishop of Sainte Androwes, the Chancellor, the Erle of Argile & diuers others wēt vnto Striueling to visit the Queene and Prince, where the Duke was perswaded by the Queene without knowledge thereof giuen to the other, to goe vnto Edenburgh, and to restore the king vnto libertie.

The king is set at libertie.

The Duke accordingly to the Quenes pleasure comming to Edenburgh, besieged the Castell & wanne it, remoued the Earle of Athole, and set ẏ king and all his seruants at libertie, for the which good turne, the king shewed great tokens of loue to his brother the Duke, although it lasted not long. The Earle of Argile, the Bishop of Sainte Androwes, the Chancellor and others which remayned at Striueling, when they hearde those newes, fled into their owne countreys: and shortly after, the Bishop of Sainte Androwes at request of the king, resigned his Bishoprike in fauor of master Androw Steward prouost of Glencloudon, and was content in recompence thereof, with the Bishoprike of Murray. This yeere there was great theft, reife, & slaughter in diuers partes of the Realme, by occasion of the variance betwirt the king and his nobles. The Duke of Albany for that he vnderstood there was poison giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, and therefore stoode in feare of his life, fledde from the Court vnto the Castell of Dunbar, whereby ensewed great discord. The king fearing the displesure of his nobles, gote him also into ẏ Castel of Edenburgh. The Erles of Angus, Buchquhan, and others left the king, and assisted the Duke of Albany. And the king through counsell of certain meane persons whome he had againe taken vnto him, summoned the Duke and others his assistantes to come to answer for such treason as hee had to lay against them, and withall prepared an army to beseege Dunbar, whereof the Duke being aduertised fled into Englande, & afterwardes being accompanyed with the Earle of Dowglas and a great nūber of Englishmen inuaded Scotland vpon the west marches, where many Englishmen were slaine and taken by the resistaunce of the Lards Cokpule, Johnston and others, the Duke was put to flight, and the Erle Dowglas taken and brought to the king, who bycause hee was an aged man and had bin long banished his countrey, was sente to the Abbey of Lundoris, where hee remayned the rest of his dayes, and at length, departing this life, was buried there. The Duke of Albany for the losse of that army, was blamed of the king of England, and therevpō taking a misliking, secretely departed ouer into France by the help of John Liddell, sonne to Sir Iames Liddell knighte, who afterwards lost his life for the same. The Duke was well entertayned in France by the King there: and finally rūning at tilt with Lewes Duke of Orleance, was hurt with the splint of a Speare and thereof died. He left behinde him two sonnes, John Duke of Albany, that was after gouernor and tutor to king Iames the fift, & Alexander that was after Bishop of Murrey and Abbot of Scone. Thys yere the Lords Hume, Torreklis, Oliphant, and Drummond, were made Lordes of the Parliament. In the yeere. 1484. the king sent the Archbishop of Saint Androwes vnto Rome for certayne priuileges which he obteyned. And ẏ same yeere, Pope Innocente the eighte of that name, sent the Bishop of Imola to treate of peace betwirt Richarde King of Englande and Iames king of Scotlād. Iames king of Scottes hauing not long before made diuers incursions & roades into England, and that to his profite, hee sewed therevpon for a truce, which came to passe euen as king Richarde wished, so that condiscending to haue a communication, commissioners were appoynted for both partes to meete at Nōtyngham ẏ seuenth day of September nexte ensuing.

Commissioners appointed on the behalfe of the king of England and Scotlande for a peace at Notyngham

chybald Myrtclaw Archdeacon of Lawden, and Secretary to king Iames, Lyon king of armes, and Duncan Dundas. For king Richard, there came Richard Biſhop of S. Aſaph, Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Henry Erle of Northumberlande, Thomas Lord Stanley, George Stanley Lord Straunge, Iohn Gray Lord Powes, Richarde Lord Fitzhugh, Iohn Gunthorpe, keeper of the Kings priuie ſeale, Thomas Barrow maſter of the Rolles, ſir Thomas Bryan chiefe iuſtice of ẏ common place, Sir Richarde Ratcliſe Knighte, William Catesby, & Richard Salkeld Eſquires. Theſe counſellers in the latter end of September after ſundry meetings and communications had togither, concluded (as followeth) a peace to bee had betwixt both the Realmes for ẏ ſpace of three yeres, the ſame to begin at the riſing of the ſunne on the. 29. of September in the yeere. 1484. and to continue vnto the ſetting of the ſunne on the. 29. of September, in the yeere. 1487. during whyche tearme, it was agreed, that not onely all hoſtilitie and warre ſhuld ceaſſe betwixt ẏ two Realmes, but that alſo al ayde and abaitement of enimies ſhould be auoided, and by no colorable meanes or way in any caſe vſed. The towne and Caſtell of Barwike to remayne in the Engliſhmens hãds, for the ſpace of the ſayde tearme, with the ſame boundes as the Engliſhmen poſſeſſed it at that ſeaſon, when it was deliuered to the Scottiſhmẽ by king Henry the ſixt. It was likewiſe condiſcended, that all other Caſtels, holdes, and forteſſes during the tearme of the ſayde three yeeres, ſhould abide in the hands of thoſe that held them at that preſent, the Caſtell of Dũbar only excepted. This Caſtell of Dunbar was deliuered vnto the Engliſhmen by the Duke of Albany, when he fled into France, and ſo remained in their hãds at that time of concluding this truce. Herevpon (by reaſon the Scottiſh commiſſioners had not authoritie to conclude any ful agreement for that Caſtell, vnleſſe the ſame might be reſtored vnto ẏ king their maſters hands) it was accorded, that if the king of Scots within the ſpace of. 40. dayes next enſewing, did intimate his reſolute refuſall to be agreeable, that the ſayd Caſtell ſhoulde remayne in the Engliſhmens hands aboue ẏ ſpace of ſixe moneths, that then during that tearme of ſixe moneths, thoſe that kepte the Caſtell for the Engliſhmen ſhould remayne in quiet, and not be troubled nor moleſted by any kind of meanes by the ſayde King of Scottes, or any other by hys procurement, ſo that they within ẏ Caſtell likewiſe abſteyned from making any iſſues or reiſſes vpon the Scottiſhe people. And if after that the ſayd tearme of ſixe moneths were once expired, it ſhould chance, that any warre aroſe for defending or recouering the ſayd Caſtell, yet the truce ſhuld endure for all other rightes and poſſeſſions, notwithſtãding that it might be lawfull to do what lay in any of their powers, eyther for winning, or defending the foreſaid Caſtel, as though no truce had bene concluded. It was further agreed, that no traytor of eyther Realme ſhoulde be receyued by ẏ Prince of ẏ other Realm, and if any traytor or Rebell chanced to arriue in eyther Realme, the Prince thereof to deliuer him vpõ demaũd made. Scottes already abiding in England & ſworne to the king there, may remain ſtil, ſo their names be certified to ẏ Scottiſh King, within. 40. days. If any Warden of eyther Realm ſhuld inuade ẏ others ſubiects, he to whome ſuch Wardẽ is ſubiect, ſhal within ſixe days proclaime him traytor, & certifie the other Prince thereof within. 12. days. And in euery ſafeconduct this clauſe ſhoulde be conteyned. Prouided alwayes that the obteynor of this ſafeconduct be no traytor. If any of the ſubiects of eyther Prince do preſume to aide, help, mainteyne, or ſerue any other Prince againſt any of the contractors of this truce, then it ſhall be lawfull to him, to whome hee ſhewed himſelfe enimie, to apprehende and attach the ſayd ſubiect, going, comming, or tarying within any of hys dominions. Colleagues comprized in this truce (if they woulde aſſente thereto) on the Engliſhe part were theſe, the king of Caſtell and Leon, the king of Aragone, ẏ king of Portingale, ẏ Archduke of Auſtrich and Burgoine and the Duke of Britaine. On the Scottiſhe parte, Charles the French king, Iohn King of Denmarke & Norway, the Duke of Gelderlãd & the Duke of Britayne. The Lordſhip of Lorne in the Realme of Scotland, and the Iland of Lunday lying in the riuer of Seuerne, in the Realme of Englande, were not comprehended in this agreement. This concord, peace, and amitie thus concluded, was appoynted to be publiſhed ẏ firſt day of October, in the moſt notable cities and townes of both the Realmes. For ẏ ſure obſeruation, keeping & performance of this truce and league, there were appointed for conſeruators on ẏ Scottiſh ſide Dauid Earle of Crawford & Lord Lindley, George Erle of Huntley Lord Gordon and Badzenath, Iohn Lord Darnlye, Iohn Lord Kenedy, Robert Lord Lile, Patrick Lord Haleene, Laurence Lord Oliphant, William Lorde Borthwike, ſir Iohn Roſſe of Halkheld, ſir Gilbert Johnſon of Elphynſton, ſir Iohn Lundy, ſir Iohn Ogiluy of Irly, ſir Robert Hamilton of Fingalton, Sir Willam Balze of Lamington, ſir Iohn Kenedy of Blarqhone, ſir Iohn Wemes, ſir Rochewen, Edward Stochton of Kirke paty, Iohn Dũdas, Iohn Roſſe of Mountgrenan Eſquires.

For ẏ Scots, the Lorde Kenedy, the Lord Mountgomery, the Lord Lile, John Maxwel Steward of Annandale, Robert Creichton of Sanquhan, or three of them. Alſo, there were aſſigned commiſſioners to meete at Roydenborne for the Eaſt marches, the firſt day of December, and at Haldan Stanke for the middle marches on the fourthe daye of the ſame moneth. At which two places for Scotlād there were aſſigned to appeare the Earle of Hūtley, the Erle of Angus, the Erle of Argyle Chācellor of Scotlād, the Lord Iuandale, the Lord Seyton, the Lord Oliphaunt, the Lord Stobhal with other. For Englād, the Erle of Northumberland, the Lord Greyſtocke, the Lorde Scrope of Mallan, ſir William Gaſcoigne, ſir Roberte Conſtable and other. The ſame Commiſſioners had authoritie to aſſigne certayn perſons, to view and declare the bounds and limits appertayning to Berwike, according to the true meaning of the league. For the battell grounde it was accorded, that the ſame ſhoulde remayne without ſowing, or earing, building, or inhabiting, as it had done before. Shortly after ẏ concluding of thys truce, King Richard entreated for a marriage to be had betwixte the Prince of Rothſay, eldeſt ſonne to king James and Lady Anne de la Pole, daughter to John Duke of Suffolke, and to the Lady Anne his wife, that was ſiſter to the ſayde King Richard. For the concluding of this marriage, both the Kings ſent their Ambaſſadours agayne vnto Notyngham, where their treatie had ſuche ſucceſſe for that time, that the marriage was agreed vpon, and writings therof drawen, engroſſed, and ſealed, and affiances made and taken by procurors and deputies on both partes. The foreſayd yong Lady was immediately called Princes of Rothſay; but by the ſhort life of King Richarde hir vncle, ſhe ſhortly after loſt that name.

King James within a while after the concluſion of this league and marriage aforeſayde, for the expreſſing and declaring of his opinion touching the Caſtell of Dunbar, whether he woulde be agreeable that the ſame ſhould remayne onely ſixe moneths, or elſe during the tearme of ẏ whole truce in the Engliſhmēs poſſeſſion, he wrote vnto King Richard a louing letter, ſignifying vnto him, that he was not minded to ſeeke the recouerie of the ſayd caſtell by force of armes, but rather to leaue it in his hand, during the whole terme of the truce, neuertheleſſe, he inſtantly required hym for the bonde of that loue and familiaritie, which nowe by treatie and aliance was ſprong vp betwixt them, that he would redeliuer the ſaid Caſtell into his handes, according as reaſon might moue him thereto, conſidering the Engliſhmen had no right to it, being only deliuered to them by traitors of their natiue coūtrey, without any reaſonable cauſe, or commiſſiō lawfully authoriſed.

King Richard vſed in this matter with pleaſant letters & faire wordes, ſo feeding forth King James without minding to gratifie him in that ſuite, ſo that as long as king Richard liued, king James could neuer get it, for any thing he might do. In the yeere. 1486. Henry Erle of Richmont comming out of France with a power of men, of the whiche Bernard Stewarde a Scottiſhman was chiefe Captaine, landed in Wales, & paſſing through ẏ cuntrey into Englād, at lēgth encoūtred King Richard & ſlew him, ſo obtayning the Crowne of that Realm. And after he was ſomewhat quietly eſtabliſhed in the ſame, he came into the North partes where hee remayned the moſte part of the next ſommer, and regarding nothing more than to haue ẏ loue & friendſhip of his neyboꝛs, & to be confederate with the Kings & Princes ioyning next vnto him, he ſent from Newcaſtell one of his counſellors Richard Fore Biſhop of Exceter, and ſir Richard Edgecombe knight, Ambaſſadors vnto King James, to treat cōtract & renew the band of peace & truce betwixt the ſaid Kings and their Realmes. Theſe Ambaſſadors were gladly receiued of King James, who declared vnto them, ẏ he bare great fauor & loue vnto their maiſter, & woulde be glad to pleaſure hym in al he might: howbeit, that his ſubiects were not of ſo good a mind towards the Engliſh nation as he himſelfe wiſhed, & therefore he willed them to bee contented with a truce for ſeuen yeres, for further he could not do, for doubt to offend his nobilitie & ſubiects: but he promiſed ſecretly, that when thoſe ſeuen yeeres were expired, hee woulde renue the ſame for the tearme of other ſeauen yeeres, and ſo from ſeuen yeres to ſeuen yeres ſo lōg as he liued. This he did, becauſe he perceyued that his people had him in ſuch hatred, that they would not conſent to any band that he ſhuld make: the Ambaſſadors perceiuing his good meaning toward king Henry, confirmed the truce for thoſe ſeuen yeeres, and ſo returned home to King Henry, who was right glad of that they had done.

King Richard would not deliuer the Caſtell of Dunbar.

Immediately after that this truce was thus concluded betwixt ẏ two Realmes, king James cauſed the three eſtates to aſſemble in Parliamēt at Edinburgh ẏ firſt of October in the yere. 1487. in the which order was take, ẏ iuſtice eares ſhuld be holden through all partes of the Realm, & that no pardons ſhuld be granted for any great crime that ſhuld be cōmitted for the ſpace of ſeuē yeres to coue, ſo that the king began to vſe ſharp execution of Iuſtice in all parts, which was right diſpleſant to many. ling in of a letter of Marque, which had bin grãted againſt Scottiſh Merchants, at the ſuite and inſtance of certayne Hollanders & Burgonions, and was ſhortly after hereupon reuoked. After ẏ Parliament was ended, the King remoued vnto Striueling, leauing his wife the Queene, and his ſonne the Prince in Edenburgh Caſtell, whileſt he keeping perſons about him of meane calling, gaue himſelfe to take his pleaſure with women, and to gather vp golde and ſiluer, greatly to the offence of his ſubiects. Yet in the mean time now after the death of king Richarde, whether it was by treaſon or appoyntment, the Caſtell of Dunbar was deliuered to the hands of king James, & that to his greate ioy and high contentation: for he that ruled his kingdome more with rigor than with any tractable mean of fauorable iuſtice, ſtood euer in feare of ſome troubleſome tumult ẏ might be raiſed by his own people, if occaſiõ were miniſtred either through hope of forrayn aide or otherwiſe. So long therefore as this Caſtell was in ẏ Engliſhmens handes, he doubted, leaſt through practiſe ſome conſpiracie ſhould be contriued betwixt his own ſubiects and the Engliſh nation, greatly to the anoyance of his eſtate, and therupon he was the more deſirous to reduce the ſame Caſtell into his poſſeſſion. But the only mean to haue aſſured himſelfe from the handes of ſuch as ſought his life, had bin to haue changed his wilful maner of gouernemẽt, and to haue leaned vnto ſuch councell as would haue aduiſed him for ẏ wealth of his whole Realme, & not vpon deſire to pleaſe, haue maynteyned his vndiſcreet opiniõs to ẏ wronging aſwel of his commõs as of ẏ nobles & peeres of his Realm: for ẏ nobilitie of Scotlãd, namely, the Earles of Angus, Argile, & Lennox, the Lords Halis, Hume, Drowmound, Grey and others, perceyuing themſelues oppreſſed by ſuche as frõ baſe birth had riſen, (without worthy deſeruing) to the degree of counſellors, and therwith aduanced to ſo high authoritie, as al things were ordered at their appoyntment, conſpired togither, & determined by force of armes to ſee a reformation in ſuch a diſordred manner of gouernement: but yet bycauſe it ſhould not be thought that they minded the deſtruction of their countrey, but rather ẏ aduancement thereof, they made the Lorde James Duke of Rothſay ſonne to the King (a child borne to goodneſſe & vertue) the chiefe Captayne in this their enterpriſe, & that in maner againſt his wil, hereby openly proteſting, that they minded & purpoſed the ſuppreſſing & confuſion of an euil king, & not ẏ ſubuerſion of their native cõtrey. By which their craftie imagined inuention, they thought to remoue all ſuſpition of their purpoſed vntroth & ſhamefull diſloyaltie. They had ſente to the Earle of Dowglas, who remayned priſoner (as ye haue heard) in the Abbey of Lundoris, and required him to aſſiſt them in their begun enterpriſe, promiſing that they would reſtore him againe to his lands and former dignitie, and honor him as principall of their faction. But that noble, wiſe, & ancient Erle, being already ſchooled with troubles, and hauing learned by experience to his great griefe what ſuch matter meant, refuſed to breake his warde, or to aſſiſt them in any wiſe, diſwading them from their enterpriſe, bycauſe it ſeemed to him neither godly nor honorable, ſithence both himſelfe and his friends had taſted for ẏ like, great hinderãce, which might be an enſample to him & others to beware in time to come. The King being once enformed of this rebelliõ & conſpiracie againſt him, was ſore diſquieted in his mind, & to mete their miſchieuous attempts, gathered an army. Yet before the bring of any force, he ſent meſſengers to his ſon, & to the nobles w̃ him, to trie if he might come to ſome agreemente with them. He ſente alſo letters to the king of England, & to the French king, requiring thẽ to take ſome paines in ẏ matter, to procure an atonement betwixt him and his nobles. And beſides this, he wrote to Pope Innocent for ẏ ſame purpoſe, praying him to intermeddle his authorizie by ſending ſome legate into Scotlãd, to appeaſe the troubles thereof. But the Scottiſh nobilitie, & ſuch of the people as were vp in armour againſte him, were ſo deſperately ſet & wholly bent on reuẽge, that no wholeſom counſell nor medicinable aduice might appeaſe their furious rage, ſo that for anſwere to his meſſengers, they ſent him worde, that if he would reſigne the title of his Crowne & Realm, & depoſe himſelfe of his whole regall dignitie, then they would come to ſome cõmunication with him, or elſe not. The like anſwere was giuẽ to ẏ Ambaſſadors of England and France, that were ſente vnto them from ẏ Kings of both thoſe Realmes, which ſore lamented the fortune of their friend & alie the Scottiſh king. But Adrian ẏ Biſhop of Romes Legate came too late, as who ſhuld ſay, a day after ẏ fayre: for when their groũded malice & ſpiteful hatred cõceyued againſt him might not bee qualified by any manner of meanes, but ẏ they wer now cõming forward w̃ al their puiſſance to Striueling where he then remayned, he would not ſtay til ẏ Erles of Huntley Errole, Athole, Crawfort, Rothus, Sutherlãd, Cathnes, & Marſhall, the Barõs Forbes, Gilquy, Granth, Frayſer and other, were arriued with their powers, amounting to the number of fortie thouſand men with the which they were cõming forth of ẏ North partes to his aide, but raſhly, & without good aduice he iſſued out of the town, accompanied with the Erles of Glencarne & Montros, the Lordes Graham, Ruthuen, Maxwell, and certayne others, and forthwith ioyned battell with hys aduerſaries at Bannockes-burne, within two miles of Striueling: and ſo when nothing mighte quiet them, at length they met thus in a pitched fielde, where after greate ſlaughter and murder made of an huge multitude of people, the King beeing put to the woorſe fledde into a Mill, whither beeing fiercely followed and founde therein, hee was cruelly ſlayne, and vnreuerently left ſtarke naked: A notable mirror to all earthly princes, that calling to remembrance ſuch a miſerable and moſt dolorous ſight, they may take heede by what manner of perſons they ſuffer them ſelues to be led and abuſed. For if this Prince King James the third had not followed vpon a wilfull pretence and obſtinate minde the councell and aduice of vauntperlors, & ſuche as (being aduanced from baſe degree vnto high authoritie) ſtudyed more to keepe them ſelues in fauoure, than to giue true aduertiſementes, and faithfull aduiſe vnto their Prince, he myghte haue reigned longer by many dayes and yeeres, in great and high felicitie.

Iames.

NOwe then, after that the Barons of Scotland hadde thus ſlayne their ſouereigne Lorde and liege King James, the third of that name: his eldeſt ſonne James the fourth was crowned King of Scotlande, and beganne hys raigne the. 24. of June, in the yeere. 1488. being not paſt ſixteene yeeres of age, who notwithſtanding that he had bin in the fielde with the Nobles of the Realme againſte his father that contrary to his mind was ſlayne, yet neuertheleſſe afterwardes, he became a ryght noble Prince, and ſeemed to take great repentãce for that his offence, and in token thereof, he ware continually an Iron chayne about hys middle all the dayes of his life. He was greatly giuen to deuotion and prayer, viſiting religious houſes, and beſtowing on them ſundry giftes.

The King was repentãt.

The King wore an yron chayne.

Was giuen to deuotion.

He gouerned his Realme in greate reſt, peace, Juſtice and quietneſſe, riding him ſelfe in proper perſon diuers dayes and nightes, to ſuppreſſe and take theeues, robbers, and oppreſſors of his ſubiects in all parts of the Realm, til he had brought the countrey to great quietneſſe.

He was a great iuſticer.

He was learned and liberal, and endewed with many other good vertues and qualities.

He was learned.

Anone after his Coronation, ỳ Earle of Lennor, and the Lord Lille, with diuers other theyr aſſiſtantes, notwithſtanding that they had bene with him at the ſlaughter of his father, ſeing that things went not as they wiſhed, reiſed an army, & cauſed the dead Kings bloudy ſhirt to be borne afore thẽ for a Banner: and comming forwards towardes Striueling againſte the yong King, were ouerthrowen at Tolymoſſe, where ỳ Lennor men, and ſundry other of the Barons ſide were ſlayne, as the Lorde of Kiltrucht and other taken and hanged for their offences.

The nobles rayſe an army againſt him.

They were ouerthrowen.

The King called a Parliament at Edinburgh, which was holden the ſixt of October, where hee being moued of clemencie, graunted a generall pardõ to al thoſe that came in field at Striueling wt his father againſt him, & appoynted euery one to haue ſpeciall pardons therupõ vnder his ſeales.

A Parliament.

A generall pardon.

He likewiſe diſpenſed with the heires of them that were ſlayne with his father there in field, appoynting thẽ their particuler diſpenſations vnder his ſeales, after the ſame manner. Further it was ordeyned, that all Juſtices, Sheriffes, Stewards, Baylifes, Lieuetenants, and other which had offices ces in heritage, and had bene with his father at the fielde, shoulde bee suspended from the same offices for the tearme of three yeares: and those which had offices for life, or for tearme of yeares, should be vtterly excluded from the same.

Moreouer, he toke order that all such goodes as had beene taken from landed men and burgesses, should be restored to them againe, except that which was taken from such landed men and burgesses as were in the fielde agaynst him, for that was deemed a lawfull pray.

It was also iudged that the death of his father came vppon him through his owne default, and that king James the fourth then raigning, and al his adherents and partakers in that field were innocent and guiltlesse of all slaughter made there at that time, and clearely acquit of al pursuit and occasion thereof, the three estates graunting to giue their seales to testifie the same, with ỹ kings great seale of the realme to be shewed to the Pope, the kings of France, Spaine, Denmarke, and other princes their confederates.

And for the cealling of theft, reif, and such other great enormities, the king was appoynted to ryde in person once euerie yeare through all partes of the Realme. And certaine noble men were ordeyned to exercise iustice in euerie shire next adioyning to the places where they had theyr chiefe residence: and hereunto they gaue their othes to be diligent in the administration of iustice.

Those ordinances were right well obserued all the dayes of king James the fourth his life tyme, so that the realme was reduced to great tranquillitie, and gouerned in good peace and iustice.

Furthermore, all giftes made by his father in preiudice of the crowne, were reuoked, from the seconde day of Februarie immediately preceeding his death, to the day in which he was slaine.

Also an Esquier, and an Heralde were sente into Fraunce, Spaine, and other places, to learne where the king might bee a suter for some greate Ladie to ioyne with him in mariage.

Moreouer beside these, there were sent honourable Imbassadors into Fraunce, Spaine, and Denmarke, to renue the olde amities and leagues betwixt those Realmes and Scotland, as had bin vsed in the dayes of this kings progenitors.

His two brethren, the Duke of Rossay, and the Earle of Mar, he caused to be brought vp in good nuriture and vertuous exercise, appointing to them such liuings for maintenaunce of their estates, as his father had assigned them.

For his Counsell he chose a certaine number of the Prelates, noble men, and barons of his realm, such as were thought most meetest, taking thys order, that fiue of them at the least shoulde continually remaine aboute him, by whose aduise hee shoulde do all things that touched the affayres of the Realme: and in case anye thing was done without their aduice, the same shoulde be adiudged voyde, and not to be obeyed, and this was inviolably kept all his dayes.

When the Esquier and Heralde were returned againe into Scotland, which had beene to visite straunge Countreys, and made report of that they had seene, there was a Parliament holden, in which it was ordeined that the Bishop of Glasco, the Erle Bothwell, and others should go as Imbassadours to sue for the kings mariage in place where it shoulde be most expedient, and moste to the kings lyking. 1491

Great variance rose betwixt the Archbishop of Saint Androwes, and the Bishop of Glasco, touching the prehemineuce of theyr iurisdiction, which drewe the noble men into factions, tyll the king commaunded the same to ceasse, and that they should trie it by law afore competent iudges. Two Archbishops striue for the prehemineuce.

The king about the same time toke order for the encrease of some number of shippes to bee had in his Realme, and that euery hauen towne should build some aswel for fishing, as to transport marchandise from place to place. Prouision is made for shippes.

The Lordes and Barons, and such other as woulde, were commaunded to helpe the Marchantes towarde the buylding of suche shippes: and for good ensample, the king caused to make certain shippes at his owne charges, which might vse the trade of fishing.

Moreouer, the king considering the ignorance that was amongest the landed men of his realme when they should passe vpon Inquests, he ordeyned that euery landed man shoulde put his eldest sonne to schole, that he might learne perfitely the lawes of the realme, & this vpon great forfeyture. Prouision made for learning.

Thus in the beginning of his raigne, diuerse good lawes and constitutions were made for the aduauncement of the common wealth, which he caused to be duely obserued and kept during hys tyme.

The Pope sent a Protonotarie called Forman into Scotland, with a Rose and a Sceptre of gold, to be presented vnto the king, desiring him to persever in godlinesse, honour, and vertue, as he had begonne. A Protonotary sent into Scotlande with a Rose.

The most part of this yeare, the king spent in rydyng abrode through all partes of his realme to see iustice ministred, specially in the North parts, where the people are comonly furthest out of order. 1492 The king goeth on progresse.

There was shortly after some appearance of warres betwixt Englande and Fraunce, whereupon king Charles sent vnto king James, requiring him of assystance, if it came to passe that the English men did inuade France: and further declared, that he had one with him called Richarde Duke of Yorke, seconde sonne to king Edwarde the fourth, who had beene preserued now many yeares secretely by his Aunt Margaret Duches of Burgoin, and therfore was iust inheritor vnto the realm of England, whō he would send into Scotlande, praying the king to assyst him to recouer his rightfull heritage, the said realme of England. And shortlye after herevpon, the sayde feyned Duke (whose ryght name was Perkin Warbecke as in the Englishe Hystorie it appeareth) arriued in Scotlande well and honourably accompanied, to trie what purchase he might make there for succours to attayne his pretended right to the crowne of Englande.

Perkyn Warbecke.

This Perkyn Warbecke did vse the matter in suche subtill wyse, that King James eyther gyuing, or seeming to gyue credite to his words, after aduise and deliberation had and taken wyth hys Counsell, receyued him in honourable wyse, naming and reputing him Duke of Yorke, and therefore promised him to ayde him in all that he myght, and shortlye after, hee maryed hym to his neare kynneswoman the Ladie Katheryn, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, and moreouer, raysed a great armie, specially of the borderers, and with the same hauing this pretensed Duke in companie wyth him, inuaded England, burnt townes, spoyled houses, toke great bootes and riche prayes both of goodes and prisoners, and allecked with the sweetnesse of such spoyle and gain, wasted al the Countrey of Northumberland, and had gone further, but that he coulde perceyue no ayde comming in vnto this new found Duke, cōtrarie to suche golden promises as he had made, that assone as they were entred into Englande, there would flocke vnto him both of the nobilitie and commons, and that in great numbers.

King Iames returneth without proffer of battaile.

King Iames perceyuing no suche matter, thought it better to returne with assured gaine, than to tarie this newe sprong Dukes doubtfull and vncertaine victorie.

And so hauing his people laden and pestered wyth spoyle and prysoners, he drewe backe into Scotlande.

A rebellion in Cornwale.

The king of England aduertised hereof, made preparation for the raysing of an armie, meaning to send the same against the Scottes: but the rebellion of the Cornish men which chaunced the same tyme about a taxe leuied then of the people, constrayned him to imploye that armye to represse the enterprise of those rebelles. Yet neuertheless he sent the Erle of Surrey to the borders, that with the power of the Countrey adioyning, he might defende the same from the inuasions of the Scottes, if they attempted to breake in. And so the Earle lay on the borders all that yeare.

King James then perceyuing that no maine armie came against him, inuaded eftsoones the borders of England, and layde siege to the Castell of Norham, sending hys lyght Horsemen abroade into Northumberlande, and the Bysshoprike of Durham, where they burned and spoyled all aboute in the Countrey: But hearing that the Earle of Surrey had raysed an armye, and was comming towardes them, they returned to the Hoste lying before Norham, where King James perceyuing he coulde not wynne the Castell, notwythstanding hee had done greate hurte and domage thereto, hee raysed hys siege, retyred into hys Countrey, and left greate companyes on the borders for defence thereof. And so before the comming of the Englishe armye, King James was returned.

The Scots inuade the borders of England.

The Earle of Surrey rayseth an army.

The Scottes rayse their siege.

The Earle of Surrey yet (as the Englishe writers affyrme) followed into Scotlande, and toke diuerse Castels & towers remayning within the Countrey, the space of fiue or seuen dayes, and then came backe without battaile or any notable skirmish offered.

The Earle of Surrey went into Scotland.

About

Aboute the same time was one Peter Hialas sent Ambassadoz from Ferdinando K. of Spaine to treate as a Mediatoz foz the concluding of peace betwixt the kings of Englande and Scotlande, which Hialas trauayled so earnestly in the matter, that at length it was agreed, that certain Commissioners of both the realmes should meete at Melrosse, where foz the king of England, doctoz Fox, then Bishop of Durham, with this Hialas, and other graue personages met the Scottish Commissioners.

After long conference and much talke had, foz the conclusion of a generall peace, finally nothing but a truce might be accozded foz certaine yeares, though Hialas did what hee possible might, to haue agreed them foz all maner of matters, quarels, demaundes and causes, what soeuer the same had beene, that a perpetual peace might haue bene concluded, bycause he was cheifely sent foz that intent.

The king of Englande requyzed to haue the counterfeyte Duke of Yozke (otherwise named Perkin Warbecke) deliuered vnto him: but king James (esteeming his honour moze than anye earthly thing) woulde in no wise seeme to betray him that fled to him foz succoz, and with whome he had coupled one of his owne kinneswomen in mariage, but he was contented to couenant, that the same Perkyn shoulde be constrayned to depart out of Scotland, and not to be further ayded by him, oz by any other through his meanes oz procurement.

The king of Scottes to keepe promise made in the sayde treatie of peace, and knowing himself to be abused by the sayde Richarde, whom he had reputed to be verily Duke of Yozke, although hee was not so, called him befoze his presence, and declared to him the greate fauour and good wyll which he had bozne towardes him, putting him in remembzaunce that foz his sake he had taken warre in hande agaynst Englande, and inuaded the Countrey in hope of assystance by his friends within the lande, where not one resozted to him. And albeit he had maried his neare kinswoman, yet might he not keepe longer warre with Englande foz his sake onely, except he might be sure of some ayde through his meanes, wherof he could see no appearance.

He desired him therefoze to withdzaw fozth of his Realme, eyther into Flanders to his mothers sister the Ladie Margaret, oz into some other place where it pleased him to abide, and expecte some better time moze conuenient foz his purpose. The sayde Richarde gaue the king thankes, and obayed his pleasure, departing shortly after out of Scotland, and sayled into Ireland, from thence to transpoze into Flaunders. But finally making an attempt into Englande, he was taken prisoner in the Abbay of Beaulieu togither with his wife, whose beautie was such, as king Henrie thought hir a moze meete pray foz an Emperoz, than foz souldiers, and therefoze vsed hir right honourably, appoynting hir to remaine in the court with the Queene his wife: where shee continued so long as the sayde king lyued.

This yeare the peace being well kept betwixt England and Scotland, the same was neare at poynt to haue beene broken, by reason that the English men which lay in garison within the castell of Noxham, did make a fray with certaine Scottish men that came ryding neare to the Castell as it had bene to haue viewed it, but although they ment no euill, yet diuerse of the Scottishmen were slaine, and many wounded and soze hurt, so that king James hauing information therof, was soze displeased therwith, thinking and saying that there was no moze vncertaine thing, than to haue peace with Englande. And hereupon he sent his Heralde Merchmount with sharpe and behement letters vnto the king of Englande, making great complaint foz this iniurie and wzong done to hys subiects by those within the Castell of Noxham, but receyuing moste reasonable letters foz excuse of that which was done, as well from the king of Englande himselfe, as from the Bishop of Durham owner of the Castell, hee was indifferently well appeased and satisfied, so that he requyzed to haue the Bishop to come into Scotlande vppon safeconduct to common with him, as well foz the full quieting of this matter, as foz other things which he had to talke with him of.

The Bishop by licence of the king his master accomplished the Scottish kings request, so that comming into Scotland, he was receyued by him right honourably at Melrose, where after certain talke had betwixt them foz the appeasing of thys last displeasure, the king brake with the Bishop foz the hauing of the Ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to Henrie the seuenth, as then king of England, to be giuen him in mariage: and further declared that he was minded to sende his Oratozs vnto hir father the sayde king Henry about the same matter.

And fozasmuch as he knewe that the Bishop was one that might doe much with king Henrie, who highly fauozed him foz his singular wisdom, and learning, he desired him to be a meane to further his sute, which if it were obteyned, he trusted should highly redounde to the honour and wealth of both the Realmes.

The Bishop considering herein as muche as the king was able to tell him, did not onely promise to doe all that in him lay, but also encouraged him to sende his Ozatozs with all speede, trusting that they should receyue a right towardly answere.

The truce like to be broken.

King Iames requireth to talke with the Bishop of Durham.

King Iames purposeth to be a suter fot mariage in England.

King James following the Biſhops aduiſe, anone after his returne into Englande, ſent certaine perſons Imbaſſadours vnto King Henry, to moue him to the effect aboue mentioned.

Ambaſſadors ſent into Englande.

Theſe Imbaſſadors were highly welcomed, & verie well heard, ſo that to be briefe, their requeſt ſeemed ſo agreeable to king Henries minde, that the mariage was ſhortly thereupon concluded, (but not conſummate betwixt the foreſaid James king of Scotlande, and the ſayd Ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie, in the. xvij. yeare of the ſayd king Henries raigne.

A mariage concluded betwixt king Iames and the Lady Margaret.

At the ſame time, when this mariage was ſo agreed vpon, a peace alſo was concluded betwixt the kings of Englande and Scotlande, for the tearme of theyr two lyues. And to auoyde that none of eyther of the ſayde kings ſubiects that had offended the lawes ſhould be receyued into any of theyr dominions, it was accorded that no Engliſh man ſhoulde come within Scotland without his Princes letters ſupplicatorie vnto the king of Scottes, nor any Scottiſh man to come within England without the like letters from his prince, deſiring ſafeconduct and paſſeport.

A peace concluded betwixt England and Scotland.

In the yeare nexte enſuing, the Biſhoppe of Glaſgew, the Earle Bothwell, and other noble men of Scotlande, were ſent in Imbaſſade from king James vnto the king of Englande, for the perfiting of the foreſayde mariage betwixt King Iames, and the Ladie Margaret, eldeſt daughter to king Henrie, which Earle by letters of procuracie and Mandate, in the name of his maiſter king James, affied and handfaſted the foreſayde Ladie Margaret in all ſolemne wiſe, according to the maner: which aſſurance and contract thus made, was publiſhed at Paules Croſſe in London, on the day of the conuerſion of Saint Paule, in reioyſing whereof Te Deum was ſung, and Fiers made, with great feaſting and banketting throughout that Citie.

This was the yeare. 1501

This done, the Imbaſſadors returned into Scotlande, and then afterwardes was great preparation made in Englande for the conueying of the ſayde Ladie into Scotlande: and lykewyſe great purueyance there for the receyuing of hir.

The. xvj. of June, King Henrie toke hys iourney from Richmont with his daughter the ſayde Lady Margaret, and came to Colweſton, where his mother the Counteſſe of Richmont then lay. And after he had remayned there certaine dayes in paſtime and great ſolace, he toke leaue of hys daughter, giuing hir his bleſſing with a fatherly exhortation, and committed the conueyance of hir into Scotland vnto the Earle of Surrey and others.

The Erle of Northumberlande as then warden of the Marches, was appoynted to deliuer hir vpon the borders vnto the king of Scotland. And ſo this fayre Ladie was conueyed with a greate company of Lordes, Ladies, knightes, Eſquiers, and Gentlemen, vntill ſhe came to the towne of Barwike, and from thence vnto Lambert kirke in Lamermoze within Scotland, where ſhe was receyued by the King and all the Nobles of that realme, and from the ſayde place of Lamberton kirke, ſhe was conueyed vnto Edenbourgh, where the day after hir comming thither, ſhe was maried vnto the ſayde king with great and ſolemne tryumph, to the highe reioyſing of all that were preſent, and verily the Engliſhe Lordes, (as the Earle of Surrey and others, which gaue their attendance on the ſayd Ladie till the mariage and feaſt were ended) at theyr returne home, gaue greate prayſe, not onely to the manhode of the Scottes, but alſo to theyr maners and heartie intertainment. For aſwell the Noble men as the Ladies and gentlewomen of Scotlande at that preſent, were nothing behind the Engliſh Lordes and Ladies in coſtly apparel, maſſie Chaynes, & other furniture, aſwel for themſelues as their horſes, and made great baukets to the Engliſh men, and ſhewed them ſuch Juſtes and other pleaſant paſtimes in honour of the mariage, ſo well as after the maner of the Countrey coulde be deuiſed. By reaſon of this mariage and aliance, men were in great good hope that perfite peace and ſincere amitie ſhould continue betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland a long time after: and verily during the life of king Henry the ſeuenth, no cauſe of breach was miniſtred betwixt him and his ſonne in law, but that they liued in great loue and amitie.

About this time, the king of Denmark through deuiſion that did riſe betwixt him and his Lordes, was conſtrayned to forſake his Countrey, and to come for ayde into Scotlande, where the king receyued him louingly, and vpon his earneſt ſute, for that he was both his couſin and confederate, and alſo the rather, at the contemplation of the French kings requeſt and perſwaſiõ, he prepared an armie of tenne thouſande men, the whiche vnder the conduct of the Erle of Arrane, he ſent with the ſayde king of Denmarke to aſſiſt him againſt his aduerſaries.

The Earle of Arrane according to his commiſſion, attending the Daniſh king into his coũtrey, reſtored him to his kingdom and former gouernment, and ſo leauing him in peaceable poſſeſſion thereof, returned with his armie againe into Scotland, with great honour both to himſelfe, the king, and realme.

Shortly after was a Parliament called, during the which the Queene was crowned, and many good actes and conſtitutions made, eſpecially touching the lymitting of places where iuſtice ſhould be miniſtred in the Iles and hie lands, whereby it came to paſſe, that the king was aſwel obeyed, and his lawes were as duely obſerued and kept by the hie lande men as by thoſe that dwelled in any part of the low land.

The king then being at peace with England, and iuſtice ſo miniſtred amongeſt his owne ſubiects, that they liued in greate reſt and quietneſſe, certaine of his counſell deuiſed wayes to winne the king great profit and gaynes by calling hys barons and all thoſe that helde any landes within his realme, to ſhew their euidence by way of recognition, and if they had not writings to ſhewe, (accõrding to the auncient inſtrumẽts & lawes of the realm ſufficient for their warrant, the landes ſhoulde remaine at the kings pleaſure: but when the king perceyued his people to grudge herewith, and not without cauſe, as with a thing deuiſed to diſquiet his people and the whole countrey, of his owne curteous and gentle nature, he eaſily agreed with the poſſeſſors of ſuch landes: for the whiche he purchaſed great loue amongeſt his people, and the deuiſors of that ordinaunce wanne paſſing great hatred and malice.

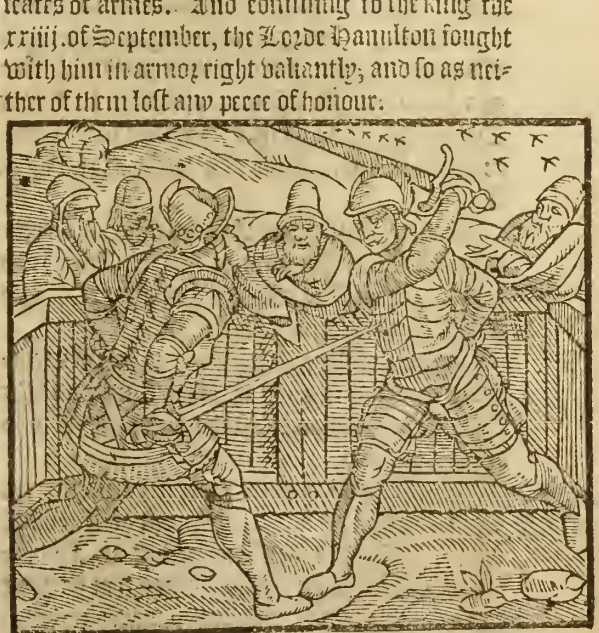
This yeare in May the king helde his court of Juſtice at Lowder, and remouing it to Edenbourgh, there continued the ſame, where the Lord of Thorneton was conuicted for killing his wife, and therefore loſt his head. 1506

There came an Imbaſſadour this yeare alſo from the Duke of Gelderland to renue the league betwixt the King and the ſayde Duke.

Alſo an Heralde came oute of Fraunce that brought newes which the king liked well.

This yeare alſo, the King cauſed a mightie Shippe to be made, the which was put forth into the road the ſeuenth of July, and the king ſayled himſelfe into the May, an Iſlande in the Forth, and was driuen in againe with tempeſt: but the ſame ſhippe was after appoynted forth, and ſent to the Sea with ſundrie valiant Gentlemen in hir to meete with the Hollanders whiche had taken and ſpoyled diuerſe Scottiſh ſhips, and throwne the Marchantes and other that were in the ſayne ouer boorde. For reuenge whereof Andrew Barton toke many ſhippes of the Hollanders and filled certaine Pypes with their heades, whiche he ſent vnto the king for a witneſſe how he had ſped.

A great ſhip made.



The Hollanders ſhips are taken.

Peace and quietnesse in Scotlande.

The whole Realme remayned in such peace and quietnesse in these dayes, that the king rode one day himselfe alone in post from Sterling, by Saint Johns towne, and Aberden, vnto Elgin, and reposing a little part of the night in the house of maister Thomas Leslie then parson of Angus, went to horse againe, and came to Saint Duthois in Rosse, by that tyme they were readie to goe to Masse. Bycause therefore he ment not to conclude any thing in suche a weightie matter withoute consent of his confederates, of which he esteemed king James as chiefe: he required him of his aduise and counsell therein, who after aduisement taken, made answere, that albeit the King of France had sufficient Counsell about him, yet sith he had desired his aduise, he would friendly giue the same: which was, that he should rather marie his daughter within his owne Realme, vnto suche one as shoulde succeede him, than to bestowe hir vpon any forrayne Prince, sithe otherwise some clayme myght bee made in tyme comming vnto the Crowne by suche as shoulde match with hir. And so with this answere the president of Tholous departed, reporting ỹ same at his cõming home vnto the French king, who therupon followed his own determination therin, confirmed and allowed thus by his confederate the king of Scotland.

The king's answere.

The Lorde Obigny died.

The Lord D'obigny toke a sickenesse and died thereof at Corstorphyn, in the Moneth of June, and caused his heart to be sent vnto Saint Ninians in Galloway, bycause he had bowed a pylgrimage thither whilest he remayned the French kings lieutenant in Naples, where he had atchieued many high enterprises agaynst his enimies. His name was Bernard Steward, lieutenant of those men of warre whiche Charles the. viij. of that name king of Fraunce did send with Henrie Erle of Richmond into England, when ỹ same Erle came against king Richard, whom he banquished, and therby got the Crowne. The French King, and the Duke of Gelderlande perceyuing that the king of Englande was mynded through procurement of the Pope and others, to make them warres, eyther of them ſent Ambaſſadors into Scotlande vnto king Iames, requyring his aſſiſtance againſt England: but king Iames mynding to maynteyne peace and concorde betwixt the parties, ſent an Ambaſſador vnto the king of Englande, deſiring him in brotherly and moſte louing wiſe to liue in peace and quietneſſe, and not to make anye warres againſt his confederate friendes, offring himſelfe to take in hande to agree and compound any difference that was fallen betwixt the king of Englande and the ſayde Princes.

King Iames perſwadeth to peace.

The king of Englande who had alreadie ſent ayde vnto the Ladie Regent of the lowe Countreys againſt the Duke of Gelderlande, made ſuch fayre anſwere hereunto as he thought ſtode wyth reaſon, and ſo diſpatched the Ambaſſadour backe againe to his maiſter without any more a doe in that matter, aboute the which he came for that tyme.

The kings baſtard maried.

John Lorde Gordon, ſonne and heyre to Alexander Gordon Earle of Huntley, returned out of Fraunce, and was maried vnto the Kings baſtarde daughter in Nouember following in thys preſent yeare. 1512. of whom the houſe of Huntley is deſcended.

A Sinode kept at Edenburgh.

There was aboute the ſame time a Synode holden in the blacke Friers of Edenbourgh, by the whole Clergie of the Realme, as Biſhops, Abbots, Priors and other Prelates, where there was a Legate of the Popes, who cauſed all the churches that were aboue .xl. pound to be taxed. This was called Bagimunts taſke, whereby the Pope and the king might knowe the value of the benefices, and to haue taxes of the ſame accordingly, as the Pope for his annates and Bulles, and the king when he ſtode in neede. This was conſented and agreed vnto by the Clergie.

Benefices were taxed.

The Biſhop Murrey came home.

Shortly after came the Biſhop of Murrey home, hauing bene at Rome, in Fraunce, and England, bringing with him from the Pope, and the kings of Fraunce and Englande, many good and pleaſant letters: and with him came a clerke of Spaine in Ambaſſade vnto the king.

A yong Prince borne in Scotlande.

This yeare the .xj. day of Aprill, the Queene was deliuered of a yong Prince in the Palace of Luithgo, who was ſhortly after baptiſed, and named Iames the fift Prince of Scotlande and of the Iles, that after ſucceeded his father in the kingdome.

The French king ſent to perſwade the king of Scotland to warres.

The Lorde Dacres, and Doctor Weſt, came in Ambaſſade from the king of Englande, and Monſieur de la Mote came wyth Letters from the French King, to perſwade king Iames to make warre againſt Englande, promiſing him mony, munition, and all other neceſſarie prouiſions of warre.

In his way as he paſſed the Seas towardes Scotlande, he had drowned three Engliſh ſhips, and brought ſeuen away with him vnto Lieth for preyes, in the which were but three Engliſhe men left aliue.

Fourteene priſes of Engliſh men taken.

Shortly after maiſter Iames Ogiluie Abbot of Dryburgh, came forth of France with letters of the like effect.

After this Robert Barton went to the Sea, and in July brought into Scotland .xiij. priſes of Engliſh men which he had taken.

About this ſeaſon, the Earle of Drumwedy was ſlain in Edenbourgh by two perſons, which toke ſanctuarie in holy Rode houſe, and ſo eſcaped. John Earle of Athole deceaſſed the .xix. of September, and Lion Harold king of Armes deceaſſed the firſt of October.

Miſrule exerciſed.

Great miſrule was exerciſed on the borders in this ſeaſon, and therfore the king aſſembled the Lordes in Edenbourgh for reformation thereof, & while they were there, the Queen was brought to bed of a childe, which dyed ſhortly after it was chriſtened.

The Queene brought to bed of a ſonne.

There came a great ſhip into Scotland which the king of Fraunce had ſent vnto the king, laden with artillerie, powder and wines, and then was the league and bande renued betwixt Scotlande and France. The ſame ſhippe landed at Blackneſſe the .xix. of Nouember.

The league renued with France.

King Iames ſent a Purſeuant called Unicorne into Fraunce, and another into Englande called Ilay, which Ilay requyred a ſafeconduct for an Ambaſſador to be ſent from the king hys maiſter vnto the King of Englande, but thys would not be graunted. Vpon the ſayde Ilayes returne, Monſieur de la Mote was ſent backe into France, and with him ſir Water Ogilup, and a meſſenger a meſſenger which the Pope had ſent into Scotlande. And the .xvj. of March next enſuing, Doctor Weſt came as Imbaſſador into Scotlande from the king of England, appoynting that certaine Commiſſioners ſhoulde meete on the borders for redreſſe of all quarels betwixt the two realms, in the Monthe of June next enſuing. And this appoyntment was kept: but no good could be done, as after ſhall appeare.

The King ſent the Biſhop of Murrey into France, to ſignifie vnto the French king the meſſage of the ſayde Doctor Weſt, and other thyings.

In the Moneth of May, there came certaine ſhippes out of Denmarke laden with Gunnes, powder, armour, and other kind of munition.

Alſo Monſieur de la Mote landed in the weſt part of Scotlande, the .xvj. of May, with foure ſhippes fraught with wine and flower, and returned againe the .xx. of the ſame Moneth.

The great Odoncll of Irelano came to king James at Edenbourgh, the firſt of June, offring his friendſhip and ſeruice to him before all other Princes, and ſpecially againſt the king of England: wherupon he was thankfully receyued, honourably entertayned, and richly rewarded. And ſo the band of friendſhip being with him concluded, he returned into his countrey.

The king prepared a great nauie of ſhippes, the principall whereof were the Michael, Margaret, and James. They made ſayle towardes the ſea the .xxvij. of July, and the king ſayled in the Michaell himſelfe, till they were paſt the Ilande of May, James Gordon ſonne to George Earle of Hūtley being one of the captains of the ſame ſhip.

The Commiſſioners met on the borders in June, according to the appoyntment: but becauſe the Engliſhmen would not conſent to make any redreſſe or reſtitution till the .xv. of October next, thinking by that delay and continuance of tyme, they ſhould vnderſtād the ſtate of their kings proceedings in Fraunce, and in the meane time reteyne in theyr handes the Scottiſh mens goodes whirh they had taken both by ſea and land (as the Scottiſh writers affyrme,) the king of Scottes being thereof aduertiſed, ſent Lion king of armes vnto king Henrie then lying at ſiege before Terwine with letters of complaint, commaunding him that if King Henrie refuſed to accompliſhe the contents of his ſayde letters, hee ſhoulde denounce warre vnto him. Wherevpon Lion arryuing in the Engliſhe armie with his cote of armes on his backe, about the middeſt of Auguſt, deſired to ſpeake with the king, and was within a ſhort ſpace by Garter chiefe king at Armes of England, brought to the kings preſence, hauing his nobles and counſellers about him, whert with due reuerence, and ſome good wordes firſt vttred, he deliuered his letters, the tenor wherof enſueth.

The tenor of the king of Scottes letter.

RIght excellent, right high & mightie prince, our deareſt brother and couſin, we cōmaund vs vnto you in our maiſt hartie maner, & receiued fra Raff herauld your letters, quharvntil ye appreue and allow the doings of your cōmiſſioners lately being with ours at the borders of bathe the realmes, for making of redreſſe quhilk is thought to you and your counſel ſhould be continuet & delaet to the .xv. day of October. Als ye write ſlaars by ſee aught not compere perſonally, but by their attourneys, & in your letters with our herauld Iſlay, ye aſcertaine vs ye will naught enter in the treux taken betwixt the maiſt chriſtian king and your father of Aragon, becauſe ye & others of the hale liege nether ſhould nor may take peace, treux nor abſtinence of warre with your cōmon enimy without conſent of all the confederates. And that the Emperor, King of Aragon, yea and euery of you be bounden to make actuall warre this inſtāt ſommer againſt your cōmon enimy. And that ſo to do is cōcluded & openly ſworne in Paules kyrk at London vpō S. Markes day laſt by paſt. And farther haue denied ſafeconduit vpō our requeſts; ỳ a ſeruitor of ours might haue reſorted to your preſence (as our herauld Iſlay reports:) Right excellēt, right high & mightie prince, our deereſt brother & couſin, the ſayd meeting of our & your commiſſioners at the borders was peremptorily appointed betwixt you & vs after diuerſe dietes, for reformation before continued to the cōmiſſioners meeting, to effect that due redreſſe ſhould haue bin made at the ſaide meeting, like as for our part our cōmiſſioners offred to haue made that time. And for your part no malefactor was then arreſted to the ſaid diet, & to gloſe the ſame, ye now write ỳ ſlaars by ſee need not compere perſonally, but by their attourneis quhilk is againſt law of god & mā. And gef in criminal action al ſlaars ſhuld naught compere perſonally, na punition ſuld follow for ſlaughter, & then vane it were to ſeke farther meetings or redreſſe. And hereby apperes (as the deed ſhewes) ỳ ye wil nouther keep gud ways of iuſtice & equitie nor kindnes with vs: the great wrongs & vnkindnes done before to vs & our leiges we pōderat, quhilk we haue ſuffred this long time in vbering, mainſwering noundreſſing of attemptates, ſo as the bil of the taken of inhalding of baſtard Herō with his cōplices in your contry quha ſlue our wardan vnder truſt of dayes of meeting for iuſtice, & therof was filat & ordeynt to be deliuered, in ſlaing of our liege noble mē, vnder colour by your folke, in taking of others out of our realm priſoner & chanet by the crags in your cuntry, withalding of our wiues legacie promiſt in your diuers letters for deſpite of vs, ſlaughter of Andrew Barton by your awn commaund, quha than had naught offēded to you nor your lieges vnredreſſt, and breaking of the amitie in that behalf by your derd, and with halding of our schips and artillarie to your sie, quhar vpō ye desyrit our diuers requisitions at your Wardens, Commissioners, Ambassadors, and your selfe, ye wrate and als schewe by others vnto vs, that full redresse suld be made at the said meeting of Commissioners, and sa were in hope of reformation, or at the last ye for our sake wald haue desistit fra inuasion of our friendes and cousings within thayr awne Countreys that haue naught offendit at you, as we first requyred you, in fauour of our tender cousing the Duke of Gelder, quhām to destroy and disherite ye sent your folkes and dud that was in them. And right sa we lattly desired for our brother and cousin the maist christen king of France, quham ye haue caused to tyne his Countre of Millaigne, and now inuades his self, quha is with vs in second degree of blude, and hale bene vnto you kind without offence, and mair kindar than to vs: notwithstanding in defense of his person we mon take part, and thereto ye bycause of bathis haue geuen occasion to vs & to our liegis in tyme bypast, neuther doing iustly nor kyndely towardes vs, proceeding alwayes to the vtter destruction of our nerest frends, quha nion do for vs quhā it shall be necessarie. In euill example that ye will hereafter be better vnto vs quhā ye lightly fauor, manifestly wranged your sister for our sake incontrary our writtes. And saying vnto our herauld ȳ we gaue you fayre wordes and thinke the contrary, in deed such it is, we gaue you wordes as ye dudde vs, trusting that ye suld haue enclined to vs, or worthin kyndar to our frends for our sakes, & suld naught haue stopped our seruitors passage to labour peax that they might as ȳ Papes halines exhorted vs by his breuites to do. And therypon we were contented to haue ouerlene our harmes, & to haue remitted the same though other informatiō was made to our haly father Pape July by the Cardinal of York, your Imbassadors: & sen ye haue now put vs fra our gude belene thyough the premisses, & specially in denying of safeconduit to our seruants to resort to your presence as your ambassador Doctor Weft instantly desired we suld sende one of our counsel vnto you vpō great matters, & appointing of differences debatable betwixt you & vs furthering of peax if we might betwixt ȳ most christen king & you we neuer hard to this purpose safeconduit denied betwixt infidels. Therefore we write to you this time at length plaines of our minde, ȳ we require and desire you to desist fra farther inuasiō & vtter destruction of our brother & cousin ȳ maist christen king, to quhā by al confederation, blude & alie, and also by new band quhilk you haue compelled vs lately to take thyough your iniuries and harmes without remedie done dayly vnto vs, our liegis & subiects, we are bouden & oblist for mutual defence ylk of others, like as ye & your confederates be oblist for mutual inuasiōs & actual war. Certifying you we will take part in defence of our brother & cousin the maist christen king, and will do what thing we trust may cause you to desist fra pursute of him, & for dreit & postponit iustice to our liegis we mon giue litters of marque according to the amitie betwixte you and vs, quharto ye haue had little regard in time by past, as we haue ordaint our Herauld the bearer hereof to say, gif it like you to here him and gif him credence: right excellent, right highe and mightie prince, our derest brother & cousin. The Trinitie haue you in keeping. Geuen vnder our Signet at Edenbourgh the. xxvj. day of July.

King Henry hauing read the letter, & considered therof with aduice of his counsel, sent for ȳ herald again, and told him that he had read and wel perceiued the contents of the letters which he had deliuered to him, & wolde make him answere with condition, that he wolde promise to declare the same to his maister. Whereunto Lion made this answere: Sir, I am his natural subiect, and he is my chiefe Lord, and what he cōmaunds me to say, I may boldly say with fauor, but the cōmandements of others I may not, nor dare say vnto my souereigne Lorde, but your letters sent by me may declare your M. pleasure, albeit your answer requireth deings and not sayings, that is, that you immediately should returne home. Then said the king: I will returne at my pleasure to your domage, & not at thy maisters commonance. And herewith he caused an answere to be writtē vnto the king of Scots in forme as followeth.

The Heralds answere.

RIght excellent, right highe and mightye Prince. &c. and haue receyued your writing dated at Edenbourgh the. xxvj. day of Julye by your Heralde Lion this bearer, wherein after rehearsall and accumulation of manye surmysed iniuries, griefes and daungers done by vs and our subiectes to you and your liegis, the specialties whereof were superfluous to rehearse, remembring that to them and euery of them in effect reasonable answere founded vpō law and conscience hath tofore bene made to you & your counsell, ye not only require vs to desist from further inuasion and vtter destruction of your brother and cousin the French king, but also certifie vs that you will take parte in defence of the sayde King, and that thing which ye trust may rather cause vs to desist from pursute of him, with many contriued occasions & communications by you causelesse sought and imagined, sounning to ȳ breache of ȳ perpetuall peace passed, concluded, and swoorne betwixt you & vs, of which your imagined quarels causelesse deuised to breake to vs contrary to your othe promised, al honor & kindnesse, we cannot meruel considering the ancient accustomed maners of your progenitors, which neuer kept lōger fayth &

promiſe then pleaſed them. Howbeit if the loue and dread of God, nighneſſe of bloud, honor of the worlde, lawe, and reaſon had bound you, we ſuppoſe ye woulde neuer haue ſo farre proceeded, ſpecially in our abſence. Wherein the Pope and all Princes chriſtened may well note in you, diſhonourable demeanour, when ye lying in wayte, ſeeke the wayes to doe that in our ſayde abſence, which ye would haue bin wel aduiſed to attempt we being within our Realme and preſent. And for euident approbation hereof we needs none other proues ne witneſſes, but your own writings heretofore to vs ſent, we being within our realm, wherein ye neuer made mention of taking part with our enimie the Frenche King, but paſſed the time with vs till after our departure from our ſayde Realme. And nowe perceaſe ye ſuppoſing vs ſo farre from our ſayde Realme to bee deſtitute of defence againſt your inuaſions, haue bettered the olde rancour of your mynde, whiche in couert maner ye haue long kept ſecrete. Nerthelesſe, we remembring the brittleneſſe of your promiſe, and ſuſpecting though not wholy beleeuing ſo much vnſtedfaſtneſſe, thought it right expedient and neceſſarie to put our ſayd realme in a readineſſe, for reſiſting of your ſayd enterpriſes, hauing fyrme truſt in oure Lorde God and the righteouſneſſe of our cauſe with the aſſiſtaunce of our confederates & Alies we ſhall be able to reſyſt the malice of Sciſmatikes and their adherents, being by the generall counſell expreſſly excommunicate and interdicted, truſting alſo in time conuenient to remember our friends, and requite you and our enimies, whiche by ſuch vnnaturall demeanor haue giuen ſufficient cauſe to the diſherſon of you and your poſteritie for euer from the poſſibilitie that ye thinke to haue to the Realme, which ye now atempt to inuade. And if the example of the King of Nauarre being excluded from his Realme for aſſyſtaunce gyuen to the Frenche King cannot reſtrayne you from thys vnnaturall dealing, we ſuppoſe ye ſhall haue like aſſyſtaunce of the French King as the King of Nauarre hath nowe: who is a King without a Realme, and ſo the French King peaceably ſuffereth him to continue, wherevnto good regarde woulde be taken. And lyke as we heretofore touched in this our wryting, wee needs not to make any further anſwere to the manifolde griefes by you ſurmyſed in your letter: foraſmuch as if any lawe or reaſon coulde haue remoued you from your ſenſuall opinions, ye haue beene many and oftentymes ſufficiently anſwered to the ſame: Excepte onely to the pretended griefes touching the denying of our ſafeconduct to your Ambaſſadour to be laſt ſent vnto vs: wherevnto we make this anſwere, that we had graunted the ſayd ſafeconduct, and if your Heralde woulde haue taken the ſame with him, like as he hath bin accuſtomed to ſolicite ſafeconducts for marchants and others heretofore, yee might as ſone haue had that, as any other, for we neuer denied ſafeconduct to any your lieges to come vnto vs and no further to paſſe, but we ſee well lyke as your ſayde Heralde had heretofore made ſiniſter report contrarye to the truth, ſo hath he done nowe in this caſe, as it is manifeſt and open. Finally, as touching your requiſition to deſiſt from further attempting againſt our enimie the French king, we know you for no competent Judge of ſo high authoritie to require vs in that behalfe: wherefore (God wylling) we purpoſe with the ayde and aſſyſtaunce of our cõfederates and Alies to proſecute the ſame, and as ye do to vs and our realme, ſo it ſhal be remembred & acquited hereafter by the helpe of our Lord and our patron S. George. Who right excellent, right high and mightie Prince. &c. Yeuen vnder our ſignet in our camp before Tyrwin, the xij. day of Auguſt.

This letter being delinered vnto the Scottiſhe Herald, he departed with the ſame into Flanders, there to haue taken ſhippe: but for want of readie paſſage he ſtayd and returned not into Scotland till Flodden field was fought, and the king ſlain. For king James perceiuing al the Engliſhmens doings to tende vnto warre rather than to peace, hauing taken order for the aſſembling of his people immediately after he had ſent forth his Heralde wyth commaundement to denounce the warre, he determined to inuade the Engliſh confines, and firſt before his maine force was come togither, the Lorde Hunnes that was Lord Chãberlaine and warden of Scotland, the. xiij. day of Auguſt, hearing that the Engliſh men had fetched a bootie within ẏ Scottiſh ground, aſſẽbled a power and followed them into Northumberland, but ere he could returne he was forlayd by ẏ Engliſhmen, which breaking out of their embuſhes, put the Scottiſh men to the worſe, and of them toke and ſlue many.

Engliſh men fetched a bootie in Scotlande.

In the meane tyme was the whole power of Scotlande aſſembled, with the which king James approching to the borders, and nothing abaſhed of the euill lucke thus at the beginning chaunced to his people, purpoſed with greater aduantage of victorie to recouer that detriment: and herevpõ he made ſuch haſt, that he would not ſtay for the whole power of his realme which was in preparing to come forwarde vnto him, but comming to the borders. he paſſed ouer the water of Tweed the. xxij. of Auguſt, & entred into Englãd, lodging that night nere to the riuer of Tuiſel: & the next day laid ſiege to the caſtel of Norham, & within ſhort ſpace wan the Brayes. ouerthrew the Barnkine, & ſlue diuers vpon the caſtel. ſo ẏ the captain & ſuch as had charge within it, deſired the king to delay the siege, while they might sende to the Earle of Surrey alreadie come with an army into the Nouth partes, couenanting if they were not rescued by the .xix. day of that Moneth, they should deliuer the castel vnto the king. This was graunted: and bycause none came within the time to the reskue, the castell was deliuered at the appointed day: a great part of it was ouerthrowen and beaten downe. After this he wanne the Castels of Fourd and Etell, and diuerse other places of strength, of which part were ouerthrowne. He also toke many prisoners, and sent them away into Scotland, and diuerse he assured: and thus he abode an .xviij. dayes within England, til two parts of his armie were scaled and departed home from him.

Fourd and Etell taken.

In which meane time the Earle of Surrey Lieutenaunt to the king of Englande hauing raysed all the power of the Nouth partes of Englande, came with the same towardes the place where he heard that king James was encamped, and approching within three myles of the Scottish campe in full sight of the Scottish men, pight downe his tentes, and encamped with his whole armie. Although king James had great desire to fight with his enimies thus lodged in full view of his campe, yet bycause hee was encamped in a place of great aduantage, so as the enimies could not approche to fight with him but with greate losse and daunger to cast themselues away, hee thought good to kepe his ground, specially bicause all those of the nobilitie which were knowne to be of experience, did not holde with their aduise that counsailed him to giue battaile (at what time the Erle of Surrey had sent an officer at armes vnto him, requiring him to come forth of his strength vnto some indifferent ground where he would be readie to encounter him) and namely the Erle of Huntley, a mã for his high valiancie ioyned with wisedome and policie, had in most reputation of all the residue, affyrmed in plaine words, that nothing could be either more fond or folish than to fight at pleasure of the enimie, and to set all on a maine chaunce at his wil and appoyntment, and therefore it shoulde be good for them to remayne there in that place of aduantage, and with prológing the time to trifle with the enimie, in whose campe there was alreadie great scarcitie of victuayles, neither was it possible that they should be victuayled from the inner partes of the realme, by reason of the combersome wayes for carryage to passe nowe after such abundaunce of continuall rain as of late was falle, & not like as yet to cease, so that in sitting still & attempting nothing rashly without aduisement, the K. should haue his enimies at his pleasure, as vanquished without stroke striken through disaduantage of the place, & lack of vitailes to sustaine their languishing bodies. And surely beside the want of vitails, ỹ foule and euill weather sore annoyed both parties: for there had not beene one fayre day, no scarce one houre of fayre weather of al the time the Scottish armie had lyen within England, but great colde, wind and rain, which had not only caused many of the Scots to returne home, but also sore vsred the English men, as well in theyr iourney thytherwards, as also while they lay in camp against the Scottish army. There was sending of messengers betwixt them to and fro, and the king had sent his quarell in writing vnto the Erle of Surrey by his herald Flay the night before the battail, cõteyning as followeth: Where it is alledged that we are come in England against our band & promise, thereto we answere: that our brother was bound as farre to vs as we were to him, & when we sware last before his ambassadors in presence of our counsel, we expressed specially in our oth, ỹ we would keepe to our brother if our brother kept to vs, and not elſe: wee ſweare that our brother brake firſt to vs, and of his breach we haue required him diuerſe tymes of amendes: and lately we warned him, as he did not vs ere we brake: and this we take for our quarell, and by Gods grace ſhall defende the ſame at your aſſyred tyme, which with Gods help we ſhal abide. Thus was the K. verie deſirous to trie the matter by battail, although the wyſeſt ſort of his Nobles wiſhed not that he ſhould do any thing ouer raſhly.

There chaunced alſo many things taken (as ye woulde ſay) for warnings of ſome great miſchance to follow, which though ſome reputed but as vaine and caſuall happes, yet the impreſſion of them bred a certaine religious feare and new terrour in his heart. For as he was in counſell wyth his Lordes, to vnderſtande their opinions touching the order of his battayles, there was an Hare ſtart amongeſt them, which hauing a thouſand arrowes, daggers, and other kinde of things beſtowed at hir, with great noiſe & ſhowting, yet ſhe eſcaped from them all ſafe and without hurt.

The ſame night alſo Mile had gnawne in ſunder the buckle and leather of his helmet wherwith he ſhoulde faſten the ſame to his head. And moreouer, the cloth or baile of his inner tent (as is ſayde) aboute the breake of the day appeared as though the deawie moyſture thereof had bene of a bloudie colour. Herevpon the king keeping himſelfe within his ſtrength, the Erle of Surrey conſtrayned by neceſſitie to ſeeke all wayes whereby to traine the king downe from the hill where hee was lodged, remoued his campe towardes the hilles of Floddon, where the king of Scottes lay encamped: and on the .ix. day of September paſſed the water of Tyll at Twiſell bridge, the rereward going ouer at Wylford, putting themſelues as neare as they coulde betwixt the Scottiſhe campe and Scotlande.

King Iames perceyuing the Engliſh men to paſſe the water, iudged that they had ment to winne an hill that lay betwixt them & his campe, and therefore to preuent them, he cauſed his fielde to be rayſed, and fire to be ſet on theyr litter and cabans, which they had made of boughes, and ſo with all ſpeed remoued to the other hill being gotten thither ere the Engliſhe men coulde perceyue him to be remoued out of his former lodgings, becauſe the ſmoke of the fiers which the Scots had made, couered all the countrey betwixt the two armies. In the meane while were the Engliſhmē aduaunced to the foote of Floddon hill, hauing thereby gotten double aduauntage: for the Scottiſh ordynance coulde not muche annoy them in marching vpwards vnder the leuell thereof, and they again might gall the Scots in ſhooting of at them, as they came downwardes vpon them. For king Iames hauing diſappoynted the Engliſh men of the hill, thought verily it ſhould be an eaſie matter for him to ouerthrow them, which being put beſide the place where they intended (as hee thought) to haue camped, would neuer abyde the countenance of his puiſſant armie, if he might attaine to ioyne with them. Therefore the Scottiſh armie making downwards, encountred with the Engliſh hoſt neare to the foote of the mountaine called Brankton, and firſt ſir Edmond Hawarde leading one of the outwings of ỹ Engliſh armie, hauing with him three .M. men, being fiercely aſſayled by the Scottes on foot, hauing ſpeares and long weapons, & alſo by certain horſmen, was in the end diſcomfited, and his people beaten downe and put to flight, ſo that being of the forſaken, he was conſtrayned to follow. But yet he & diuerſe other which eſcaped, ioyned themſelues to the next battaile as well as they might. This ſo proſperous a beginning, who would thinke ſhould haue turned to the loſſe of ỹ Scots part & aduancemēt of the English side? But so it came to passe, for K. James no sooner saw that wing of the English host ouerthrowne and discomfited, but that he deemed how al the whole power of ỹ Englishmẽ had bin fleeing away: & therefore alighting beside his horse, & cõmanding those ỹ were about him to folow, prepared himself to pursue the chase. His captaines did what they coulde by wordes to remoue him from his purpose, declaring to him the dutie of a prince, which is not rashly to enter the fight, but to prouide and see that euery thing bee done in order: & where as cõming to trie the matter by hand blowes, he can do no more than an other man, yet keeping his place as apperteyneth to his persõ, he may be worth many thousands of other. The king nothing moued wt these exhortatiõs, breaking his array of battaile, with a cõpanie of noble men, rushed forward into the fore ward, where accomplishing the office of a footman, foũd the English men not fleeing, but manfully standing at resistance, so that there was a right harde rencoũter, and many arrowes shot on euery side, and great hurt done therewith. At length sir Edward Stanley with the reregard of the Englishe mẽ came fiercely downe frõ the hil of Brankston vpon the backe of the kings army, wherein they fought cruelly on both partes for a long space, but at length the victory inclined to the Englishmen, for the king himself was there beaten downe and slaine, with all that whole battaile which first entred the fight.

King James deceyued him self and alighted from his horse.

The Captains good counsell not regarded.

The kings hardinesse mared all.

Sir Edmond Stanley inuaded the backe of the reregarde.

King Iames slaine.

The other part of the Scottish host, whereof Alexander Hume Lorde Chamberlaine had the gouernaunce, although he sawe where the other Scottishmen were in daunger and closed in on euery side, yet would he not once remoue one foote forwarde out of the place (where he stood) to ayde them. Moreouer the lack of discretion in the king which would needes runne vpon his owne death, amazed the mindes of all men, and brought them into such a perplexitie, that they knewe not what to do, but looked one vpon another without styrring to or fro, as those that were in dyspayre now after the death of their king to recouer the victorie, which by so strange a chaunce, seemed as it were slipped out of their handes.

The Lorde Chamberlaine stood still.

Howbeit the Lorde Chamberlaine bare the most blame, for that he did not cause a new onset to be giuen. But it happened well for the Englishe men: for if king James had ordered himselfe wisely in this battaile, or that after he was slain, a newe furie had moued the Scottes to haue renued the fight in reuenge of the kings death, as had beene expedient, the victorie vndoubtedly had beene theirs (as was thought by men of great vnderstanding.) Whereupon the Englishe men remembring howe manifestly Gods goodnesse appeared towards thẽ in this battail, cõfessed themselues long after bounde to God for their safetie and deliuerance out of that present danger. The fight began about foure of the clocke in the after noone, and cõtinued three houres, in the which .xv. M. men were slaine on both partes: and of that nũber a third part at the least was of Englishmẽ, (as was credibly reported) but (as our Englishe writers affyrme) there died of English men not past .xv. hundred, but yet the Scottish men holde, that there died more of the English men than of their nation at this field, and that many thought it was not the bodye of King James whiche the Englishmen found in the field and toke it for his, but rather an other Scottish mans corps, called the Laird of Bonchard, who was also slain there. And it was affyrmed by sundry, that the K. was seene the same night aliue at Kelso: and so it was commonly thought that he was liuing lõg after, and that he passed the seas into other Countreys, namely to Jerusalem to visite the holy sepulchre, and so to driue forth the residue of his days, in doing penance for his former passed offences: but he appeared not in Scotland after as king, no more than Charles Duke of Burgoine did appeare in his coũtreys after the battail of Nancie, although his people had the like vaine opinion that he escaped from that discomfiture aliue.

The Lorde Chamberlaine beareth the blame.

The Englishmen thanked God for this noble victorie.

15000. men slaine.

But now to returne to the truth of the matter where we left. In the night following after this terrible battaile, the residue of the Scottish armie returned homewardes the same way they came, wasting & spoyling the English borders as they passed. At their comming home, euery man spake euil of thẽ, for that as cowards & naughtie persõs, they neyther sought to reuenge the death of their noble king, nor yet to succor their felowes ỹ were beaten downe and slaine before their faces. But namely Alexander Hume Lorde Chamberlaine was reproued, as cause of all that mischiefe, which behaued himselfe not as a captaine, but as a traytor or enimie to his countrey.

The Scottish men returne home again.

They were reuiled of their owne people.

Thus haue you heard how through rashnesse and lacke of skilful order, the Scottish army was ouercome, and that worthie Prince king James the fourth brought to his fatal ende, on the .ix. day of September, in the .xxv. yeare of his raigne, and xxxix. of his age, which was in the yeare from the incarnation. 1513. For his politike gouernment and due administration of iustice, which he exercised during the time of his raigne, he deserued to be numbred amongest the best Princes that euer raigned ouer the Scottish nation.

All theft, reife, murther, and robberie ceassed in his dayes, by such rygorous execution of lawes penall as he caused to bee executed through all the boundes of Scotlande: Insomuche that the sauage people of the oute Iles forced themselues through terror and dreade of due punishment to liue liue after the order of lawes and Juſtice, where otherwiſe of themſelues they are naturally inclyned to ſedition and diſquieting of eche other. To conclude, men were in great hope, that if it had pleaſed the high determinate purpoſe of almightie God to haue lente to him longer lyfe, hee ſhoulde haue brought the Realme of Scotlande to ſuche a flouriſhing eſtate, as the lyke in none of hys Predeceſſours tymes was yet euer heard of.

There died with him in that vnfortunate battaile, of noble men, beſide other of the meaner ſort: The Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes his baſtard ſonne, the Biſhop of the Iles. The Abbots of Inchaffray and Kylwenny, the Erles of Montros, Crafford, Argile, Lenox, Glencar, Cathnes, Caſtelles, Bothwel, Arrel high Conſtable of Scotland, Addel, Athol, & Morton: the Lords Louet, Forbos, Eluerſton, Ros, Inderby, Saintcleare, Maxwel, & his three brethren, Daunley, Simple, Borthick, Bogony, Arſkil, Blackater, & Cowin: knights and gentlemen of name, ſir John Dowglas, Cutbert Hume of Faſtcaſtell, ſir Alexander Seton, ſir Dauy, maiſter John Grant, ſir Dunkin Cawfield, ſir Saunder Lowder, ſir George Lowder, maiſter Marſhal, maiſter Key, maiſter Ellot, maiſter Cawell clerke of the Chaunceric, the deane of Elleſter, Mack Kene, Mack Clene, with many other.

After the death of that worthy prince king James the fourth, ſlaine at Branxton (as before yee haue heard) his ſonne James the fifth ſucceeded him: for after the returne of thoſe that eſcaped from the fayde field, the Queene aſſembled the Lordes and eſtates of the realme togither at Striueling, where the .xxj. day of September. 1512. hir ſonne the forenamed James the fifth, a child of one yeare fiue Monethes, and tenne dayes of age, by vniuerſall aduice and conſent was crowned King, and his mother the Queene appointed Regent of the Realme, vſing the counſaile of the reuerend father James Betō Archbiſhop of Glaſgew the Erles of Huntley, Angus, and Arrane. But ſhortly after they fell at variance among themſelues about the beſtowing thoſe benefices which were vacant by the deaths of thoſe perſons which had beene ſlaine at the fielde, by reaſon whereof ſome of them writte letters ſecretely into France to John Duke of Albanie, willing him to come into Scotland to be tutor to the king, and gouernor of the Realme, as he that was next of bloud to the king, and neareſt to the crowne, in caſe the kings childre decealled without iſſue. He therfore ſent Monſieur de la Bawtie, into Scotland, who in company of the Erle of Arraue, the Lord Flemming, and Lion the Herald (which long had bene in France) landed on the weſt coaſt the thirde of Nouember, and ſhortly after the ſaid Monſieur de la Bawtie deliuered his letters to the Queene and Lordes, who therupon met at S. Johns towne, and there by vniuerſall conſent it was accorded, that the Duke of Albany ſhoulde be admitted tutor and gouerner to the king and realme, and that the ſame ſhoulde be confirmed in Parliament by ỹ three eſtates which ſhuld be kept at Edēburgh the .xiij. day of March next for the ſame intent.

Monſieur de la Bawtie is ſent into Scotland.

An aſſembly had at Striueling.

To reherſe the troubles and great diſquietneſſe that chaunced during the minoritie of this king, through lack of due adminiſtration of Juſtice, & by diſcord and variance dayly riſing amongſt the Lords & Peeres of the realme, a man might haue iuſt cauſe greatly to wonder therat, & in waying the ſame throughly, no leſſe lament the oppreſſion done to the poore commons in that wicked and moſt miſerable time when iuſtice ſeemed to ſleep, and rapine with all the other ſortes and rabble of inirious violence inuaded hir emptie ſeate, triumphing ouer all as a conquerour.

The great diſquietnes raigning in Scotland during the minoritie of Iames the fifth.

The Queene ſent louing letters vnto the king of England hir brother, requiring him of peace, wherupō a truce was take betwixt ỹ two realms of Englande & Scotland for the ſpace of one yere & a day. In the beginning of Februarie, the king of England hearing that a Parliament ſhould be holden in Scotlād for the bringing in of the duke of Albanie to be tutor, wrote to his ſiſter that ſhe ſhoulde in any wiſe impeach & ſtay his comming thither, declaring howe daungerous it was, not only for hir, but alſo for hir ſonne to haue him gouernor, which was to ſucceede if hir ſonne were once out of the way. But the chiefeſt cauſe that moued the king of Englande to labour that the Duke ſhould haue nothing to doe in Scotlande, was (as many thought) for that he knew how the Duke in fauour of the king of Fraunce woulde ſhewe himſelfe an enimie againſt Englande with all the force he might make or procure. And ſhortly after that the peace was cōcluded betwixt him and the king of Fraunce, he ſent a letter alſo, requiring him not to ſuffer the duke to paſſe into Scotland for the reaſon firſt alledged. But notwithſtanding the labor that king Henrie made to the contrarie, it was concluded by the eſtates in Parliament aſſembled in Edenburgh at the time prefyxed, that ſir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion king of Armes ſhoulde be ſent into Fraunce, to procure the Duke to come into Scotlande, being nowe confyrmed Tutor and Gouernour, according to the lawes of the Realme in ſuche caſes prouyded. Wherevpon in Apryll then next following they toke the Seas, and paſſed into Fraunce accordingly as by the eſtates had beene deuiſed.

A Legate from Rome.

This yeare came a Legate into Scotlande from the Pope, with certaine priuiledges granted to the king and realme.

The Queene deliuered of her ſecond ſon Alexander.

The .xxx. of Aprill was the Queene deliuered of a Prince in the Caſtell of Striueling, whiche was baptiſed by the poſtulate of Dunfermling, being Archedeane of Saint Androwes, and inſtantly confirmed by the Biſhop of Cathynes, by the name of Alexander. During the time that the Queene lay in childbed, great diſcord fell out betwixt the Lords of the weſt partes, and the other Lords of the realme: but ſhortly after the Queene called an aſſembly at Edenbourgh the .xij. of July, where they were all well agreed. And herewith two of the Cleargie were ſent into Englande for peace, and the .xxviij. of the ſame moneth maiſter James Ogilbie Abbot of Dryburgh, and ſir Patrick Hamilton, a Lion the Herald came forth of France with Articles in writing from the king there, and the Duke of Albanie, by the which the Dukes comming was excuſed, becauſe the king could not want him, till ſome ende were had touching the warres betwixt him and the King of England, which was concluded in October next enſuing.

The mariage of the Queene mother.

This yeare the .vj. of Auguſt, the Queene maried Archebald Dowglas Erle of Angus, and immediately after in Saint Johns towne toke the great Seale from the biſhop of Glaſgew that was Chancellor of the realme. Whereupon the ſayde Byſhoppe got him to Edenbourgh, where many Lords aſſyſted him, & kept out the Queene and hir new huſbande, ſo that they might not enter there, whereof greate diſcorde roſe within the Realme amongeſt the Nobles and Peeres of the ſame.

The great ſeale taken from the Biſhop of Glaſgew.

In the peace contracted betwixt Lewes the xij. of that name king of France, and Henrie the eight king of Englande, no mention was made of the Realme of Scotlande, for the whiche the Scottiſhmen thought great fault in the Frenche king, ſeeing that for his cauſe the warre had beene attempted betwixt them and England.

A peace concluded betwixt Englande and Fraunce.

The ſame yeare, about the .xxv. of October, William Elphingſton Biſhop of Aberdene, and Lord keeper of the priuie ſeale, departed this life at Edenbourgh. He had bene a faythfull Counſeller to James the fourth, by whoſe helpe he founded & endowed the Colledge in the olde towne of Aberdene, for the encreaſe of learning & vertue, which hath floriſhed with good wittes of ſtudents there euer ſithence euen vnto theſe our dayes.

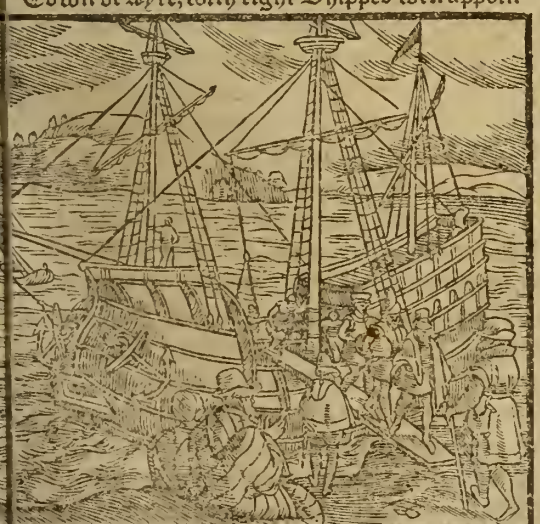
The deceaſe of the Biſhop of Aberdene.

The .xx. day of Nouember Leſire de la Baſtie receiued the caſtell of Dunbar in the name of the Duke of Albany, at the handes of the Deane of Glaſgew brother to the Biſhop of Murrey, cleped Forman.

Monſieur de la Bawtie.

Alſo ſhortly after, the Prior of S. Androwes then elect Archbiſhop of that ſea, beſieged the Caſtell of Saint Androwes, and wanne it by force from the keepers of it, which were appoynted to defend it in the name of Gawin Dowglas, wherwith the Queene and the Earle of Angus were highly offended.

The .xij. of Januarie being a very myrke windie night, the Earle of Lenox, and the maiſter of Glencarne vndermyned the nether groundſoyle of the Caſtell gate of Dunbrytaine, and entred thereby into the caſtel, and ſo toke it, putting out therof the Lorde Erſkin.



The Caſtell of Dunbrytaine taken.

Shortly after, to witte the .xv. of that Moneth, a greate aſſemble was made betwixt the Earles of Angus and Arrane, the one to haue fought with the other, which was the cauſe & beginning of great trouble that enſued.

The

The same day in Edenburgh were the Bulles published which the Bishop of Murrey Forman had purchased at Rome for the obteyning of the Archbishoprike of S. Androwes, the Abbacies of Dunfermeling, & Arbroeth, through supplication of the Queene and Duke of Albany: frō which the Bulles, the prior of Saint Androwes appealed, pretending title to the Archbishops See by election and generall gift of the Lordes of the Realme. And herevpon gote togither his friends in Edenburgh, as the Master of Hales and other. And on the other parte, the Lord Chamberlayne, and diuers of ẏ Bishop of Murreys frends gote the kings letters, by vertue whereof, they proclaymed the sayde Master of Hales, and the prior of Saint Androwes rebells, with al theyr assistants, putting them to the horne: whereupon they were costreyned to depart out of Edēburgh. And in May following, the Prior wente vnto Rome, there to iustifie his appeale.

The foure and twentie of Februarie, a Parliamente was assembled at Striueling, but bycause the Lordes coulde not agree amongst themselues, it was prorogued till the comming of the Duke of Albany, which was loked for to bee in Scotland, in Aprill, or at the furthest in May next ensuing, as he had sent worde by Sir John Sterling of the Keir, that was lately come from him with letters vnto the Lords and Peeres of the Realm. The fiftenth of May, truce was proclaymed betwixt England and Scotland to endure for three yeeres, but the same day at sixe of the clocke in the after noone, the Englishmen entred the borders of Scotland vppon the water of Rule, and forrayed the countrey, doing greate hurt therein, notwithstanding the truce. The seuententh day of May, John Duke of Albany, tutor and gouernor of Scotlande, arriued at the Town of Ayre, with eight Shippes well appointed and furnished with men and all kind of necessary prouision for his estate. From thence taking the Sea agayne, he sayled alongst the coast till he came to Dunbritaine, and there came a land, and on the next day passed forth to Glasgo, where all the Westland Lords receyued him with greate semblance of reioycing for his arriuall. The. 26. of May, he was receyued into Edēburgh, a great number of Lords meeting him on the way. The Queene also came from hir owne lodging and met him, to do him honor. Sundry Farces, Pageants, & playes were shewed by ẏ burgesses, for to honor his entrie in the best manner they coulde deuise. Shortly after his cōming to Edenburgh, there came thither forthe of all partes of the Realme, the Lords and Barons, where they being assembled in counsell, hee toke vpon him the gouernement of the Realme, which he promised to vse by their aduice, so that they woulde assist him in setting forthe of iustice and good orders, whiche they vndertoke to do. Herevpon was the Parliament which had bin prorogued till his cōming, summoned to be kepte at Edenburgh the twelfth of July, in the whiche, diuers Actes were concluded and made, and the Lord Drummond was adiudged in the Dukes mercie, for striking Lion King of Armes. The Duke pardoned him of life and honor, but his landes and goodes remayned in the kings hands: notwithstanding, he was afterwards restored to the same againe. In this Parliamente also the Duke of Albany was confirmed by the three states of the Realme tutor and gouernor to the King, the Scepter and Sword being deliuered to him, his oth also was taken by the Lords, and theirs giuen to him, that each of them should be faithful to others, & namely, to their King and soueraigne Lorde, and also should maintayn iustice to the vttermost of their powers, for the aduancemente of his honor, and suretie of the Realme. In the meane time, whilest this Parliament was in hand, the gouernour was aduertised, that the king should haue bin conueyed forth of the Realme secretly into Englande, whereupon he suddaynely departed in the nighte time from Edenburgh, with his men of warre in good order, and came to Striueling, where the King, with his brother Alexander lay in the Castell with the Queene, whiche Castell, togither with the Kings person, and the other within it, were deliuered to him the thirde day of August, whereupon hee committed them and the Castell to the keeping of foure Lordes of the Realme, whereof the Earles of Eglenton and Montrous were two. The Lord Hume, bycause he had assisted the Earle of Angus and the Queene against ẏ gouernor, was denounced a Rebell, & the Erles of Lennox and Arrane with many other, were sent to his houses to seaze the same into the kings hands. In ẏ Castel of Hume was layd gunpoulder by a trayne, whereby diuers of thē that entred fell into the same Castell were burnt. The Lord

Hume himſelfe gote him into Englād, & ſore diſquieted the Marches, ſo that no day of truce was holden, neither on the Eaſt nor middle Marches. The twelfth of Auguſt, ẏ Quene, ẏ Erle of Angus, & his brother Georges Dowglas, went from Temptallon vnto Berwike, & frō thence paſſed to the Nunry of Caudſtreame, wherevpō aduertiſemente being giuen to the king of Englande, & his pleaſure therein knowne, the .xxvj. of that moneth, ſhe was receiued by the Lord Dacres, & cōueyed to Harbottell Caſtell, where ſhe remayned till ſhe was deliuered of a daughter, called Margaret Dowglas, afterwardes maried to the Erle of Lennor, (as in place conuenient it ſhal further appeare.) There was no Scottiſhman at this time receyued into Englande with hir. The gouernor perceyuing ẏ Rebellion of ẏ Lord Hume, paſſed to the bordures with his Frenchmē, where the firſt of Octobre, the ſayd Lord Hume came & ſubmitted him ſelfe to the gouernors pleaſure, and his brother ſhortly after did the ſame, and they were both deliuered to the Earle of Arane, who was appoynted to keepe them in ſafetie within the towne of Edenburgh. But the twelfth of October next enſewing, the ſayd Erle of Arrane departed from thence in the night ſeaſon, with thoſe his priſoners, ſtealing their wayes a forte. Herevpon, the gouernour cauſing the Parliamente to be holden that was ſummoned to begin the .24. of Octobre, the ſayde Lord Hume, Maiſter William Hume, and Dauid Hume, were conuict of treaſon by all ẏ eſtates, to loſe their liues, lands, & goodes. This Parliamente was prorogued till a fifteene dayes after, within which time, the Earle of Arrane was appoynted to make appearance, or elſe it was agreed, that they ſhoulde proceede againſt him in like manner. And in that meane ſpace, the gouernor wente to beſiege the Caſtell of Hamilton, where that noble aged Lady, ẏ olde Counteſſe of Arrane, daughter to king Iames ẏ ſecond, and Mother to the Earle of Arrane, and Aunt to the Duke by his fathers ſide, cauſed not only ẏ Caſtel to be ſurrēdred at the Dukes pleaſure, but procured alſo the Erle of Arranes peace, which Earle, the twelfth of Nouember next enſuing, came with the Biſhop of Glaſgo vnto Edenburgh, & there ſubmitted himſelfe to ẏ Dukes will. About the ſame time, certayne Lords toke part with the Erle of Murrey the kings baſtard brother againſt the Earle of Huntley, and reyſed a cōmotion, ſo that being gote into Edenburgh, there was muche adoe, and the Towne greatly diſquieted. The gouernor lying in ẏ Abbey, came into the towne, and toke the Erles of Huntley, Erroll, Murrey and others, and committed them to ward within the Caſtel while he tried ẏ cauſe, and finding that Maiſter William Hay beeing with the Erle of Murrey had rayſed ẏ ſturre, hee ſent the ſame Hay into France, there to remayne during his pleaſure, and forthwith ẏ ſayd Earles were ſet at libertie. Lion king of armes appointed to goe into England with letters to king Henry, was ſtopped at Caldſtreame by the Lord Hume, who toke his letters from him, & kept him priſoner, til Alexāder Humes mother, ẏ remained priſoner in Dunbar was exchāged for him. The .18. day of Decēber, Alexāder duke of Roſſey ẏ kings brother, departed this life at Striueling. The .17. day of January, a truce was take betwixt England & Scotlande, til the feaſt of Pentecoſt nexte. This truce was agreed vpon at Coldingham, by certayn Commiſſioners, apointed on eyther part there, to treate for peace. For the Realm of Scotland were theſe, Monſieur de Planes the Frenche Ambaſſador, Archdeacon of Saint Androwes, Maiſter Gawin de Dunbar, and Sir William Scot of Baluerie knightes. The Engliſh men compriſed for their part, ẏ Earle of Angus & the Lord Hume within ẏ compaſſe of this truce. In the meane time, the Erle of Arane departed frō ẏ gouernor again, & repaired to ẏ weſt parts, where hee confederate himſelfe with certayne Lordes, notwithſtanding that Sir James Hamiltō, and the Lorde of Cauder remayned pledges for hys good demeanor within ẏ Caſtell of Edenburgh. The Erles of Lenox, Glencarne, and other cauſed the Caſtell of Dunbertaine and diuers other to be furniſhed, and toke the Caſtell of Glaſgo with the kings great artillerie that lay within it, and ſpoyled the ſame. The gouernor aduertiſed thereof, rayſed an army & went to Glaſgo, where by the labor of the Biſhop an appointment was taken, ſo that ẏ Caſtel was deliuered into ẏ Biſhops handes. The Erle of Lenox came in to the gouernor, and toke a new reſpite, & about the beginning of March next following, the Earle of Arrane did the like. Forman ẏ Archbiſhop of S. Androwes, againſt whome the Priour of S. Androwes did ſtande as ye haue heard for that benefice, to the great vnquieting of ẏ Realme, by ſuch partakings as chanced therabout amōg ẏ Lords, came now to ẏ town of Edēburgh, & reſigned all ẏ three benefices wherof he had purchaſed Bulles of ẏ Pope, that is to ſay, the Archbiſhoprick of S. Androwes, ẏ Abbacies of Arbroth & Dunfermeling in ẏ gouernors hāds, to beſtowe the ſame at his pleaſure: who by the counſel of certayn Lords to ſatiſfye ſuche as claymed intereſt to the ſame, and pacifying of all debates, beſtowed thē as followeth. Aberdene then vacant, vnto Alexãder Gurdon, & to ỳ Archbishop of Glasgo called Beton, he gaue the Abbacie of Arbroth, assigning to the Earle of Murrey a large pensiõ out therof: one of ỳ Hamiltons was made Abbot of Kylwynning. And thus he bestowed the benefices which had bin vacant euer sithence Flodden fielde, vnto dyuers Lordes, or to their kinsmen, that by suche liberalitie vsed towards them, all debates and discords might ceasse which had happened amõgst them, specially, about the bestowing of the same benefices: this was done in the moneth of February. Shortly after, the gouernor by counsell of the Lords, to ỳ end the Realm might come to a perfect quietnesse, and the noble men vnited togither, receyued into fauor the Erle of Angus, and master Patrick Pantoun Secretary, who for hys cause had bin kept as prisoner in Insche gay. He likewise receyued the Lorde Hume, and his brother, pardoning them all their offences past. And in Parliament holden the fift of May, they were restored to all their lands, heritages, fees, and honors. About that time, the Lord of Strawen in Athole, cõmitted diuers great offences & crimes, for the whiche, hee was taken by the Earle of Athole, and beheaded at Logiraith by the gouernors commission.

All this while, the Parliament was not dissolued but vpon prorogation, and so the same began agayne the first day of July, at what tyme the king of Englande, at request of his sister the Queene of Scotland, wrote letters to the Lords now assembled in Parliament, requesting them to expell the gouernor forth of the Realme, but all the Lordes and estates with vniuersall consente, sente Albany the Heralde with letters to the sayd King, excusing them, that they myghte not in any wise satisfie his desire therein, the same beeing againste reason and the lawes of theyr countrey.

In the moneth of September, the gouernour commaunded the Lord Hume, with his brother Maister William Hume, & Dauid Kar of Fernihurst to be arrested and bestowed in seuerall places, that better rule might be kept vpon the borders, but they lying nowe in warde, sundry informations were giuen vp against them, and therevpon the eyght of October, the saide Lorde Hume and his brother were conuict of Treason, for assisting and maintenyng of the theeues vpõ the borders, and other crimes, for the whiche he was beheaded, and on the morrow after, his brother ỳ foresaid William Hume was likewise beheaded, and their heads were set vpon the Tol-buith in Edenburgh: Dauid Kar was spared. And shortly after, the Duke rode to Jedworth with a greate company of men, and stayed the greate robbing and reauing which had bin vsed on the borders, and left there good wardens to keepe good rule in those partes, and so returned to Edenburgh. The third of Nouember, another Parliament was holde, in which it was decreed, that the gouernor shoulde be deemed and reputed for second person of the Realm, notwithstanding the clayme made by his elder brother Alexander Steward, that was begotten on the daughter of the Erle of Orkney, which was alledged to haue bin first maried to their father ỳ Duke of Albany, before hee was maried to the Erle of Bullognes daughter, on whome hee begote the gouernor, wherevpon this Alexander made protestation to be heire to his father, but they were afterward agreed, and Alexander renounced his title in hys brothers fauor, and was made Bishop of Murrey, and Abbot of Scone. At this Parliament, the gouernor required licence to goe into Fraunce, and to be absent there .vj. moneths: but this suite was not graunted till Aprill following.

The same time, was the Earle of Lenox put in warde within the Castell of Edenburgh, till he had caused the Castell of Dunbritaine to bee deliuered vnto one Allane Steward in the Cõstables name, and then he was set at libertie. In ỳ moneth of December, Monsier de la Bautie was made Warden of the East marches in steede of the Lord Hume, and kept dayes of truce, whiche procured him suche hatred, that it cost him afterwardes his life. In the moneth of Januarie, the gouernor wente to S. Johns towne, and there held his seat of Justice, where the Lord Fleming for the time, was made greate Chamberlayne of Scotlande, with all the fees thereof. In the yeere 1517. there came Imbassadors from Francis the new French king, to desire, ỳ the auntient league might be renued betwixt him and ỳ K. of Scotland, their Realmes, Dominions, and subiects: for the which cause, all the Lords of the Realme were assembled at Edenburgh, where by them it was concluded, that the gouernor himselfe shuld passe ỳ Seas into France, & also, that the Bisshop of Dunkeild, the secretarie, & the master of Glencarne as Imbassadors shuld goe thither, ỳ whiche the thirtenth of May, went a Shipbourde, and by the East seas sayled thither, and the gouernor toke Ship at Newmarke beside Dunbertayne the seuenth of June, taking his course by ỳ West seas, and so passed into France, where it was agreed, that he shoulde haue remayned but onely foure moneths, he hauing appointed the Bisshops of Saint Androwes and Glasgo, the Earles of Huntley, Argile, Angus, and Arrane, to gouerne in his place, whilest he was absent. Also he ordeined Monsier de la Bautie Lieutenante of the bordures. He also had caused the King to be brought into Edenburgh Castell, within the whiche hee shoulde remaine in the keeping of the Earle Marshall, the Lords Erskin, Boythwike, Rithuen: of the which, two at least shoulde be always present. The Queene that remayned as then in Englãd, after she vnderstode that the gouernor was departed towards France, returned to Edenburgh the seuenteenth of June, but she was not suffered to see the King till August following, at what time, for feare of the pestilence to be crept into the Castell, hee was remoued to Cragmiller, where the Queene oftentimes came vnto him, but at length, through some suspition conceyued, least the Queene might conuey him from thence into Englãd, he was eftsones brought vnto the Castell of Edenburgh, in whiche he was kept after, according to the order taken in that behalfe. The Lard of Wedderborne & other bordurers, hauing conceyued no small grudge for the death of the Lord Hume, and further to see De la Bautie exercise his office, and to rule ouer them, they conspired againste him, and thereupon besieged the house of Laughton, wherupon, whẽ De la Bautie came forthe of Dunbar, to assemble the men of the countrey to rayse the siege, as Lieutenant of the bordures, he was chased by the sayde Larde of Wedderborne & other so fiercely, that in the end he was slayne, and foure Frenchmen with him: his head was cut from the shoulders, and set vp in the towne of Duns the nineteenth of January.

The Lordes regents were herewith maruellously offended, and chose the Earle of Arrane to be warden of the bordures in De la Bauties place, who was also chosen to be prouost of Edẽburgh: wherewith the Erle of Angus was highly displeased. But the Erle of Arrane, not seeming to passe muche thereof, toke George Dowglas the said Erle of Angus his brother, and Marke Kar, committing them to warde within the Castell of Edenburgh, bycause of the fauor he bare vnto the said Lard of Wedderborne and his complices.

Moreouer, for due punishmente of the murder of the foresayd De la Bautie, there was a Parliament called the nineteenth of Februarie nexte, in ỳ which, Dauid Hume Lard of Wedderborne, & his three brethrẽ, William Cokborne and John Hume, with diuers other their partakers, were indited for the besieging of the Castell of Laughton, the slaughter of Monsier de la Bautie, and for the setting vp of his head, intercomuning with the Englishmen, and diuers other misdoings. Immediately after the end of this Parliamente, the Erle of Arrane came into the Mers, with a great Army, and hauing with him the kings great Artillerie, meante to haue besieged suche places, as wold haue resisted him. But at his being in Louder, the keyes of ỳ Castell of Hume were brought vnto him, which on the next morow he receyued, and put men within it to keepe it as hee did in Laughton and Wedderborne, which he receyued at the same time. The master of Hales was also sought for at that time, that hee mighte haue bin apprehended to answere the slaughter of Dauid Hume, Prior of Coldingham, whome hee had slayne

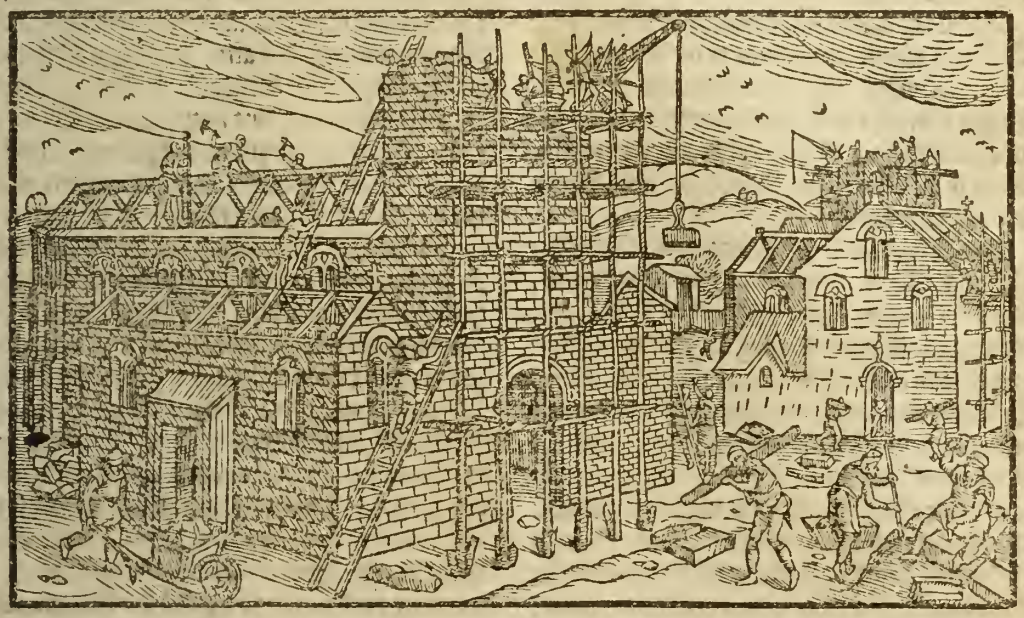
And at that ſame time, was one Captayne Moyes a Frenchman ſent forth of France, with a certayne number of men, to receyue the Caſtell of Dunbar into hys keeping, which accordingly he did, ẏ ſame being deliuered vnto him.

The Scots euil vſed at the French kings hands.



The Erle of Lenox, who had bin with ẏ gouernor in France, returned home into Scotland, and with him came a Frenche Herald from the king with letters, and maiſter Walter Stewarde Abbot of Glenluce came likewiſe from ẏ gouernour. And about that time, by cauſe the Queene and Lords were aduertiſed that the French king had contracted newe bandes of peace and amitie with the king of England, without making mētion of Scotlande, they thought themſelues euill vſed, being his confederate friends, and thereupon ſent ſharp letters to the King of Fraunce, and to the gouernour, by Albany the Herralde.

Ye In the moneth of June, Maiſter Gawin Dūbar, Archdeane of Saint Androwes, and Clearke of the Regiſter, was preferred to the Biſhops ſeate of Abberdene ẏ was vacant by the death of Alexander Gourdon. This Gawin founded an Hoſpitall in Abberdene, and endowed the ſame with lands for ſuſtenance of twelue poore men, with a prouoſt to haue care ouer them.

He alſo builded a faire bridge, with ſeuen arches ouer the water of Dee beſide Aberdene, and purchaſed landes, for the perpetuall vpholding thereof.

He alſo builded two Steeples in the Cathedrall Church, with halfe of the croſſe Church and a faire Palace for the ſmall Prebendaries, called the Chaplaynes.

Moreouer, hee beſtowed many rich pretious ornaments vpon the ſame Church of Abirdene, as Copes, Chaſſes, and other ſuche like things, which remayned there long after.

Many right commendable works were accompliſhed by this diligente Prelate, greatly to his praiſe and high renowne, for he ſpent not the frutes of his benefice in vayne, but on ſuche maner of buildings.

The ſeuenteenth of June, there roſe greate ſturre in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the Erle of Rothes, and the Lord Lindſey, about the enioying of the Sherifwecke of Fife, by reaſon whereof, they were both put in warde, the one in Dunbar, and the other in Dunbertayne.

About the beginning of Auguſt, the Queene remayning in Edenburgh, vnderſtoode that the Erle of Angus hir huſband as then ſoiourning in Dowglas Dale, had taken a faire gentlewoman in thoſe partes, and kept hir as his concubine, for the which acte ſhe conceyued ſuch hatred againſte him, that there was neuer no perfect loue betwixt them afterwards. In the beginning of Februarie, there came a Clearke as Ambaſſador from the Frenche King with letters, concerning the concluding of the truce betwixt Scotland and England, whiche meſſage the Lords made ſmall account of, byeauſe the king had omitted to comprehend Scotlande in the league which he laſtly made with England.

In September, the King was remoued forth of the Caſtell of Edenburgh vnto Dalkith, for doubt of the peſtilence, which was ſuſpected to be in the Caſtell of Edenburgh. And from Dalkith the Earle of Arrane rode to Edenburgh, to haue bin eſtſoones elected regent and prouoſt of that Towne: but he miſſed his purpoſe, for ẏ townemen woulde not ſuffer hym to enter, but repulſed hym backe, ſo that diuers were hurt on both ſides.

The Earle of Arrane.

Herebyppon, greate diſſention roſe betwixte the ſayde Earle of Arrane, and the Erle of Angus, byeauſe of his repulſe in that ſuite, whereby the whole Realme was deuided into partakings, ſo that ſundry ſlaughters thereof enſued, as of the Prior of Coldingham, and fiue of his men murthered, by the Lard of Wedderborne at Lamerton, the ſixt of October.

Diſſention betwixt the Earles of Arrane and Angus.

About the ſame time, the king returned to the Caſtell of Edenburgh, and in the towne there, were remayning the ſame tyme the Earles of Angus, Erroll, and Crawford, the Lorde Elames, and other the Biſhops of Saint Androwes, Aberdine, Orkney, and Dunblane, with diuers Abbots and other Prelates.

And in the towne of Glaſgo was the Biſhop of Glaſco Chancellor, with ẏ Earles of Arrane, Lenor, Eglentō, and Caſſels, the Lords Roſſe, Semphil, the Abbot of Paſley, the Biſhop of Galloway, and other noble men of the Weſt. Thus the Lords were deuided, and would not take any order for the good gouernemente of the common welth. In December, Monſieur de la Fayot, and a french Clearke called Cordell, with an Engliſhe Herrald called Clarenceaux, came frō the Kings of Fraunce and Englande, with an Imbaſſador alſo from the gouernor, with a concluſiō of peace, taken for one yeere, betwixt Scotland and England, who comming to Edenburgh, were receyued by the Earle of Angus and the other Lordes there with him, the whiche ſent for the Chancellor and the Earle of Arrane to come thither, but they wold not come any nerer, thā to Linlithgo. The Imbaſſadors therefore toke in hand to perſwade, that an aſſemble might be had in Striueling, but the Earle of Angus woulde not come there. Neuertheleſſe, the ſaid Imbaſſadors wente thither, where the Erle of Arrane and his partakers, as the Chanceller and others, receyued them thankfully, and proclaymed the peace, accordyng to the treatie which they had brought, and ſo with courteous anſwer and great rewards licenced thē to depart.

Monſieur de la Fayot.

The peace proclaymed.

But in their returne towarde Englande, the Earle of Angus with a greate number of menne met thē at Carlauerok, reprouing them ſharply for their demeanor, and for taking their anſwere of the Chancellor, ſo that they were not a little afraid, leaſt ẏ Erle in his diſpleaſure, would haue vſed ſome outrage towardes them, which otherwiſe than in words it ſhould appeare, he did not.

In January, about the keeping of a Courte at Jedworth, there was reiſing of people betwixte the Earle of Angus on the one part, and the Lorde of Fernihurſt, in whoſe ayde, James Hamilton came with foure hundred Mers men, but the Lorde of Sellefordе then Warden, aſſiſting the Erle of Angus his part, met Hamilton at Kelſo with a greate company, and when they were light to fote, and ſhoulde haue foughten, the Mers men left ſir James Hamilton in al ẏ danger, with a fewe of his owne men about him, ſo that with muche payne he was holed, and eſcaped in greate daunger vnto Hume, with loſſe of foure of his ſeruantes which were ſlayne, and on the other parte, there was an Engliſhman ſlayne called Rauſe Car, that came in aide of the Warden. On the morrowe after, the Lorde of Fernihurſt, as Bayly to the Earle of Arrane, of that regalitie helde his Court at the principall place of the forreſt of Jedburgh, and the Earle himſelfe helde his Courte likewiſe in an other parte of the ſame lande three miles diſtant from the other.

Variance betwixte the Erle of Angus, and the Lord of Fernihell.

The thirtie day of April, the Lorde of Wedderborne, and Maiſter William Dowglas, newly made Prior of Coldingham, with their partakers in greate number, came to Edenburgh to ayde the Erle of Angus, who was within the Towne agaynſte the Earle of Arrane and the Chancellor, who were alſo there. But nowe by the comming of theſe ſuccours, whiche entred by force at the neather bowe, and ſlewe the Maiſter of Mountgomery, and Sir Patrick Hamilton Knighte, the Earle of Arrane, and the Chancellor, were conſtreyned to forſake the Towne, and to paſſe through the North loch.

The one and twentie of July, ẏ Erle of Angus beeing in ẏ Towne of Edenburgh, George Hume, brother to the late Lord Hume beheaded, came thither with the Abbot of Coldinghā, brother to the Earle of Angus, and Dauid Hume of Wedderborne, & a great company of Gentlemen & others, and paſſed to the Tolbuith, where they remayned till the heads of the Lorde Hume & of his brother William were taken downe beſide the place where they were faſtned on a gavil; and this was done in preſence of the prouoſt for the time being.

The Lorde Humes head taken downe.

The next daye they went to Linlithgew, and from thence to Striueling, in hope to haue found the Chancellor, and ſome other of that faction there, but miſſing of their purpoſe, they returned to Edenburgh agayne, and cauſing ſolemne funerall obſequies to be kepte in the blacke Friers, for for them that ought thoſe heads, with offerings and banquets; they afterwards returned home to their owne dwellings, without attempting any other thing for that preſent.

In November, the Duke of Albany arriued in Scotlãd on the weſt parties, at an Hauen called Crawtach, the nineteenth of the ſame moneth, and on the three and twentie he came to Edenburgh, accompanyed with the Queene, the Archbiſhop of Glaſgo Chancellor, the Earle of Huntley, and many other Lords, Knights, Barons, and Gentlemen, and within fiue dayes after their cõming thither, the Prouoſt and Bayliffes were depoſed, becauſe they had bin choſen in fauour of the Earle of Angus, and other appoynted in their roomthes. Then was there a Parliament ſummoned to be kepte at Edenburgh, the fyre and twentie of Januarie nert folowing, and on the ninth of Januarie, a generall ſommonance of forfalture was proclaimed at ẏ market Croſſe in Edenburgh, wherein were ſummoned ẏ Earle of Angus & his brother, the Prior of Coldingh̃, the Lorde of Wedderborne, the Lorde of Dalehouſy, John Sommerwell of Cawdſtreme, and William Cockborne of Langton, with theyr complices, to make their appearance in the ſayde Parliament, to be tried, for ſundry great offences by them committed. Maiſter Gawin Dowglas Biſhop of Dunkeld, hearing of this Proclamation, fledde into England, and remayned in Lõdon at the Sauoy, where hee departed this lyfe, and is buried in the Church there. He was a cunning Clearke, and a very good Poet: he tranſlated the twelue bookes of the Eneidos of Vergill in Scottiſh Metre, and compiled alſo the Palace of honor, with diuers other treatiſes in the Scottiſh language, which are yet extant. The Earle of Angus, fearing the ſentence of forfalture to bee layd againſt him at the Parliament, procured his wife (although there was ſmall liking betwixte them) to labor for his pardon vnto the gouernor. Whereupon it was agreed, that the Earle, and his brother George Dowglas ſhoulde paſſe out of the Realme into France, and there to remayne during the gouernours pleaſure: and ſo they departed into Fraunce, and remayned there all the next yeere following. The king of England hearing that the Duke of Albany was arriued in Scotlãd, and had taken the rule vpon him, doubting leaſt he ſhoulde perſwade the Scottiſhmen to aſſiſt the French king, againſt whome, by perſwaſion of the Emperour, he meante ſhortly to make warre, ſente this Herrald Clarentieux into Scotlande, to require the Duke to departe from thence, alledging, that it was promiſed by the K. of Fraunce at the laſt enterview betwixte them, which chanced the Sommer before, that he ſhuld not come into Scotland. And moreouer, whereas the king of Englande was vncle vnto ẏ King of Scots, he conſidered with him ſelfe, that by nature he was bounde to defend his Nephew as hee ment to do, & therefore he thought it not reaſon ẏ the Duke being next to ẏ Crowne to ſucceede, if ought came to ẏ yong king, ſhould haue the gouernement of him, leaſt he might be made away, as other yong kings had bin. He further complained, that ẏ Erle of Angus ſhould be ſent forth of ẏ Realme, ſo ẏ he could not enioy ẏ company of his wife, ſiſter to the ſame K. of England. Clarentieux had therefore commandement, that if ẏ Duke refuſed, to depart out of ẏ Realm of Scotland, he ſhould intimate a defiance with open warre againſt him, which the ſaide Clarentieux did, declaring his meſſage vnto the Duke from point to point at Holy Rode houſe, as he had in commandement. To whom ẏ Duke anſwered, that neyther ẏ king of France, nor the king of Englande ſhoulde ſtay him from comming into his countrey, and as touching the King, who was as yet yong in yeeres, hee loued him as his ſouereigne Lord, and woulde keepe him & defend both him & his Realm againſt all other that would attempt to inuade ẏ ſame, according to his conſcience, honor & dutie. And as touching the Erle of Angus, he had vſed towards him all clemencie & mercie, notwithſtãding his euil demerites, and that principally for the Queenes cauſe, whom he woulde honor as mother to his ſouereigne Lorde. Theyr anſwer being reported to the king of Englande, cõtented him nothing at all, and therefore prepared to make warre. The tenth of Aprill, there came fiue great ſhips into ẏ Forth, vnto Inchkeith to haue ſpoyled ẏ Ships, & inuaded ẏ coaſt there. But they were ſo ſtoutly reſiſted & kept off, ẏ they were not ſuffered to do any great exploit, & ſo they returned without pray or priſe. In this ſeaſon, Andrew Forman Biſhop of S. Andrews deceaſed, and Biſhop James Beaton Archbiſhop of Glaſgo, Chancellor of Scotlãd was remoued to S. Andrews, & made Abbot alſo of Dũfermeling, & the Archbiſhoprike of Glaſgo was giuẽ to a yong man one Gawin Dunbar, that was the kings Scolemaſter. In the moneth of May, there was a great adoe in Edenburgh, by ẏ falling out of ẏ ſeruants of ẏ Erles of Murrey & Errol with the ſeruauntes of the Earle of Huntley, by reaſon whereof, the whole towne fell to partakings, but the Duke comming ſuddenly from the Abbey of Holy Rode houſe, ſtayed the matter, & committed the ſaid Earles vnto warde within ẏ Caſtell. The Emperour came into Englãd & perſwaded ẏ K. there to moue warres againſt ẏ French K. and ſo not only ẏ Frenchmen but alſo the Scots were commanded to auoide out of Englãd, their gooddes confiſcated, & they ſhipped forth of ẏ land, w a white croſſe ſowed vpõ their vppermoſt garmẽt

The Earle of Shrewesburie inuadeth Scotland.

In July, the Erle of Shrewesburie was sente by the king of England vnto the bozzures, with commission, to rayse the power of the Northe partes to inuade Scotlande, who vpon the suddayne entred and came to Kelso, where he burnt one parte of the towne, but the bozdurers of the Mers and Teuidale not being halfe so many in number as the other, set vpon them, slewe, & toke many prisoners, and so constreyned them to returne into Englande with small honor.

The Duke of Albany, hearing of the greate preparation that ỹ Erle of Shrewesburie made, to raise an army of fourescore thousande men to inuade Scotlande, hee likewise sente vnto all the Earles, Lozds, and Nobles of the Realme, willing them to raise all suche power as they coulde make in defence of their coũtrey, which they did, and so being assembled, the Duke with a mighty army of Scottishmen and certayne Frenchmen, with greate artillerie, marched forwarde, till hee came to the water of Eske foreanenst Carlile, and perceiuing that the English armie came not then forwarde, he did what he could to perswade the Noble men to enter into Englande, but as they were in counsell togither about that earnest motion made to them by the Duke, a certayne graue personage sayde to them in this manner: My Lozds, hither be we come by the commaundement of my Lozd gouernor Duke of Albany, & albeit we be ready to defende our owne native Realm, cõtraire ỹ inuesiõ of our auld enimies of Englande, yet neuerthelesse it seemeth not guid, nor for the weale of our realme of Scotlande to passe within England with our army to inuade the same at this time, and the earnest perswasiõs whilke the gouernoure makes to vs to doe the same, proceedes alanerly for ỹ pleasure of Frãce, it appeareth to be sufficiẽt ynough for vs so lang as the king our soueraigne Lozd is within age to defende our owne Realme, and not to inuade: otherwise, we may put the hayle countrey, and nobilitie therof in hazard of Tinsall, for K. James the fourth brought the Realme of Scotlande to the best that it euer was, and by the warre, it was brought to the worst almost that might bee: for by that warre, was hee and his nobilitie tinte, whilke Scotlande sare laments. Wherefore by mine aduice, let vs goe to the gouernor, & knowe of him the cause why he wauldo perswade vs to inuade England.

The Duke of Albany reyseth an Army to inuade Englande.

The words of a Counseller.

Then they all came to the gouernours tente, and the Earle of Arrane, an auncient wise man spake for them al, and sayd. My Lozd gouernor, by your will and commandement, here is assembled the maist of the nobilitie of Scotlande with their power, vpõ a pretẽce to enter within England, my Lozds here wauld know the cause and quarrell why this warre is begun, gif it myghte please your goodnesse it should well satisfie their myndes. The Duke studied a little space, and sayde, this question wouldo haif bin demaunded ere now, for well you know, that I for very luse I beare to the Realme of Scotland of ỹ whilke I haue my name, honor and lignage haise passed the Seas from the noble Realme of Fraunce, into this Realme of Scotlande, and great cause there was for me so to do, to bring you to a vnitie, when ye ware in diuision, by reason wherof, youre Realme was like to haue bin conquered and destroied. And also the king of France, by my suites & intercession, will ioyne with you in aide against ỹ English nation: and when this warre was determinate in the Parliamente, you made me Captayne, authorising me to inuade England with Banner displayde. Then was no demaund made of the cause or quarrell, and that I haif done, is by your assente and agreemente, and that I will iustifie. But to answere youre demaund, me thinke you haise iust cause to inuade England with fire, sworde, and bloud, gif ye bee not forgetfull, and without you will beare dishonor and reproch for euer. For yee knowe, that this Realme of Scotland is our inheritance, as a portion of the worlde allotted to our nation and aunceslors whome we succeede, then where may there bee better warre, than to maintayne thys our naturall inheritance? Is it not dayly seene, the greate inuasions that the Englishmen on vs make, the greate manslaughter and murders, with thefts and spoils that they do daily? Is not this one cause of warre? to defend the countrie is the office of a king, the honor of noble men, and the very seruice of chiualrie, and the dutie naturall of the communaltie: for I thinke it a iust quarrell, gif we might conquere the Realme of England, and annex it to our owne Realme, for the great iniuries and wrongs done by that Nation to vs and our predecessors: for seene the beginning of our habitation in this Ile of Brytayne, the Englishmen and we haue euer bin ennemies, and vs haif they euer hated, and yet haue we euer withstand them. Suppose, we at the last battell of Flodden by chance, lost our soueraigne Lozde, and diuers noble men, whilke was rather by treason of the Lozde Chamberlayne than otherwise, who wouldo not relieue the kings army when he might. And yet I thinke we wanne the field, whilke murder all we noble men ought to reuenge. Therefore I wouldo that you shoulde courageously aduance your selues in this quarrell to get honor, and to be reuenged. Then one wise man that was president of the counsell answered the gouernour, saying. My Lozd, fortune of weir is led by him, that all leydes, and he strikes the strake, we can warke na miracles, and beare are the Lozds of England ready to encounter vs.

The Earle of Arrane declareth to the gouernor the mind of the Lordes.

The Duke answere to the Erle of Arrane.

The reply of a wise Counseller.

And

And gif wee inuade their Realme, ſurely they will fighte, for their power ſall encreaſe dayly, and ours will diminiſh. And gif God graunt vs the victory (as I truſt he ſhall) yet haue we not wonne the field, for ready comming is the Earle of Shrewesbury ſa mikell dread in Fraunce as ye knawe wel, with an great puiſſant army, and there is na doubt, but the King of England wil ſend or bring another army gif we ſhould chance to get the firſt battayle, and gif we get the ſecond field, that will not be without great loſſe of many nobles, by reaſon whereof, the Realme ſhall be weaker, and gif we be ouercommen, how many ſould be ſlayne, God knawes. They that flie are worthy to be reputed as Traytors to the K. and ſo by wilfulneſſe and ſule hardineſſe, the Realme may be in ieoperdie to be vndone. I ſay, while the king is within age, we aught to mone na weir, leaſt by weir, we maye bring him to deſtruction. Then ſayd the valiant gouernour, here is an puiſſant army of Scotland, gif we returne, we ſall encourage our eniinies. Therefore ſeene you thinke it not gude to inuade, my counſel is, that we camp ſtill on the bordures, while we ſee what the Engliſhmen pretends to doe againſte our Realme, to the which, the nobles conſented, and lay ſtill there in camp certayne dayes after. After this conference had betwixte the Nobles, and the gouernour, the Queene as then beeyng not with them, but aduertiſed of all the proceedings and determinations, ſent word to the gouernour, and deſired him, that there might bee a treatie of peace had, and ſhee promiſed to get the Warden of the Engliſh marches to come to the gouernours camp, vpon pledges, whereunto the gouernour condiſcended. Herevpon the Lorde Dacres, Warden of the Weſt Marches of England, came vnto the gouernours camp, and thither alſo at that time, was the Queene hir ſelfe comen, & ſo vpon the eleuenth of September, an abſtinence of war was taken and conenanted, ẏ in the meane time, ẏ Duke and Queene ſhould ſend Ambaſſadors into England, to treate and conclude a reſolute peace.

In the moneth of October next enſuing, there were three Ambaſſadors ſent into England, according to the agreemente in the laſt treatie, but there were ſo hard and extreame conditions proponed on the King of Englands behalfe, that the ſame could not be accepted, as being contrary to the honour & weale of ẏ Realme of Scotlande, as the Scottiſhmẽ toke the matter. And ſo thoſe Ambaſſadors returned, withoute agreemente or concluſion of peace, whereuppon folowed greate trouble betwirte them of the borders of bothe Realmes. The Earle of Northumberland was made Warden of the whole marches, but ſhortly after, he began to make ſute to bee diſcharged of that office, and ceaſſed not til he obteyned, and then was the Earle of Surrey made generall warden, & the Lorde Marques Dorſet, warden of the Eaſt and middle marches, the Lord Dacres continuing ſtill in his office of Wardenſhip ouer the Weſt marches. Aboute the ſixth day of March, the ſayd Lordes came to the borders, about which time, the Duke of Albany cõſidering that the warres betwixte Scotlande and Englande were yrkeſome to the nobles of the Realm, becauſe the ſame warres were taken in hande, chiefly to ſerue the Frenche Kings turne, therefore he paſt by the Weſt Seas into France, and in the beginning of March where he was ryghte hartily and gladly receyued of the King, his requeſt was only to haue fiue thouſand horſemen, and ten M. footemen of Almaynes, to bee tranſported into Scotlande, and doubted not, if hee might haue this graunted, but that with that power, and the aſſiſtance of the Scottes, he ſhuld be able to ouerthrow the K. of England in battel, or elſe to driue him out of his Realme. But the French K. neyther beleued this vayne brag, nor yet mygbte ſpare anye ſuch power, hauyng warre at that time both againſt Englande, and the Emperoure, neuertheleſſe, he promiſed hym ſome ayde, wherevpon the Duke abode & wayted for the ſame a long ſeaſon. In the meane while, the Lordes of Scotland cauſed certayne noble men to lie vppon the borders monethly in defence of the ſame againſt the Engliſhmẽ, dayly loking for ſupport from Fraunce. Euery cõpany remayned their monethes, and then departed home as the cuſtome is, and thus they continued ſtill till September following. Much hurt was done on eyther part, and diuers houſes were ouerthrowen and deſtroyed both in Englande & Scotland. During whiche time, the King of Fraunce prepared certayne ſhippes, with men, and munition, to paſſe with the Duke of Albany into Scotland, but the King of England to catch him by the way, had layde a greate nauie of Shippes in the paſe on the Seas, as he ſhould make his courſe: but the Duke embarquing him ſelfe with his people at Breſt in Britayne, ſayled by the Weſt parts of Englande, and the one and twentith of September, landed at Kirkowbre in the Weſt partes of Scotlande: hee broughte with hym beſide a good number of Frenchmen, Richard de la Pole, a man of great parentage, borne in England, and baniſhed hys Countrey. theyr inuasions, they were constreyned to returne with losse (as some Scottishmē haue written.) The D. immediately after his arriual came to Edenburgh, where he caused all the Lords of the Realme to assemble in that towne, where he declared the great loue and affection that the K. of Fraunce bare to the Realme of Scotlande, in so muche, as hearing of the slaughters, murthers, and brennings, practised by the Englishmen, he thought that he felt the same done vnto him, reputing himselfe one of their members, and for reuenging thereof, he wouldbe partner with them as their member, for more credite whereof, he shewed the Kings letter, confirming his declaration. Hee therefore exhorted them to assemble an armie, in reuenge of iniuries and wrongs done to them and their Countrey, for he had brought with him money, men, and artillerie, to the furtherance thereof. Herupon it was concluded, ỹ the army shuld assemble at Dowglas dale the eyghteenth of October, the whyche conclusion they kept, & from thence they marched to Caldstreame vpon Twede, and sent ouer the water certayne of their greate artillerie, with a company of frenchmen and Scottes, by ỹ guyding of Dauid Car, and being got ouer, they lay siege to the Castel of Warke, which was kept by sir Wil. Lisle Captaine therof, hauing with him a strong garrison of Englishe souldiers, & greate prouision of artillerie, and all things necessarie, yet at the firste assault, the vtter Barnekin was wonne, and the saide company of Scottishmen and frenchmē lay within the same, endomaging the Castell in all they might. The Earle of Surrey and diuers other of the Englishe nobilitie, with an army of fortie thousande men, were at Inwyke, not farre distante from Warke, and the Marques Dorset was sente with a greate companye to keepe the Towne of Barwike, for doubt least the same shuld haue bin besieged. Also in the meane time, a newe assaulte was made to the inner barnekin of Warke, and the same won like wise as the other had bin before. After thys, was the Castell assayled, and parte of it beaten downe, with the artillerie lying on the Scottish side of the water of Twede. At which breach, the assault was giuen, and the same continued, till that through mirkes and lacke of light, the assaylants were driuen to retire.

Greate slaughter was made at that assaulte on both sydes, but especially of them within the house. The assaylantes meante to haue geuen a freshe assaulte the nexte day, beyng the fourthe of November, but a sore and vehemente storme and tempest of rayne chanced that nighte, that they were constreyned to leaue off that enterprise, and to get themselues ouer the riuer again vnto the army, least by the rising of the water of Twede, they myght haue bene cutte off by theyr enimies, before they coulde haue bin succoured.

The Scottes and French retire back ouer the water.

In the meane time, whylest this siege continued, a number of Scottishmen made a roade into the Countrey of Glendale within the Englishe marches, and brente and spoyled diuers Townes, cast downe sundry pyles, and returned without anye resistance: for the Earle of Surrey would suffer none of his people to depart from the army, nor breake order, for feare of more inconuenience.

The Duke of Albany lying on the Scottishe syde of Twede, sent an Herrault vnto the Earle of Surrey, willing him to call to remembrance, howe in his absence he had inuaded Scotlande with fire and sworde, for the whiche cruell dealing, he required him vpō his honor to come forward, & he would meete him in ỹ cōfines of both ỹ realmes, & giue him battel, to which the Earle gine him battell, to the which message the Earle aunswered, that he had no commission to inuade Scotland at that time, but only to defend, and (as some haue reported) hee caused a secrete messenger to passe to the Queene, as then lying a good way distant from the army, to moue for some abstinence and truce, and further to perswade the Duke to retire home, which hee did, so that by his labour, a truce was taken for that instant, and afterward confirmed for a longer time: and thus the Duke returned with honour (as the Scottish men report.) This truce was wel kept all the next Winter following, and no inuasion made, till the moneth of May. And then was the Earle of Surrey sente agayne to the Englishe borders, and the Lordes of Scotlande on the other parte monethly lay on their borders by quarters, for defence of their Countrey as the vse is.

On Trinitie Sonday, being the one and twentith of May, a fiue hundred Scottes entred Englande, to surprise the Englishe Merchantes, and others, going that daye vnto Berwike, where yearely on that daye the fayre is kept, and so by reason thereof, they met with diuers of them that went to this fayre, and toke to the number of two hundred prisoners, whome they ledde with them into Scotlande, but Hall sayeth, that by the comming of the yong Lorde of Fulbery to the succours of the Englishmen, the Scottes were chased, and lost two hundred of their numbers.

The fifth of July, Sir William Fenwicke, Leonarde Mulgraue, and Basterde Heron, with diuers other, to the number of nine hundred Englishmenne, entred into the Mers, and began to spoyle and robbe the Countrey, but they were shortly compassed about with Scottishmen, and so hardly assayled, that although they fought valiantly a good while, yet by fyne force they were compelled to giue grounde, and seeke to saue themselues by flight, in whiche, a two hundred of them were taken prisoners, and Basterd Heron with diues other slayne.

Amongst the prisoners, were Sir Rauf Fenwike, Leonarde Mulgraue, and diuers other Gentlemen of good calling.

The seuentenih of July, the Lord Maxwell, and Sir Alexander Iordeyne, with diuers other Scottishmen in great number, entred England at the West marches by Carleile, with displayed banners, and began to harrie the Countrey, and brente diuers places. The Englishmen assembled on euery side, so that they were far more in number than the Scottishmen, and therupon set fiercly vpon their enimies, in so muche, that for the space of an houre, there was a sore fighte continued betwixt them, but the Lord Maxwell like a righte politique Captayne (as of all that knewe him hee was no lesse reputed) ceased not to encourage his people, and after that, by the taking of Alexander Iordayne and diuers other, they hadde bin putte backe, hee broughte them in aray agayne, and beginning a newe skirmishe, recouered in a manner all the prisoners, toke and slewe diuers Englishmen, so that hee returned with victorie, and ledde aboue three hundred prisoners with hym home into Scotlande.

the Lordes in Edenburgh, with the Duke of Albany, where some of the Lordes were of mind that the warre shoulde continue: other thought it not reason, that for the pleasure onely of Fraunce, the Realme should sustayne suche damage, as it had done by those three last yeares warre now passed, and therefore they perswaded peace.

Moreouer, there was also muche debating of the matter, touching the age and gouernemente of the King, some of the Lords holding, that he was now of age to take the rule vpon himselfe, and that the gardenship or tutorie of a King expired, sooner than of another priuate person.

The Duke of Albany perceyuing howe the Lordes were deuided amongst them selues, and neyther content with his gouernement, nor willing to mayntayne the warres which hee had so earnestly perswaded for the pleasure of Fraunce, he declared to them that hee would returne into Fraunce, and so taking his leaue of the nobilitie, wente to Striueling, where the King was, of whome hee toke leaue, also giuing vnto hym suche louing and faithfull counsell, as to hys knowledge seemed expedient, and so wente into the West Countrey, where hee toke the Seas in September, and sayled forth into Fraunce.

The Duke of Albany returneth into Fraunce.

The King of Englande hauing in the moneth of June sente ouer into Fraunce, vnto Archimbald Earle of Angus, that remayned there vpon commaundement of the Duke of Albany, perswaded him to come from thence secretly into England, which accordingly he dyd, and being safely arriued in Englande, Kyng Henrye procured hym to passe into Scotlande, that with the assistance of suche Lordes as would bee ready to take his part, he myghte reyse warre against the Duke of Albany, which sought by all meanes (as the Kyng of Englande was enformed) to destroy hym and his, but ere the Earle could come into Scotlande, the Duke was departed toward Fraunce.

The Earle of Angus commeth into England.

The fyre and twentith of July, the Kyng by aduice of his mother, and certayne yong Lords, came from Striueling vnto Edenburgh, and a three dayes after, the Queene toke the whole gouernement of the King vppon hir, and entred into the Castell of Edenburgh with the Kyng, where they soiourned the most parte of the nexte Winter.

The Queene taketh the gouernement into hir hands.

The Prouost of Edenburgh was discharged, whome the Towne hadde chosen, and the Lorde Marwell was appoynted by the Queene, Prouost in his place.

There was a Parliament also sommoned to be holden at Edenburgh the third day of Februarye nexte ensuing.

A Parliament sommoned.

The King of Englande glad to heare that the Duke of Albany was departed into France, sent into Scotlande in Imbassage one maister John Magnus, and Roger Ratclife Esquier, to declare vnto the Queene and Lordes, that hee would bee content that a truce might be accorded betwixte the two Realmes of England and Scotlande, nowe that the Duke of Albany was returned into Fraunce, who had bin the onely procurer of the warres: hereupon, they agreed to take truce to endure for one yeare, and in the meane tyme, they appoynted to sende Imbassadors into Englande to treate vpon a continuall peace, aliaunce, and amitie to be hadde betwixte both the Realmes.

A truce tak for one ye

In this meane whyle, the Earle of Angus came into Scotlande, and bycause of the displeasure whiche the Queene bare him, there ensued occasion of greate diuisions within the Realme, notwithstanding the Queene by aduice of certaine Lordes, sente the Lord Gilbert Earle of Cassels, Robert Cockburne Bysshoppe of Dunkeld, and the Abbot of Cambuskenneth, Imbassadors into Englande, in the moneth of December, the whiche were receyued at Grene-

Ambassad into Eng

wiche by the King of Englande the foure and twentith of the same moneth, where the Bysshop of Dunkeld made an eloquent oration in latine, declaring the cause of theyr comming, the whiche in effect was for intreatement of peace, loue, and amitie betwixte the two Realmes, and for the more sure establishment thereof, they required that a mariage might be concluded betwixte theyr King and the Ladye Mary, daughter to the King of England.

This request was well heard by the Kyng, who thereyppon appoynted commissioners to common thereof with the sayde Imbassadors, diuers articles were proponed by the sayd Commissioners on the King of England his behalfe, and in especiall one, whiche was, that the Kyng of Scotlande shoulde renounce the league with the King of Fraunce, and that further, he should come into Englande, and remayne there till hee came to perfect age to bee maried: bycause the Imbassadors had not commission to conclude so farre, the Earle of Cassels returned into Scotlande, to vnderstande the myndes of the Lordes and Counsell in these poyntes, the other remayning at London till his returne to them agayne.

When

When the day of the Parliament appointed to be holden in the Tolbuith of Edenburgh was come, the king, Queene and Lords fearing some tumult in the Towne to be raysed by the Earle of Angus, would not passe forth of the Castell, but kept the Parliament within the same.

The Earle of Angus and Lennox and divers other to the number of two thousand men, came in the night season unto Edenburgh, bycause they durst not enter the towne in the daye time, for feare of the gunnes that lay in ỳ Castell.

The next day, being the fourteenth day of Februarie, the saide Earles with the Archbishop of Saint Andrewes, the Bishop of Aberden, that by the Queenes appointment had bin kepte before in warde, the Bishop of Dunblane, the Erle of Argile, and diverse other Lords and Barons being in the Towne, sente to the Castell, alledging, that the King was kepte as prisoner by the Queene, and iustice suppressed, with great pomage of the common wealthe, and therefore hee desired, that the King might bee delivered unto them to be governed by the advice of the three estates, and if they refused to deliver hym, they would besiege the Castel, and if they wanne it, all their lives within should reskat their pleasures, the kings only excepted.

The Queene by the counsell of the Earles of Arrane and Murrey, refused not only to deliver the King, but sente them worde, that except they did depart the Towne, they would surelye discharge all the artillerie of the Castel againste them.

Herebypon, greate feare rose in the towne, specially among the burgesses, but by the diligence of certaine persons that travelled betweene the parties, an assurance was taken on eyther side for certaine dayes. In the meane time, the Earle of Angus caused the Castell to bee forsette, that neyth. victuale nor other thing might be suffered to be conveyed into it, except so muche as might serve for the sustentation of the Kings owne person. At length, all the parties were agreed, so that the fourte and twentith day of Febuary, the King came unto the Parliament holden in the Tolbuith in most honorable wise, with the assistaunce of all the estates, having the Crowne, Scepter, and sword borne before him, and from thence hee was brought to the Abbey, where he remayned.

In this Parliament, there were eight Lordes chosen to bee of the Kinges privie counsell, the whyche toke the Gouvernemente of the Kyng and Realme upon them, as these: The Archbishops of S. Andrewes and Glasquho, the bishops of Aberdin and Dunblane: The Earles of Angus, Argyle, Arrane, and Lennox: the Queene was adioyned to them as principall, without whose advice nothing should be done. From this Parliament also was the Erle of Cassils sente, with answere unto the King of Englande: hee came to London the nineteenth of Marche. But bicause the king had knowledge, that the French King was taken at the battaile of Pauie, hee would not proceede in the treatie of marryage betwixte the kyng of Scotlande and his doughter, till he had the Emperours advice, whome he affirmed to bee his confederate friend, and so renuing the truce for three yeares and syxe monethes, the Ambassadours returned into Scotland about the beginning of Aprill next ensuing, without any contract of mariage at that time. The Argument betwixt the Queene and Lords continued not long for anone after died the Bishop of Dúkeld, whose benefice the E. of Angus obtained of the king for his brother M. Dowglas, without the advice of the Queene and other Lords, wherupon the Q. departed and went unto Striueling, leaving the king ẅ the Erle of Angus, who togither ẅ the Erle of Lennox toke the whole rule and government of ỳ Realme and K upon him, & made his Uncle Archimbald Dowglas, treasourer of the Realme, and then the saide Earles of Angus and Lennox bestowed benefices, offices, and al other things, by the advice of George Dowglas brother to the saide Earle of Angus and others of that faction.

The King not in his owne power.

In this meane time, the Archbishop of Saint Andrewes, and the Earles of Arrane, Argile and Murrey, remaining with the Queene at Striueling, alledged that the king was withholden frō them by the E. of Angus, sore against his wil, and therefore they sente unto the Earle, requiring him to deliver him: but ỳ Erle causes the K. to give the answere himself, that he would not come from the Erle of Angus, albeit he wold gladly have bin out of his hands if he might, as by secret message sent to sundry of the lordes, likewise at that time it appeared, for he willed the by privie meanes to assemble an army, and to come & fetch him out of their handes that thus detained him. Herebypon shortly after, they raysed a power, and comming therewith to Linlithgew, purposed to passe unto Edenburgh, ỳ they might get the K out of the Erle of Angus his handes: the said Erle ẅ the Earle of Lennox & other his assistants being thereof advertised, came to ỳ fields ẅ the kings banner displayed, & brought the king with him, although partly against his will.

The Queene mother in armes.

The Queene with such Lords as were with hir there in the armie, for the reuerence they bare to the Kyngs person, and fearing the daunger that might chaunce unto them, if they buckled togither in a foughten field, they withdrew themselves to Striueling, and from thence the Queen went into Murrey lād [illegible] of Murrey,

and

and there remayned a long time after.

The Earles of Arrane and Argaile went into the Weste Countrey, and the Bishoppe of Saint Andrewes to Dunfermeling, and then the Earle of Angus toke vppon him more boldly the gouernement of the King and Realme, and sent to the Bishoppe of Saint Andrewes (who was chauncellour) for the great seale, which was deliuered to them that were so sent for it.

The great seale deliuered.

The nobles of the Realme remaining thus at variance, and deuided amõg themselues, there was small obedience of lawes and iustice, diuers slaughters in sundry parts were committed, great thefties and robberies made by the borderers vpõ the Inland Countries.

Moreouer, this yere ỹ displeasure still continuing betwixt the Queene the kings mother and hir husband the Earle of Angus, she secretly forsooke him and so vsed the matter that she was married to Henry Stewarde, brother to Andrew Stewarde Lorde Auendale to whome she had borne good will (as hath bin reported) long before which Henry was after created by the king Lorde of Methwen.

1526. The foure and twentith of July, the King being accompanied with the Earle of Angus, ỹ Lorde Hume, the Karres and others, roade vnto Jedburgh, in purpose to haue reformed the misgouernaunce of ỹ borderers, but after that they had remained there three dayes with little obedience shewed towards them, they returned, and on the fifte and twentith day of July, at the Bridge of Melrose, the Lard of Bocclough, accompanyed wt aboue a thousand horsemen, began to shew himselfe in sighte, whose principall purpose was to haue taken the King from the Earle of Angus & his assistantes, being requested and commaunded by the King himselfe so to do.

The Lard of Bocclough his enterprice, to take the king from the Earle of Angus.

The Erle of Angus incontinently sente an Herrault vnto the Lorde of Bocclough, to know what his intention was to doe, who answered, that he came to do the King honour and seruice, and to shewe his friendes and power as the vse is of the borderers.

The Earle of Angus wt the Lorde Hume, and the rest, not being contente wyth hys answere, bicause of the great feude betwixte hym and the Humes and the Karres, sente vnto him a commaundemente in the Kings name to departe, and not to approche neere to the kinges presence, vnder paine of high treason, whereunto he answered, that he knew the kings mind wel ynough, and would not spare for his commaundemente to come to his graces presence, whyche answere receiued from him, incontinently the Earle of Angus, the Lordes Fleming and Hume, the Karres, the Lorde of Sessefoord, with theyr friendes, alight[illegible] the King remayning on horsebacke, accompanied with the Erle of Lenox, the Lord Marwel, George Dowglas, and Ninian Crechton Tutor of Sanquhar.

The Lard of Bocclough lighted also on foote, but bicause the most parte of his men were of the theeues and outlawes of the borders commonly called broken men, vppon their firste approche to the toyning with their speares, they fledde, leaning the Lorde of Bocclough with a smal number of his owne seruauntes aboute him in all the daunger yet they defended themselues right manfully, and slewe the Lorde of Sessefoorde and diuers other on the Earle of Angus his side, but finallye, ouerpressed with multitude, they were put to flight, and foure score of Bocclughes men slaine in the chase.

The Sessel slaine. The Bocclo to flig

After this, the King returned to Jedburgh, and remained there the space of foure dayes, and then returned to Edenburgh.

All this while, the King was gouerned and holden against his will, by the Earle of Angus and his assisters, although he did not outwardly shewe so in countenaunce, but dissembled the matter as well as hee might, yet perceiuing two enterprises to haue quapled that hadde bene attempted for his deliueraunce, he thought to assaye the thirde: and hereuppon, procured the Earle of Lennox to assemble an armye wyth assistance of the Queene and hir frendes, to helpe to deliuer him from the handes of his enemies. The Earle of Lennox did so, and came with such power as he could raise frõ the West partes vnto Linlithgew.

The noxe pary

The Erle of Angus being aduertised, that the Earle of Lennox was gathering men, sente to the Earle of Arrane for ayde, requiring him to come with suche power as he could make, and to meete him at Linlithgew.

The Earle of Arrane immediatly heerewith, gathered a power, and with the same came to Linlithgewe before the Earle of Lennox, who shortelye after comming wyth hys people, approched that Towne, vnto whom the Earle of Arrane sente a messenger, requiring hym to tourne and saue his enterprise, assuring him, that albeit hee was hys systers sonne, hee would not spare him, if hee helde forwarde vppon his journey.

The Arrareth:

The Earle of Lennox heerewith answered in a great rage, that hee would not stay, till hee came to Edenburgh, or else dye for it by the way.

The Earle of Arrane therefore not staying for the Earle of Angus hys comming from Edenburgh, issued forthe of Linlithgewe at the West ende of the Towne, and encountred the Earle of Lennox and his companie where there was a cruell onsette geuen on both sides, flodes, but suddaynely the Earle of Lennox hys company fledde, and he himselfe with the Lorde of Hunston and diuers other Gentlemen, were slayne.

In the meane time, the Erle of Angus bringing the King with him arriued, and had come to the battell, but that the King was not willing to come forthe of Edenburgh in that quarrell (as some haue written) and therefore made excuses, as he did also by the way, sayning himselfe sicke, but George Dowglas droue and called vppon his horse very sharpely, and constreyned hym to ride forth with faster pace than hee would haue done, giuing him many iniurious words, which hee remembred afterwards, and would not forget them. They went that night to Striueling, and shortly after, passed through Fife, searching for the Queene, and the Bishoppe of Saint Andrewes, and because they were kept secretely in their friendes houses, so that they could not bee heard of, they spoyled the Abbey of Dunfermeling, and the Castell of Saint Andrewes, taking away all the monables which the Archbyshoppe had within the same.

This done, they returned to Edenburgh.

In this season by reason of this discord, diuers and sundrye murthers and heynous ryots were committed in many parts of the Realme, namely, the Earle of Cassels was slayne by the Sheriffe of Ayre, and greate spoyle done on the borders. This yeare, the Kyng by counsell of the Earles of Angus, Arrane, and others, went with eight M. men vnto Jedburgh, to set some order amongst the borderers, for the keeping of better rule, and so on the eight of June, the principals of al the surnames of the clannes on the borders, came to the King, binding themselues, and deliuering pledges for their good demeanours.

The seuententh of July, there was a greate assembly of the Lordes at Holirod house, at what time, there came a simple fellowe to loke vpon, seruaunte sometime to the Earle of Lennox, and in the middes of a greate companye of people in the Abbey close, strake Sir James Hamilton Knight right desperately with a shorte prage or dagger in the bellie three seuerall stripes vp to the haft, and yet the same Sir James dyed not of those hurtes. The man beeyng taken, straight wayes confessed the deede without repentance, why on the feeble hand quilke wald not doe that thing the hart thought, and was determinate to doe: beeyng enquired what he was, and who caused him to doe the same, he aunswered, that hee was an seruant of God, sent by him to doe that deede: and albeit he was put to great torture and paines daily by ỹ space of a moneth, yet would hee neuer giue other aunswer, and so he was hanged, and hys head set ouer one of the gates of Edenburgh Towne.

About the same time, there came out of Germany master Patrick Hamiltō, Abbot of Ferne, brother sonne to the Earle of Arrane, who hadde bin scholler to Martin Luther, and others there.

Thys man beeyng conuented and examined vpon certaine articles, as of iustification, predestination, of free will, and suche like, contrarye to the doctrine taught by the Churche in that time, because hee did affirme, and constantlye defende them, hee was declared an Heretike and burned. The Abbot of Ferne burnt.

The eyghteenth of March, the Kyng beseged the Castell of Edenburgh, the Queene and hir husband Henrye Steward, with James hys brother beeing within it. But as soone as the Queene vnderstode, that hir sonne the Kyng was there in person, she caused the gates to be set open, and vpon hir knees, besought him of grace for hir husband and his brother, and would not rest, till shee hadde obteyned the same, but yet they were kept in warde within the Castell, tyll the King afterwards released them. Edenburgh Castell beseged.

In the yeare following, the King being now come to the age of seauenteene yeares, and of good discretion and witte for his time, would not longer remayne vnder the gouernemente of the Earle of Angus and his company, and thereupon assembled diuers noble men at Striueling, and by their counsell, sent an Herraulte vnto the Earle of Angus and his assisters resident as then in Edenburgh, commaundyng them on payne of high treason, that they shoulde departe forthe of that Towne, and that none of them shoulde come within foure myles of the Courte, wheresoeuer the same chanced to bee: and shortly after, the Kyng hymselfe with two thousande menne, followed the Herraulte, whereupon, the Earle of Angus, both beeing charged by the Herraulte, and aduertised of the Kynges commyng towarde the Towne, departed thence immediately. The Kyng beeing seuentene yeares of age, refuseth to bee longer vnder gouernement.

And shortly after, the same Herrault was sent vnto him againe with commaundement frō the K. that he should remayne prisoner within ward in the Countrey of Murrey, till the Kings pleasure were further knowen: whiche he woulde not obey: wherefore both he and his adherents were commoned to appeare in Parliament to be holden at Edenburgh, in September nexte following. In this Parliament begun at Edenburgh the sixth of September in this yeare. 1528. ẏ Erle of Angus, with his brother George Dowglas, his Uncle by his father Archembald Dowglas, Alexander Drommond of Carnok, and dyuers other, were by decree of Parliament attaynted, and forfalted for diuers offences, and especially, for assembling the kings people to haue assayled the kings person, and because he had deteyned ẏ king against his will with him the space of two yeres and more, al which time he stood in feare of his life. In this Parliament, Henry Steward ẏ Quenes husband, was created L. of Methwen, and made master of the ordinance. In October following, the K. assembled a great company of men, with artillerie, and diuers kind of munitiō, to beseige the Castell of Tantallon, whiche the Erle of Angus held, who aduertised of the preparatiō made for ẏ same siege, furnished the Castell with mē, & al kind of necessaries, & went himself into England. When the siege thē was laid about the Castell, it was so strong and so well prouided, that it might not be wonne for all that coulde bee done at that season, in somuch, ẏ after Dauid Fanconer, principal gunner of the kings side was slayne, the K. caused ẏ siege to be reised: yet at lēgth (though not til a lōg time after this) it was deliuered to the King by appoyntmente.

The eightenth of May, in the yeare. 1529. the Earle of Cathnes and the Lord of Sincler with a greate armye by Sea, passed into Orkeney to haue taken that Isle into possession, but the people of the Countrey assembled at the commaundemente of Janies Sincler of Kirkewall theyr Captaine, who gaue battell to the Earle and his army with such courage, that he discomfited the enimies: the Earle with fiue hundred of his men was slayne, and drowned in the Sea, vnto the

which they were driuen.

The L. Sinclar and all the residue wer take.

The Orkney men held opinion, that their patrone S. Magnus was seene that day to fighte in the field on their side against their enimies.

The same moneth on the fiftenth day, there was a greate assemblye of the Lordes in Edenburgh, where the K. himselfe sate in iudgement. The Lard of Hinderlād called Cockeborne, and one Adam Scot of Tushlaw, who was named king of theeues, were accused of theft, and of receiuing and mainteining of theeues, slaughters, and other crimes, of the which being conuict, they lost their heads, which were set ouer ẏ Tolbuith of Edenburgh. The same day, ẏ Erle of Bothwel was also cōuict for maintaining thē & their crimes, & his life, lands & goodes wer in the kings hands. He was therfore kept in ward within Edenburgh Castell, and after sente into Murrey land, and lastly banished the Realme during the kings dayes. Also, the Lord Marwell, the Lorde Hume, the Lards of Balglueth, Fernyherst, Pollort, Johnson, Marke Kar, and other principall men of the borders, were conuict by assise, and putte in warde, by reason whereof, the borderers kepte better rule euer after during the Kinges raigne.

About this season, a landed man named John Scotte, that had trauelled abroade in the world, and nowe beeyng returned into Scotland, & because it was bruted in other Countreys bee had fasted. xl. dayes without either meate or drinke, was was for tryall thereof put in Dauids Tower in Edenbourgh Castell, and diligent watch set vpon him to see that hee had no sustenaunce to relieue him withall, and so kept for fortie dayes, hee fasted all that tyme wythout any kinde of nourishment, to the greate wonder of the people.

In the Sommer of this yeare. 1529. Archimbalde Dowglas, that had beene forfalted (as yee haue heard) came alone to the king while he was a hunting in Striueling Parke, and besought his grace of pardon, which he had obteyned fully at his handes, bycause he fauoured him more than any of that surname, if hee had not beene (as hee was in deede) altogither determined that none of them shoulde remaine wythin the land at that tyme, and so he banished him into France, where shortly after thorough griefe of mynde he departed this life.

In the Moneth of June, the King with an armie, went to the borders to set order there for better rule to be kept, and to punishe such as were knowen to be most culpable, & hereupon he caused xlviij. of the most notable theeues, with their Captaine John Armstrong to bee apprehended, the which being conuict of murther, theft, and treason, were all hanged on growing trees, to the ensample of others.

There was one cruell theefe amongest the rest, which had burned a house with a woman and hir children within it, he was burned to death.

George Armestrong, brother to John, was pardoned, to the ende he shoulde appeache the residue, which he did, so that they were apprehended by the Kings commaundement, and punished for their misdoynges according as they had deserued.

In August following, many marueylous sightes were seene about Striueling, as Candels burning vpon the toppes of hilles in the nightes, and in the morning aboue Sunne rysing: diuerse armed men appeared fighting vpon the ground, which was taken to be a foretoken of some trouble to ensue in those parties.

The. xv. day of August, a greate number of people being assembled at the Market in Campscenneth. lij. persons were drowned in the Ferrie boate: amongst the which were diuerse honest men and women of the countrey.

The first of Marche, in the yeare. 1530. the Abbot of Culrose called Inglis, was cruellye murthered by the Lorde of Tulliallan and hys seruants, amongest whome there was a Priest called sir William Louthien, for the which they were apprehended, and the sayde sir William the xxvij. of the same moneth, vpon a publike skaffolde in Edenbourgh was degraded, (the King, Queene, and a great companie of people beeing present) and after his degradation, he was deliuered to the Earle of Argile high Justice, and the next day the sayd Tulliallan, and the same priest were beheaded.

This yeare the Colledge court of Justice called the Sessions, was instituted in Edenbourgh by the King, with consent of the three estates in Parliament assembled, and after confirmed in Rome, in the which are fiftene Counsaylers ordinarie, eight of them being spirituall persons, of the which the most auncient is president, and seuen tempozall men, but so as by this number the Chancellor of the realme is aboue the president, when he is present. There are also foure counsaylers extraordinarie, remouable at the princes pleasure. The Sessions instituted.

In the yeare. 1531. I finde little done to make account of, for the Earle of Angus remaynyng in Englande, coulde not perswade the King of England in his fauour to breake the peace wyth Scotlande, though the same Earle earnestly laboured to bring that to passe. 1531

But in the yeare. 1532. sir Arthure Darcy was sent to the borders, who being at Barwike, by the counsaile of the Erle of Angus then being there, they made a roade into Scotlande, and burned certaine places, wherupon the Scots assembling themselues to defende their Countrey, made towardes the Englishmen, who retyred themselues to Barwike againe. 1532. Sir Arthure Darcie sent to the borders. He maketh a road into Scotland.

After this were diuerse inuasions made on euery side vpon the borders, and shippes likewise taken by Sea, and yet no warre was proclaimed.

In September, in the yeare. 1533. certaine Commissioners of either Realme were at Newcastell to treate for redresse, and recompence to be made for the burning of townes and villages, taking of goodes, downe casting of pyles, taking of ships, slaughters of men, and diuerse other spoyles and iniuries done, as well by the Sea as by the lande, from the. xxiij. day of Aprill in the yere 1532. vnto the day of the meeting of the same commissioners, which doings were little lesse in effect than had bene vsed in tyme of open warre, although the same was not proclaimed. Bycause therefore that the skath and iniuries fell out to be so greate on both sides, that particuler redresse coulde not bee had, the order thereof was referred to the pleasure of both the Princes. 1533

Further it was agreed, that for a perpetuall peace to be concluded, certaine Commissioners should be appoynted to treate thereof at London. as afterwardes they did. For the king of Scotlande there were sent as Commissioners about this treatie, William Stewarde Bishop of Abardine, the Abbot of Kinlos, & sir Adam Sterburie knight, the which accompanied with diuers other knightes, barons, and gentlemen, came to

London, and were there right honourably receyued the .xxv. of March, after they had beene before the kings presence, there were certaine Commissioners appointed by him to treate with them of peace, the which agreed vpon certaine conditions and articles for a peace to continue betwixt both kings during their naturall liues, and one yeare after the decease of that prince, which first chaunced to depart this worlde, and so the Commissioners returned into Scotland in the moneth of May next ensuing. 1524

A peace concluded.

About the same tyme, were sent into France Dauid Beton Abbot of Arbroith, and James Gillyn Secretarie as Ambassadors to require the Duke of Vandosmes sister in mariage for the King, with which motion the Ladie and hir friendes were verie well contented, neuertheless (as afterwardes shall appeare) the King himselfe passing secretely into Fraunce in proper person, when he had once seene the Ladie, he liked hir not; and so became a suyter to the French king his eldest daughter Magdalen, whome hee obteyned, wherefore the duke of Vandosmes sister woulde neuer after match hirselfe with any other in mariage, but professed hirselfe in a house of Religion, where she remained the residue of hir life time.

Ambassadors into France.

The king himselfe passeth secretely into Fraunce.

The king of Englande sente Ambassadors into Scotlande, the Bishop of Durisme, Sir Thomas Clifforde, the Prior of Durelme, and one Doctor Magnus, who were honourably re-ceyued in the Moneth of Julie, and then was the peace before concluded by the Ambassadours at London, confirmed by the king himselfe, and the charter thereof interchaungeably sealed, with the great Seales of both the Realmes during the lyues of both the Princes, (as before yee haue heard.)

The peace concluded wyth England.

The same yeare, the king passed through the north partes of his realme, and holding Justiceers, caused Justice, dulye to be ministred in places where he came against offenders.

Iustice ministred.

Moreouer in Edenbourgh was great inquisition made, and punishment exercised against such as were detected to holde opinions against the religion then vsed, the king himselfe assistant thereto. Maister Normand Gozley that was abiured before, and Andrew Stratton that woulde not renounce his opinion were burned.

The Sheriffe of Linlitgow and diuerse other that were fled for feare of punishment, were conuict of heresie.

Diuerse English men that holde against the deuorce betwixt king Henrie, and the Lady Katherin dowager, fledde this yeare into Scotlande, and were receyued.

English fugitiues receyued into Scotland.

In the yeare. 1535. the Pope sent a messenger into Scotlande requiring king James to assyst him against the King of Englande, whome hee had decreed an heretike, a Scismatike, a wedlock breaker, a publike murtherer, and a sacrileger, and therefore he had declared him to be depriued of the sayd kingdome, the which he would bestow vpon him, and other catholike Princes. 1535

The Pope sendeth into Scotlande.

In the yeare. 1536. the King toke the Sea, with fiue shippes, without knowledge of the most part of the Lordes of his Realme, and sayled aboute the Iles of Skie and Lewes, and the other Iles, and by storme was driuen to take lande at Saint Ninians in Galoway, and so returned to Striueling from whence he passed a foote in pylgrimage vnto our Ladie Chapell of Lauret beside Muskelbourgh, and afterwarde sent for diuerse of his Lordes, and by their counsaile toke his voyage againe by sea with fiue ships to passe into Fraunce, as he was minded to haue done the first time, but what caused him to alter his purpose then, we find not. 1536

The kings voyage about the Iles.

This second time he embarked at Kirkcaldy the last of August, and with good and prosperous winde, he shortly after arriued in Fraunce, there being with him in companie the Earles of Argile, and Arane, the Lordes Boyd and Fleming, with diuerse other barons, knights, & gentlemen, and before him there were in Fraunce the Erles of Murrey, Lennor, and Cassils, the Lorde Erskyn, the Abbot of Arbrothe and other.

He sayleth to Fraunce.

Immediately after his arriuall, he roade in secrete maner disguised vnto Vandosmes in Picardie, taking with him but one seruaunt named John Tennent, whom he caused to take vppon him as he had beene maister, and so comming to the Duke of Vandosme his place, got sight of the Ladie who shuld haue bin his wife, but not liking hir, hee returned againe without talking eyther with hir or hir friendes, and comming to Rouen where his companie were abyding for him, hee passed from thence towarde Paris, where the Dolphin of Fraunce was appoynted by the king his father to meete him seuen leagues from the Citie, who brought him to the King, who receyued ned him in such heartie maner, as if he had beene his owne sonne, and with as muche honour as might haue beene shewed to the greatest Prince in earth.

There were Justes, Tourneyes, and other princely pastimes practised and set forth, in which Justes and other exercises of warrelike feates, hee shewed himselfe as hardie, cunning and valiaunt as any other person within all the Realme of Fraunce, for the which hee wanne passing great prayse.

In the meane tyme he caused his Ambassadors and the noble men that were with him, to declare vnto the king of Fraunce, that the cause of his comming was for maryage to be had betweene him and the Ladie Magdalen, eldest daughter to the King, whome he loued and fauoured aboue all other within his realme. The French king being glad hereof, that the auncient bande betwixt Scotland and France might thus with new alliance be confirmed, and therfore declared that hee woulde willingly giue him hys daughter in mariage, but herewith he let him vnderstand that his daughter was much subiect to sickneſſe, and therefore he referred that to the king of Scotland his owne pleasure, whether he would haue hir, or his yongest daughter the lady Margaret, whiche was after maried to the Duke of Sauoy, which offer of choise being reported to the king of Scotlande, hee continued in his former purpose, whiche was to matche with the Ladie Magdalen, who was in deede a pleasant yong Ladie, beautifull, of good fauour, louely countenance, and louely maners aboue al others within that Realme. Whereupon the mariage was contracted betwixt them, and an hundred thousand crownes of the same promised with her in dower, with xxx. thousande frankes of pension during the life of king James, which money was deliuered vnto him at his returne homewardes, besides many rich hangings, Cupbordes of plate, sumptuous apparell, and riche Iuels giuen to him and his wife, farre aboue the summe of an other hundred thousand crownes, with two great ships (the one called the Salamander) and greate plentie of Artillerie, powder, and other munition.

The mariage contracted betwixt the king of Scottes and the Lady Magdalen.

Moreouer all his charges and expences were borne by the French king during his being within the realme of France.

The same time also was the auncient league and bande of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France renued, and the day of the solemnization of the mariage appointed to bee holden the first of Januarie.

In the meane time great preparation for the same was made, and all the Nobles of Fraunce sent for to be there at that day. On the whiche within the Church of Nostre dame in the Citie of Paris, the King of Scotlande openly maried the sayd Ladie Magdalen, in presence of the king hir father, the king of Nauarre, seuen Cardinals, and dyuerse great Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Lordes, Barons, Bishops, and other.

After the solemnization of the Mariage, king James remayned in Fraunce, till the Moneth of May, passing the time with all kinde of pleasure and disport that might be deuised for his honourable entertainment.

Finally, the king and his wife Mudent Magdalen toke their leaue of the king of France their father at Paris, about the latter ende of Aprill, and so roade to Rouen, where they were receyued with great triumph, and from thence they passed downe the ryuer to Newhauen where they embarked, being accompanied by the Admirall of France, and many other noble men of the realme appointed by the French king to attende vpon them into Scotlande, and so they sayled forth with with pleasaunt winde and prosperous weather, throughe the Seas, untill they came into the Forth, and there landed at the peare of Lieth Haven, the .xxix. of May, in the yeare .1537. where a great number of Earles, Bishoppes, Barons, and other Noble men and Gentlemen of Scotlande were readie to receyue them with passing ioy and gladnesse, and from thence with greate tryumph they were conueyed to the Abbey of Holyrode house.

This noble Ladie with hir louely countenance and seemely demeanour, at hir first arriuall wanne the loues and heartie good willes of all the Nobles and people of the Realme, with all contented so highly the minde and fantasie of the king hir husband, that there was neuer more hope of wealth and prosperitie to succeede within the realme, than at that present: but fortune enuying so greate felicitie, would not suffer them to continue any long tyme togyther: for about the ende of June shee fell sicke of a vehement Feuer, whereof shee departed thys lyfe the tenth of Julye nexte ensuyng, and was buryed in the Churche of holye Rode house, for whose death the Kyng was ryghte sorrowfull, and syzred not abroade of a long time after.

Queene Magdalen departeth this life.

The Ladye Glames and hir husbande conuict of treason.

In the Sommer of this yeare, the Ladie Glames, Syster to the Earle of Angus was apprehended, and likewyse hir Husbande Dauid Lion, and both of them brought to Edenbourgh, where they were accused and conuict by an assise, for conspiracie of the kings death: the sayd Lady was burned, and hir husband hanged, hir sonne the Lord Glames, was also conuict for misprision and concealement of that crime, and therefore forfalted of his landes, and condemned to die: but bycause he was yong and of tender yeares, the king pardoned him of life, and commaunded him to perpetuall prison, in the whiche he remayned so long as the king liued.

The master of Forbes beheaded.

Shortly after John maister of the Forbes, and eldest sonne to the Lord Forbes, who had maried a sister of the sayd Ladie Glames, was at Edenbourgh likewise indyted and conuict by an assise for the like conspiracie of the kings death, for the which he was beheaded and quartered, and hys heade and quarters set aloft vppon the gates of Edenbourgh. His father the Lorde Forbes vpon suspition of the same conspiracie was long after kept in prison within the castell of Edenbourgh, but at length when nothing might be proued against him, he was released and set at libertie.

Iustices appoynted to sit in diuerse partes of the realme.

This yere the king in September caused Iustices to sit in the north partes of the realme, and likewise in October, and in the winter following he caused the like to bee done in the South and west parts.

The king himselfe was oftentymes present, assysting the Lordes which he had appoynted his Commissioners for the furtheraunce of Iustice, and maintenance therof throughe all partes of his realme.

The king by the aduice of these noble men of his realme, thinking it necessary for him to match againe in mariage with some noble princesse, sent into France vnto the Erle of Murrey, and Dauid Beton Abbot of Arbroth, his Ambassadors there resident, willing them by the aduice of the French king, to treate for a mariage to bee had betwixt him and the Ladie Marie de Lorraine, dutchesse of Longuile, widdow, daughter to the Duke of Guise, and being aduertised from his sayde Ambassadors, that the King of France, the Lady hir selfe, and hir friendes, were well contented therewith, he sent in the beginning of May the Lorde Marwell, and the maister of Glencarne, well accompanied into Fraunce, to ioyne with hys other Ambassadours for the contracting of that maryage, the which according to their Commission treated thereof, and concluded vpon resolute articles, and so espoused hir by procurators, as the vse is among such estates, with great triumph in the Citie of Paris, whereat the king and many noble men were present.

The king is suter for mariage to the Dutchesse of Longuile.

After this she was conueyed to Newhauen, and there taking the Seas, passed throughe the same, till she came to Carell in Fife, where shee landed the tenth of June, and from thence shee was conueyed to the new Palace in the Abbay of Saint Andrewes, being honourably prepared for the receyuing of hir. And there the King accompanyed wyth manye Noble menne, openlye solemnized and confyrmed the foresayde mariage with the sayd Ladie in the Abbay Church, with great ioy and triumph.

The mariage solemnized.

The King with hys Queene remayned there the moste part of that Sommer. And wythin a fewe Monethes after the maryage, she conceyued wyth childe, to the greate comforte of the King and the whole Realme, for the hope of succession thereby, and therefore generall Processions and publike prayers were made throughe all partes of the Realme for the prosperous successe of the same.

After that the king had pacified the borders and all other parts of his realme by exercising of Iustice, and trauailing about the same in his owne persone throughe all places (where neede required) so that there was as greate quietnesse, rest, and policie vsed in Scotlande, as euer was in anye Kings dayes before him: Yet neuertheless there were certaine disobedient persons in the Iles.

Great quietnesse in Scotla

The King therefore to bring them to order, caused to prepare a good nauie of shippes, and in the the Moneth of May went abourde the same in the road of Leith, hauing with him the Earles of Arrane, Huntley, Argile, and diuerse other Erles, Lordes, and Barons, with whom he sayled forth by the coastes of Fife, Angus, Aberdin, by Murrey forth, Southerlande, and Cathenes, till hee came to Orkeney, where he landing and all hys companie with him, were receyued right honourably by the Bishop Robert Maxwell. Here they furnished themselues with fresh victailes, and other such things as were necessarie, and taking the seas againe, sayled to the Iles of Skie, and Lewis, where Mac Clewd of the Lewis, a principall clan of his kin, was brought vnto the king, who sent forth also a cõpanie vnto Mac Clewd haugh, who came likewise out of his Ile, and presented himselfe to the king.

From thence the king sayled by the coast of Rosse by Kyntaile, to the Ile of Tranternes, where diuerse of the Maconiles, such as the Lord Olagarry, John Moydart and others, (who alledged themselues to be of the principall bloud, and Lords of the Iles) were brought also to the kings presence.

From thence trauayling through the residue of the Iles, Maclane, and James Maconile of Kinter, being the two principal Captaines of the small Iles, came likewise to the king, who at length landed at Dunbretaine, and sent the captayns and ships with prisoners to passe the same, way he came rounde aboute the coast so to come to Edenbourgh, where the same prisoners being arriued, the chiefe heades of them were kept in ward as pledges for good rule in their Countries, and were not suffred to depart so long as the king liued, whereby there followed greate quietnesse, and as good obedience to the lawes throughout al the Iles, as there was in any part of the realm, and as good account and payment made to the kings Comptroller in his Exchequer, for the lands of the same Iles pertayning to the crowne, as for any part of the reuenues belonging thereunto within the maine land.

Whilest the king was in this voyage, the Queene was deliuered of a sonne at Saint Andrewes, whereof the king being aduertised at hys landing, hasted with all possible diligence to the Queene, and shortly after was the childe baptised, and called James. The Archbishop of S. Andrewes, and the Earle of Arrane were Godfathers, and the Queene the Kings mother was Godmother. For the byrth of this Prince, there were bonefires made through all partes of the Realme, with greate triumph and ryuing of thankes vnto God for the same.

After this the Queene, mother to the K. returned vnto Methwen, where after she had remayned a certaine tyme, a sickenesse tooke hir, of the which shortly after she departed this life, and was buried in the Charterhouse Churche of Saint Johns Towne, by the Tombe of King James the first. The king himselfe and many Nobles of the Realme were present at the funerailes, which were kept in most solemne and pompous maner. The Queene mother departed this life.

The same yeare, were burnt at Edenbourgh for hereſie, as it was then taken, a regular Chanon, two blacke Friers, and a secular man. Certaine persons burnt for religion.

Also two Priestes were degraded, and condemned to perpetuall prison.

The same time there was a gray Frier in the Citie of Glascew burnt for the like cause, and many other summoned, and because they would not appeare, they were denounced heretikes.

About the same tyme, James Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrewes, a man of great age, departed this life, and was buried in Saint Andrewes. Before his departure, he had prouided successors to all his benefices, first to his Archbishop his sea, and to the Abbay of Arbroth, maister Dauid Beton, afterwards Cardinall, and to the Abbey of Dunfermling maister George Dury, that was Archdeane of Saint Andrewes. These men without any gainsaying of the King entred with his good will into the same benefices, immediately after his decease. The death of James Beton Archbishop of S. Andrewes.

This James Beton buylded a great part of the new Colledge of Saint Andrewes, and left great summes of money & treasure to go through to make an ende of the same worke.

This yeare in the moneth of August sir James Hamilton of Finhart knight, remayning as then in the towne of Edenbourgh, was arrested by Dauid Wood Comptroller to the king, who charged him in the kings name to go vnto ward within the Castell of Edenbourgh, which commaundement he willingly obeyed, thinking himselfe sure enough, as well by reason of the good seruice he had done to the king specially in repayring the Palaces of Striueling & Linlitgew, as also for that the king had him in so high fauour, 1540 Sir James Hamilton arested

After this, the Queene went vnto Saint Johns towne, where she was honourably receyued with great triumph made by the towne. She

They remayned there the space of fiftene dayes, and were highly entertayned by the Bishop of that place. There were exercises and disputations holde in all kinde of sciences in the Colledges and Schooles, with diuerſe Orations made in Greeke, Latine, and other languages, to the high prayse and commendation of the maiſters and students in that Vniuerſitie.

From thence the king with the Queene returned to Dundee, where a coſtly entrie was prepared for them also, after they had bin right princely entertained there, they came to Falkeland.

In the Moneth of May, Sir John Borthwike, commonlye called Capitayne Borthwike, ſuſpected, defamed, and accuſed of hereſie, Captain Borthwike accuſed of hereſie. was commoned to appeare in Saint Andrewes before the Cardinall, and diuerſe other Bishops and Prelates there present, where notwithſtanding his abſence, the same being proued by ſufficient witneſſe agaynſt him (as was thought) hee was conuict and declared an heretike: An ymage was made to reſemble him, and at the Market croſſe of the sayd Citie, as a signe and a memorial of his condemnation, it was burned, to the feare and example of other, but he himſelfe escaped their handes and got into Englande, where he was receyued.

This yeare the King of England aduertiſed of the meeting of the Emperor, the French King, and Pope, at the Citie of Nice, doubting some practice to be deuiſed there agaynſt him, ſent to the king of Scotland, the L. William Howard, deſiring him as his moſt tender kinſman and nephew, to meete him at the citie of Yorke in Englande, where he would communicate ſuch things with him, as ſhoulde be for the weale of both the realmes: and therewith the King of Englande truſting that the king of Scotlande would haue fulfilled his deſire, cauſed great preparation to be made at Yorke for the receyuing of him. But albeit the king of Scotlande was willing of himſelfe to haue paſſed into Englande, to haue met and seene his Vncle, yet after long reaſoning and deliberation of his Counſaile and Prelates aſſembled for that purpoſe, caſting in their minds (as they toke it) what daunger might fall to him and his realme, if he ſhould paſſe into Englande, in caſe he ſhould be ſtayed and holden there, contrarie to his will, as king Iames his predeceſſor was, hauing no ſucceſſion of his bodie: and againe, for that it was certainly knowne, that the principall cauſe why the King of Englande required this meeting or enterview, was to perſwade the king of Scotlande to vſe the like order in Scotlande, as he had done within his realme of England, in aboliſhing the Popes authoritie, making himſelfe ſupreme heade of the Churche, expulſing religious perſons oute of their houſes, and ſeaſing the iewels of their houſes, their lands and rentes, with ſuch like information: and if it chaunced their king ſhould attempt the like, they thought he ſhould loſe the friendſhip which was betwixt him, the Pope, the Emperor and French king, that were his great friendes and confederates. Herewpon they perſwaded him to ſtay, and by their aduiſe ſent pleaſant letters and meſſages vnto the ſayd king of Englande, deſiring him to haue him excuſed, for that he could not come into Englande at that time, hauing ſuch lettes and cauſes of abyding at home, as ſhortly he ſhoulde vnderſtande by his Imbaſſadors, which he ment to ſende to him, as well for this matter as other ceules. And shortly after sir James Leyzmouth was appoynted to go as Imbassadoz into England, as well to make the kings excuse foz his not comming to meet the king of England at Yozk, as also to make complaint vpon certaine inuasions made by the bozderers of Englande into Scotland, and also foz the vsing of the debatable ground betwixt the two Realmes But the king of England soze offended that the king of Scotlende: woulde not satisfie his request, to meete him at Yozke (as before is recited, would admitte no excuse. but determined to make warre into Scotland; albeit as the Scottishmen alledge, hee would not suffer the same to be vnderstood, till he had prepared all things in a readinesse: and in the meane time sent Commissioners to meete with the Scots cõmissioners vpon the debatable groũd to talk foz redzesse to be made of harmes done vpon the bozders, but no good conclusion coulde be agreed vpon by these commissioners, neither touching the debatable land, noz yet foz reparing of wzongs done by inuasions.

But that the truth concerning the causes of this warre moued at this present by that noble Prince king Henrie the. viij. may the better appeare, I haue thought good here to set downe the same as they were drawne foxth and published in print to the whole wozlde by the sayde king in a little Phamplet vnder this title.

A declaration conteyning the iust causes and considerations of this present warre with the Scots, wherein also appeareth the true and right title that the kings most royal Maiestie hath to his soueraintie of Scotlãd, and thus it beginneth.

BEing now enforced to the warre which wee haue alwayes hitherto so much abhozred and fled, by our neighboz & nephew the king of Scots, one who aboue al other foz our manifold benefits towarde him, hath most iust cause to loue vs, to honoz vs, and to reioice in our quietnesse: we haue thought good to notifie vnto the wozlde his doings and behauioz in the pzouocatiõ of this war, and likewise the meanes and wayes by vs to eschew and auoyd it; and the iust and true occasions wherby we be now pzouoked to pzosecute the same, and by vttrãce and demulging of that matter; to disburden some part of our inwarde displeasure and griefe: and the circumstaunces knowne, to lament openly with the wozlde the infidelitie of this time, in which things of suche enozmitie do burst out and appeare. The king of Scottes our nephew and neighbour, whom wee in his youth and tender age preserued and maintayned from the great daunger of other, and by our authozitie and power, conducted him safely to the royall possession of his estate, he now compelleth and enforceth vs foz preseruation of our honour and right, to vse our puyssaunce and power agaynst him. The lyke vnkindnesse hath beene heretofore shewed by other in semblable cases agaynst Gods lawe, mans lawe, and all humanitie: but the oftner it chaunceth, the moze it is to be abhozred, and yet in the persons of Pzinces, foz the raritie of them can so happen but seldome, as it hath now come to passe. It hath bene verie rarely and seldome seene before, that a king of Scottes hath had in maryage a daughter of Englande. We cannot, ne will not reprehende the king our fathers acte therein, but lament and bee sozie it toke no better effect. The king our father in that matter mynded loue, amitie, and perpetual friendship betwene the posteritie of both which how soone it fayled, the death of the King of Scottes, as a due punishment of God, foz his vniust inuasion into this our Realme, is and shal be a perpetuall testimonie of theyz reproch foz euer, and yet in that present time coulde not the vnkindnesse of the father extinguish in vs the naturall loue of our nephew his sonne, being then in the miserable age of tender youth: but we thẽ forgetting the displeasure that should haue worthily pzouoked vs to inuade that realm, nourished and bzought vp our nephew, to atchieue his fathers possessiõ & gouernmẽt, wherin he now so vnkindly vseth and behaueth himselfe towards vs, as he cõpelleth vs to take armoz & warre agaynst him. It is specially to be noted, vpon what groundes, and by what meanes we be cõpelled to this war, wherein among other is our chiefe griefe and displeasure, that vnder a colour of faire speech & flattering wozdes, we be in deed so iniuried, cõtemned and despised, as we ought not with sufferance to permit, and passe ouer: wozdes, wzitings, letters, messages, ambassades, excuses, allegations, could not moze pleasantly, moze gently, ne moze reuerently be deuised & sent, than hath bin made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs, & euer we trusted the tree would bzing foxth good fruit, that was of the one part of so good a stocke, and cõtinually in apparance put foxth so fayze buddes: and therfoze would hardly belieue oz giue eare to other, that euer alledged the deedes of the contrarie, bring neuertheless the same deeds so manifest as we must needes haue regarded them, had not we beene so loth to thinke euill of our nephew, whom we had so many ways boũd to be of the best sozt toward vs, and therefoze hauing a message sent vnto vs the yeare past from our sayde nephew, and a promise made foz the repayzing of the sayde King of Scottes vnto vs to Yozke, and after greate pzeparation on our part made therefoze, the same meeting was not onely disappoynted, but also at our being at Yozke in the lieu therof, an inuasion made by our sayd nephew his subiectes into our lande, declaring an euident contempt and dispite of vs: we were yet gladdc to impute the default of the meeting to the aduise of his counsaile, and the inuasion of the lewdnesse of his subiectes, and accordyng therevnto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to such Imbassadours as repayred hither at Christmasse afterwarde, as if no such cause of displeasure had occurred, specially considering the good wordes, sweete wordes, pleasant wordes, effsones proponed by the sayde Imbassadors, not onely to excuse that was past, but also to perswade kindnesse and perfite amitie to ensue.

And albeit the king of Scottes hauing contrarie to the article of the league of amitie receyued and interteyned suche rebels as were of the chief and principal, in sturring the insurrection in the North agaynst vs, with refusall before time, vpon request made to restore the same, yet neuertheless, vpon offer made, the sayde Imbassadors to sende commission to the borderers, to determin the debates of the confines in the same with so great a pretence of amitie, and so fayre words as coulde be in speech desired, we were content for the time to forbeare to presse them ouer extremely in the matter of rebels. Albeit we neuer remitted the same, but desirous to make triall of oure sayde nephew in some correspondence of deedes, condiscended to the sending of Commissioners to the borders, which to our great charge wee did, and the king of Scottes our sayde nephew the semblable: where after great trauaile made by our Commissioners, this fruite ensued, that being for our part chalenged, a peece of our grounde plainly vsurped by the Scottes, and of no greate value, being also for the same shewed suche euidence, as more substantiall, more autentique, plaine and euident, cannot bee brought forth for any part of grounde within our Realme: the same was neuertheless by them denied, refused, and the euidence onely for this cause reiected, that it was made (as they alledged) by Englishmen. and yet it was so auncient, as it coulde not bee counterfeyt now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight as no man woulde haue attempted to falsifie for such a matter. And yet this denial being in this wise made vnto our Commissioners, they neuertheless by our commaundement departed as friends from the commissioners of Scotlande, taking order as hath beene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time.

After which their receasse, the Lorde Maxwell warden of the west Marches of Scotland, made Proclamation for good rule, but yet added therewith, that the borderers of Scotlād should withdrawe their goodes from the borderers of Englande, and incontinent the Scottish men borderers, the fourth of July entred into our Realme sodainly, and spoyled our subiectes contrarie to our leagues, euen after such extremitie as it had beene in the time of open warre, whereat wee much marueyled, and were compelled therefore to furnish our borders with a garnison for defence of the same. Wherevpon the king of Scots sent vnto vs James Leyrmouth maister of his housholde, with letters deuised in the most pleasaunt maner, offring redresse and reformation of all attempts. And yet neuertheless, at the entrie of the sayd Leyrmouth into England, a great number of the Scottes then not looked for, made a forrey into our borders, to the great annoyaunce of our subiects, and to their extreme detriment, wherewith, and with that vnseemly dissimulation, we were not a little moued, as reason woulde wee should: and yet did we not finally so extremely prosecute and continue our sayde displeasure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the sayd Leyrmouth, and suffred our selfe to bee somewhat altered by his wordes and fayre promises, tending to the perswasion that we euer desired to find the king of Scottes such a nephew vnto vs, as our proximitie of bloud, with our gratuitie vnto him did require.

In the meane time of these fayre wordes, the deedes of the borderers were as extreme as might be, and our subiects spoyled: and in a road made by sir Robert Bowes for a reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert Bowes, & many other were taken prisoners, & yet detayned in Scotlād without putting them to fine or raunsome, as hath beene euer accustomed. And being at the same time a surseyance made on both sides, at the suyte of the sayde Leyrmouth for a season: the Scottes ceased not to make sondry inuasions into our realm, in such wise, as we were compelled to forget faire wordes, and onely to consider the king of Scots deedes, which appeared vnto vs of that sort, as they ought not for our duetie in defence of oure subiects, ne could not in respect of our honour, be passed ouer vnreformed: and therefore put in a readinesse our armie as a due meane whereby we might attaine such a peace, as for the safegarde of our subiects we be bound to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowledge had thereof, the king of Scottes ceased not to vse his accustomed meane of fayre wordes, which in our naturall inclination wrought effsones their accustomed effect, euermore desirous to finde in the King of Scottes such regarde and respect to be declared in deedes, as the correspondence of naturall loue in the nephew to suche an vncle as we haue shewed our selfe towarde him, doth requice. Wherefore vpon new request and suyte made vnto vs, we determined to stay oure armie at Yorke, appoynting the Duke of Norfolke folke our Lieutenaunt, the Lorde privy seale, the Bishop of Durham, & the Master of our horses, there to commen, treate, and conclude with the Imbassadours of Scotland, for an amity and peace, upon suche condition, as by reason and equitie were indifferent, wherby the warre might be eschewed, being by sundry invasions of the Scottes then opened and manifeste. In this communication betweene our and their commissioners, after diuers degrees of commission shewed by the Scots, and finally one that was by our Commissioners allowed, matters were proponed for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficile or harde of our parte, but so agreeable to reason, as the commissioners of Scotland sayde they doubted not but if it might be brought to passe that the King of Scottes our Nephewe might haue a meeting with vs, al matters shuld easily be componed and determined: whereupon they left speaking of any articles of amity, and the Imbassadours of Scotlande made muche outwarde ioy in cõmunicatiõ of meeting. They shewed themselues in wordes, fashion and behauiour much to delight in it, to reioyce in it, and therewith, thought it easie and facile to bee concluded and accomplished, and for their parte they toke it then for a thing passed, a thing concluded, and most certayne to take effect, and only desired fiue dayes to obtayne answeare from their Master, and our army from that time to stay and goe no further: whereunto our Commissioners then agreed. After these fiue dayes was sent a commission out of Scotland, with power to conclude a meeting precisely at such a place, as they knew wel we should not, ne could not in Winter obserue and keepe, wherewith when our Commissioners were miscõtent, the Imbassadours of Scotlande to releue that displeasure, and to temper the matter whereby to winne more tyme, shewed forth their instructions, wherein liberty was giuen to the Imbassadours to exceede their commission in the appointment of the place, and to consent to any other ẏ by our commissioners should be thought conuenient: which manner of proceeding when our Cõmissioners refused, alleaging that they would not conclude a meeting with men hauing no commission therevnto, the Imbassadours of Scotland vpon pretence to sende for a more ample and large commission, agreeable to their instructions for appoyntment of the place, obtayned a delay of other fiue dayes to sende for the sayde ample commission without restraint of place: And after these fiue dayes they brought forth a newe commission, made in a good forme and without exception: but therewith also they shewed newe instructions, contayning suche a restraynt as the former commission did cõtaine, so as the liberty giuen to the Commissioners in the commission was now at the laste removed and taken away by the instructions, with addition of a speciall charge to the Imbassadours, not to exceede the same. And thus first the Imbassadours of Scotland seemed to haue a will and desire to conclude a place seemely and conuenient, whiche for want of commission they might not do, and at the last might haue concluded a meeting by vertue of their commissiõ, and then for feare of the commaundement in their second instructions they durst not. And so they shewed their first instructions partly to excuse their King, who should seeme secretely to will more, than in the commission he did openly professe. And then with an ample commissiõ from the King they shewed their secrete instructions for defence of themselues, why they proceeded not according to their commission, not caring how much they charged therin the king, whose faulte they disclosed, to discharge themselues, trusting that by benefite of the Winter approching, and the time lost in their communicatiõ, their Master should be defended against our power for this yeere, without doing for their parte that by honour, right, lawe, and leagues they be obliged and bounde to do. And in this meane time our subiectes being taken prysoners in Scotlande, coulde not be deliuered vpon any raunsome, contrary to all custome and vsage of the borderers in the time of peace and warre. And in this meane tyme stayed a great part of our army already prested, and in our wages to go forwarde. In this time Imbassadours (as ye haue heard) assembled to talke of an amitie, but cõcluded none. The treating of amity was put ouer by communication of a meeting. The communication of meeting was so handled by alteration of commission and instructions on their behalf, as it appeareth a playne deuice only inuented for a delay, whiche hath giuen vs light, wherevpon more certaynely to iudge the King of Scottes inward affection towarde vs, whose deedes and wordes well waied and considered, doth vs plainely to vnderstande how he hath cõtinually labored to abuse vs with sweete and pleasant wordes, & to satisfie the appetites of other at home and abrode with his vnkinde & displeasant deedes. In his wordes he professeth an indissoluble amity, he alledgeth kinred, he knowledgeth benefites, onely the faulte is, that hee speaketh an other language to all the worlde in deedes, and thereby so toucheth vs in honour and denegation of Justice, as we be inforced and compelled to vse the swoorde whiche God hath put in our handes as an extreme remedy, whereby to obtayne bothe quietnesse for our subiectes, and also that is due vnto vs by right, pactes and leagues. Wee haue pacientlye suffered many delusions, and notably the laste yeere, when we made preparation at Yorke for his repaire to vs. But should we suffer our people and subiectes to be so oft spoyled without remedy? this is done by the Scottes what soeuer their wordes be. Should wee suffer our rebels to be detayned cõtrary to the leagues without remedy? this is also done by them what soeuer their wordes be. Should wee suffer our lande to be vsurped contrary to our most plaine euidence, onely vpon a will, pryde, & arrogancie of the other party? this is done by them whatsoeuer their wordes be. And all these be euer presumptuously done agaynst vs, and giue suche signification of their arrogancy, as it is necessary for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, least they should gather further courage, to the greater displeasure of vs and our posterity hereafter.

And yet in the intreating of this matter, if wee had not euidently perceiued the lacke of such affection as proximity of bloud should require, we would much rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximity of bloud to our Nephew, than we did heretofore the inuasiõ of his father.
But considering we be so surely ascertayned of the lacke thereof, and that our bloud is there frozen with the colde ayre of Scotlande, there was neuer Prince more violently compelled to warre, than we be by the vnkind dealing, vniust behauiour, vnprincely demeanor of him that yet in nature is our Nephew, and in his actes and deedes, declareth himselfe not to be moued ther-with, ne to haue such earnest regarde to the obseruation of his pactes and leagues, ne such respect to the intertaynement of the administration of Justice, as naturall equitie bindeth, and conseruation of equity doth require: whiche wee much lament and be sory for, and vse nowe our force and puissance against him, not for reuẽgement of our priuate displeasure (beyng so often deliuered as wee haue bene) but for recouery of our right, the preseruation of our subiectes from iniuries, and the obseruation of suche leagues as haue passed betweene vs, firmely trusting, that almighty God vnder whome we raygne, will assist and ayde our iust proceedings herein to the furtheraunce and aduancement of the right, whiche wee doubte not shall euer preuayle against wrong, falshood, deceyte, and dissimulation. Hitherto it appeareth howe this present warre hath not proceeded of any demaũd of our right of superiority, whiche the Kings of Scots haue alwayes knowledged by homage & fealty to our progenitors eũe from the beginning: but this warre hath bene prouoked & occasioned vpõ present matter of displeasure, present iniury, present wrong ministred by the Nephewe to the Uncle most vnnaturally, & supported contrary to the desertes of our benefits most vnkindly, if we had minded the possession of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to attayne the same, there was neuer King of this realme had more opportunitie in the minority of our Nephew, ne in any other realme a Prince that hath more iust title, more euident title, more certaine title, to any realme that he can clayme, than we haue to Scotland, not deuised by pretẽce of mariage, nor imagined by couenant, nor contriued by in-uention of argument, but lineally descended from the beginnyng of that estate established by our progenitors, and recognised successiuely of the Kings of Scotlãd, by deedes, wordes, actes and writings continually almost without interruption, or at the least intermission, till the raigne of our progenitor King Henry the sixte, in whose time the Scots abused the ciuil warre of this realme, to their licence and boldnesse, in omitting of their duetie: whiche for the proximity of bloud betweene vs, we haue bene slacke to require of them, beyng also of our selfe inclined to peace, as we haue euer ben alwayes glad, rather without preiudice to omitte to demaund our right if it might conserue peace, than by demaunding thereof to be seene to moue warre, specially agaynst our neyghbour, agaynst our Nephew, against him whom we haue preserued from daunger, and in such a time as it were expedient for al Christendome to be in vnitie and peace, wherby to be more able to resist the common enimy the Turke.

But for what considerations we haue omitted to speake hitherto of the matter, it is neuer-theless true, that the kings of Scottes haue alwayes knowledged the Kings of England superior Lordes of the realme of Scotlande, and haue done homage & fealty for the same. This appeareth first by History written by suche as for confirmation of the truthe in memory haue truly noted and signified the same. Secondly it appeereth by instruments of homage made by the Kings of Scottes and diuers notable personages of Scotlande, at diuers sundry tymes sealed with their seales, and remayning in our Treasory. Thirdly it appeereth by Registers and Recordes iudicially & autentiquely made, yet preserued for confirmation of the same. So as the mater of title being moste playne, is furnished also with all manner of euidences for declaration thereof. First as concernyng Histories which be called witnesses of times, the light of truth, and the lyfe of memory, and finally the conuenient way and meane, whereby the thinges of antiquity may be brought to mens knowledge, they shewe as playnly this matter as could bee wyshed or requyred, with suche a

consent of wryters as coulde not so agree vpon an vntruth, contayning a declaration of suche matter as hath moste euident probability and apparance. For as it is probable and likely, that for the better administration of Justice amongst rude people, two or moe of one estate might be rulers in one countrey, vnited as this Ile is: so it is probable and likely, that in the beginnyng it was so ordered for auoyding dissention, that there shoulde be one Superiour, in right of whome the sayd estates should depend.

Accordyng whereunto we reade, how Brute of whome the Realme then called Brytayne toke first that name, (beyng before that tyme inhabited with Gyaunts, people without order or ciuility) had three Sonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, and determining to haue the whole Ile within the Ocean sea to bee after gouerned by them three, appoynted Albanact to rule that now is called Scotlande, Camber the parties of Wales, and Locrine that now is called England: vnto whome as beyng the eldest Sonne, the other two brethrene should do homage, recognysing, and knowledging him as their superior.

Nowe consider if Brutus conquered all this Iland, as the Hystory sayth he did, and then in his owne tyme made this order of superiority as afore: howe can there be a title deuised of a more plaine beginning, a more iust beginning, a more conuenient beginnyng, for the order of this Iland, at that time specially when the people were rude, whiche cannot without continuall stryfe and variaunce contayne two or three rulers in all poyntes equall without any manner of superiority, the inwarde conscience and remorse of whiche superiority shoulde in some parte dull and diminishe the peruerse courage of resistence and rebellion.

The first diuisiō of this Ile, wee finde written after this sorte, without cause of suspition why they shoulde write amisse. And accordyng hereunto wee finde also in Hystory set forth by diuers, how for transgression against this superiority, our predecessours haue chastised the kings of Scottes, and some deposed & put other in their places: we will here omitte to speake of the rudenesse of the antiquity in particularity, whiche they cared not distinctly to committe to writing, but some authors, as Anthonius Sabellicus amongs other diligently enserchyng what he might truly wryte of all Europe and the Ilandes adioyning, ouer and besides that whiche he wryteth of the natures, maners, and condicions of the Scottes, whiche who so liste to reade, shall finde to haue bene the very same in times passe, that wee finde them nowe at this present, he calleth Scotland, parte of England, whiche is agreeable to the diuision aforesayde being in deede as in the lande continuall without separation of the Sea, so also by homage and fealty, vnited vnto the same, as by particular declarations shall most manifestly appeere, by the testimony of suche as haue left wryting for proofe and confirmation thereof.

In whiche matter passing the death of king Humber, the actes of Dunwald King of this realme, the diuision of Belyn and Brenne, the victories of king Arthur, we shall beginne at the yeare of our Lorde D. CCCC. whiche is a D.Cxlij. yeares passe, a time of sufficient auncienty, from which we shal make speciall declaration & euident proofe of the execution of our right and title of superiority euermore continued and preserued hitherto.

Edwarde the firste before the conquest, Sonne to Alured King of England, had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Maryon a Scot writyng that story in those dayes, graunteth, confesseth, and testifieth the same: and this dominion continued in that state xxiij. yeares.

At whiche tyme Athelstane succeeded in the crowne of Englande, and hauing by battayle conquered Scotlande, he made one Constantine king of that party, to rule and gouerne the country of Scotlande vnder him, addyng this Princely worde, that it was more honorable to him to make a King, than to be a King. Xxiij. yeares after that, whiche was the yeare of our Lorde, 947, Eldred King our progenitour Athelstanes brother, toke homage of Irise then King of Scottes. Xxx. yeares after that, which was in the yeare of our Lord 977, King Edgar our predecessour toke homage of Kynald kyng of Scots. Here was a little trouble in England by the death of Saint Edward kyng and Martyr, destroyed by the deceyte of his Mother in lawe: but yet within memory, xl. yeares after the homage done by Kynald to kyng Edgare, that is to say, in the yeare of our Lorde 1018, Malcolme king of Scottes did homage to Knute our predecessour.

After this homage done, the Scottes bitered some peece of their naturall disposition, wherevpon by warre made by our progenitour Saint Edwarde the Confessor, xxxix. yeare after homage done, that is to say, the yeare of our Lorde 1056, Malcolme king of Scottes was banquished, and the realme giuen to Malcolme his Sonne, by our sayde progenitour S. Edwarde: vnto whome the sayde Malcolme made homage and fealty, within eleuen yeares after that William Conquerour entred this realme, whereof hee accompted no perfect conquest, vntill hee had likewyse subdued the Scotts, and therefore in the sayde yeare which was in the yeare of our Lorde, 1068, the sayde Malcolme King of Scottes did homage to the sayde William Conquerour, as his superiour by conquest King of England. xv. yeares after that, whiche was in the yeare of our Lord, 1094, the sayde Malcolme did homage and fealty to William Rufus, sonne to the sayde William Conquerour, and yet after that was for his offences and demerites deposed, and his sonne substitute in his place, who likewise fayled of his duetie: and therefore was ordeyned in that estate by the sayde William Rufus, Edgar brother to the last Malcolme, sonne to the first, who did homage & fealty accordingly.

Seuen yeares after, that was in the yeare of our Lorde, 1100, the sayde Edgar King of Scottes did homage to Henry the first our progenitour, xxvij. yeare after that Dauid King of Scottes did homage to Mathild the Empresse, as daughter and heyre to Henry the first. Wherefore beyng after required by Stephen, then obtayning possession of the realme, to make his homage, he refused so to do, because he had before made it to the sayde Mathild and therevpon forbare. After which Dauids death, whiche ensued shortely after, the Sonne of the sayde Dauid made homage to the sayde King Stephen. viij. yeares after that, which was in the yeare of our Lorde. M.Cl. William king of Scottes, and Dauid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotlande, made homage to Henry the secondes sonne, with a reservation of their duety to Henry the second his father. xxv. yeres after, which was in the yeare of our Lord, 1175. William king of Scotlande after muche rebellion and resistence, accordyng to their naturall inclination, King Henry the second then beyng in Normandy, William then king of Scottes knowledged finally his errour, and made his peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the nobility of Scotland, makyng therewith his homage and fealty.

Within. xv. yeares after that, which was the yeare of our Lorde, 1190. the sayde William kyng of Scottes came to our Citie of Cantorbury, and there did homage to our noble progenitour kyng Richarde the first. viij. yeares after that the sayde William did homage to our progenitour king John, vpon a hil besides Lincolne, makyng his othe vpon the crosse of Hubert then Archbishop of Canterbury, beyng their present, a maruelous multitude assembled for that purpose. xvj. yeares after that, whiche was in the yeare of our Lorde, 1216, Alexander King of Scottes maried Margarete, the daughter of our progenitour Henry the thirde, at our Citty of Yorke, in the feaste of Christmasse, at whiche tyme the sayde Alexander dyd his homage to our sayd progenitour, who raigned in this realme lvj. yeares. And therefore betweene the homage made by the sayde Alexander kyng of Scottes, and the homage done by Alexander, sonne to the sayde king of Scots, to Edwarde the first at his Coronation at Westminster, there was aboute fifty yeares, at whiche tyme the sayd Alexander king of Scots repayred to the sayde feast of Coronation, and there did his dutie, as is aforesayd. Within xxviij. yeares after that, whiche was the yeare of our Lorde, 1282, John Baliol Kyng of Scots made his homage and fealty to the sayd king Edwarde the first our progenitour.

After this beganne Robert Bruse to vsurpe the crowne of Scotlande, and to moue sedition therefore, against them of the house of Bellioll, whiche made for a season some interruption in the sayde homage, but yet no intermission without the termes of memory, for within. xliij. yeares after, which was the yeere of our Lorde, 1326, Edward Baliioll after a greate victory had in Scotland agaynst the other faction, and enioying the crowne of Scotlande, made homage to our progenitour Edwarde the thirde. And twenty yeares after that, which was in the yeare of our Lorde. 1346, Dauid Bruse, who was euer in the contrary faction, did neuertheless in the Title of the crowne of Scotlande, wherof he was then in possession, make homage to our sayde progenitour Edwarde the thirde.

Within, ix. yeres after this, Edward ỹ third, to chastise the infidelitie of the Scottes, made warre agaynst them: when after greate victories, Edward Baliioll hauing the iust and right title to the realme of Scotland, surrendred clearly the same to our sayde progenitour, at the towne of Rokesborough in Scotlande, where our sayde progenitour accepted the same, and then caused himselfe to be crowned Kyng of Scotlande, and for a tyme entertayned it, and enioyed it, as very proprietary and owner of the realme, as on the one party by confiscation acquited, and on the other part by free will surrendred vnto him. And then after the death of our sayde progenitour Edwarde the thirde beganne sedicions and insurrections in this our realme, in the tyme of our progenitour Richard the second, whiche was augmented by the alteration of the state of the sayde Richarde, and the deuolution of the same, to Henry the fourth, so as the Scottes had some leysure to play their vagues, and follow their accustomed manner. And yet Henry the fifth for recouery of his right in Fraunce, commaunded the kyng of Scottes to attende vpon him in that iourney. And in this time the realme of Scotlande beyng discended to the house of the Stewardes, of whiche our Nephew directly commeth.

James Stewarde kyng of Scottes in the yeere of our Lord. 1423, made homage to Henry the sixte at Windsore, whiche homage was distaunt frō the time of the other homage, made by Dauid Bruse. lx. yeares and more, but farre within the freshe memory of man.

All whiche homages and fealties as they appeare by story to haue bene made and done at times and seasons as afore, so do there remayne instruments made therevpō, and sealed with the seales of the kings of Scotlande testifyng the same. And yet doth it appeare by story, how the Scottes practised to steale out of our treasury diuers of these instrumentes, whiche neuertheless were afterwarde recouered againe.

And to the intent ye may knowe of what fourme and tenour the sayd instrumēts be, here is inserted, the effect in word and sentence as they be made, whiche we do, to meete with the cauillation and contriued euasion of the Scots, alleging the homage to haue bene made for the Erledome of Huntington, whiche is as true as the allegation of him that is burnt in the hand, to say he was cut with a sickle. And therefore the tenour of the homage is this.

I John M. king of Scottes shalbe true and faythfull vnto you Lord Edwarde by the grace of God king of Englande, the noble and superiour Lorde of the kingdome of Scotlande, as vnto you I make my fidelity of the same kingdome of Scotlande, the whiche I holde and clayme, to hold of you, and I shall beare to you my fayth and fidelity of life and limme, and worldly honour agaynst all men, and faythfully I shall knowledge, and shall do to you seruice due vnto you of the kingdome of Scotland aforesayde, as God so helpe and these holy Euangelies.

Now for the thirde part touching Recordes and Registers, we haue them so formall, so autentiquall, so seriously handled and with suche circumstaunces declaryng the matters as they be and ought to be, a great corroboration of that hath bene in Stories written and reported in this matter. For amongs other things we haue the solempne acte and iudiciall processe of our progenitour Edwarde the first, in discussion of of the Title of Scotland, when the same was chalenged by twelue competitours, that is to say, Florentius comes Holandiæ.

Patricius de Dunbar comes de Merchia.

And finally, after a great consultation and mature deliberation, with discussion of the allegations proponed on all parties, sentence was giuen for the Title of Bailiol, according wherevnto, he enioyed the realme, but for confirmation of the dutie of the homage before that time obserued by the Kings of Scottes, it appeareth in those Recordes, howe when those competitours of the realme of Scotlande repayred to our sayde progenitour, as to the chiefe Lorde for discussion of the same, in as much as the auctorite of the iudgement to be giuen depended therevpon: it was then ordered that the whole Parliament of Scotlande. spirituall, temporall, and of all degrees assembled for that purpose, and considerying vpon what grounde and fundation the Kings of Scotland had in times past made the sayde homages and recognition of superiority, the said Parliament findyng the same good and true, should if they so deemed it, yeelde and giue place, and by expresse consent recognise the same.

At whiche Parliament was alleged vnto them, as appeareth in the same Recordes, not onely these Actes of the Princes before those dayes, and before rehearsed: but also besides the testimony of stories, the writings and letters of forreyne Princes at that tyme reciteyng and rehearsing the same: whereupon the sayd Parliament dyd there agree to this our superiority, and ensuyng their determination did particularly and seuerally make homage and fealty with proclamation, that who soeuer withdrew himselfe from doing his dutie therein, should be reputed as a rebell.

And so all made homage and fealty to our progenitour Edwarde the firste. And the realme of Scotlande was in the time of the discussion of the Title ruled by Gardias deputed by him, all Castels and holdes were surrendred to him as to the superiour Lorde, in the time of vacation, benefices, offices, fees, promotions passed in that tyme from the mere gifte of our sayde progenitour, as in the right of this crowne of Englande, Shyriffes named and appoynted, writtes and precepts made, obeyed and executed: and finally all that we do now in the Duchie of Lancaster, the same did our progenitour for the tyme of the contention for that Title in the realme of Scotlande, by the consent of an agreement of all estates of the realme assembled and consulted with for that purpose. At whiche tyme the Bishops of S. Andrewes and Glasqno, were not as they now be Archbishops, but recognised the Archbyshop of Yorke, whiche extended ouer all that country.

Now if the Scottes will take exception to the homage of their Princes as made in warre, and by force whiche is not true: what will they say: or can they for shame alledge agaynst their owne Parliament, not of some but of all confirmed, and testified by theyr writings & seales: whereunto nothing enforced them but righte and reason, beyng passed in peace & quiet without armour or compulsion. If they say they did it not, they speake lyke themselues: if they say they did it, then do they now lyke themselfe, to withdrawe their duetie, not so much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appeareth unto you the beginnyng of the right of superiority, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermission within memory, certayne omissions and forbearyngs upō the grounds and occasions before specified we denie not; whereby they haue many tymes sought and taken their opportunities, to withdrawe the doing of their duety in knowledge of our superiority ouer them, whiche to auoyde, they haue not cared what they sayde or alledged, though it were neuer so untrue, lying alwayes in a wayte when they might annoy this realme, not without theyr owne greate daunger and perill, & also extreeme detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their duety, so God graunted unto this realme force to compell them thereunto within memory, and notwithstandyng any their interruption by resistaunce, whiche unto the tyme of our progenitour Henry the fifte, neuer endured so long as it made intermission within tyme of minde, whereby the possession might seeme to be empayred: from the time of Henry the fifte unto the seuenth yeare of our raygne, our realme hath beene for a season lacerate; and torne by diuersitie of Titles, till our tyme, and sithence by warre outwardly vexed and troubled, the story is so lamentable for some part thereof, as were too tedious to rehearse.

Sithence the death of our progenitour Henry the fifte, our Grandfather Edwarde the fourth raygned, who after greate trauayles to attayne quietnesse in his realme, finally in the tyme of preparation of warre agaynst Scotland died.

Richarde the thirde, then usurped for a small tyme in yeares, whom the King our father by ỹ strength of Gods hande ouerthrew in battayle, and moste iustly attayned the possession of this realme; who neuertheless after the great tempestuous stormes, findyng all matters not yet brought to perfect quiet and reste, ceassed and forbare to requyre of the Scottes to do their duety, thinkyng it policy rather for that time to assay to tame their nature by the pleasant coniunction and conuersation of affinity, than to charge them with their faulte, and requyre duety of them, when opportunity serued not by force and feare to constraine and compell them.

And thus passed ouer the raygne of our Father without demaunde of this homage. And beyng our raygne nowe. xxviij. yeares, wee were. xxj. yeares letted by our Nephew his minoritie, beyng then more carefull how to bring him out of daunger, to the place of a kyng, than to receyue of him homage, when hee had full possession of the same. Wherefore beyng nowe passed, sithence the laste homage made by the King of Scottes, to our progenitour Henry the fifte 122. yeares, at whiche tyme the homage was done at Windsore by James Steward, then King of Scots, as afore. fiftie fiue of these yeares the Crowne of this realme was in contention, the trouble whereof engendred also some businesse in the tyme of the King our Father, whiche was. xxviij. yeare: and in our tyme, xxj. yeares hath passed in the minority of our Nephew. So as finally, the Scottes resorting to their onely defence of discontinuance of possession, can onely alledge iustly but. xiij. yeare of silence in the tyme of our raygne beyng all the other times sithence the homage done by James Stewarde, such, as the silence in them (had they beene neuer so long) could not haue engendred preiudice to the losse of any right that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to King Edwarde for not demaundyng homage beyng in stryfe for that estate, whereunto the homage was due? What shoulde Richarde the thirde searche for homage in Scotlande, that had neyther right ne leysure to haue homage done unto him in Englande? who can blame our father, knowing the Scots nature neuer to do their dutie but for feare, if he demaunded not that of them, which they would eschew if they might, beyng his realme not clearly then purged from all seede of sedition, sparkled and scattered in the cruell ciuile warres before?

Lawe and reason serueth, that the passing ouer of tyme not commodious, that the purpose is not alledgeable in prescription for the losse of any right. And the minority of the King of Scots hath endured. xxj. yeares of our raigne, whiche beyng an impediment on theyr parte, the whole prescription of the Scots, if the matter were prescriptible, is thus deduced euidently to. xiij. yeare, whiche. xiij. yeare without excuse

we haue ceassed and forborne to demaunde our dutie, lyke as the Scottes haue lykewise ceassed to offer and tender the same, for which cause neuerthele we do not enter this warre ne minded to demaunde any suche matter now being, rather desirous to reioyce and take comforte in the frendship of our Nephew as our neighbour, than to moue matter vnto him of displeasure, whereby to alienate suche naturall inclination of loue as he shoulde haue towarde vs: but suche be the workes of God superiour ouer all, to sucker occasions to be ministred, whereby due superiority may be knowne, demaũded & required, to ỹ intent ỹ according thereunto al things gouerned in due order here, we may to his pleasure passe ouer this life to his honour and glory whiche he graunt vs to do, in suche reste, peace, & tranquillity, as shall be meete and conuenient for vs.

When therefore the kyng of England had set forth this declaration of the causes that moued him to make warre agaynst Scotlande, he prepared to prosecute the same bothe by sea and lande, and hauing rigged and furnished diuers ships of warre, he sent the same forth to the sea that they might take such Scottishe shippes as were to returne from their voyages made into Fraunce, Flaunders, Denmarke, and other countreys, whether they were gone for trade of Marchandize, with whiche the Englishe shippes encountred, to ke. xxviij. of the principal shippes of all Scotland fraught with all kinde of Merchãdize & riche wares, which they brought with them into the Englishe portes.

The king of Scotland aduertised therof, sent with all speede an Herrault, desiring restitution of his shippes as he thought stode with reason, seing no warre was proclaymed, but the King of England thought it no reason to departe with them so soone, till a perfect agreemẽt might be had, and sir Robert Bowes deliuered: who (as ye haue heard before in the premitted declaration set forth by the King of England) to reuenge the inuasiõs by the Scots violently made into ỹ English borders, with. iij. M. mẽ roaded into Scotland, & began to burne and to spoyle certayne small townes, whereupon the fray being reysed in the countrey, the Erle of Huntley who was appointed to remaine as Lieutenant vpon the borders, for doubt of such sodden inuasiõs; immediately gathered a number of borderers, and set vpon the Englishe men, and put thẽ al to flight, Sir Robert Bowes and his brother Richard Bowes with diuers other to the number of vj. hundred were taken prisoners, and the said sir Robert Bowes & other ỹ principal lãded men were kepte still in Scotlande till after the kings death. This victory chanced to the Scots at a place called Halden Rigge in the Mers, vpõ S. Bartholomewes day. Whiche is the. xxiiij. of August. After this the king of England sent the Duke of Norffolke with the Erles of Shrewsbury, Derby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertforde, Angus, Rutland, & the Lords of ỹ North parts of England, with an army of. xl. thousand men as the Scots esteemed them, though they were not many aboue. xx. thousand, who entred into Scotland the. xxj. of Octobre, & brent certayne townes vpon the side of the water of Tweede, but the Erle of Huntley hauing with him a ten thousand of the borderers and other, so wayted vpon them, giuing them now & then skirmishes and allarms, that they came not past two miles from the water of Tweede within the Scottish bounds at that season. In the meane time the king of Scotlande beyng aduertised hereof, gathered a greate army throughe all the partes of his realme, and came to Sowtray hedge, where they mustered, & were numbred to be a. xxxvj. thousand men, with the which he came to Falla Hure, & there encãped, determining to giue battel to the Englishmen, as he pretended: howbeit if ỹ Duke had taried longer, as it was thought he would haue done, if the time of ỹ yeere & prouision of vitailes had serued, the Scots would yet haue bene better aduised before they had ioyned wt him in a pight field: but true it is that after ỹ Duke had remayned there so long as vitayles might be had & recouered frõ any part, he retyred with his army backe into Englãd, not without some losse of mẽ, horse, & spoiles, which ỹ Scots vnder the Erle of Huntley & others toke fro the Englishmẽ in that their retire, specially as they passed ouer the riuer of Tweede. After the Englishmẽ were thus departed & withdrawẽ home forth of Scotlãd, king James being of an high & manly courage, in reuenge of the harmes done by the Englishmẽ within his countrey, thought good ỹ his whole army should passe forwarde & inuade England, himself to go therwith in proper person. And herein he requested the cõsent of his nobilitie, who after long reasoning & good aduisement take in the mater, gaue answere to the king in this sort, ỹ they could not thinke it good that they should passe within Englãd, & to seeke battayle, ỹ king himself being with thẽ, considering ỹ his. ij. sonnes were lately deceased, so ỹ he had no successiõ of his body: for in case that they lost the field, as the chaũce of battell is most vncertaine, then the king of England hauing great substance, might therewith folow the victory & put the realme of Scotlande in greate hazarde. Therefore they thought it sufficiently to defend their owne boundes, & to constrayne the enimie for feare to leaue the inuasion therof, as presently they had done and declared that they were determined to haue giuen battayle to theyr enimies if they had cõtinued within the realme, and doubted not by the helpe of God, they hauing so iust a cause, and being inuaded in theyr countrey, but that they shoulde haue obteyned the victory. The King hearyng theyr determination, albeit his high courage pressed him to inuade, yet the approued witte of his nobles and Coũsellours caused him to follow their aduise, and so returned with his army backe againe the first of Nouember, the army of England being first discharged, and the Duke of Norffolke in his returne towardes London.

The king breaketh vp his army.

Shortly after, the kyng of Scotlande went himself in person vnto the West marches of his realme, where the Lord Maxwell was Warden, whom togither with the Erles of Cassels, and Glencarne, and certaine other Lordes there with him, the king appointed to inuade the English marches on that side, taking with them the power of the borderers, and sente also with them Oliuer Sincler, & the residue of the Gentlemen of his household. These Erles & Lordes entring into Englande on S. Katherines euen beyng the .xxiiij. of Nouember, began to burne certayne townes vpõ the water of Eske: but as soone as the scrye was raysed in the countrey, the Lord Muharton Warden of the west marches of Englande, sodenly raysed the power of the countrey, and came to a little hill, where they shewed themselues in sight vnto the Scottishe army. The Scottishe Lordes perceyuyng the Englishmen gathered, assembled theselues togither, and enquired who was Lieutenaunt generall there by the Kings appointmẽt, and incontinently Oliuer Sincler was holden vp on twoo mennes shoulders, where he sheweth forth the Kings commission, instituting him Liuetenant to the kyng of that armie: but how soeuer that was redde, the Erles and Lordes there present, thought themselues embased too much to haue suche a meane Gentleman aduaũced in authoritie aboue them all, and therefore determined not to fight vnder suche a Captayne, but willyngly suffred themselues to be ouercome, and so were taken by the English men, not shewyng any countenaunce of defence to the contrary, and without slaughter of any one person on eyther side.

The Scottes discomfited by the Englishmen.

This rode was called Soloway Mosse, at the whiche were taken prysoners men of name, these persons followyng: The Erles of Cassels and Glencarne, the Lorde Maxwell, the Lord Flemyng, the Lord Somerwel, the Lord Oliphãt, Oliuer Sinclare, the Lord of Cragy, and sundry other Gentlemen, the whiche were ledde prysoners to London, where they remayned till after the King was dead.

The kyng being in Carlauerocke vpon the borders not farre from Soloway Mosse, when this misfortune fell vpon his men, after he heard thereof he was maruellously amased, the more in calling to remembrance the refusall made by his Nobles, assembled with him in campe at Fala vpon his request to inuade Englande. Herewith such an impression entered his minde, that he thought with himself that all his whole nobilitie had conspyred agaynst him, and therevpon toke such a behement and high displeasure increased with a melancolious thought, that he departed sodenly from thence to Edenburgh, and after remoued to Faulkeland, where he remayned as a man desolate of comforte, beyng sore vexed in spirite and bodie, and would not permitte any maner of person to haue accesse vnto him, his secrete and familiar seruants only excepted. And as he was thus vnquieted, newes was brought him that the Queene his wyfe was brought to bedde of a fayre yõg Princesse the .viij. day of December, the whiche newes he lyked very euill, and added the griefe thereof to his former displeasantnesse, in so muche that he perceyued the ende of his lyfe to approche, and withall sayde, that hee sorsawe great trouble to come vpon the realme of Scotlande, for the pursuit whiche the King of England was like to make therevpon agaynst the same, to the ende hee might bryng it vnder his subiection eyther by mariage or by some other meane. It was reported that he was disquieted with some vnkindly medicine: but how soeuer the matter was, he yeelded vp his spirite to almighty God, & departed this worlde the .xiiij. of December, in the yeare of oure redemption .1542. the .xxxiij. yeare yeare of his age, and .xxxij. of his raigne.

Shortly after hys departure, hys body was conueyed from Falkeland vnto Edenburgh in moſt honorable wiſe, the Cardinall, the Erles of Arrane, Arguile, Rothes, Marſhall, and dyuers other noble men being preſent, and with all funerall pomp as was requiſite, it was buried in the Abbey Church of Holy Rode houſe, beſide the body of Queene Magdalene, daughter to the King of Fraunce, his firſt wife. There was greate lamentation and mone made for his death throughout all parts of his Realme, for hee was very well beloued among hys ſubiectes.

THe Eternall God calling to his mercy Iames King of Scotland, the fifth of that name, Mary his only daughter and heire began hir raigne ouer the Realme of Scotland the eyghteenth day of December, in the yere of our Lord. 1542. Frauncis the firſte of that name then raigning in Fraunce, and Henry the eyght ouer the Engliſhmen.

She was not paſt ſeuen dayes olde when hir father departing this life, left vnto hir his kingdome, hir mother lying in childbed in the Caſtel of Lithquo, of which place, ẏ Lord Leuingſton being Captayne, had the charge committed to him, both of the daughter and mother, with the mothers good agreement and free conſent.

Moreouer, immediately after the Kynges death (bycauſe he deceaſſed without making any will, or taking any direction for the gouernemente eyther of the Realme, or cuſtody of the yong Queene hys daughter) Dauid Beaton, Cardinall and Archbyſhop of S. Androwes, the ſpeciall miniſter and factor of the Frenche cauſes, to the aduancement and continuaunce thereof, inuented and forged a will and Teſtament of the late King now departed, in whiche among other things, hee eſtabliſhed hymſelfe chiefe regent, adioyning with him the Earles of Murrey, baſe brother to the Kyng deceaſſed, Huntley and Argile, not once mentioning the Earle of Lennor, then abſent in Fraunce, nor yet Iames Earle of Arraine his Couſin, beeing there preſent in Scotland. Thoſe that profeſſed the reformed Religion, being then called Proteſtantes, to whome the ſayde Cardinall was euer a cruell enimie and ſherp ſcourge, eſpyed forth his vniuſt dealing in this behalfe, and truſting by the gentle nature and good inclination of the ſayd Earle of Arraine, to haue ſome libertie to imbrace the Goſpell, ſet him againſte the Cardinall, ſo that by the helpe of his owne and their friendes, he remoued the Cardinal and his adherents from the vſurped rowmth and authoritie, and therewith was the ſayde Earle of Arraine proclaymed gouernour and protector of the Realme.

The Proteſtants eſpyed the Cardinals craftie iugling.

This Earle of Arrane made a title to haue and enioy that office and rowmth, as nexte in bloud to the yong Queene, as diſcended from a ſiſter of King Iames the third, married to his Grandfather Lord Hamilton in the yere. 1475. by reaſon of whiche marriage, hee was created Earle of Arrane, as by acte of Parliament holden the ſame yeare at Edeburgh, it was agreed and ordeyned.

The King of Englande that noble Prince Henrye the eyght, aduertiſed of the death of the King of Scottes, conſidered with good aduiſe, that now there was offered a moſt ready meane and iuſt occaſion, whereby the two Realmes of Englande and Scotland might be brought into one entier Monarchie, without warre or bloudſhed, by the marriage of his ſonne Prince Edwarde, beeyng then little paſt fiue yeares of age, with the yong Queene of Scotlande. Hee therefore being reſolued fully to bring the ſame to paſſe eyther by quiet meanes or by force, and ſending for the Erles of Caſſill and Glencarne, the Lordes Maxwell, and Fleming, and other Priſoners ẏ had bin taken at Solowaye Moſſe, cauſed them to bee conueyd vnto Hampton Court, where the ſeauen and twentith of December they being right curteouſly enterteined, hee made vnto them an ouerture of his purpoſe and whole intent, propouning the whole matter vnto them, requeſting them for their partes to help with their conſents, that a contract of marriage might bee made betweene his ſonne the Prince, and their yong Queene, promiſing to them libertie without raunſome, beſydes other pleaſures and benefytes, if they would doe their indeuour to perſwade the Gouernoure, and other of the nobilitie of Scotland to be agreeable hereunto.

The King of England talketh with the Lords of Scotland priſoners, for a marriage betwixt his ſonne, and their Queene.

The Scottishe Earles and Lords accepted the Kings offer, and withall promised to doe their diligence to perswade the rest of the nobilitie in Scotland at their coming home: whereupon they were licenced to depart, and so comming to Newcastell, remayned there with the Duke of Suffolke, then the Kings Lieutenant of the North partes, till he had receyued for the of Scotlande certayne pledges of the chiefest of these Lordes, for performance of their promises.

The Earle of Angus sente home into Scotlande.

Likewise the King of England sent wyth them the Earle of Angus, and his brother Sir George Dowglas with his letters to the Gouernoure, requesting effectuously, ẏ they might be restored to their rowmthes, lands, and possessions in that Realme. These Lords arriuing at Edenburgh aboute the middes of January, declared to the Gouernoure their message and proposition made by the King of Englande, with such efficacie, that the Gouernour beeyng perswaded thereto by their wordes, sente for the Lords and nobilitie of the Realme to come vnto Edenburgh to a conuention, there to be holden the seauen and twentith of that present moneth, where they concluded that a Parliamente shoulde bee kepte in Marche next ensuing, and doubting least the Cardinall (beeing there present) should goe about to perswade the nobilitie not to consent to their desires, they caused hym to be put in warde within the Castell of Dalketh, the Lord Seton being appoynted to haue the custody of him.

Aboute the same time, Sir Robert Bowes, and all other the Englishmen that were prisoners, and had bin taken at Halden rigge on S. Bartholmewes day (as before ye haue heard) were sente home by the Gouernoure into Englande, and Sir Raufe Sadler was sente Imbassadour from King Henry, vnto the saide Gouernoure, and other the Lords of Scotland, and came thither before the Parliamente, to perswade the Lordes to agree vnto the Kyng hys maisters motions, trauelling so diligently in the matters whereabout he was thus sent, that it was concluded by acte of Parliament to send Imbassadours into Englande, for the better satisfaction of King Henries desires, and so the Earle of Glencarne, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, Sir James Leyzmouth, and the Secretary being named and appoynted thereto, departed in the moneth of March, and comming into England vnto the King, remayned there till the latter end of July, in which meane time, suche couenants, contracts, and promises were had and concluded, passed and sealed interchangeably, as stood with the pleasure and good liking of King Henry, so as the marriage was fully contracted, and a peace concluded for tenne yeares, by authoritie of the afore sayd Parliament. Herewith also the Lorde Gouernour shewed himselfe to embrace the reformed Religio, causing one Frier Guilham to Preache agaynst Images, and frute-lesse ceremonies, and gaue libertie that ẏ Bible, called the new and old Testamẽt, should be had in Englishe, and vniuersally published through the Realme of Scotlande.

Also hee commaunded not onely the Cardinall (as before ye haue heard) but also ordeyned that the Queene mother should remayne in Lithgow with the yong Queene hir daughter, vnder some manner of safe custody, and the Cardinall to be remoued vnto his owne Castell of Saint Androwes, with warders about hym to see him safely kept.

The Realme beeing thus brought in quiet, and vnder good gouernement, the French King fore misliking this new coniunction of ẏ Scots with England, and doubting least the olde former bond of aliance betwixt France and Scotland might therby be vtterly dissolued and shaken off, he sent for Mathew Earle of Leuenor, then abrode in his seruice in the warres of Italy, and vppon his comming backe from thence to the Court, hee declared to him the decease of the late King of Scottes, the intrusion of Arrane, and the attemptes in that Realme begun, with all the circumstances from poynt to point as he knewe, and further discoursed with hym what wrong hee had to be sette aside, and displaced from hys ryghte of gouernemente, and therefore exhorted hym to repayre home to recouer the same, offering not only to assist him with men, money, and munition, but also to ioyne hys friendes in Scotlande with hym in ayde to attayne the place of regimente, and to remoue Arrane and others from it. Mathew E. of Leuenor

Earle

Earle of Leuenor hereupon with commission and instructions deliuered to him by the French King, had also letters from him directed to the Lordes that were of the French faction, wherein the sayde Kyng requested them to remaine and continue in their former good meanings towards him, and to assist the Erle of Leuenor in all things, as should be thought expedient.

The Earle therefore fully instructed by the Frenche Kyng, howe to deale and proceede, tooke his leaue, and with all speede taking the Sea, directed hys course into Scotlande, where after his arriual, he came to Edenburgh, in which towne all the Lords being assembled togither with the Gouernoure, hee declared to them the effect of hys commission from the French Kyng, his request to them, and good affection to mayntayne them against England, if in case they would continue the olde league with him, and not seeke to make any new alliance with the King of Englande: but perceyuing that the Gouernour and his friends were minded to satisfie the Kyng of Englandes desires, he would not tarrie for a resolute answer, but by the counsell of the Earle of Argile, William Earle of Glencarne, and others of the French faction, he suddaynely departed forth of Edenburgh towarde the West Countrey, highly displeased as should seeme with the Gouernoure, and taking Lithgow in his way, hee conferred with the Queene Dowager (as they termed hir) deuising how to assemble the noble men of the Frenche side, to bring hir and hyr daughter to libertie, out of the daunger of the Lorde Gouernoure, bycause it was supposed that hee meante to conuey hyr into Englande.

About the same time, through practise of the Abbot of Paisley, brother to the Gouernour, and others, the Castell of Edenburgh was gote out of the hands of Sir Peter Chreichton, and the keeping thereof committed by the Gouernours appoyntment, vnto James Hamilton, Lard of Stanehouse: but the Earle of Lennox, with the assistance of the Earles of Huntley, Argile, and others of the Frenche faction in August following, conueyed the yong Queene with hir mother from Lithgew vnto Sterling. The Cardinall also was there with them lately before, hauing corrupted his keepers, & gotten abroade at libertie. Herewith was a day appoynted and proclaymed for the Coronation of the yong Queene. The Earle of Arrane then gouernour, with the Erles of Angus, Cassils, the Lordes Marwell, Somerule, and diuers others, called the English Lords, remayning stil at Edenburgh, aduertised the King of Englād of all the drifte of Leuenor, and other of that faction, requiring his aduice and counsell howe to deale for the disappoynting of their purposes, that sought to continue the amitie still wyth Fraunce, to the preiudice of peace with England.

The King of England aduertised hereof, as wel thus from the Gouernour, and other the Scottish Lords, as also from Sir Raufe Sadler, his Maiesties Ambassadoure there, doubted greatly least these Lordes, in whose handes the Queene then was, in respect of the fauour whiche they bare to the Frenche King, should conuey hir ouer into Fraunce, whereupon, he requested the Gouernour, and the other Lordes that fauoured his side, so to deale, that she might bee sente into Englande, there to remayne, till the marriage mighte bee consummate betwirt hir, and his sonne Prince Edwarde: hauing in the meane time such Lordes of hir Countrey about hir to attende vppon hir, and to see to hir brynging vp, as should be thought expedient. To conclude, his Maiestie not only sent his princely comfort by way of counsell and good aduice, but also accordyng to their desire (and as by the Duke of Suffolke his highnesse Lieutenaunte then in the North it was thought expedient.) Thomas Lorde Wharton with two thousande menne from the West marches, and the Lord Ebers with other two thousand from the East bordures, were appoynted to enter Scotland, and to ioyne themselues with the Gouernour and hys friendes, to assist them againste their aduersaries, but as they were in a readinesse to marche, through the secret labour of the Cardinall, wishing the aduaunceme̅te of the Erle of Arrane his kinsman (whom he thought hee shoulde well ynough frame to be at his appoyntmente) rather than Leuenor that was knowen to be of a greater stomacke, the matter was so handled, what by the Cardinall and the Erle of Huntley of the one part, and ỹ Queene Dowager on the other, that the Earle of Arrane reuolting from the Kyng of Englande, came in to the Dowager, and ioyned himselfe with the Cardinall, and other the Lords of the Frenche faction, by reason whereof, they all concluded to mayntayne him in the estate of Lorde Gouernour, and not to place Leuenor as their purpose was to haue done, if Arrane hadde continued faythfull to the King of Englande.

Shortlye after, the yong Queene was Crowned at Striueling, the Cardinall taking vpon him to order things as hee thought good, appoynting the Gouernour to beare ỹ Crowne as chiefe person, & next in blond to the Queene, and the Erle of Lennox to beare the scepter. holden at Edenburgh, at the whiche in presence of the Patriarche of Apulia the Popes Agent, and of the Frech Kings Imbassadours, Monsieur la Brosse, and Monsieur Menage lately before come into the realme, the Erle of Arrane was newly confirmed gouernour: and for the sure preseruation (as they pretended) of the yong Queene, it was agreed by the gouernour and the estates, that she shoulde remaine with the olde Queene hir mother in Sterlyng Castell, during her mynoritie, and certayne rentes of that Seigniory was assigned for the mayntenaunce of suche trayne as was thought expedient to bee attendant aboute hyr: and further the Lordes Lennigston, Erskin, and Fleming, were apoynted to abide continually with hyr, for the better saueguarde of hyr person. Thus was euery thing ordered as seemed to stand with the pleasure of the Cardinall: wherupon the Erle of Lennox perceyuyng how vncurteously he was vsed, to haue his aduersary thus confirmed in authoritie by the Frenchside, and himselfe reiected, he first sente to the Frenche King, informyng him throughly of the iniuries to him done, putting him in remembrance of the promises made to him when hee departed from him: also the constantnesse of his seruice, the hasarde he had put himselfe in for his sake, and notwithstandyng howe hee was yet vnkindely dealte with, that through truste of his promised ayde and assistaunce, he was brought out of credite in his countrey, and subiected vnder the commaundement and authoritie of his enimie, and wrongfully disappoynted of his right, whiche he loked to haue recouered, and to haue bene mainteyned therein, by his suppoyte.

In consideration whereof, he renounced his seruice, willing him from thencefoorth not to loke for the same any more at his handes. Herewith Leuenar ioynyng himselfe with the Erles of Angus, Cassilles, and Glencarne, the Lordes Maxwell, and Somerville, the Sheriffe of Ayre, the Larde of Drumlanrig and other of that side, called the English Lordes, set himselfe agaynst the Gouernour, the Cardinall and others of that faction, so that the residue of this yeare was spente in ciuill dissention betweene them.

Ciuill dissentiō in Scotlād.

And here is to bee noted that a little before that the Erle of Arrane reuolted to the French parte, there were arryued in the mouth of the riuer of Cloyde on the west coaste fiue shippes which the Frenche King had sent to the ayde of his frendes in Scotland, vnder the conduction of Iames Stewarde of Cardonold, and of the forenamed Monsieur de la Brosse, and Monsieur Menage, the French kings Imbassadors.

There came with them also the Patriarke of Apulia, of whome ye haue lykewise hearde before, they had brought aboorde in these shippes fifty thousande Crownes, and munition to the value of twne thousand Crownes. The Erle of Lennox therefore when he first resolued to turne to the Englishe parte, with the aduise of his confederates, seysed vpon those shippes, got the fiftie thousand Crownes, and the most parte of the munition into his handes: and brought it to the Castell of Dunbertayne, reteyning it to his owne vse, where it was sente to haue bene employed to the maintenaunce of the Frenche faction, agaynst the King of England and the Lordes that leaned to his side.

The Erle of Lennox therefore, raysing a power of menne of warre with the assistaunce of the Lordes of his faction, came with them vnto Leith agaynst the Gouernour, that was then in Edenburgh: but through the diligent trauayle of the Cardinall, the Erles of Huntley, Murrey, and Argyle, the matter was taken vp and an appoyntment accorded: so that sir George Dowglas was deliuered as a pledge for his brother the Erle of Angus, the Master of Glencarne, for his father the Erle of Glencarne, the Abbot Cassaghole, for his brother the Erle of Cassilles, to remayne in safe keepyng where it pleased the Gouernour to appoynt.

The Erle of Lennox came vnto Edenburgh to ỹ Gouernor, but within fiue dayes after they went bothe to Lithquo, from whence the Erle of Lennox secretely departed from the Gouernour without biddyng him farewell, and comming to Glasquo, fortified both the Castell and Steeple there with menne and munition. The Gouernour aduertised thereof, passed thither with the power of the whole realme, entred the towne, assieged the Castell and steeple whiche he wanne, hanged certen Gentlemen whiche he toke there to the number of sixtene, and pardoned the other inferiour Souldiours. The Erle of Angus, and the Lorde Maxwell hearyng of thys sturre, came vnto the Gouernour vnto Glasquo before the siege was layde, to intreate of some accorde betwirte him and the Erle of Lennox. But the Gouernour caused them both to be secretly conueyed frō the counsell by the backside of the blacke Fryers of Glasquo, vnto the Castell of Hamilton, and from thence the Erle was sente to Blacknesse. The Lorde Maxwell was kepte still in holde at Hamilton, and George Dowglas, and the Master of Glencarne in Edenburgh Castell: these persons thus imprysoned stoode in greate doubte of theyr lyues as some supposed, but as diuers other did suspect, they were rather committed

How soeuer it was with them, the Erle of Lennox by the aduise of his friendes, sent the Erle of Glencarne, & a Gentleman called Thomas Bishop, vnto the king of Englande with offer of his seruice, and request to haue in mariage the Lady Margarete Dowglas daughter to the Erle of Angus, and neece to the sayde Kyng. They that were sente so solicited the Erles cause, that in the ende the King beyng perswaded that Leuenor ought of right to haue the gouernement of the realme of Scotlande, and to be seconde person in the same, and herewith in consideration how vniustly not onely his Maiestie had bene dealt with, but also how vnthankefully and discourteously Lennor had bene vsed both at the handes of the Frenche king and also of his adherentes in Scotland, by the Cardinall and others, he bothe thankefully receyued his gentle offer of seruice, and also promised to ayde him in his Title and all other lawfull causes: and herewith prepared an army to passe into Scotlande by sea, appoynting the Erle of Hertforde, and the Lorde Lisle to haue the conduction of the same, who shippyng at Tynmouth with theyr people, arriued in the Forth vnder Wardis Castell, a myle and a halfe aboue Leith the thirde of May, the whole naule conteyning aboue the number of two hundred shippes. Here at Newhauen a quarter of a myle from the sayde Castell they landed theyr armie of twelue thousande men of warre, with great artillery and all kinde of munition.

The Lorde Gouernour beyng at that present within the towne of Edenburgh, hearyng of their arriuall wente forth of the towne accompanied with the Cardinall, the Erles of Huntley, Argyle, Bothwell and others, purposing to stoppe theyr landing, but perceyuing the puysaunce of the aduersaries to be suche, as they coulde not resist the same, they returned to Edenburgh agayne, and sente Maister Adam Otterburn prouost of Edenburgh, and two of the Baylifes to the Erle of Hertforde, to vnderstande the cause of his comming, and withall offered, that if there were any iniuries or wrõgs done by any of the Scottes nation, hee woulde appoynt Commissioners to talke with suche as by him shoulde be authorized thereto, for the full answearing thereof, and to that effect he woulde gladly receyue them into the towne of Edenburgh. The Erle of Hertford answeared that he had no commission to talke of any suche mater, but rather to take reuenge of the vniust dealing and breache of promise on those that had falsified their fayth. And therfore minding to burne the towne of Edenburgh as wel as other within that realme, hee willed the inhabitantes and all those that were within the same to come forth, and submitte themselues before him the kings Lieutenant, to stand vnto the Kings will and pleasure, or els he would not fail to proceede in execution thereof. The Prouost answeared that he would rather abyde all extremities than to accomplishe his request and desire in that behalfe, and therevpon returned to the towne.

After the Gouernour had heard what answeare was made to the Prouost, he caused the Castell to be furnished with all things necessary for defence, and departed straight wayes to Striuelyng. The English army lodging that night in Leith, marched the nexte day towarde Edenburgh, passing vp the Cannogate streete to enter at the nether bowe, where they founde some resistaunce made by Scottes, so that diuers were slayne on bothe partes. Towardes night, the Englishmen after they had continued long in skirmishyng that day with the Scottishmen retyred to Leith. The nexte day the whole army with the great Artillery came forwarde towardes the towne, and breakyng open the Cannogate, they entred the towne by the same, bryngyng their ordinaunce within sight of the Castell, purposing to plante the same in battery agaynst it, but the Capitayne of the castell caused the Artillery within to shoote of at them in so great aboundance, and so good measure, that they slew diuers Englishmen and dismounted one of their peeces, so that in the ende they were constrayned to drawe backe their ordinaunce and retyred, but yet in the meane time they set fire on the towne, and brente the moste parte of all the houses in the same. They brent also the Cannogate streete, and the Abbey of holy rode house. The Gouernour at that present released out of prison the Erle of Angus, the Lorde Maxwell, the Master of Glencarne, sir George Dowglas and others.

In this meane time also there came from the Bordures by lande fower thousande of English horsemenne, vnder the conduction of the Lorde William Eures, & his sonne sir Rauf Eures, who ioyning with the army at Leith, skoured the countrey on euery side the towne of Edenburgh, finally after that the English army had layne in Leith a certayne space, they brent that towne also, and sent their shippes away fraught with pillage & spoyles (got aswell in that towne as in Edenburgh, and abrode in the countrey) backe towardes England. And therewith the Erle of Hertford, the Lord Admirall and others returned by land through the coũtry vnto Barwike, as in the Englishe historie more at large appeareth. of Lennox with an army of menne whiche he had rayled was ready to come on the backes of the Gouernour and his adherentes, if they had assembled their forces and come forewarde to haue gyuen the English men battayle. For all this season the ciuill contention still continewed, and sundry conflictes and skirmishes chaunced betwixt the parties.

The English army hauing brente Edenburgh and harried the countrey aboute, departed from Leith (whiche towne they also brent) and drew homewardes, brenning and spoyling sundry Castelles, Piles, Villages, & Townes in their way. Also where the Lorde Maxwell came in to the Erle of Hertforde, for his double dealyng hee was stayed and brought into Englande. Shortly after the returne of the English armie the Gouernour, and the Lord Boyd came with an army to besiege the Castell of Glasquo, which ỳ Erle of Lennox had lately againe recouered. The Erle of Glencarne, and other of the Erle of Lennox his friendes, being at that present within Glasquo, issued forth, & vpon Glasquo Howe gaue the Gouernour battayle, in the whiche the Larde of Campsketh mayster of the houshoIde to the Gouernour, and vij. score others, of the surname of the Hamiltõs losse their lyues, but the victory yet remayned vpõ the Gouernours side, Andrew Coningham sonne to the Erle of Glencarne, & James Coningham, with George Tullough Captaine of the Erle of Lennox his shotte, being slayne on that parte, besides others of the meaner sorte.

Shortely after this ouerthrow, the Erle of Lennox accompanied with Alexander the master of Glencarne, otherwise called Lord of Kilmawse, Walter Graham brother to the Erle of Montrose, sir John Boythwike knight, and sundry other Gentlemen toke the sea to passe into England, & arriued at Westchester aboute Midsomer: passing from thence to the Court, he was ioyfully receyued, and immediatly thereupon was the mariage celebrated betwixt him and the Lady Margaret Dowglas daughter & heyre to the Erle of Angus, & to Margaret his wife queene of Scottes, sister to king Henry the eight, at what time there was assured to him by way of inheritaunce, Landes to the valewe of xvij. hundreth markes of yearely rent of assise, in consideration of this mariage with the Kings neece, & in recompence of landes losse by him in Fraunce, to the whiche he was inheritour after the decease of Robert Steward Lorde Obenie, one of the foure Marshals of Fraunce.

Moreouer kyng Henry beyng now vpon his iourney towards Bullongne, aswell for the annoyance of his highnesse enimies in Scotland, as for recouerie of the sayde Erles right in that realme, appointed the sayd Erle to enter Scotland in the moneth of August, accõpanied with sir Rise Mauncfield, sir Peter Mewtas knights M. Thomas Audley, M. Thomas Brookes, old M. Winter cõptroller of the Kings shipps, & his sonne sir William Winter that now is, & sundry other Capitaynes, hauing vnder their charge two hundred hakebutters, two hundred Archers with long bowes, and two hũdred armed pikes, beside the Mariners belongyng to those shippes, that were appoynted to goe forth in this iourney, beyng in number aboute xij. or xiiij. sayle, belonging to Bristow, and other of the West partes.

The Erle of Lennox retyreth into Scotland.

Upon their arriual on the coast of Scotland they brent the Ile of Arrane, and rased the gouernours Castell there to the grounde. And afterwards arriuing at the Ile of Bute, they entred the same, and toke the Castell of Rosey standing therein, from whence the Stewardes kings of Scotland had theyr originall) the Capitaine they had away prisoner with them into England. Here also they toke twoo Frenche shippes laden with wines, and this done they entred the Firth of Clyde, thinking to find none but their frendes in the Castell of Dunbertane: but the truth is, that in this meane time the Erle of Glencarne with sundry gentlemen being left in that Castell, with the Capitayne thereof called Houlon, to keepe it in the name and to the behoufe of the Erle of Lennox, were in his absence perswaded through practise of the queene Dowager, not onely to renounce theyr promised faith to him, in defrauding him of that Castell, but also to entrappe and winde him within their daunger to take him prysoner.

The Ile of Bute taken.

For whiche purpose they so dissembled the matter, that they had gotte him a lande onely with three hundred menne, and so farre forth they were growen in talke, that the Erle of Lennox beyng entred into the Castell with a fewe other with him, the money was layde downe on the bowde, to be payde to the Capitayne for his satisfaction.

The Erle of Lennox in daunger to betrayed & taken.

But in the meane tyme the Erle of Lennox and suche as were with him, perceyuing some treasonable practise in hande, gotte forth of the house againe vnto theyr companie below, leauing the money behinde them, and after made shifte to gette to theyr shippes, and not before it was high time, for if they had stayed that night, they had bene entrapped by George Dowglas, who with foure thousande menne was secretely drawen thitherwardes and entred the towne of Dunbertane, shortly after ỳ the Erle of Lennox was thus departed, and got to his shipps lying there at hande in the riuer of Clyde, downe the whiche he retyred to the sea, not without daunger to haue loſt the ſame ſhippes by reaſon of the narrowneſſe of the water: for the Erle of Argyle beyng gotten betwixte him and the ſea, with a great power of men: with Baners diſpleyd hailed the ſhippes with ſhotte of ordinãce from the caſtel of Dynnune, annoying the Erle of Lennox his paſſage as much as he coulde. But he eſcaping with the Engliſh gentlemen, and the ſhippes out of daunger, toke aduiſe togither at the Ile of Bute what they had to do. The Erle ſore moued to haue bene thus repulſed frõ Dunbretayn, & ſtomaking the matter ſore, to be ſo contenanced by his enimy the Erle of Argyle, with the aduiſe of the Engliſh Gentlemen, he returned with them, and with great ſhew of manhood taking lande beſide the Caſtel and towne of Dynnune, where the Erle of Argyle with ſeuen hundred men was ready to encounter him, and to keepe him of from landyng, but by the helpe of the ſhotte out of the ſhippes, and great ſtore of boates, the Engliſhmen landed, ſlew lxxx. of the enimies moſt part Gentlemen, & put the reſidue to flight, with the loſſe of three men onely on the Engliſh ſide. This done the towne of Dinnune was brente and the Churche ſpoyled, that was full of goods and ornamentes. When the night approched, by reaſon the Engliſhmenne had no pouder nor other prouiſion a lande, the Erle with his people returned to ſhippebord in ſafetie, though not without offer of ſkirmiſhe made by the enimies though to their loſſe, namely of thoſe that aduaunced themſelues moſte forwarde. Abonte foure or fiue dayes after the Erle of Lennox with fiue hundreth menne landed in an other parte of Argyle, and remaynyng on lande a whole day togither, brent, ſpoyled, and waſted the countrey: the Erle of Argyle with two thouſande men giuing the loking on and not ones offering the ſkirmiſhe, ſo that the Erle of Lennox with his Souldiers retyred to his ſhippes without encounter.

After this they inuaded the Ile of Kinter where James Macconell dwelled, brent many places in that countrey, toke and caried away great bootes of cattayle and other goodes. All the coaſtes of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, and likewiſe of Galloway remayned in continuall feare; ſo that oftentimes their beakons were fyred, and many of the Noble menne conſtrayned to come to the Erle of Lennox, ſeeking to him for aſſurance.

In theſe exployctes the Erle had with him Walter Macfarlane of Tirbatt, and ſeuen ſcore men of the head of Lennox, that ſpake bothe Iriſhe and the Engliſh Scottiſh tongues, light footemen well armed in ſhirtes of maple, with bowes, and two handed ſwordes, and beyng ioyned with the Engliſh Archers and ſhotte, did muche anayleable ſeruice in the ſtreyghts, marriſhes, and mountayne countreys.

To conclude, after the Erle of Lennox and his company had atchieued theſe enterpriſes afore mencioned, he returned towards England, and ſente ſir Peter Mewtas knight, and Thomas Biſhoppe a Scottiſh gentleman, to aduertiſe the King of Englande of his proceedings, who found him at the ſiege of Bulloigne, where they declared to him the whole circumſtance of euery thing as the ſame had paſſed in the Erles iourney, which the king toke in very good part. And vpon his returne into England, after the cõqueſt of Bullongne, the Erle of Lennox was alſo called home to the Courte by letters to him directed, he beyng then at Bryſtow. Abont the middeſt of Februarie, Syr Rauf Eure commonly called Euers, Lorde warden of the Engliſhe middell Marches, entred Scotland with a power of foure thouſand Engliſhmen, Iriſhmen, and aſſured Scottes, and comming firſte vnto Jedworth, lodged there that night, and therewithall vnderſtanding that the gouernour and the Erle of Angus were at the Abbey of Melros, aboute an eight myles diſtaunt from thence, the nexte morneyng he was gotte forth ſo early, that he was almoſte vpon the enimies in ſuche wiſe on the ſudden, that they fledde out of their lodgings, and lefte their beddes and all their houſeholde furniture which they had there with them, not hauing time to conuey it away at their departure, their warning was ſo ſhort. Syr Rauf Eure at his comming thyther finding them fledde and gone, ſpoyled the towne and Abbey, vtterly defacing the Tumbes and Monumentes of the Erles of Dowglas, greatly to the diſpleaſure of the Erle of Angus, and thoſe of his linage.

The Gouernour and the ſayde Erle ſore agreeued to be thus foyled at the Engliſhmens handes, aſſembled togither all ſuche forces as they might recouer, ſo that they had quickly got vnto them aboue fiftene hundred menne, whereof eight hundreth at the leaſt were Gentlemen, and hearyng that the Engliſh men were retyring towardes Jedworth, they mette them at a place called Pannyer Hugh, where bothe the parties alighting on foote, ment to trie the quarell by playne force of hande; but as they were ready to ioyne, the aſſured Scots to the number of ſeuen or eight hundred reuolted vnto the parte of their countrey men, by reaſon whereof after a right ſharpe and fierce conflict the Engliſhe menne in the ende were conſtreyned to flee, whome the Scottes right egrely purſewed, ſlewe Sir Rauſe Eure, the Lorde Ogle, Sir Bryan Layton, and other Gentlemenne and Soul-

Souldiers to the number of eight hundreth, they toke also about a two thousand prisoners, with certayne pieces of Artillery and other munition. This victory fell to the Scottes the xvij. of February, the report whereof was right displeasant to the English nation, but specially the losse of that worthy Gentleman sir Rauf Eure, was greatly bemoned, and that euen of the King himselfe, for the noble prowes and great loyaltie whiche at all times had bene founde in him.

His seruice a-gaynst the Scottes.

His seruice had ben such in these warres against Scotland, that he had brought the more parte of all the Scottes within xx. miles space of the English borders, vnto the obeysance of the king of England, although at length they holpe to worke his confusion as before you haue heard: and here I haue thought good (although out of place) to say somewhat further in the dew commendation of this noble Gentleman.

His seruice in the rebellion tyme.

In time of the great rebellion in the North partes, whiche chaunced in the xxviij. yeere of King Henry the eight, when many other the Noblemen and Gentlemen of those parties had conspired togither with the commons by leuying warre to resist the Kings proceedings, this Sir Rauke Eure beyng then within Scarborough Castel, accõpanied onely with his friends, seruants and tenants, whiche of very good will were contented to serue vnder him, was besieged in the same Castell, and kept from all relefe & succours that might come or be brought vnto him from any parte, during the terme of fiue weekes or there about, so that for the space of xx. dayes after their prouision was spent, they liued onely with bread and water, hauing little or no other sustenance, whiche extremitie not withstanding, he kept the fortresse in safetie to the Kings vse vnto the ende of that dangerous rebellion, and then to his high prayse and commendation deliuered it like a faithful Gentlemã into the Kings hands. This I should haue set downe in place where mencion is made of that rebellion, but the note came not to my hand till that parte of the booke was paste the presse, and so rather here than not at all, I haue thought good to imparte it to the Reader. But now to returne to the purpose for the doings in Scotlande. About the same time that the victory before mencioned chanced to the Scottes, Robert Comerse bishop of Rosse departed this life, to whome succeeded Dauid Pantane, Secretary to the gouernour and Priour of S. Mary Ile.

He is besieged in Scarborough Castell.

Death of Byshops.

In April William Steward bishop of Aberden likewise deceased, and maister William Gordon Chãcellor of Murray, vncle to George Erle of Huntley, was by the Cardinals suyte promoted to that see, greatly to the displeasure of the Erle of Angus that laboured to haue preferred an other thereto. For this & other causes the Cardinal was greatly in hatred of ỹ Dowglasses. This yeere also Montgomery otherwise called Monsier de Lorges, knight of the order of S. Michael, was sent by the French king with iiij. thousand Frenchmen into Scotlande to assist the Scottes against England, he landed at Dunbertayne, and came in good order to Edenburgh the xiij. of May: he brought with him from the French king the order of S. Michaell, to inuest therewith the Lord gouernour, the Erles of Angus, Huntley, and Argile. Herwith also was an army of Scottes reysed, and ioyning with the Frenchmen, they approched ỹ boundures where they lay for a season, but the Erle of Hertford Lieutenant generall of the North partes comming downe, toke such direction for the safe keeping of the English boundures, that after the Scottes had layne there in campe a certayne space without atchieuing any great enterprice, though some notable exploit was looked for to haue bene attempted by them at that present, they brake vp their armie and returned home.

An army of Scots lieth the borders

The .xvj. of September about three or foure hundred Scottes and Frenchmen, attempted to enter into England on the east boundures, but the Englishmen perceyuing where they were aboute to passe by a certayne streyt, they set vpõ them with their Archers, discomfited them, sleying, and taking to the number of seuen score of them. Amongst other that were taken, one of the Sonnes to the Lord Hume, with a French capitayne, and George Elphinston Archer of the corps to the French king, were accompted chief. Also on the West boundures Robert Maxwell eldest sonne to the Lord Maxwell, was taken in a roade made by him & others into the English confines on that side, although at an other time certaine Englishmen making a roade into Scotlande were distressed, the more parte of them beyng taken or slayne. At a Parliamẽt holden at Linlithqhuo, begon there the. xxviij. of September, and continued til the first of October, Matthew Erle of Lennor, & Thomas bishop of Utheltree, were forfalted, & al their lãds and goodes giuen away and annexed to the Crowne. In this meane time the king of England desirous to haue the seruice of the Iles of Scotland for sundry great causes and respects, moued the Erle Lenor to deale with them to ỹ ende, whiche her did, and his trauell toke suche effect, that the Iland men were cõtented to rest at the king of Englande his deuotion, partely for that they were in a maner swoorne enimies to the Erle of Argyle and his family, and partly for that they doubted the king of Englands puyssance if he shoulde attempt to inuade those parties:

parties: and againe, bearing an olde speciall fauor to the Earle of Lennox and his house, hauing an auntient bonde of alliance and amitie with the same, they were the more ready to satisfie his motion. Herevpon, they elected amongst them a Lorde of the Iles, nexte of the bloud, a title long sithence right odious to the state of Scotland, and by the inducement of the Earle of Lennox, hee was contented as the Kyng of Englands pentioner, to receyue two thousand Crownes of him yeerely, with certayne riche apparel of cloth of golde and siluer from the said Earle.

The first proofe he attempted to shew of hys seruice in the King of Englands behalfe, was this, hauing instructions thereto from the Erle of Lennox, vnder colour of a conference, for matters touching the estate of the Countrey, he had suborned one of his aliance and seruantes, called ỳ Clane Reignald, to entrappe the Erles of Arguile and Huntley, and although they escaped very narrowly, the Lord Louet an auntient Baron, and greate friende to those two Earles, was slayne by the sayd Clane, togyther with seauen hundred of his kinsmen and frends, in so muche, that there remayned not but one yong boy of that lignage to succeede in that Lords lands.

After this, the L. of the Iles with fyue M. mẽ embarqued in certayne vessels, passed ouer into Carrike, harried and brent the lands of the Erle of Cassels, then a great enimie to the Kyng of England. In this voyage he got great spoiles, and slew many of the enimies: after which enterprise so atchieued, he came with his power by Sea, and landed in Irelande, where the Earles of Lennox and Ormonde were, with twelue hundred Irishmenne, appoynted to ioyne with him, that with their whole power they myghte inuade the Earle of Irguiles Countreys, and consequently the mayne lande of Scotlande at the brode syde. But before the preparation could be made ready for that iourney, the newe Lord of the Iles deceassed, whose buriall in Irelande to honor the Earle of Lennox, stode the Kyng of England in foure hundred pounds sterling. But now to returne vnto ỳ doings on the bordures betwixt England and Scotland in thys season. Ye shall vnderstand, that after the army of Scotland was broken vp, the Earle of Hertford by vertue of his cõmission reysed an army in the Countreys of the further side of Trente Northwardes, so that when the same was assembled togither with such straungers as were then in the Kynges wages, they were in all of horsemenne and footemen twelue thousande fighting men. With thys army garded with great store of artillerie, munition, and all manner of furniture necessary, the Earle of Hertford entred Scotlande, and marching to Coldingham, past vp by the water of Tweed, and brent a great part of the Mers and Tiuidale, the Abbeys of Kelsey, Melros, Dryborne, and Jedworth, with Townes and Villages, to the nũber of fiue score, but yet he entred not farre within the countrey beyond the said water, but kept alongst neere to the same, & returned back without any encounter: for after the Scottish armye was broken vp, it was not like they woulde assemble agayne, and so the Earle of Hertford taking the time that serued hys purpose, sore endomaged the Scottish bordures at that present. Many other final inuasions were made, as wel by the one parte as the other, and some skirmishes fell out betwixt them, sometime to the losse of the Scottishe, and sometime of the Englishe, according to the course of warre. In the Lent season the Cardinall of S. Andrewes caused al the Bishoppes and Prelates of the Realme to assemble at the towne of S. Andrewes, where a learned man, named M. George Wischart, that had bin in the Schooles of Germany, was accused of Heresie, which he had (as was alledged against him) publiquely preached and priuately taught in Dundee, Brechin, and dyuers other parts of Scotlãd, since hys returne home. This matter was so vrged against him, that he was conuict, and brente there in the Towne of Saint Andrewes during the time of that conuention and assembly.

The thirtith of May the Cardinall beeyng within his Castell of S. Andrewes, certaine of his owne friends as he toke them, to wit, Norman, Lord Leslie, William Kirkaudie, ỳ yong Lard of Grange, with sixteene chosen men, entred the Castell very secretely in the morning, toke the Porter, and all the Cardinals seruãts, thrusting them out of the place by a posterne gate, and that done, passing to hys Chamber where he lay in bedde, as hee gote vp, and was opening his Chamber doze, they slew him, and seised vpon the artillerie and munition, wherewith that foztresse was right plentifully furnished, and likewise with rich hangings, houshold stuffe of all soztes, apparell, copes, iewells, ozornaments of Churches, great stoze of golde and siluer plate, beside no small quantitie of treasure in ready coyne. Sir James Leiremonth Pzouost of Saint Andzewes, assembled all ỹ people of that Towne foz the rescue of the Cardinall, after he heard that the conspiratozs were entred the Castel, but they shewed the dead body of the Cardinall ouer the walles, as a spectacle to the people, and so they made no further atttempte, sith they sawe no meane how to remedie oz reuenge the matter at that present. The cause that moued the conspiratozs thus to kyll the Cardinall, was thought to be partly in reuenge of the bzenning of M. George Wilchart, fearing to be serued with the same sause, and in the ende to bee made to dzinke of the same cuppe. Partly also it was thoughte they attempted it through counsell of some greate menne of the Realme, that hadde conceyued some deadly hatred against him.

The same euening, the olde Lard of Grange, Maister Henry Balnauis, one of the Counsell of the Realme, and sundzye Gentlemen of the surname of the Mzluines, John Knockes and others, to the number of seuen scoze persons, entred the Castell to their suppozte, taking vppon them to keepe it against the gouernour and hys partakers.

The Gouernour hearing that his deere cousin the Cardinall was thus made away, assembled the greate Lozdes of the Realme, as the Earles of Angus, Huntley, Argyle, and others, by whose aduise hee called a Parliamente, and continued the space of thzee monethes, the Gouernour was glad to take an appoyntmẽt with them within, to the end he might get out of their handes his eldest sonne, who was remayning with the Cardinall at the time when hee was murthered, and so kepte by them that dyd the murther, tyll nowe they agreed to delyuer hym to his father, with condition that hee shoulde reyse his siege.

They deliuered also the dead bodye of the Cardinall, after it had layne buried in a dunghill within the Castell, euer sithence the daye in which they slew him.

Shoztly after, to witte, the last of Marche, Francis the Frenche King deceassed, and hys sonne Henry, the second of that name succeeded him, who at ỹ desire of the gouernour of Scotland, appoynted Leone Strozzi Pzioz of Capoa, a Knight of the ozder of Malta, with a nauie of sixteene Galleys fraughte with menne of warre, and munition, to passe into Scotlande, to help to winne the Castell of S. Andzewes.

The death the Frenche

The Gouernour in the meane time with an army past to the West bozdures to besiege the Castell of Langham, the whiche was kepte at that presente by Michaell Wharton, hauyng then with him but sixteene Englishmenne, who neuertheleste abid thzee oz foure dayes siege, and seauen Canon shottes, and so yeelded the house to the Gouernoure, and heereby was the peace bzoken, sirste by the Scottes, euen as the Englishmen could haue wished.

Mozeouer the same time, the Earle of Rothous was acquit by an assise as they call it of Earles & Lozds, of an accusation wherewith he was charged as confederate and partie with thẽ that had murthered the Cardinall.

Whilest the Gouernoure was thus passed with his armye to the West bozdures, hee was aduertised that the Pzioz of Capoa was arriued, and entred into the Towne of Sainte Andzewes, wherevppon the Gouernoure, with all the Nobilitie that were then about him, hasted thyther to assist the Pzioz, and so the siege was strongly layd aboute the Castell there.

The Castell of Saint Andrewes besieged by the Frenche

The Pzioz caused certaine peeces of artillerie to bee dzawen vppe, and mounted on the toppe of a Churche, whiche was higher than the Castell, so that those peeces shot plump into the Castell, that none durst shewe themselues on the walles, oz abzode in the yarde within the Castell.

Hee caused also certayne Canons to bee dzawen with ingins, neere to the verye walles of the Castell, whyche battered the same in suche sozte, as the ditches were neere hand filled with the rubbishe and stones of the walles that fell downe.

Mozeouer, the Galleys at an high water appzoched on the Riuer side so neere to the Castell, that with shot of Cannons and other artillerie, they sore annoyed them within, and slew diuers.

The defendants perceiuing themselues thus besieged on all sides, and not able long to holde out, put forth a token vpon a speares poynt, to signifie that they desired parlee, whiche was graunted, and certaine of them comming forth, were admitted to talke with the Gouernoure, the Queene, and the Prior of Capoa. They offered to render the Castell, so they might depart, and haue their liues saued with bagge and baggage, but this would not bee graunted, the Gouernour vtterly refusing it, at length he was contented to pardon the of their liues, if the french King should thinke it good, else to stande to hys pleasure. The spoyle of the Castell was giuen to the Frenchmen, who vpon the surrender entring the same, lefte nothing behinde them that might serue them to any vse in taking it away. All the principall men within it were led to the Galleys, and conueyd away into France prisoners at the Frenche kings discretion. Diuers of them were committed to sundry prisons on the coast of Britaine, and others were appoynted to rowe in ỹ Galleis till ỹ yeare. 1550. in which the prisoners were set at libertie, and the others that were in the Galleis were redeemed by their friends for certayne summes of money.

Thus was the Castell of Sainte Indrewes rendred the nine and twentith of July, fourteene dayes after the arriuall there of the Prior of Capoa; whereby his greate baliancie, well knowen afore that time, was so renued, as hys prayse for his speedie dispatch and good successe therein was much aduanced.

Shortly after the Duke of Somerset, heeretofore in this Booke named Earle of Hertford, Uncle by the mother vnto the yong Kyng of England, and admitted gouernour of his person, and protector of all his Realmes, dominions and subiects, minding the aduancement of the yong King his nephew, thought good with all speede to procure the consummation of the marriage, betwixte him, and the yong Queene of Scottes, but perceyuing that the same could not be brought to passe without force, hee seemed loth to let passe the opportunitie of time the offered (as hee tooke it) to serue his purpose: and thereupon by aduise of counsell leuied an army with all expedition, & came to Berwike, aboute the later ende of August, and in the beginning of September entred Scotlande with the same armye, conteyning a seauentreene or eyghtreene thousande men, whiche was deuided into three principall wardes, a vantgard led by the valiant Erle of Warwike, the battayle by the D. of Somerset himselfe, and the rerewarde by the Lord Dacres of the North. There were certaine wings and troupes of men of armes demilances, and light horsemen, and also of harquebuters, that attended vpon these .iij. wards, garded with diuers peeces of great artillery: the lord Grey of Wilton high marshall of the army, had the generall conduction of the men of armes and demilances. Sir Frauncis Bryan, lieutenaunt of the light horsemen, with .viij.C. of them was appoynted to the vantgarde, Syr Peter Mewtas captaine of .v.C. haqbutters, and sir Frauncis Fleming, maister of the ordinaunce with a .M. light horsemen were appointed to the battaile, and sir Richarde Manners, with .vj.C. light horsemen attended vpon the rerewarde. In this order marchyng throughe the Mers, and Louthian, they came at lengthe vnto a place called Buckling Brayes, neere to the Fourth side, in which riuer ỹ English fleete was arriued, and laye before the Towne of Leith, but now by order giuen came backe from thence, and lay neerer to the army. The gouernour of Scotland aduertised of the comming of this army of Englande thus to inuade Scotland, with al diligẽce sent abrode solemne summonance for the leuying of a newe army forth of all partes of the Realme, the which being assembled togither, hee encamped therewith neere to Muskelburgh water, within lesse than two miles of ỹ place where the English army came now to encamp.

The Gouernour raiseth an armye.

Heere we haue to vnderstãd, that the Scots light Horsemen oftentimes woulde come pricking almost within theyr staues length of the Englishmen as they marched, whooping & shouting, to the ende they might trayne them forth frõ their strẽgth, and with rayling words would stil be in hand to prouoke thẽ therto, but the D. of Somerset doubting the goodnesse of those Scottish prickers, gaue secret cõmandmẽt that no offer of skirmish by the Scottish Horsemen should be taken: but at length the L. Grey of Wilton, not well able to beare such bold presumption in the Scots, aduenturing as he tooke it ouer rashly, & more thã stood with their owne suretie, made sute to the D. of Somerset, that if they continued in such brauerie, it might bee lawfull for him to set them further off. The D. at the first would by no meanes assent thereto, telling the L. Grey, that hys desire proceeded more of a lolitie of courage, than of any knowledge of the enimie, and seemed to defende the goodnesse of the Scottish Horsemen, but when the L. Grey persisted in his sute, and the Earle of Warwike assisted his request, the Duke in the ende yeelded thereto. Heerevpon when the Scottes the next time, whiche was on the Friday the ninth of September came forth to offer the skirmish after their wonted manner, the L. Grey taking with him certayne bands of Horsemenne both menne of armes, Demilaunces, and also lighte Horsemenne, deuided them in troupes, appoynting the Spanish and Italian hagbutters on horsebacke to keepe on a wing, and to gard the hindermost troupe of the English Horsemenne, giuing order to the leaders of euery troupe, that to which so euer the enimie should once offer, in any wise that no aunswer by skirmishe were made them, but after they had drawen them to their accustomed play, and proffer of charge, that troupe that it was offered vnto, presently vppon the enimies wheeling about should throughly gyue it them, and that so giuen, the nexte troupe presently to giue it in the face, and so as occasion required, both those troupes wholly togyther to help other without breaking. The Scottes comming forward, pricking and whowping after their olde wont, the Englishmen forbare a great whyle, tyll at the last, four or fyue hundred of them comming skattered vppon the spurre, with a maruellous shoute within their staues length of the foremost troupe, and thinking then to haue wheeled about, Maister Nicholas Gaynesford, the leader of that troupe, and Lieutenant of the Lorde Greys band of his men of armes of Bulloigne, cryed a charge, whyche as speedily on the English parte as vnlooked for of the Scottes beeing giuen, from charging at that time in sport, the Scottes wer driuen to gallop away so fast, as theyr Horses myghte beare them, losing of their companyes that were taken and slayne to the number of an eyght hundred or more (as some haue written) but yet as dyuers of the Englishmen aduentured too farre in following the chase, they were distressed, and sundrye of them taken prisoners, among the whiche were some of theyr Captaynes, as Sir Raufe Bulmer, Thomas Gower, and Robert Crouche, eache of them hauing in charge the leading of seuerall bandes of lighte Horsemenne. Thus muche for this Fridayes skirmish, wherein the chiefest force of the Scottish Horsemen was defeated, to the great discouragement of the rest. But nowe to proceede to the chiefest poynt of the Scottes infortunate proceedings. True it is (as the Scottes haue reported) that the Gouernoure, and the nobilitie of Scotland meant not to hazarde battayle within theyr owne Realme, but rather to lye styll and defend their ground, if the Englishmenne shoulde come forwarde to gyue them battayle there.

Order gyuen by the Lorde Grey.

Nicholas Gaynesford.

The Scottes Horsemen put to flight.

English Captaynes taken.

The Scottes meant not to haue gyuen battayle.

The Englishmen aduertised therof the morrow after this great skirmish, reysed theyr field verye earely, purposing to take an hyll called Pinkhill, where they myghte place their ordinance, and to shoote into the Scottish Campe, whereby they shoulde force the Scottes to dislodge from theyr ground of aduantange.

The purpose of the Englishmen.

The Gouernour and the Scottishe Lordes beholding their enimies thus marching forewarde, thoughte best to stay theyr enterprise, and therefore suddaynely notwithstandyng theyr former determination, rushing forthe of theyr camp, passed forwarde to encounter theyr enimies.

They were deuided into three battayles, the Earle of Angus wyth certayne Lordes with him, leading the vantgarde, the Earle of Huntley and his friendes the rerewarde, and the Gouernoure accompanyed with the Earle of Argile and the rest of the noble menne, were in the maine battayle. The Englishmen hauyng gote the hyll, and perceyuing the Scottes to come forwardes with greate hast, stayed for their comming, but the Scottes were so rashe and hastie passing firste through the water in their armour, and so vp towardes the hill, that continuing their marche with suche speede as they seemed, rather to trotte than to keepe anye ordinarie marching pace, before they coulde come to ioyne with the Englishmen, they were almost out of breath, yet the Earle of Angus & the other in the vantgard boldly abid the charge of al the English horsemen, & so rigorously rencountred them, that slaying & beating downe no small nūber both of mē and horses, they put the rest to flight, so that no small part of them retired backe in such disorder, that they ran thorough the rankes of ỹ footemen in the forewarde, wherewith suche feare entred among the Englishmē, that as hath bin reported, they had vndoubtedly fledde, if the manfull courage of the Earle of Warwike had not bin shewed at that present, according to the wonted valure of hys often approued prowes, wherby he caused them to stay, and relie themselues agayne. In the meane time, the battayle & the rerewarde of the Scottes aduaunced forwarde with great courage, but ther was a Galley, and two pinesses of the Englishe fleete which from the sea shotte so terribly at the Scottish army, that ỹ same was not only sore galled and endomaged therby, but also stayed, that they could not come easily forward, and herewith the English vantgard encouraged with the comfortable wordes and behauiour of the Earle of Warwike, and other the Captaynes, made towards the Scottishe vantgard agayne, the whyche not able of it selfe to resist, retired in good order to the greate battayle of Scotlande, whereuppon the multitude fearing, by reason they sawe them in the forewarde thus retire (albeit in good order) that all hadde bin lost, gaue backe, and toke them to flight, whome the Englishmenne followed amayne, slaying the Scottishmenne downe on heapes in passing great numbers.

Many were also drowned in the water of Undercske, through the whiche they toke their flight.

The Earle of Huntley and the reregarde stoode still with their ensignes and bannees, tyll the chase was past by them, but at length were driuen to make away as well as the rest, and the Earle himselfe in the retire beeing taken a foote, well clad in gilte armour enameled, was leadde prisoner to the Lorde Protectour. Diuers other menne of name, Barons, and Knightes, were taken prisoners. There were slayne no small number of personages of good accompte. Among other, the Lorde Fleming, the Maister of Erskin, the Maister of Graham, the Maister of Methyne, the Maister of Ogiluy, the Maister of Leuingston, the M. of Ros, the Larde of Lochinwar, the Larde of Glencarnocke, and others. The next day, the English army remoued to Leith, where the prisoners were put into a Church, diuers of them beeing sore wounded, but the Earle of Huntley entring bond for them that they should well and truely pay their raunsomes agreed vpon betwixt them and their takers, or else to come and present themselues prisoners in England by a certaine daye, they were suffered to depart. The Gouernour escaping from the battayle, came to Striueling, where the Queene Regent was, togyther with hir daughter the yong Queene. Here by the counsell and aduise of the Earle of Ingus, and diuers other Lords that were also withdrawē thither after the battayle, they were conueyd to the Countrey of Menteith, where they remayned in the Abbey of Inch Mahome, til the English armye was departed out of the Realme, and then they remoued agayne, and came to Striueling.

The Englishe nauie wanne the Isle of S. Colmes Ins, and did sundry other exployts by Sea, as in the English Historie it may appere.

Moreouer, the Earle of Bodwell, whome the Gouernour had before kepte in prison, and was the night after the battayle set at libertie, repayred to the Duke of Somerset with diuers other Lords and Gentlemen of Louthian, whilest he lay at Lieth, offering themselues to be at the King of Englands commaundement, and so were assured from receyuing hurte or domage by the English power.

The Duke of Somerset hauing remayned at Leith an eight dayes, and demaunding the Castell of Edenburgh, could not obteyne it, departed from thence the eyghtenth of December homewardes the nerte way, ouer the Mountaynes of Soutrey, comming the thirde day before the Castell of Hume, where they dyd so muche by countenancing to win that fortresse, that within three or foure dayes after their comming thither, it was surrendred. Hume Castell rendred to the Englishmen.

This Castell beeing wonne, and a garnison left therein to keepe it, they remoued to Rockesburgh, where within the compasse of the ruinous walles of an olde Castell they builte a forte, and after returning into England, lefte a conuenient garnison to keepe it.

They gote also about the same time a strōg fortresse, called Fast Castell, standing neere to the Sea syde, and placed a garnison within it. Fast Castell wonne by them.

And moreouer in this meane tyme, they? Fleete by Sea wanne the Castell of Brought tie Crag, and putte in like manner a garnison within it to keepe the same (as in the Englishe Historie it may further appeare:) and in what sort also all the chiefest Lords and Gentlemen of the Mers and Tiuidale, came in, and submitted themselues to the Duke of Somerset, vpon assurance had and giuen. Broughtie Crag wonne.

Furthermore, whilest the Duke of Somersette with hys armie dyd thus inuade Scotland on the East parte, it was ordeyned by the sayde Duke, and other of the Counsell to the Kyng of Englande, that Mathewe Earle of Lennor, and Thomas Lorde Wharton, then Warden of the West Marches of Englande, should with a power inuade Scotlande on the West syde, to the end that there should not any of the West borders nor Countreys come to assist the Gouernour, against the Duke of Somersettes armye, but bee driuen to remayne at home to defend their owne Countrey. Hereupon, there was an army leuied to the number of fiue thousande fotemenne, and eyghte hundred light Horsemen, with whiche power, the Earle of Lennor and the Lorde Wharton entring Scotlande the eyght of September, encamped the firste night vpon the water of Eske, & marched the nexte daye through the nether parte of Annandale, till they came to the Castell of Milke, a fortresse of good strength, ỹ walles being fourteene foote thicke. Captain of this Castell was one Jo. Steward, brother to the Lard thereof, who vppon the approch of the Earle of Lennor, yeelded the house vnto him, without any shewe of resistance, whereuppon Fergus Graham, brother to Richie Grahame of Eske, was appointed with a garnison of Souldiers to keepe that Castell to the vse of the yong King of Englande, and was afterwards confirmed Captayne there with fiftie light Horsemen, by appoyntmente of the Duke of Sommersette, and the Counsell, so that during the warres, he remayned there to the great annoyance of the Scottes, enimies to Englande, and preseruation of the Countrey thereaboutes, to the King of Englands vse. The Castell of Milke yeelded

The twentith of September, the Earle of Lennor, and the Lorde Wharton encamped neere to the Towne of Innande, and the morrow after approching neerer to the same, gaue commonance vnto the Captaine thereof, called Lion, of the house of Glames, who with an hundred Scottes kept the Churche and Steeple of Annand, keeping peeces of themselues verye strong and mightily reenforced with earth: they within therefore refused to yeelde, and valiantly defended themselues.

The greatest peeces of artillerie whych the Englishmen hadde there at that time, were certayne double and single Falcons, wherewyth they beate only the battlements, till they myght with certayne engines approche harde to the walles, and vndermine the same, so as the roofe of the Church was shaken downe, and a greate number of them within the Church slayne and crushed to death. Suche as escaped fledde into the Steeple. Two of the Englishmen that wroughte aboute the mynes were slayne, but at length, the Captayne moued by perswasion of the Erle of Lennox, to whome hee claymed to bee of kynne, rendered the Steeple vnto hym, with hymselfe, and .96. Scottes Souldyers, with condition to haue their lyues onely saued, and the Captayne to remayne prisoner, and to goe into England. Immediatly vpon theyr comming forth of the Steeple, fyre was giuen to the traines of powder in the mynes, and so both the Church and Steeple were blowen vp into the ayre, and rased downe to the grounde. Thys done, they brente the Towne (after they hadde sacked it) and left not a stone standing vppon an other, for that the same Towne hadde euer bin a right noysome neyghbour to Englande. The Englishmen had conceyued suche spite towardes thys Towne, that if they sawe but a peece of timber remayning vnbrente, they would cutte the same in peeces with theyr billes. The Countrey heerewith was striken in such feare, that the next daye all the Kilpatrickes and the Iordeynes, the Lards of Kirkmichel, Apilgirth, Clolbourne, Howmendes, Muby, and ẏ Irrewings, the Belles, the Rigges, the Murrayes, and all the clanes and surnames of the nether part of Innerdale, came in, and receyued an oth of obeysance, as subiectes to the King of Englande, deliuering pledges for their assured loyaltie.

The residue that woulde not come in and submitte themselues, hadde theyr houses brent, their goodes and cattell fetched away by the Englishe lyghte horsemen, that were sente abrode into the Countrey for that purpose.

These things thus executed, the Earle of Lennox, and the Lorde Wharton returned backe into Englande wyth theyr prisoners, bowties and spoyles, receyuing greate thankes and commendations by gentle letters, of the fyue and twentith of September, from the Duke of Somerset, then lying at Rockesburgh, aboute fortifying of that place.

The gouernour perceyuing thus that without the assistance of Fraunce hee should not be able to resist the Englishmen, hauing now gote such foote hold within the Realme of Scotland, required the Queene Dowager, and Monsieur Doysell, Liger Ambassador for the Frenche Kyng to perswade with him by letters, to send an army into Scotland, to the aide of his frends there. The Queene, and Monsieur Doysell, perceyuing a ready way prepared to bring that to passe which they most desired, which was, to haue the Queene of Scotlande ordred in all things by the Frenche Kyngs aduice, they vndertooke to procure an army out of Fraunce, according to the gouernours desire, if hee wyth the states of the Realme woulde agree that the Queene myght bee sente into Fraunce, and a contract made for hir bestowing in marriage, as stoode with the French Kings pleasure. The Gouernour condiscending heereunto, assembled the states, and by their aduises, passed certayne couenantes to the effect aforesayd, and sente the same in writing by certayne messengers into Fraunce.

The Gouernours suite to the Queene Dowager, and to the French Ambassador.

The Queene Dowager promiseth ayde out of Fraunce with condicions.

The Frenche King gladly accepting thys message, prepared a nauie of Shyppes and Galeys to transporte an army into Scotland the next Sommer. In the meane time, the Gouernour laid siege to Broughtie Crag, and the D. of Somerset as well for meane to cause the Scottes to retire that siege, as also for the annoyance of Clidesdale, appertayning to ẏ Gouernour and ẏ Erle of Angus, and other Scots ẏ would not come in to the obeysance of the K. of England, appoynted the Earle of Lennox to make a new inuasiō into Scotland, & to vse for triall of their fidelities, the help of two thousand Scottish light horsemen, that were already assured and sworne to serue the Kyng of England in all such exployctes in which they should be employed. The Earle of Lennox desirous to aduaunce the King of Englands affayres, & hauing receyued letters from William Earle of Glencarne, with promise of hys assistance, and likewise of his father in lawe the Earle of Angus, the Lorde of Drumlanrig, and those Lordes and Gentlemenne of the Countreys of Kile, Cunningham, Renfreu, & Lennox, entred Scotlād about the twelfth of Decēber, accompanyed with Henry Wharto, second son to the L. to Dunfreis, where the generall assemblie was appoynted of the two thousande assured Scottishe lyght Horsemen, when the musters should bee taken, hee founde vnneth three hundred, and those for the more part of the broken countreys of Annãdale, Ewisdale, Eldale, and Liddesdale. The Earle of Glencarne came thither indeede, but vnder a counterfeit shewe of good meaning, where in trueth hee meante nothyng but craft to discouer all the Earle of Lennox hys purposes, who perceyuing his double dealing, and fyndyng no suche forces ready to assist hym as he looked for, and moreouer mistrusting the loyalties of the master of Maxwell, & the Ettlemẽ of Nidesdale, meaning as he toke it, to entrappe hym, and delyuer hym to the Queene Dowager, and the Lorde Gouernour, stode in some perplexitie what way should bee the best for hym to followe, thinking it not to stande wyth hys honor to returne, without atchiuing some enterprise.

The Earle of Glencarne had shewed to him two letters written by the Lorde of Drumlanrig, signifying, that if the Earle of Lennox came, accompanyed onely with Scottishmen, he woulde both serue him and honor h m in the best wise hee myghte, but if hee broughte those Englishmenne in his company, he would not onely refuse to ayde hym, but also reyse all the power hee myght make, eyther by his friends or otherwise to resist him.

The Earle thus perceyuing that hee was in daunger to bee betrayed among them, and that there was all the deuises practised that myghte bee to slay those that shoulde come to the deuotion of the King of Englande, dissembled the matter with Glencarne and other that were suborned to betray hym, pretendyng to them, that hee would followe the course of theyr deuises, but in the meane tyme hee gote togither the Englishe Captaynes that were appoynted to attende hym, and also suche Scottishmen as hee knewe hee myghte trust, and meaning to scourge Drumlanrig, and to cutte hym shorte, for that hee was the chiefe instrument to slay all the Scottishmenne in those parties from entring friendshippe wyth the Englishmenne: hee gaue secret warning to all the Captaynes and leaders aboute nine of the clocke at night, that they should be ready wyth theyr men to mount on Horsebacke at the firste sounde of the Trumpette, and keeping wyth them the Erle of Glencarne, the M. of Maxwel, the Lardes of Closburne, Kirkmichel, and others the Gentlemenne of Nidesdale and Annandale, hee sente forthe syxe hundred chosen Horsemenne vppon sounde of the Trumpette, at twelue of the clocke at nyghte, vnder the leadyng of Henrye Wharton, and other the Captaynes of the garnisons, who in the dawning of the nexte morrowe, arriued neere the place of Drumlanrig, where they appoynted foure hundred of theyr Horsemenne to passe to the forrey, who reysed fyre, and brente two after he perceyued that the moſt part of the enimies were departed, and that the reſidue of the Gentlemenne and Captaynes of the Engliſhe Hoꝛſemen were withdꝛawing towards Dunfreys, being not paſt a fiue ſhoꝛe men, he fiercely followed after them with hys power, in hope not onely to ouerthꝛowe and diſtreſſe them, but alſo to take the Earle of Lennox at Dunfreys.

The Annandallers laden wyth spoyle and Cattaile, beeing in number a foure hundred men, departed with their pray homewards. The Lard of Drumlanrig lying al thys while in ambush with seauen hundred men, forbare to breake out to giue anye charge vppon his enimies, doubting least the Earle of Lennox hadde kepte a stale behynde, but nowe

Drumlanrig purſueth the Engliſhmen.

Maiſter Henrye Wharton and thoſe fiue ſcoꝛe Hoꝛſemen, retiring beyonde the water of Nith, and perceyuing that Dꝛumlanrig and his mẽ entred the water raſhly to purſue them, returned, and gaue ſuch a deſperate charge vpon them, that Dꝛumlanrig and his company were ſcattered and putte to flighte, yet Dꝛumlanrig himſelfe, although there were ſome ſpeares bꝛoken vppon hym, thꝛough the goodneſſe of hys Hoꝛſe eſcaped.

He is put to flight.

Two Gentlemen of his ſurname and traine, that were in no ſmall eſtimatiõ with him, were ſlayne, and fiue ſcoꝛe pꝛiſoners taken, and ledde to Dunfreis.

The terrour of this ouerthꝛowe, and ẏ bꝛuite of the Earle of Lennox hys entrie thus made into Scotland, cauſed the Gouernoure to leuie his ſiege frõ Bꝛoughtie Crag, and with ſpeede to come from thence, the better to defende hys Countreys of Cliddeſdale, and Dowglaſdale.

The ſiege of Broughtie Crag reyſed.

Sir Andꝛew Dudley, Captayn of Bꝛoughtie Crag, bare himſelfe right vãliantly, in defending the Caſtell during thys ſiege, ſo that the Scottes certeſſe loſt diuers hardy perſonages, and among other Eawen Hamilton, the Gouernoures kinneſman, was ſlayne at the ſame ſiege.

Moꝛeouer, the Pꝛioꝛ of Whiterne by hys letters and meſſengers, offered himſelfe to obey the King of Englande: and the inhabitantes of the burroughe and hauen townes of Wigton and Kirckowbꝛe, the Knightes of Loghinwar and Garleis, the Laird and tutoꝛ of Bomby, ẏ Lairde of Cardines, and all the Gentlemen of Annandale, Nideſdale, and Galloway, euen to Whiterne, beeyng. 80. myles in length from Carelile, thꝛough the inducemente of the foꝛeſayd Pꝛioꝛ, and of the Knightes of Loghinwar and Garleis (foꝛ the fauoꝛ they bare to ẏ Earle of Lennox) within two dayes after the diſcomfiture of Dꝛumlanrig, came vnto Dunfreis, and there receyued an oth to be true to the Kyng of Englande, and afterwardes wente with the Earle vnto Carelile, leauing the Countrey in good quiet, and the King of England acknowledged foꝛ Lozde of Galloway, Nideſdale, and Annandale by the inhabitants thereof.

And after that the foꝛenamed perſons hadde remayned foꝛ a ſpace at Carelile, they deliuered pledges, and returned home into their Countreys, as aſſured men and ſubiects to the Kyng of England.

The Scottes deliuer pledges.

In thys meane whyle, the Gouernoure hauing holde ſiege befoꝛe the Caſtell of Bꝛoughtie Crag, by the ſpace of thirtie daies, and nowe retiring from thence (as befoꝛe yee haue hearde) by the aduice of the principall Lozdes aboute hym, hee cauſed Maiſter James Halibourton, tutoꝛ of thoſe parties, to reyſe certaine companies of Hoꝛſemen, and appoynted hym wyth Captaine Leiremouth, whome he left in Dundee with certayne ſoꝛtemenne) to defende the Countrey againſte the Engliſhmenne, if they iſſued foꝛthe of Bꝛoughtie crag, to atchieue anye enterpꝛiſe anye where neere thereaboutes.

And further it was appoynted alſo that about the ende of Febꝛuary, the Earle of Lennox and the Lozde Wharton with fiueen hundꝛed Engliſhe hoꝛſemenne, beſyde the aſſured Scottes Hoꝛſemenne, and aboute a foure oꝛ fyue thouſande Engliſhe ſoꝛtemenne, ſhoulde by the Weſt boꝛdures inuade Scotlande: they accoꝛdyng to theyꝛ commiſſion ſette foꝛward, and the fyꝛſte nyghte came to Lochmaben, and there lodged.

The Earle of Lennox and the L. Wharton inuade Scotland.

The nexte daye they marched to Dunfreis, and whyleſt they remayned there, the Earle of Angus beeyng come to Dꝛumlanrig, by meſſengers entred ſome talke wyth hys ſonne in lawe the Earle of Lennox: but ſyth it was perceyued that thys was done, rather to entrappe the Earle of Lennox, oꝛ at the leaſtwiſe to dꝛiue tyme, vppon conſultation hadde wyth the Maiſter of Maxwell, the Larde of Cloſeboꝛne, and others the Gentlemen aſſured of Nideſdale and Annandale, it was concluded, that the Townes of Moꝛton, Duſdere, and others, neere adioyning togyther in thoſe parties, ſhoulde bee bꝛente, to the ende, that the Earle of Angus myghte ſo bee dꝛawen to the fielde, and caughte by ſome one meane oꝛ other.

The diſſimulation of the Earle of Angus.

Aboute midnighte therefoꝛe the foꝛrey beeyng ſette foꝛthe, vnder the leading of Maiſter Henry Wharton, to the number of twelue hundꝛed lyght Hoꝛſemenne, the Maiſter of Maxwell, nowe Lozde Herries, and the reſidue of the aſſured menne beeyng amongſt them, kept kept forewarde, and in the morning the Erle of Lennor, and the Lorde Wharton marched forth with the fotemen, till they came tenne miles beyond Dunfreis: And where the Erle of Angus was drawen to the Castell of Drumlanrig vnder pretence to commune with his sonne the Erle of Lennox (but meaning to entrappe him) if it wer possible he was so enuironned by the Englishe fotemen ere he coulde haue sufficient warning, that he was forced to flee onely with fiue persons in his company. But nowe the Englishe horsemen beyng come to Dulcere.xlviij.miles within ỹ realme of Scotland, hauing passed sundry great riuers, they set that towne on fire. But the master of Maxwell with the other Scottish gentlemen & light horsemen borderers, to the nũber of foure hundred, beyng in company of the Englishe horsemen, as before ye haue heard, had continued the destruction of the Englishmen afore hande, and the better to worke their feate, they had procured as ye haue hearde, the Erle of Angus to come vnto Drumlanrig with a chosen power of men for that purpose. There were also vpon euery hil about, great numbers of fotemen Scottes, with speares and lance staues to assist the Erle of Angus and his complices agaynst the Englishmen. The Lairde of Drumlanrig with a number of chosen horsemen was aduaũced forward in sight of the Englishmen as they were busie in fyring the towne of Dulcere. The assured Scottes therefore thinking the enterprice to be surely mough conueyed for their continued purpose, openly vpon the field neare to Dulcere, hoysting vp a blacke penfill vpon a speare point for a token, reuolted wholy, and ioygned themselues to the Laird of Drumlanrig & other their coũtrey men, and thrust in betwixt the Englishe horsemen and fotemen, to the great perill of distressing aswell the one as the other: for making towardes the place where the Erle of Lennor, and the Lord Wharton were cõming forwarde with their fotemen, neere to the olde castell of Dauswynton, sometime the house of the Cumynes, they brupted it abroad that the Englishe horsemen were quite ouerthrowen.

The reuolting of the assured Scottes.

A false rumor spred.

The Erle of Lennox beholding the manner of his aduersaris, a lighted afote from his horse willing the Lorde Wharton to do the like: for this day (sayd he) I will die a true Englishman. At length the Englishe horsemen fetching a cõpasse in retyring backe frõ Dulcere, came neare to the place where the Erle & the lord Wharton were ranged in order of battell, and thinking no lesse but that theyr horsemen had bene ouerthrowen, were ready to marche backe towardes Dunfreis. But theyr horsemen thus comming in, and perceyuing how the matter stode, gaue a right valiant charge vpon the Scottes that stode countenauncyng the fotemen, and ready to take the aduantage if they might haue dryuẽ them through shrinkyng backe into any disorder: but such was the violence of the shocke giuen at that instant with great manhode vndoubtedly by the Englishe horsemen, that the Scottes were therewith put out of array, scattered & quyte put to flight: the Lairde of Drũlanrig beyng taken prysoner corrupted his taker and so gotte away. The maister of Maxwell escaped in great daunger of life, for he had sundry speares broken on him in the chase as he fledde away. There were yet taken that day of the Scots to the number of. 400. beside sundry that were drowned in the water of Myth. Amõgst the prisoners were these men of name, the Abbot of new Abbey, Christy Irrewyng of Bonshaw, a brother of the Laird of Hẽpsfield, and many other Gentlemen of name. Dunfreis was rifled and spoyled: as the Erle of Lennox and the Englishmenne returned thither, and a Marshall courte appoynted there for execution of pledges, but yet suspended and stayed, till the Counsels pleasure might bee knowen in that behalfe.

There were at the first euill newes spredde abrode, and certified to the court of England of this iourney, howe the Erle of Lennox and the English army was ouerthrowē, so that it was by order appoynted, that the Erle of Derby, the Lords Scroupe, & Coniers, with their powers should repayre to the West borders to garnishe the same for defence agaynst the enimies: but vpon the true report how the mater had passed, made by Master Henry Wharton, and one Bishop a Scottishman, sent in post for that purpose, that appoyntment was stayed, and master Wharton was at that time made Knight, and the sayde Bishop richely rewarded for bringing so good newes. Herewith were letters directed downe from the counsell to the Lorde Wharton, for the executiō of certaine pledges, to witte the master of Maxwels pledge, beyng one of his nearest kinsmen, of the house of the Herries, also the Warden of the Grey friers in Dunfreis, the Vicar of Carlauerock, and diuers other whiche were executed at Carlile.

Pledges executed.

In this meane time were the fortes at Lawder, and Hadyngton buylte, the castels of Pesket and Dawkithwonne, al the Milles brent with in foure myles of eche hande of Edenburgh, and other exployctes atchieued by the Englishmen, as in the History of Englande is more at large expressed.

But now the French King hauyng prepared an army ready to come into Scotland, caused the same to draw downe to Brest in Brytayne, where the shippes and Galeys were rigged & made ready to passe therewith into Scotland. The chiefe leaders of whiche army were these, whiche had charge chiefly to commaunde in the same, Monsieur de Desse Lieutenant generall, Mōsieur Dandelot Colonel of the Frēch fotemen, the Counte Reingraue colonel of the Almaynes, Monsieur de Malleray, Monsieur Doysel, Pietro Strozzi Colonel of the Italiās, Monsieur de Etauges Capitayne of the horsemen, sir Nicholas de Villegaignon a knight of the Rodes, or rather Malta Capitayne of the Galeys, and Monsieur Duno Commissarie of the artillery, with diuers other worthie personages and men of approued valiancy. These Capitaynes with theyr powers beyng embarqued at Brest, sayled alongst by the East seas, and at length aboute the middest of June came into the Rode before Leith, where they landed theyr people and ordinaunce, and afterwardes with the aduise of the Gouernour, and other of the Scottish Lordes, they went to beslege Hadington, and comming thither, encamped thē selues in places of aduantage about the towne, caste trenches, planted their ordinaunce, battered the rampyres, and kept them within straytly besieged on eche hande, vsing all the wayes they coulde deuise to cōstrayne the Englishmen to yelde: they forbeare yet to giue a generall assaulte, bycause they would not hazarde (as they haue reported) the losse of so many menne, as might haue bene slayne and maymed thereby, to the greate weakenyng of their power there, hauyng not meane to supply it whā they would, and yet they had a great army of Scottes with them for a season, and had made the breaches so reasonable, that with small payne they might haue entred by the same, if the force of the defendants had not sufficed with handeblowes to haue beaten them backe, as no doubte there was no want of good willes in them so to haue done, if the Frenchmen had put the matter in triall: yet during this siege, they within stoode in great necessitie of things behouefull for the defense of the towne. Wherevpon sir Henry Wharton with a band of light horsemen of the West borders and others, came and put into the towne a certayne number of men with powder, & other necessaries, greatly to the relefe of the besieged, and no lesse displeasure of the Frenchmen and Scottes, that were not aware of this enterprice till it was done in the night season, by the good and fortunate conduction of them that had the conueyance thereof.

Why the Frenchmen forbare to giue an assaulte.

But after this, there came a power of English horsemen to the number of little lesse than two thousande demie lances, light horsemen, and arquebusiers on horsebacke, vnder the leading of sir Robert Bowes, sir Thomas Palmer, sir Henry Wharton, Capitayne Gambo'a Spaniarde, and others, the which aduenturing ouer rashly within daunger of the whole Frēch power, were ouerthrowē, and chased, sir Robert Bowes, and sir Thomas Palmer, with a great number of other Capitaynes, Gentlemen and Souldiers beyng taken prysoners, beside those that were slayne. Yet after this ouerthrow of those horsemen, the French remoued theyr siege from the places where they had first planted it, and lodged further off from the towne, continuyng there till at length by an army sent forth of Englande vnder the conduct of the Erle of Shrewsbury, the Lorde Grey, and others, they were constreyned to retyre from thence, as in the English history ye may finde more largely expressed, to the whiche for further report of the euentes chanceyng duryng that siege, I referre the reader.

But

But this is to be remembred, that whyleſt the ſiege remayned at Hadyngton, by a conuention or aſſemble of the Lordes it was decreed, that the Queene ſhoulde be ſente into Fraunce, and therevpō Monſieur de Villegaignon with foure Galleys departing from Leith, made ſemblance as though he would haue ſayled into Fraunce, but hauyng paſſed the mouth of the Fourth, he turned his courſe on the left hand to paſſe alōgſt the ſhoare Northward by the Germayne ſeas, ẏ compaſſing the lande on the Eaſt ſide, he might paſſe about by the Iſles of Orkney, and ſo by the Weſt Iſles till he came to Dunbretayne where the yong Queene lay.

This iourney he fortunately atchieued, the ſame neuer afore that tyme to mans remembrance beyng made or attempted with Galeys. At his arriuall at Dunbretayne, he founde all things ready prouided neceſſary for the embarquyng of the Queene, that he might conuey hir into Fraunce, for the accompliſhment whereof he had taken that iourney in hande. Herevpon ſhe beyng brought aborde into the Kings owne Galey, wherein Monſieur de Brezze was alſo appoynted to be abourde with hyr, as hee that had bene ſent with expreſſe commaundement to ſee hir conueyed into Fraunce, who togither with Villegaignon ſhewed ſuch diligēce in atchieuyng that enterpriſe, that finally they arriued with proſperous winde and weather in the hauen of Breſt in Brytaine with that yong Queene, beyng as then betwixte fiue and ſixe yeares of age.

But now to the doyngs in Scotlande concerning ẏ warres there, after that ẏ ſiege of Hadington was reyſed by the Engliſhe armie as before ye haue hearde, the Frenchmenne thereupon retyred themſelfes vnto Muſkelbourgh, and chooſing forth a plot of grounde for theyr aduātage, kept themſelfes within the ſame, and herewith there came to them a fiftene thouſande Scottiſhmen to aſſiſte them: ſo that when the Engliſhmen came forewardes to aſſayle them, they found them ſo ſtrongly embattayled, that whether their cōmiſſion did not ſo farre extend, or whether they had no likyng of the matche, they forbare to ſet vpon them in that ground of ſo great diſauantage for the aſſaylantes, & ſo returned backe to Hadington, & after homewards, hauing furniſhed the towne with newe ſupplies of men, munition, and vitayles ſufficient.

Here is to be noted ẏ the engliſh fleete entring into the Fourth was ready to haue ayded ẏ army by lande as occaſions might haue bene offered, but the Lord Admirall perceyuing no likelyhood of battayle by lande, toke vpon him to atchieue ſome other enterpriſes, and firſt comming to Brent Yland ſet certaine ſhippes a fire there, of the chiefeſt in the riuer, and ſaluting the towne of Leith as he paſſed by, with Canon ſhotte, he determined to lande ſome of his men on the North ſide of the Fourth, to make ſome ſpoyle within the countrey of Fife. But Iohn Erſkin Laird of Dun, as then ſomewhat diſeaſed and returned home from the campe, cauſed ſuch dayly and nightly watche and warde for to be kept, that this enterpriſe could not be ſo ſecretely cōueyed by the Engliſhmen, but that the ſame was perceyued, & ſo preuented, that vpon theyr landyng they were forced to retyre with loſſe, and happy was he that might firſt get agayne to ſhippeborde. The Laird of Dun. The Engliſh men repulſed at S. Menettes.

The Erle of Shrewſbury beyng come backe from Hadington vnto Dunglas, order was giuen for the buylding of a forte there, as in the Engliſh hiſtory further may appeare, and in the meane tyme Mōſieur de Deſſe remayning in campe at Muſkelbourgh, hearing that the Engliſh armie was remoued homewardes, & how diuers newe bandes of horſemen and footemen, beyng lefte in Hadington, were ready to come forth to ſkirmiſh abroade vpon ſight of the enimy, he toke aduiſe to trie if he might drawe thē forth to their loſſe, and therevpon was Monſieur Dandelot & the Reingraue appoynted to chooſe forth a thouſande of their luſtieſt footemen, the whiche with three hundred horſemen were conueyed and layde cloſely in ambuſhe, behinde a litle hill not farre from the towne. This done, a few horſemē were ſent forth to draw the Engliſhmen out of the towne to ſkirmiſh with thē. The Engliſhmē wer no ſoner aduiſed that the enimies were there at hand in the field, but that all their horſemen iſſued out of the towne backe with certayne footemen, and ſtreight had the Frenchmen in chaſe, who retyring, maintayned the ſkirmiſh, of purpoſe to make the Engliſhmē more earneſt to come forewarde: but immediatly as Mōſieur de Deſſe ſaw his time, he gaue ſigne by ſounde of Trumpet to the footemen to breake forth, who togither with the horſemen gaue ſo fierce an onſet vpon the enimies, that they were incontinently diſcomfited, and fleyng toward the towne, were followed by the French euen harde to the Walles, diuers were ſlayne, and aboue an hundred taken priſoners. The Engliſh mē put to the worſe at a ſkirmiſh neare to Hadington.

After this Monſieur de Deſſe reyſed from Muſkelbourgh, and commyng to Lieth ſette in hande to fortifie that towne. The Marſhall Strozzi, and Monſieur Dandelot, with diuers other Capitaynes embarqued themſelfes in the Galey that yet remayned, toke their courſe to returne into Fraunce, one of the ſame Galeys (they beyng eight in number, beſide a foyſt and a Brigandine) was taken by an Engliſh ſhippe called the Faucon, as ſhee paſſed thyough the narrow Leith fortified. After the departure of Monsieur Dandelot, Monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron remaigned Coronell of the French fotemen in Scotland. As to the furniture on the water there remained now but foure Galeys vnder the guiding of one capitayne Bache an Italian, a man of great experience and approued skill. For ye must vnderstand, that before the arriuall of the English nauie and armie to the succours of them in Hadington, Monsieur de Mallerie vice Admirall of Fraūce returned home with the fleete of ships ẏ had brought the French armie into Scotlād.

Monsieur de Mallerie vice Admirall of Fraunce.

In what sort the Lord Grey of Wilton afflicted the countreys of Tiuidale & Liddesdale, after the returne of the Erle of Shrewsbury, is partely touched in the history of England.

About the same time, there chāced a mutinie to ryse betwixt the Scottes and Frenchmen in Edenburgh, by reason that a French souldier fel a quarelling with two or three Scottishmen, & falling together by the eares, diuers Scots that came to departe the fray, would haue had the Frenchman to prison, but other Frenchmē beyng there also present, would not suffer the Scottes to take him away. Wherevpon arose a great tumult and hurle amōg them, in so much that there were diuers slayne on bothe partes, namely James Hamilton Lard of Stanhouse knight, capitayne of the Castel, and Prouost of the towne of Edenburgh with his sonne, and M. William Steward one of the Queenes seruants beside sundry others. For the Frenchmen doubting some continued commotion agaynst them, assembled togither in order of battayle in the streetes, so that before the mater might bee appeased by the Capitaines that shewed theyr diligent endeuors therein, they had inough to do to bryng it to passe as they wished.

An affray betwixt the frēch souldiers, and the townesmen of Edenburgh.

The beginner of this businesse was hanged the same day in the market place of Edēburgh, where he began first to pyke the quarrell.

Monsieur de Desse to shew that this variāce had not proceeded so farre as the bruyte thereof gaue forth (for it was rather increased ye may be sure than diminished) vndertooke an enterprise in hand to winne the towne of Hadington by a camisado, but in what sorte they missed theyr purpose, and howe they were well beaten backe, and seute away by the valiant manhood of the English capitaynes & souldiers thē within that towne, ye may reade further thereof in the Englishe history. There were seuen score, some say three hundred slaine in the base court.

The Frenchmē giue a camisado to Hadington, & are beaten backe.

But now for somuche as I haue sayde nothing of Broughtie cragge, sithēce the Lord gouernour rayled his siege from thence, ye shall vnderstand, that (as some haue written) shortly after the Erle of Argule came thither with an armie of his Prithe Scottes and beliegeid it: but when he saw that he could not preuaile, he toke truce with them within for a tyme, and before the same was expyred, there came new succours to the Englishmen, so that the Erle of Argule (by reason his people had remayned there the full terme of their bounden & ordinary seruice) was constrained to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmē to become Maisters of a litle hill, where afterwardes they buylded a forte, and nowe in the later end of this yeare, they purposed also to haue fortified Dundee, & to haue kepte the same with a garrison of Souldiers, but hearing that Monsieur de Desse with his Frenchmen was cōming thitherwardes, they auoyded the towne of their owne accorde, hauing firste spoyled the houses and after set them on fire.

The Reingraue with two bandes of his Almaignes, and Monsieur de Etauges with his company of horsemen were sent before, who cōming to Dundee and finding the Englishmen gone, encamped there, staying till Monsieur de Desse was come that followed at hande with the French fotemen.

Within two dayes after, they goyng forth to bew the forte, were in daunger to haue bene caught ere they coulde get backe againe, for the Englishmen and Lanſquenetz that were there with them (parte of Conrad Phennings bādes) issued forth, & droue them to retyre, not without danger to haue bene distressed, if the Reingraue had not vsed the greater policie in retyring the troupe. To be short, Monsieur de Desse to stop the Englishmen from entring any further into the countrey on that side, lefte .iij. enseignes of Frenchmen, & two enseignes of Scottes within Dundee, with artillerie & Pioners to fortifie the town, & to keepe it in safetie frō the Englishmē.

This done he returned to Edenburgh, & sent the residew of his people abrode into the coūtrey to lodge in townes and villages here and there as was thought moste expedient, for the better refreshyng of them after their long trauell.

On S. Stephens day at night the castell of Hume was skaled & wonne out of the Englishmens hāds. One of the surname of the Humes a man of .lx. yeares of age was the first that entred on the wall, sleayng one of the warchemen that kept his walke on that side. About the same time the Reinsgraue returned into France, leauing his fiue enseignes of Almaynes behind him vnder the charge of Capitayne Retouze a good man of warre and of great experience.

English history, and about the same tyme there landed at Dunbrytaine foure bandes of Souldiers, Prouancois and Gascoignes, bryngyng money with them to pay the Souldiers theyr wages behinde as then for the space of three monethes.

Sir James Wilsorde also was taken about the same tyme by the Frenchmen in a skirmishe at Dunbar, as I haue also noted in the history of England.

Not long after Monsieur de Desse was appointed by the Queene Dowager, to go vnto Jedworth to preuent that the Englishmenne shoulde not fortifie there, whereof thee stode in some doubte.

Immediatly vpon his commyng thither, the Lard of Fernihirst requested him to helpe to recouer his Castell of Fernihirst out of the Englishmens handes, whiche they had taken from him and kepte, greatly to the annoyance of all the countrey thereaboutes. Monsieur de Desse taking with him Mõsieur de Dysel, and Monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, hasted thither with the chiefest parte of his army, sendyng before certayne Capitaynes with their bandes to survey the house, who at theyr cõming thither, vsed suche diligence in followyng the offered occasiõ, that they both repulsed theyr enimies that came forth to giue them the skirmishe, and pursuyng them with great rigour, wanne the lims of the house vpon them, forcing the capitayne & souldiers to retire within the dongeon, and kept them so shorte therein, that they had opportunitie to mine an hole through the wall, of such largenesse as a man might easily enter by the same. Herewith a greate number of Scottes hauyng broken open the gate of the base court, where the Frenchmen were busie to assaulte the dongeon, brust in on heapes vpon desire to be reuenged vpon the Englishmen, and namely of their capitayne, who as they sayde, had done them many great displeasures. The Capitayne perceyning this, and doubting if he fell into the Scottishmens handes he should die for it, he presented himselfe at the hole, whiche the Frenchmen had made, and yeelded himselfe to Monsieur de Dussac, and la Mouthe Rouge, who mindyng to vse him as became mẽ of warre, would haue ledde him out of the presse, but sodenly a Scotte comming behinde him, whose wife (as was reported he had rauished) smote of his head so iust from the shoulders, that it leapt a foure or fiue yeardes quyte from the body.

Many other cruell partes the Scottes seemed to shewe against other Englishmen taken here at Fernihirst: but they excused the matter by the euill dealyngs of the Englishmen to the wardes before that time.

Monsieur de Desse returnyng to Jedworth ayded by the furtherance & counsell of the Scots ceassed not in occasions of aduantage to attẽpt newe enterpryses agaynst the Englishmen, as time and opportunitie serued, and among other exployctes the castell of Cornewall an old house buylte after the auncient maner of fortifyng was taken by the Frenchmen, and spoyled of al things worth the bearyng away. The castel of Cornewall wonne.

Also Capitayne Cobios a Frenchman hauing a bande of fiftie light horsemen Scottes serupng vnder him, one night had a fayre hande against a number of English horsemen, whom he charged so on the sudden, as he saw them out of order, that he easily discomfited them, & toke mo prysoners (whom he brought to Jedworth) than he had persons in his company to assayle them. Capitaine Cobios.

Monsieur de la Chapell de Biron, was sent forth by Monsieur de Desse, with the company of horsemen that belonged to Monsieur de Etauges then prysoner, and fiue hundred footemẽ beside Scottes, to make a roade into England, whiche enterprise hee atchieued in brennyng townes and villages, and returned without any great losse sustayned at that time. A roade made by Monsieur de la chapelle de Biron.

Within twoo dayes after his returne to Jedworth, Monsieur de Desse dislodged frõ thence, and taking with him foure fielde peeces and all his men of warre, entred into Englande, toke the castell of Fourd, and brent it with ten small villages in the coũtrey thereabout, situate within halfe a myle eche of other. There was one tower yet parcell of that castel of Fourd, which was kepte by Thomas Car, so that the French men could not winne it, for they had no time to stay long about it, remouing that night ouer the water, and encamped there within the Scottish grounde. An other made by Mõsieur de Desse. Fourd castell wonne. Thomas Car.

As the Scots and Frenchmen executed these enterprises, they were coasted by certayne light horsemen, but neuertheless the Frenchmen returned in safetie to Jedworth, hauyng sore endomaged the Englishe borderers by that roade, in so much as it was thought the Scots (which were with them at that roade) gayned at that time, by pillage and bowties to the valew of .ix. thousand crownes. Scottes gayne by spoyle.

The Englishmenne sore agreeued, that the Frenchmen lyng thus in Jedworth, shoulde in such wise addresse one enterprice after an other against them, so greatly to theyr annoyance, assembled a power togither at Roxburgh, purposing to haue assayled the Frenchmen in theyr campe at Jedworth: but Monsieur de Desse hauyng warning thereof, departed from thence first to Melrose, and after further off within the countrey, fearing to be constreyned to giue bataile Monsieur de Desse fleeth out of Jedworth, for feare of the Englishmen.

tayle, whiche he coulde not haue done without manifest losse of his feeble army, hauyng not past xv. hundreth fotemen, and fiue hundred horsemē able to haue done seruice: for such was the miserie whiche they had in maner continually sustayned through want of vitayles, and other necessary helps duryng the time of their encamping at Jedworth, that what through sickenes and hurtes receyued in assaultes and skirmishes, no smal number of them were dead, and many other so feeble, that they were not able to ayde themselfes, in so much that now being got out of daunger, they thought themselues happily escaped.

The miserable state of the Frenchmen in Scotland.

Shortly after, in the beginning of the sōmer, the Englishmen armed a. xxv. sayle of men of warre, the which arriuing at the Basse, neare to the mouth of the Fourth, assayed by fayre and pleasant wordes to haue perswaded the keepers of the castell there standing on the height of a great rocke to haue yelded the place into theyr hands, but perceyuing their perswasions would not be regarded, they toke their course vp into the Fourth, & finding in their way. iiij. shippes of Frenchmen & Scottes, seased vpon them as a wished pray, & the morrow next ensewyng at the very breake of day they came before Leith, & saluting the towne with Canō shot, remayned there at ancre. x. or. xij. dayes, in which meane while they landed their people at Inskith, and beganne to fortifie with all diligence, but before the place coulde be put in any strength, the ships departed frō thence backe towards the sea, & left in the yland iiij. enseignes of Englishmē, & one enseigne of Italians to defende the pioners and the Iland against the Scots and Frenchmen, if they should attempt to assayle them.

Inskith fortified by the englishmen.

After the English nauie was thus departed, Monsieur de Desse & the Queene mother being at Edenburgh, determined with all diligence to employ all suche forces as they might make about the recouering of the yle before the fortifications begonne by the Englishmen should be brought to any perfection.

Herebyō Monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron enbarqued in the Galley of Monsieur de Villegaignon, rowed forth to view the maner of the Englishmens dealing within the Ile, whiche he did in such effectuous wise, that approchyng within Harquebuse shot, he brought knowledge with him not only of the state & whole circumstances of their buyldings, but also of the perfect number of their ensignes, & the qualitie of the mē of warre that serued vnder the same. At that present also Mōsieur de Thermes lately before arriued at Dunbrytane with an hundred men of armes, & ij. hundred light horsemen after the maner of Fraunce, & one thousand fotemē was come to the Queene, busie nowe to further this enterprise. She had got togither within Leith haue all the boates that belōged to al the creekes and hauens of the Fourth, so that on thursday after Trinitie sonday euery thing beyng prepared ready for the purpose, in the morning by the breake of day the Queene was come to Leith to see the embarquing of the men of warre appoynted that day to trie what successe fortune would sende them.

The dilig of the Scot Queene.

There was no diligence wanting, neither among the Scottes nor Frenchmen to bestowe themselfes aborde, & the cōfortable wordes of ỳ Queene greatly encouraged thē thereto beholding them, & deuising with Mōsieur de Desse & the other capitaynes til they were al set forward.

The forwardnesse of the souldiers.

Villegaignon with his galleys passed on before to keepe the Englishmē occupied, so as they should not perceyue the Frenchmens meaning: but they discouering the vessels at their settyng forth, conceyued streightwayes what was intended, & therupon prepared to keepe the enimies off from landing, so that vpon the Frenchmens approche, they saluted them with arrowes and Harquebuzeshot very hotely: at length yet by fine force the Scots and Frenchmen got a land, and drout the Englishmen and Italians backe frō the sea stronde vp to the higher grounde, where they stode at defense on a plompe togither, doyng their best to defende the place agaynst the assaylantes: but finally their generall named Cotton, being slaine with George Applebie Esquyer a Capitayne of an enseigne of fotemen sent forth of Derbyshire, & one Gaspar Pizoni, that was capitaine of the Italians beside diuers other gentlemen and the most principall men of warre and souldiers among them: the residue were cōstreyned to retyre vnto a corner or point of the Iland, where they were taken without further resistāce, although before they had made right stoute defense, hurte & slayne diuers Scots & Frenchmen, both at their landyng, & also after they were entred on lande. Among other Mōsieur de la chapelle de Biron was strikē through the hand with an harquebuzeshot, and his burguenet beaten so into his head, that his frendes that were about him, were fayne to conuey him into one of the Galleys to be dressed of his hurtes by a Chirurgian. Also a Gentleman named Delbozies, whiche bare the sayde Monsieur de la Chapelle, his Coronell enseigne was slayne with a pike by the hands of the forenamed Cotton the English generall.

Inskith is recouered out the French

Thus was Inskith recouered out of the Englishmens hands, after it had bene in their possession by the space of. xvij. dayes, the more to the highe contentation of Monsieur de Desse, for that the same time he stode vpon his discharge and returne into Fraunce, beyng appoynted to surrender vp his place to Mõsieur de Thermes, lately before arriued (as ye haue heard) with cõmission to receiue the same. So that Monsieur de Desse to ende his charge with the glory of this atchieued enterpryse, esteemed it muche to stande with his honour.

and

Shortly after he returned into Fraunce with the Galleys, and Monsieur de Thermes succeeded in his place for the generall conduct of the French army in Scotland. Who by the aduise of the gouernour and other of the Scottish lords determined with a siege volant to keepe the Englishmen in Hadington from vitayles and all other relefe. First therefore after that Desse was departed towardes Fraunce, Monsieur de Thermes with his Frenchmẽ and some Scots encamped at Abirladie, where they beganne the fundation of a forte, so to impeach the Englishmen from setting a lande any victuals there, to be conueyed from thence to Hadington as before they had done.

In this meane tyme the Englishmen had increased theyr nũbers of Almaignes and other straungers, and not onely furnished their fortes with new supplies of men, but also had an army in the fieldes whiche lay most an ende at Dunglas, and one while besieged Hume castell, but after they sawe themselues disappointed of the meane, whereby they supposed to haue recouered it, they reysed from thence and spoyled the most parte of Tiuidale and other the Marches thereabout, in reuenge as they alledged, of the disloyaltie and breache of promise proued in the assured Scottes. Generall of this army was the Erle of Rutland, Lieutenant at that present of the North partes, a noble man right valiaunt, wise, well aduised, and stayed in his dealings, very honorable & courteous in al his demeanor. He was accompanied with Capitaynes of good estimatiõ and approued prowes, as sir Richard Maners, sir Frauncis Leake, sir John Sauage, sir Thomas Holcroft, sir Oswald Wulstroppe and others. He so behaued himselfe in that daungerous time of the vprores and rebellious commotions of the commõs, through the more parte of the realme of Englande, that although the appoynted forces agaynst Scotlande were stayed, and turned to the suppression of the rebelles, to the encouragement no doubte both of Scottes and Frenchmen in Scotland, yet they were so fronted and kept in awe by that army vnder the sayde Erle of Rutland, that they rather lost than gayned in this season at the Englishmens handes.

At one tyme the same army vnder the conduct of the sayde Erle, passing forth with a conuoy of vitayles vnto Hadington, came so suddenly vpon the Frenchmen where they lay in campe, that whether through defaulte of theyr skowtes or other negligence vsed by them, or through the great diligence and prouident forewardnesse shewed by the Englishmẽ, the Frẽch men were in suche hazarde to haue bene vtterly distressed, that if the Englishmen had not doubted more than by many was thought needefull, they might haue ouerthrowen, taken and slaine the Frenchmen, as was supposed at theyr pleasure. But the Englishmen at theyr first comming in sight of them (as it stoode with the reason of warre, sith by aduenturyng rashly oftentimes in such cases to late repentance easily ensueth) stayed, the better to cõceyue of that which they had to do: whereby the Frenchmenne had leasure to marche their wayes a mayne pace, till they were got out of daunger: for after they ones beheld the troupes of the English horsemẽ almost at their elbowes, and herewith the battayle of the Almaignes suddenly appearyng on the hill toppe ready to come downe vpon them, it was no neede to bidde them packe away.

The French men in danger to haue bene distressed.

The French men retire.

The Scottes light horsemen commyng on the backe of the English army, perceyued where the Almaignes (to make them ready to giue battayle) had throwen of their clokes and lefte the same with all other their baggage and stuffe whiche they had aboute them in the keepyng of none, but of their women and boyes, whereupon those Scottes horsemen not minding to suffer such a pray to escape theyr handes came galloppyng in, and toke all the beste stuffe they coulde lay holde vpon, and returned in safetie before any enimy might come backe to the reskew.

The baggage of the English lanſquenetz spoyled by the Scottish horsmen.

The Almaignes were in no small chaufe for the losse of their garments and other necessaries, but there was no helpe then to seeke remedy in that behalfe, for the Scottes were withdrawen, and got quite out of daunger.

The English army after that the Frenchmen were thus fledde and gone, passed forth to Hadington with their cariages laden with vitailes, to the great comforte of them within that fortresse, standing in great necessitie before this cõuoye came. This summer also and a litle before the victellyng thus of Hadington, vpon knowledge had that Iulian Romero with his bande of Spaniardes, wherof he was Captaine seruyng the king of Englande, was lodged in Coldingham a fyue miles distant frõ Berwike, certaine bandes of Almaignes and Frenchmen came thither vpon the sudde, and surprising the Spanyardes before they were aware of theyr approche, set vpon them in their lodgings, toke and slew in maner the whole number of them. Moreouer about the same time Fast castel was recouered by a trayne out of the Englishmens handes handes, certayne Scottishmen fayning themselues to bryng prouision of victayles to them that kepte it, and getting entrie within the gate, first slewe the porters that warded at the gate, and after assayling the other within the house, slew the most parte of them, & toke the residue, obteyning thereby possession of the Castell.

Things passing in this wise in Scotland in ý sommer of this yeare. 1549. the Englishmē were not onely in the meane time sore troubled with commotions raysed by the commons of that realme, but also with the warres which the Frenche king made agaynst them, within the countrey of Boullongnoys, so that they had not meane to imploy their forces against Scotland as they had determined to haue done, as partely before and more largely in the hystory of England is mentioned, by reason whereof, anone after Michaelmas they gaue ouer ý keeping of Hadingtō, & rasing their fortificatiōs there, they returned into England to the great reioysing of the inhabitantes of Louthian, to whome that towne had giuen occasion of greate troubles & calamities. Vpon the giuing ouer thus of Hadington, the Gouernour & the Queene Dowager were aduanced, in hope to recouer againe al that the Englishmē helde within the boundes of Scotland, but first it was thought good to assay the winning of Broghtie Crag, for it sounded (as was thought) greatly to the diminishing of the estimation, aswell of the Scots as Frenchmen, that the Englishmen should keepe sote so farre within the realme, in dispite of their whole puyssance.

Herevpon Monsieur de Thermes about Cādelmas, hauing all things in a readinesse for the siege, came thither, and did so much, what with shot of Canon, to make batterie, & other meanes of enforcements, that giuing the assault both with Scots & Frenchmen, they entred the forte the .xx. of Februarye by fine force, so that al those within were eyther taken or slayne, whereupon those Englishmen also that kept the castel, rendred vp the same without further resistance, amongst other prysoners sir John Luttrell the Capitayne was one.

Broughty crag wonne by the Frenchmen.

In this meane time there were certayne cōmissioners appointed betwixt the two kings of England and Fraunce to commune of a peace, but bicause they continued long in their treatie ere they could agree, the Scots and Frenchmen surceassed not in occasions of aduantage to pursue the warre, so that comming before Lowder they besieged that fortresse, & skirmishing with the Englishmen that issued forth, to encounter them, droue thē in at the gates with some losse on either parte, and this done, the French helde them within so straytly besieged, that if the peace had not ben the sooner cōcluded, sir Hugh Willoughby capitayne of that forte, muste needes haue yeelded through lacke of shotte, & other necessary things seruing for defence: whiche were spent so, that they were constrayned to vse theyr pewter vessell in steede of bullets. But as it fortuned, a peace was accorded, passed & confirmed, that very selfe time betwixte the twoo kings of England & Fraunce, through the diligent & orderly trauell of the Cōmissioners appoynted to deale therein, whose names ensue: first for ý king of England, the right honorable John Erle of Bedford, knight of the Garter, and Lorde priuy seale: Williā Paget lord of Beaudesert, knight also of the Garter: sir William Peter knight, chief secretary to the sayd king: & sir John Mason knight, secretary to him for ý French tong. For the French king were appoynted Frances de Montmorance, Lord of Rochepot, knight of the order of S. Michael, and Lieutenant for the same king of Picardie, in absence of Monsieur de Vandosme: Gaspar de Colignie, Lorde of Chastillon, knight also of the order, and Capitayne generall of the footemen of Fraunce, & the sayde kings Lieutenant generall in the countie of Bullongne: Andrew Guillard lord of Myrtier, knight also of the order, and one of the same kings priuy Counsell: & Guillaume Bouchetell lord of Sally, knight likewise of the order, and Secretary of the estate of the finances.

Among other articles cōprised in this peace, it was couenanted, that all such fortes, castels & places as the Englishmē held in any part within the Scottish dominions, shoulde be deliuered & restored to the Scots: & that the fortes of Dūglas, Rorburgh, and Aymouth, which the Englishmen had buylte & reysed out of the groūde, should be rased and throwen downe, to auoyde all occasions of new controuersies, that might growe by reason of keeping or defending the same, so as the peace nowe concluded, might in all poynts be firmely and truly kept & obserued, aswell betwixt England and Scotland, as England & Fraunce, and betwixt all and euery the subiectes of the same realmes, bothe by sea & lande. Monsieur de Mourret was sente into Scotland with the copie of this peace, by whose meanes it was proclaymed anone after Easter about the beginning of Aprill, and euery thing vsed and ordered according to the articles of the agreement concluded.

Moreouer the Marques de Maine, after Duke Dammalle cõmyng ouer into England about the same time for an hostage, passed afterwardes through the realme into Scotland, to visite his sister Queene Dowarier, and shortly after returned. They mourned both for the death of theyr father Claude de Lorayne, ỹ first Duke of Guyse, who deceassed the .xviij. of Aprill this present yeare 1550.

In Septẽber following, the queene Dowarier accompanied with the Earles of Huntley, Cassils, Marshall, & Southerlande, and diuers other of the Scottish nobilitie toke the sea, and sayling to Fraunce landed at Dieppe: she was conueyed thither by the Prior of Capoa, Leone Strozzi, sent and appointed with .vj. Galeys to haue the conduction of hir. From Dieppe she remoued to Rowen, where the king then lay, of whome shee was right courteously receyued. The master of Erskin, & master Henry Sinclar Deane of Glasgow sayled into Flaũders, where they passed & confirmed a peace betwixt Scotlande and the lowe countreys. After that the Queene Dowarier had remayned aboute a. xij. monethes or more in Fraunce, this yeare in Octobre, she returned homewardes to passe thorow Englãd: she landed at Portesmouth, and the second of Nouẽber she came frõ Hampton courte by water, and landed at Powles wharfe in the after noone, and from thence roade to the Bishop of Lõdons palace by Paules, and there lodged. The .iiij. of Nouember she roade in hir charet to the kings palace of the white Hall, accõpanied with the Ladie Margaret Dowglas, the three Dutchesses of Suffolke, Richmont, & Northumberland, & diuers other great Ladies & Gentlewomen both Scots and English. At the courte gate the Dukes of Northumberland and Suffolke, & the Lord Threasorer were ready to receyue hyr, and at hir entring into the Hall, the king stood in the vpper ende therof, & the Erle of Warwike holding the sworde before him. She at hyr approching to him, kneeled downe, & he courteously toke hir vp, kissed hir, & taking hyr by the hand, ledde hir vp into his owne chamber of presence, & after into the Queenes chamber of presence, where he kissed al the Ladies of Scotlande, & so departed for a while. She dined on the Queenes side that day with the King, his seruice & hirs cõming both togither, the kings being placed on the right hande of the table, and hyrs on ỹ left. What plẽty of all maner of costly meates and drinkes there was, & what riche furniture of plate & all other things was shewed to set forth the feast it wer superfluous to write. All the Ladies both of England and Scotland dined in the Queenes great chamber. After diner the king shewed hyr his Galerie and gardens, with all other commodities of the place. And about foure of the clocke he brought hyr downe agayne by the hand into the Hall, where he first receyued hir, & there kissing hir, she toke hir leaue & returned to the Bishops palayce frõ whence she came. The .vj. of Nouẽber she departed towardes Scotlande, riding frõ Poules through the citie, passing forth at Bishops gate. The Duke of Northumberlande, the Earle of Pembroke, & the Lord Threasorer brought hir to Shoredich church, & there toke their leaues of hir. The Duke of Northũberland had an. 100. men on horsebacke with Jauelins, whereof .xl. were gẽtlemen clad in blacke velnet coates, garded w̃ white, & hattes of blacke velues with white feathers, & chaynes of gold about their neckes. The erle of Pẽbroke had .vj. score men well apointed also, with blacke Jauelins & hattes with fethers, & the Lord Threasorer had an. 100. gentlemẽ & Yemen with Jauelins, in like maner wel apparelled: which three companies of horsemen furnished the streetes on either side, frõ the crosse in Cheap, to Birchẽ lane end as she passed ỹ way. The Sherifes of Londõ had the conduction of hir to Walthã towne end, where she lodged that night: & in euery shire through which she passed ỹ Sherife with the gentlemẽ of the same shyre receiued hir, & gaue their attendãce on hir, till she came to enter into the next shire, where ỹ Sherife & gentlemen there, receyued hir, & that order was obserued till she came to the borders of Scotland, & al hir charges for meate, & drinkes, aswell for hir selfe, and whole trayne, as also the prouision for theyr horses, was borne & allowed by the King. The erle of Huntley & diuers other of the Scottish Lordes returned home by sea, the sayde Earle landing at Montros, aboute the later ende of December.

Doctor Wanthope a Scottishman borne, Archbishoppe of Armachane, so nominated by Pope Paule the thirde, and after created Legatus à latere, by Julius the thirde, deceassed this yeere in Paris the .x. of Nouember. This man was blynde from his infancie, but yet gaue himselfe so vnto studie, that he was first made Doctor of Diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris, and after attayned to such estimation in the court of Rome, that he was by the forsayde Popes aduaunced as before ye haue heard.

In this iourney the Queene secretly trauayled with the Lordes, bothe spirituall and temporall, to haue their consentes to be regent of Scotland, immediatly after hir doughter the Queene came to sufficient yeres, and that the time of hyr Tutorishyp were accomplished, or sooner if the lawes of the realme would so permitte: and to assure hir selfe of their good willes in this behalfe, she contracted sundry priuy bandes with the, making large promises of great rewardes vnto euery of them.

The Queene mother seketh to be gouernour.

To conclude, this matter was so handled by hir & others to whom she committed the doings therein, that in the yeare following the Gouernour agreed to surrender vp the gouernance into hyr handes, hyr doughter the young Queene beyng not yet full. xij. yeares of age. The Gouernour was promised not only a full discharge and a quietus est of al his doynges, aswell for receipt of money, iewels, and other things duryng the time of his gouernment, but also a confirmation of the heritable gifte of the Dukedome of Chatelerault, likewise an other confirmation of all giftes and restitutions by him made, during the time he had exercised the office of Gouernour. And forthwith the Queene Dowarier sent into Fraunce to get all these things dispatched with suche assurances of writyngs vnder hands and seales as was expedient, & to be sent home into Scotlād for his securitie in al things.

1553. The gouernment is resigned vnto the Queene.

This yeare the sixte of July Edwarde the sixte of that name kyng of Englande departed this life, and after him succeeded his sister Marie, eldest doughter to King Henry the. viij.

Edenburgh castell deliuered to the Lorde Erskin to kepe

The Lordes then assemblyng in Parliament at Edenburgh on the sayde twelfth day of Aprill, all the couenants of agreement had and made betwixte the Queene Dowarier and the Gouernour, were presented and redde, touching the dimissiō and giuing ouer of the Gouernours authoritie confirmed by the Queene hir selfe in Fraunce, with consent of the King of Fraunce hir husband, the Duke of Guyse, and the Cardinall of Lorayne hir curators, with a gifte of the Dukedome of Chatelerault vnto the Gouernour, vnder the greate seales of Fraunce, and others to whom it appertayned. After this there was redde a confirmation of the three estates of Scotland touching the premisses, in which they bound themselues to warrant the Queenes discharge made to him, & to establish him as secōd person of the realme, with other things conteyned in the contract, to the whiche there in open Parliament all the estates subscribed & put thervnto their seales: whiche done, the Gouernour gaue vp his office of Tutorishyp, in presence of the sayd estates, the Queene mother, & Mōsieur Doysell beyng there present, who receyued the same in the Queenes name at that time remayning in Fraunce: and herewith presently was a cōmission shewed, ginē by the Queene of Scotlande in Fraunce with consent of hir curators, making the Queene Dowarier hir mother, regent of hir realme, whiche office she toke vpon hir, & was thereto admitted by the estates of the realme. Then was the Parliament newly authorized in the Queenes name, with consent of hir curators, & in name of the Queene regēt.

The gouernour resigneth his office vnto the Queene.

The Queene grueth the gouernāce of the realme vnto the Queene mother.

The Queene regent sent the Erle of Huntley to ỳ Hie lād, to take John Mwdyeart, who returned without him, wherupon Huntley was called before the Queene, & Counsayle, & put in warde in the castell of Edenburgh, the. xj. day of Octobre. The Queene chaunged al the officers, & made the Earle of Cassels threasorer, and Ueilmort a Frenchman cōtroller: also an other Frenchman called Mosieur Rubie, keeper of the great seale, in place of the Erle of Huntley, who was Chauncellour and then in warde. These twoo mens counsell and Monsieur Doysels she vsed principally in al things. The Earle of Huntley to be deliuered out of warde, renounced his title to ỳ Erledome of Murrey, wherof he had a gift in heritage. Also he renoūced his interest to the fermes of Orkney & Shetland, & to the Erledome to Mar, & of the queenes lādes of Straits Dic. And further was cōtented to go ouer into Fraūce, there to remaine for ỳ space of. v. yeres. Inuernes afozesayd, & after at Elgine, Bamfe, Aberden, and Saint Johns towne.

In the meane time there were sent commissioners to the bozders, as the Bishop of Dunblane, the Lard of Lethyngton, and master James Macgill, where Doctoz Tunstall Bishop of Duresme, and certayne others foz England mette them, and remayned there till the Queenes cõming backe fozth of the Nozth in September following.

This yere was a Parliament holdẽ in which the Lardes of Bzimston, Dzmiston, & Grange, with M. Henry Balnaues & others, which were fozfalted in the gouernours time, were restozed. The same time the Queene by counsel of Mõsieur Doysell, & Rubie, and certaine of the nobilitie of Scotland, requested, that a newe ozder might be made, whereby euery mans substance should be put in an inuentozie, and accozding to the rate thereof to pay an yearely taxation to be put and kept in the treasure house til warres began, and that theñ men of warre might be waged therewith to lie vpon the bozders, & none in that case to be charged to come from their owne houses, but when any great army came fozth of England to inuade Scotlande. Diuers of the great Lozds were agreed to this ordinance, but the most part of the Barons hearyng thereof, assembled togither in Edenburgh, to the nũber of two hundzed and aboue, & sent the Lardes of Calder in Louthian, and of Wemis in Fife, to the Queene and Lozdes, beseching them not to set suche newe taxations vpon them, foz they could not beare such burdens, but would defend the realme as befoze time their elders had done, not meanyng to put their goodes in inuentozie, as if they should already make their laste will & testaments: & so by this meanes that deuise was dashed to the griefe of the inuentozs.

This yeare in July the Queene sent foz the Lozdes to cõmune with them at New bottell, where she opened to thẽ diuers wzongs done on the bozders by Englishmen, & how no redzesse could be got, wherfoze she required that warres might be moued agaynst Englãd in reuenge of those iniuries, although the Bishop of Dzkeney was ỳ same time at Carleill in talke with Cutbert Tunstal bishop of Duresme & others, commissioners foz Englãd. The principall cause ỳ moued the M. Regent to seeke to make warre against England, was foz that the Englishmẽ ayded ỳ Emperour in fauour of his sonne king Philip agaynst the French king, bycause their Queene had taken to husbande the same King Philip, & sent the Erle of Pembzoke ouer with an army to ioyne with king Philips power. It was thought therfoze, that if the Scots inuaded the English bozdures, it might cause thẽ to call backe their powre fozth of Fraunce to defende their owne countrey. But the Scottish Lozdes woulde not consent in any wise to beginne any warres: whiche their dealing when Monsieur Doysell perceyued, he speedely went vnto Haymouth beside Berwike, & fozthwith the same with all diligence, making inuasions into England: wherupõ the Scottishmen in their owne defence were constreyned to make warre, & the Earle of Hũtley was made Lieutenãt vpõ the bozdures, who came thither, and remayning there by assistãce of the Frenchmẽ, made sundzy inuasions & roades into England, bzent diuers townes and villages, & cast down many stone houses, pyles, & strengths. In this meane while were the Scottish commissioners at Carleill, and the Maister of Marwell Warden of the west bozdures, beyng there with them, with much a do got away and came home into Scotlãd. The Queene assembled a great army out of al parts of the realme, the whiche came fozward to Kelso in the moneth of October, where the Queene and Frẽchmen perswaded them to entre by inuasion into England, but they meaning to take further aduise, passed ouer Tweede to Marwell hughe, where they encamped, & afterwardes approched the castell of Warke, enuironing the same with a siege foz the space of twoo oz thzee dayes. Capitayne Read at that present had charge of that castell, with thzee oz foure hundzed sowtemen, & one hundzed hozsemen, seemyng to care litle foz the Scottishmens fozces.

The Erle of Westmerlãd being then Lieutenant of the Nozth partes, gathered such power togither as he might make, & came to Lowike accompanied with the Lozde Talbot, sir James Crostes, & others to succour where moste neede should appeare. The Scottishe army perceyuing the Englishmen thus in a readinesse to resiste theyz attempts, toke aduise togither, and concluded that it was not foz the weale of the realme, at that tyme to hazarde battell fozth of the boundes of theyz owne lande, theyz Pzinces beyng absent and as yet in hir minozitie, considering also that the warre was not taken in hãd foz their owne quarell, but foz the pleasure of Fraunce. These and other the lyke reasons beyng alledged by the Earles of Arrane, Huntley, Argile, Cassilles, and other, to the Queene and French Capitaynes, they were nothing satisfied therewith, but the Scottishe Lozdes woulde attempte no further, but retyred backe and skaled their army. In remouing from Warke, they were pursued by certayne bandes of the bozdurers and others, which were repulsed and stode in daunger to haue bene distressed, if Capitayne Read had not with noble courage issued fozth, and in tyme relieued them that were retiring, whereby they stayed and gaue a new charge, in suche sorte as the Scottes were beaten backe agayne and chased ouer the water to theyr mayne armie that was already passed ouer. The Queene and Monsieur Doysell perceyuing that they coulde not get the Scottishe Lordes to make any further exployte at that present, she retired home, but Doysell with his Frenchymen were appoynted to remayne still in Haymouth to contergarrison the Englishmen within Berwike. There were diuers sote bãds of Scottes waged by the French King, whiche were appoynted to lie in places aboute the bordures, as at Kelse, Rockelburgh, and suche like for defence of the countrey, and the annoyance of the Englishmen as occasions might serue.

After this, Sir Andrewe Car and diuers other entred Englande with a power of men about Martilmas, but the Earle of Northumberlande beyng then Lieutenant of the North partes of Englande, and lying on the bordures assembled his forces togither, and commyng to encounter the Scottes on the very bordure side neare to Cheuiot, at the first the Englishmenne were put to the worse, but yet at lengthe the Scottes were ouerthrowen, and chased Sir Andrew Car and many other beyng taken prysoners. Sir John Forster bare himselfe very valiantly at this encoũtre, so that his seruice might not well haue bene spared. He was thrust thorow the mouth into the necke, and also through the thigh. Moreouer his horse was slayne vnder him. The conflict was sharpe, for both the horsemen and sotemen came to make proufe of theyr forces. The warre thus being begonne and followed, the Scottes kept theyr quarterage, and euery noble man as hee was appoynted, lay on the bordures with a thousand horsemen, during his ordinary terme, & on the other side the English bordures were furnished with new supplies of mẽ of warre, so that there were dayly roades and incursions made by the parties, to the greate domage and spoyle of the townes & billages situate neare to the confines of bothe the realmes.

1558. A Parliament

In December the Queene assembled a Parliament at Edenburgh, where by consent of the whole estates, there were elected and chosen James Beton Archbishop of Glasquo, Robert Read bishop of Orkney, George Lesley Earle of Rothes, Gilbert Kenedy Earle of Cassels, James Steward prior of S. Androwes, George Lord Seaton, James Flemmyng, and John Erskin Lard of Dun, Ambassadours and commissioners to go into Fraunce, and there to contract mariage, betwixte Marie queene of Scotlande, and Fraunces Dolphyn of Fraunce, and to solempnise the same mariage. Whereupon sufficient commissions and instrumentes were made to them by the estates of the Parliamẽt, & they accepting the same, made preparatiõ for ỹ iourney, and departed in the moneth of February forth of the roade of Leith, and with greate windes and boysterous stormes, came into Fraunce, losing in theyr iourney one of theyr shippes, with men and horses before S. Ebbes head in the North of Scotlande, and an other with great riches and many Gentlemen, with the Capitayne called Waterton in the roade of Bullongne. The Ambassadours themselues neuertheless escaped, and commyng safe vnto the French courte in the moneth of March were honorably receiued of the King at Paris, where the contract of mariage was made, and three score thousand Frankes assigned in Dower to ỹ Queene of Scotland, s. xxx. thousand Frankes of yearely pension with many riche Iewels.

There was also a perpetuall bande of league concluded betwixte Fraunce and Scotlande, and greate preparation made for the mariage, whiche was solemnised in Paris with greate triumphe and assistaunce of all the Cardinals, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Lordes, and Bishops of the realme in the Churche of Nostre dame, the xviij. of April in the present yeare, 1558.

But now to leaue this triumphant Mariage, and the Scottishe Lordes Ambassadours there in Fraunce for a tyme, we will returne to shewe what happened betwixt the Scottes and Englishmen at home where the warres were pursued to the losse or litle gayne of both partes.

About Whitsontyde sir Henry Percy with diuers bandes of the countrey garnisons, and sir George Bowes then Marshall of Berwike, with sundry bandes of the garnison of that towne passed forth into Scotland, they beyng in all aboute a. viij. or. viij. hundred horsemen, & two thousand sotemen. They brent the townes of Duns and Langton, & hauing got togither a great number of cattell returned homewardes.

Ambassadours sẽt into Fraũce to cõsummate the mariage betwixte the Queene of Scotlande, and the Dolphin of Fraunce.

The

The Scots that lay in Kelso and other places keeping their quarterrage on the boroures, (for the realme as ye haue heard was quartered, euery parte keepyng theyr turne as the maner is) assembled togither to the number of two thousande horsemen or fewe lesse, and three bandes of footemen, hasting forth to defende the countrey. And perceyuing where the Englishmen were, followed and coasted them as they returned with theyr bootie, till they came to Swinton, where they ouertoke them, and skirmished with them sharpely as they were passing through the towne.

The Scottishe footemen beate backe parte of the Englishmens shotte into theyr battell, and preassed very forewarde in hope to be assisted by their horsemen, the whiche (as ye haue heard) outmatched greatly, the English horsemen in number, but the sight growyng somewhat hote, and the more to the disaduantage of the Englishmenne, for sonuche as their shotte and powder beganne to fayle them, by reason the misty morning had made muche of theyr powder dankishe, so that they coulde haue no vse thereof. But herewith sir Henry Lee, capitaine Read and others, beyng in the battell, behaued themselues very stoutly, causing the footemen to stay, and boldly to abide the chiny, and herewith procured the horsemē to giue a charge in such conuenient time, as if the same had bene protracted, it might haue turned very euill to the English side: but now as well the horsemen, as footemen playing theyr partes, the Scottishe horsemen abidyng without the towne in troupe whilest their footemen were in skirmishe stode away, leauyng theyr footemen to be slayne and spoyled of the Englishmen, and yet those footemen fought it out right manfully, so that if the Scottes horsemen had done their partes so well as the footemen, it was likely to haue gone harder on the English side than it did. But now the Scottishe horsemen entring not the fight, theyr footemen were enclosed by the Englishmen, for those that were in the forewarde and were passed by, returned, and commyng behind theyr enimies, holpe to beate them downe, so that fewe or none of the Scottes or Frenchmen (whereof there were some fewe amongst them) escaped, but were eyther taken or slaine.

Amongst others, capitayne Cullane, and capitayne Kenedie two chiefe leaders of the footemen were taken: diuers of theyr horsemen also in the retire were taken, amongst whome the Lorde Keith, sonne to the Earle Marshall of Scotland was the chiefest. But this victorie was not atchieued without losse of diuers Englishmenne. Amongst other one Pel, enseigne bearer to sir John Markhams bande of footemē was slayne. Also master Edrington a capitayne of light horsemen, was taken prysoner by the Lard of Edmonston at the first charge giuen vpon the Scottish horsemen, and led away without reskue. M. Edrington taken.

Beside the manfull prowes of Sir Henry Percy, and other the English capitaynes before mencioned, the forwarde valiancie shewed that day of sir William Brereton, and Thomas Markham, that led his father Sir John Markhams bande of footemen, also of Rause Ellerkar a Capitayne of horsemen, is not to be forgotten, who with diuers other Capitaynes and Souldiers behaued themselues in such wise at that present seruice, as theyr dealings therin deserue speciall memory. Sir William Brereton.

Moreouer at an other tyme the Scottes and Frenchmenne entryng into England, the Scottishe horsemenne to the number of a thousande or there aboutes, passed forth to brenne and forray the countrey, but the Earle of Northumberlande, and his brother Sir Henry Percy, assembled togither a power of horsemenne, and Sir Henry Percy meetyng with them at Grendon, set vpon the Scottes and chased them ouer the water of Twisell, vnto the forte battayle of the Frenchmenne, who retyring to the riuer of Tweede, passed ouer the same at Chapell Fourde, where they were assayled bothe by certayne forte bandes of the garnison of Berwyke, that were come forth to ayde the Earle, and also by the Horsemenne, so as diuers were drowned in the ryuer before they coulde gette ouer, but after they were once got to the further side, they put themselues in order of battayle againe, and retired in a squadrone very strongly, susteyning litle or no hurte at all, notwithstanding that the Earle of Northumberland (beyng then come) and his brother Sir Henry Percy, with the reste of the Capitaynes and Gentlemen of the countrey, pursued them ouer the water for the space of two myles, skirmishing with them still as they marched away, but coulde do them no harme, bycause they kepte themselues in so good order, & the English footemen were not able to reache them. Whereupon the English horsemenne suffryng the Frenchmen to departe, left them, and passing into the countrey, brente Long Ednam, and diuers other Hamlettes and Villages, and so returned. The Scots put to flight at Grendon. The good order of the Frenchmen in their retire. Long Ednam brent.

Diuers Scottes that day at the ouerthrow & chase of their horsemen were taken prysoners, as the Lord Grey and others. The Lorde Grey of Scotland take prysoner.

After this the Englishmen wanne the strong pile of Caw milles, wherin were a. xvj. Frenchmen, that defended it for the time very stoutly, so that it coste the liues of diuers Englishmen Caw milles wonne by the Englishmen.

before they could take it.

Shortly after, there was a sore skirmishe at Halidon hill: for where as the most parte of the Sommer it was ordeyned that euery day certayne bandes of Souldiers shoulde warde on the same hill, to giue libertie to the inhabitantes of Berwike, to mowe and carrie in theyr haye, they continued for a tyme without any trouble offered by the Scottes or Frenche, so that the warders standyng in no doubte of the enimies, vsed out of theyr armour to shote, boule, coyte, and exercise such lyke games of pleasure, wherof the Scottes and Frenchmen beyng aduertised, came one day from Aymouth in so secrete wise, that they were drawen very neare to the Englishmen, ere they had any warning of their approche, so that before they could be gotte into order, the Scottes and Frenchmen were almost at theyr elbowes, and falling in skirmishe with them, handled them very roughly, although sir William Bereto, sir John Markham, master William Drurie, Cutbert Vawghan and other the Capitaynes of the Englishmen did behaue themselues right manfully, brynging their men in order, encouragyng them, and doyng what appertained vnto hardie and skilful warriours, but yet three tymes that day the Scots and Frenchmen put them from the heigth of the hill, till at length sir James Croft comming from Berwike, vsed suche diligence and policy in the mater, that the Scottes and French were repulsed and constreyned to retyre, withdrawing backe vnto Aymouth, after they had continued in skirmishe from one of the cloeke till it was paste foure, with no small losse on bothe partes.

A sore skirmish on Halidone hill.

After this the Earle of Bodwell lying on the bordures as Lieutenant accordyng to the order for the time of his quarterage, entred one day into England, & sent his forrey to brenne Fenton towne, keeping himselfe in ambush at Haltwel Sweyre. Sir Hery Percy aduertised that ỹ Scottes were thus entred, got togither a thousande horse, and makyng swyth to defende the countrey, set vpon the Earle at the foresayde place of Haltwell Sweyre, but some feare entring into the harts of the Englishmen, by reason of certayne shotte whiche the Scottes had there with them, fledde, and were pursued by the Scottes ouer the water of Till. There were taken aboue fyue score Englishmen, amongst whom capitayne Errington, & capitayne Car, that had the leadyng of light horsemen, were two, beside diuers other men of good accompte in seruice, as one Vaughan a Gentleman and suche lyke.

The Englishmen put to flight.

Aboute this time whylest the Lorde Evre commonly called Evers, remayned capitayne of Berwike, one Kirkaudye cousine to sir William Kirkaudye Lard of Grange, chanced to be taken prysoner into Berwike, and afterwardes beyng ransoned, at his comming home to Aymouth, he made reporte that hee had bene vsed straytly during the tyme that he remayned prysoner, at the handes of the sayde Lord Evre, by reason whereof, vpon a chalenge made by Grange to fight a combat with the Lord Evre, the mater grewe to this issue, that where their degrees were not equall, Raufe Evre brother to the Lorde Evre, vndertoke in his brothers behalf to breake a staffe with the Lard of Grange vpon the side of Halidon hill at a day appoynted, where they mette, eyther of them brynging twelue Gentlemen with them, to see the triall of this chalenge performed. But when they came to haue theyr armour and weapons hewed, the truth is so, that Grange was armed in a coate of plate, and a cuirace aloste vpon it, wherewith some faulte was founde, bycause Master Evre was cladde only in a single coate of plate, without any other peeces of armour for defence of his body: but yet suche was the great courage of the sayd Master Evre, that he would not refuse the chalenge notwithstading his aduersaries aduantage of armour. Wherevpon they rane togither, and brake both theyr staues: and as it fortuned Master Evre was hurte in the flanke.

The Lard of Grange chalengeth the Lord Evre.

The Lard of Grange, and master Rauf Evre runne against one another.

The warre beyng thus pursued betwirte Englande and Scotland, beside the encounters and roades whiche are before mencioned, there were two great roades made into Scotlande, the one by the Earle of Westmerlande, and the other by the Earle of Northũberland, the Lord Talbot beyng there, and hauing the leadyng of certaine Demilãces. Moreouer it was thought good by the Englishmenne, not onely to annoy the Scottes by lande but also by sea: wherevpõ sir John Clere with certayne shippes of warre sayled forth alongst the coaste, till at length he arriued at the Iles of Orkenay, where goyng a lande aboute an enterpryse, and staying longer than was requisite, he was encountred by his aduersaries, and slayne with many of his people, whiche were there a lande with him.

Sir Iohn Clere slayne in the Isle of Orke

But although the Scottes had good successe in that parte, they sustayned greate domage on the West side of the realme, by a iourney whiche the Earle of Sussex then Lorde deputie of Irelande attempted agaynst them. For the better vnderstãding wherof ye shal note, that after the Lord Clinton high Admirall of Englande had brent the towne of Cõquest in Brytaigne, there were seuen shippes of warre appoynted to passe into Irelande, as the Marie Willoughbie, the New barke, the Sacret, the Gerfaucon, saudon. and three other that were Merchantes, and appointed that yeare to serue the Queene of Englande in hir warres. There were also beside those seuen shippes of warre, two vitaylers appoynted to attende vpon them: sir Thomas Cotton was ordeined theyr Admirall, and one Southwike of Doner theyr vice Admirall. Vpon their arriuall in Yrelande the Earle of Sussex hauyng also prepared three other ships, with sufficient and necessary prouision for his iourney, imbarqued with so many souldiers as conueniently might be bestowed aborde in that fleete, contayning xij. sayle in the whole: and departyng towarde the West of Scotland, landed in a parte of the countrey called Kentyre, with as many Souldiers & Mariners as might be spared out of the shippes, leauyng them furnished with competent numbers for theyr sauegarde: and being got to land, he passed forth into the countrey, and brent two houses that belonged to Iames Maconnel chiefe Gouernour of those parties and a greate enimie to the Englishmē. He brent also diuers townes, villages, and hamlettes belongyng vnto the sayde Maconnell, with great store of corne & other things which came in theyr way. The Scottes oftentimes skirmished with the Englishmenne, but durst not aduenture to ioyne with them in battayle, they kepte so good order by the Earle of Sussex his politike and valiant conduction.

There were a sorte of Scottes gotten into a boate meanyng to haue fled, but being apprehēded by ẏ Englishmē, they were executed. Finally after the Earle had remayned there on lande in brennyng and spoylyng the countrey for the space of three dayes, he returned to his shippes, & in safetie wente aborde agayne with his men, and making sayle to the Ile of Arrane, entred the hauen called Imalasshe, and lādyng at that place, brente the countrey, and after wente to Cumber where he likewise brent & haried that Ile. This done, he meante to haue gone vnto two other Flandes Play and Jurey, but the windes grewe so terrible with tempestes & foule weather, that they lost one of theyr shippes, and some of the rest were so rent and spoyled of their tagle and furniture, as they escaped in great hazarde of beyng caste away also. There were xxbj. Mariners drowned, the which perceyuing the shippe to be in daunger of sinkyng, fled into the boate and so perished. The other that remayned in the shippe were saued, as Maister Fraunces Randoll and others. By reason therfore of such foule weather the Earle of Sussex was constrayned to returne into Yrelande, arriuing at Cragfergus, where he landed with his Souldiers, and appoynting the ships to returne into England, he passed by land vnto Dublyn, spoyling the enimies countreys by the way, and takyng from them a greate pray and bootie of cattell, notwithstanding the paynefull passage whiche he had to make through the combresome wayes, bowgges, and woodes, without relefe of all necessarie things in that so troublesome a iourney.

Thus farre for those two yeares warre in the dayes of Marie Queene of Englande, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, whereof sith I finde none that hath written any thing at all, I haue yet sette downe these odde notes, as I haue learned the same of such as had good cause to knowe the truth thereof, beyng eye witnesses themselues of suche enterpryses and exploytes as chanced in the same warres, namely capitayne Read, capitayne Wood, capitayne Errington, and captaine Eurey, capitaine Markham, with others, whiche of their courtesie haue willingly imparted to me the reporte of diuers such things, as I wished to be resolued in, which accordingly so farre as my remembrance hath serued, I haue here deliuered, to the end the same may giue occasion to others (that may happely light vpon more full instructious) to imparte to posteritie a more perfect discourse, where otherwise the mater might peraduenture wholy passe in forgetfulnesse.

And now to returne vnto the Scottish Ambassadours that were sent into Fraunce, for the cōclusiō of the mariage betwixte their Queene & the Dolphin: after that ẏ same mariage was cōsummate, & euery thing ordered & brought to passe accordyng to the effect of theyr commission, in the moneth of August they toke their leaue of the Frenche King, the Queene, and Nobilitie there, to retourne homewardes into Scotland, albeit fewe of thē came home, for the Bishop of Orkeney departed this life in Diepe, the. xb. of September: the Earle of Rothes deceassed there the. ix. of Nouember: the Erle of Cassiles departed in the same place the. xiiij. of Nouember; and the Lorde Fleming deceassed in Paris the. xbiij. of December. And so onely the Archebishoppe of Glasqwo, the Prior of saint Andrews, and the Larde of Dun retourned into Scotland in October. After whose commyng, there was a Parliament sommoned by the Queene, to be holdē in December next.

In the meane time the Erle of Argile, & the priour of S. Andros left the Queene in Perth, & went to S. Andros, ioyning themſelfes with the other, & made reformation of the Churches, caſting downe Altars, images, houſes of frears, & Abbeys in that towne and in Cowper and other places thereabout: & aſſembling a great cõpany of coũtrey men, came to Cowper to make reſiſtance againſt the Frenchmen that were in Falkelande with the Queene. But when they ſhould haue met on Cowper Moze in battayle, the Duke of Chatellerault, the Erle Marſhal, and others laboured betwixte them, ſo that the battayle was ſtayed, and the Queene with the Frenchmen returned vnto Edenburgh.

Two armies were pacified.

The Erle of Argile, the priour of S. Andros & theyr aſſiſters came to S. Johns towne & beſieged it, till it was to thẽ ſurrendred. The Erle of Huntley was ſent to them from the Queene to treat with them of ſome accord, but he profited not. At the ſame time a certayne number of perſons of the townes of Dundee and Perth, came to the Abbey of Scone, and ſpoyling the Church, bẽt it with the moſt part of the houſe, the Erle of Argile, and the priour of S. Andros beyng with them in company. After this, they wẽt to Striueling, where they cauſed ẏ houſes of the black Friers, & gray Friers to be throwen downe. From thẽce they paſſed to Edenburgh, where the Queene hearyng of theyr comming, departed with the Frenchmenne vnto Dunbar, the Duke of Chatellerault, & the Erle of Huntley being with hyr in company.

The Erle of Argile, & his cõpany, called the Lordes of the congregation, were receyued into Edenburgh by the baylifes of the towne, where the places of the blacke & Grayfriers were ſuddenly ouerthrowen, & the Churche a Field, and Trinitie colledge, & S. Giles church were reformed, and the images and altares pulled downe. The Lordes remayning thus in Edenburgh, toke the Abbey, the coygning houſe, & the coygning yrons, and ſeaſed vpõ the Queenes moueables which they found in the Palayce, and kept the ſame.

Monſieur Doyſell and the Frenchmenne came from Dunbar to the Linkes of Leith, accompanied with the Duke of Chatelerault, the Erles of Huntley, Bothwell, Mourton, and others, and the Lordes of the Congregation came forth of the towne of Edenburgh of purpoſe to haue gyuen battayle to the Frenchmen, men, albeit they were not sufficiente partie to resist them: but the Earle of Huntley trauelled betwirte them, by whose meanes there mette twelue on euery side, who agreed vpon certaine articles, & so the Queene and Frenchmē entred into Leith, and forthwith began to fortifie it.

Shortly after this, the Duke of Chatellereault, partly through perswasion of the Earle of Arguile his sisters sonne, and the West lande Lordes, and partly because he vnderstode that his sonne the Earle of Arrane was fled forth of Fraunce to Geneua for the Religion, hee toke parte with the Lordes from that time forthe against the aduice of the Bishop of Sainte Andrewes, and diuers other his friends.

This yeare in June, Henrye the Kyng of France, at the triumph of the mariages betwixt the King of Spaine and his daughter, and the Duke of Sauoy and his sister, was wounded in Justes at the Tourneillis in Paris by the Counte Montgomerie, and dyed of the hurtes the tenth of July nexte ensuing, beeing the eleuenth day after he was wounded. Then Francis his sonne, that hadde married the Queene of Scotland, was crowned King at Sainte Denis, and annoynted at Reymes in September following.

Heerewith the Duke of Chatellereaulte, and the Lordes of the congregation, sent to the Queene, beseeching hir to leaue off from making of forts within the Realme, but she would not graunt so to doe: wherefore they assembled their whole forces in Edenburgh, and besieged the Towne of Leith in October, the Queene and Frenchmenne, with the Bishops of Sainte Andrewes, Glasquo, Dunkreys, the Lorde of Seton, and diuers other Scottishmen beeyng within it, but the Frenchmē of war issued forth of Leith, and mette neere to the Abbey of Holy Rode house, with the Scottishe Lordes and their company, where many Scottishmē were slayne, and the rest chased into Edenburgh: the Frenchmen also following them to the gates of Edenburgh, hadde entred, if those within the Castell had not shot off the artillerie at them, to stay the slaughter and pursute.

In the time of this siege, the yong Lorde of Lethington, Secretary to the Queene, beeyng with hir in Leith, left the Towne, and secretely departing, gote him to the Lordes, and holp greately afterwards to obteyne ayde forthe of England.

After this, the Queene and Frenchmē came to Edenburgh, whiche was peaceably rendred to them, where they remayned all that winter.

About the same time, the Bishop of Amiēs, Monsieur de la Broslle, and two Doctors of Diuinitie, came into Scotland in September, and La Broslle was made Leuetenaunt of the Frenche armye: Monsieur Martigues, colonell of the footemen, and with them came a greate company of Frenche Souldiers to the Queene Regent, so that then the Frenche power was thirtie fiue hundred good men of warre, beside two bands of Scottes souldiers, vnder the leading of Captayne Anthony Kenedie, & James Steward of Cardonald. The Lords of Scotlande perceyuing the Frenchmen encreased, so that they by their owne forces onely, were not able to resist them, sente to the Queene of Englande Elizabeth for assistaunce, to expell the Frenchmen, which the Queene of Englande graunted, not onely for to serue the Scottishmens turne, but specially for the suretie of hyr owne Realme and state, whiche as then was thought stode in daunger of trouble, in case the Frenchmen were suffered to remayne in Scotland, considering the euill dealing of the french King and his counsell in some pointes alreadye shewed. The Queene of England therefore sent the Duke of Northfolke to Berwike, whither came to him the Earle of Argile, the Prior of Sainte Andrewes, the Maister of Maxwell, and the yong Lorde of Ledington Secretarie, and made agreement to haue ayde of Englande, to the effect afore saide. And for sure keeping heereof, the Scottish Lords deliuered pledges into England, there to remaine during the life of the King of Fraunce, and one yeare after his decease. The pledges were these: Dauid Hamilton, sonne to the Duke of Chatellereault, an other called Campbell, Cousin to the Earle of Argile, Robert Dowglas, brother to ỳ Prior of S. Andrews, and the Lard of Lochleuin, and a sonne of the Lord Ruthuenne.

About the same tyme, James Hamilton Earle of Arraine, eldest sonne to the Duke of Chatellereault, and Captaine of the Scottishe Companie of mē of armes & archers in France, being fledde for Religion secretely to Geneua, from thence came by the conuoy of M. Randall Englishman into England, which at hys comming into Scotlande hee performed, and ioyned himselfe with the Earle of Argile, and other Lords in the cause afore sayd.

The Duke of Chatellereault, the Earles of Arguile, Arrane, and others, came to the towne of Glasquo, and caused ỳ Images and Altares to be taken downe, seising the Bishops liuing into their hands, and toke the Castell of Glasquo pertayning to the Bishoppe, and put certayne Gentlemenne into it to keepe it, whereof the Frenchmen beeing aduertised, marched forward to Glasquo, to the number of fiue thousande men, the Bishop of Glasquo, the Lordes Sempell, Seton, Ros, and diuers other wyth them, toke the Castell againe, and staying one night in the Towne, returned on the next morrowe to Kirkintulloch, and frō thence to Lithquo and Edenburgh.

After their returne from Glasquo, a certaine number of Frenchmenne went to Striueling, and passing by the bridge ouer the water of Firth, came into Fiffe, in purpose to haue gone vnto Saint Andrewes, and to haue fortified the Towne, but they being in Kingcorne, there assembled togyther in Fiffe the Earles of Arrane and Rothes, the Prior of Saint Andrewes, the Lord Ruthuen, the Maister of Lindsey, and diuers other, hauing with them no greate number, but yet they daylye skirmished with the Frenchmen, and would not suffer them to come from the Sea syde, where diuers Frenchmenne were slayne, and one of their Captaynes, with thirtie of his Souldiers, and few Scottishmen or in manner none, excepte that the Earle of Southerland, who chanced to be with them at the pricking, was sore hurt in the arme with the dredge of a calliuer shot.

Certaine Frenchemenne slaine.

As the Frenchmen were in their progresse, at the mouth of the water of Leuin in Fiffe, there arriued in their sight a nauie of Shippes, which at the first kenning, they toke to be frēch Shippes, but shortly after, perceyuing them to be the English nauie, they returned with greate diligence to Brunt Iland, where they past the ferrie of Kingcorne in boates and crayers to Leith, and instantly beganne to fortifie that Towne, casting greate trenches about it, and making great blockhouses for their defēce. The English Shippes came to the roade of Lieth, where they cast ancars the day of January.

An Englishe nauye.

The Queene Regente sente vnto the Vice Admirall of that fleete, named Maister Winter, requiring to knowe of him, for what cause hee was come into those waters, who answered, that he had bin abrode on the Seas seeking after Pirates, and in case anye of them came thither, hee was arriued there in the Forthe to waite on them, where the principall cause indeede was to impeache, that no Frenchman shoulde lande there, in case any came forthe of Fraunce, and also to keepe thē that lay in Inskeith from victayles, and that no Frenchman shoulde passe by Sea forth of Leith.

About the same time, the Queene Regent, hearing that the Duke of Norffolke was come to Newcastell, as generall Lieutenaunt of the Northe, sente an Herrault with a letter to him, in whiche letter it was signified, that the Herrault had credite to declare further matter than was conteyned in the same letter, but when hee was demaunded what hee had to saye, he denyed to haue anye credit at all, whereupon William Flower, then Chester Herraulte, and now Norrey Kyng of Armes, was sente vnto the Queene, who commyng to Holy Rode house neare to Edinburgh, was receyued by sundry Herraultes, and so was had to one of their houses, and there kepte for that nyght.

A Scottes Herrault sente to the Duke of Norffolke.

An English Herraulte to the Quene of Scottes.

The nexte daye after hee had dyned, he was brought to the Court, and at his entryng within the gates, there were a number of Harquebusiers readye wyth their peeces that discharged, and shot off the same.

At hys commyng to the presence of the Queene, hee with ducfull obeysaunce, deliuered his letters, and after the same had bin redde, he was demaunded what credit he had to vtter, whereupon he declared, that the Duke of Norffolke being the Queenes Maiesties liuetenaunt in the Northe partes of Englande, marueyled greately that she woulde send an Herrault with letters, and write therein howe shee had giuen credite to hym, and yet when he was demaunded to vtter his credite, hee shoulde confesse that he had none.

The Queene heerewith called for the Herrault, to vnderstande whether he had credite or not, who denyed to haue had any at all, wherewith the Queene seemed to be somewhat abashed, but neuertheless she brake forth and sayd, that she marueled greately that the Queene of Englande shoulde send hir Shippes into hir Riuer, without giuing hir knowledge afore hand. Chester answered thereto, that where it was certaynely knowen that the French King had prepared to send a power of men of Warre into Scotlande, without aduertising hir thereof, shee coulde not but thinke that dealing verye straūge, & therfore had in very deede sent certaine of hir Shippes with victayles, for prouision to be laid within hir Townes and Castels on the fronters, the whiche Shippes by tempest beeing dispersed, mighte happily be driuen into the riuer there, albeit hee hadde not spoke with any of them since their comming forthe, but yet as hee had hearde by others, they had bin very vncurteously vsed: for comming in after that manner for succour, the Canon had bin bent against them.

Herewith the Counte Martgues standyng by, beganne to speake very stowte wordes vnto Chester, alledging, that where it was perceyued well enoughe, that the Queene of Englande mente to make warre againste his Maister the Frenche Kyng, hee trusted shee woulde gaine as little thereby, as his sister had done in breaking with his father Henry the late French King. Chester heerevnto answered, that hee thought to haue found but one regent in Scotland land, to whome he shoulde neede to make aunswere, whereupon Martigues was commaunded to silence.

All this while the Queene had talked with Chester in the Scottishe tong, and bycause hee did not so well understande hir, hee beganne to speake in the French language, whereat the Q. seemed greately to reioyce, and beganne agayne to discourse with hym of hir griefes, & he on the other part made hir aunswer as fell to purpose, and at length, when hee was demaunded what further credite he hadde, he declared, that where she hadde requested a safeconduct for Monsieur la Broche to passe through Englād into Frāce, if shee woulde see hym safely conueyd to Berwike, he durst assure hir of a sufficient safeconduct for his safe passage: through the Queene his mistres Realme, but at length, there was another Gentleman commended to him, in lieu of La Broche; that was his Cousin. And nowe when Chester should take his leaue, he declared that he had not bin courteously dealte with, for sithence his comming thither, hee coulde not bee suffered to passe anye where abrode out of hys Chamber, but at meale times, and therefore if any of hir messengers should chance to come into the Queene his mistresse dominions, hee would procure (if he might) that they should tast of the like entertaynement: but the Queene seemed not to understande that he had bin in anye wise so hardly dealt with, shewing that she was not well contented therewith, and so Chester toke his leaue, and returned backe into England, without any reward for his paynes taken in that iourney, at the handes of the Scottish Queene, howsoeuer she liked of his message.

In the meane time, there was an army prepared in England, of seauen or eight thousande men, who were sent into Scotland, the Lorde Grey of Englande beeing appointed generall, who came to the Linkes, beside the Towne of Leith, on Saterday the sixth of Aprill: before they pight downe their field on the said Linkes, Monsieur Martigues, colonell of the Frenche army, issued forthe of Leith, with nine hundred Harquebusiers of Frenchmen, to a little knolle, called the Halke hil, where a sore continual and hote skirmish was begun betwixt the Englishmen and Frenchmen, with hagbuttes, calyuers, and pistolets, which skirmish continued fyue or sixe houres, in the whiche there were manye slayne on both parties, and diuers hurte. At length, Martigues was forced with his cōpany to retire backe to the Towne of Leith, and the Englishmē pight downe their Campe, and planted their ordinance beside the said hill.

A Englishe armye.

They were backed wyth a fiue. C. pikes whiche kepte aloofe.

The Lord Grey being in Muskelburgh, sent to the Queene Regente, that lay as then in the Castell of Edenburgh, desiring an abstinence of warre for foure and twenty houres, that in the meane time he might sende some of his Counsell to declare vnto hir the cause of his comming with that army, and to cōmune of suche things as might staunch the shedding of blond. The Queene graunted hereunto, and sent an Herrault to Leith, to cause the said assurance to bee taken, but ere he came to the Towne, the Skirmish afore sayd was begun.

In this meane time, the Lord Grey sent sir George Howard, and Sir James Crokts to ỹ Castell of Edenbugh, to speake with ỹ Queene to that effect, who had long conference with hir vppon the Blockhouse, at the vtter gate of the Castell, during the time of the skirmish, where they declared, that the occasiō of the cōming of the armye, was for the cause aboue mentioned, desiring the Queene to procure the Frenchmen to departe the Realme of Scotlande: and they they promised in that case to returne againe into their owne Realme, and neyther to disquiet Frenchmen nor Scots, whervpon the Queene toke time to be aduised till the nexte daye, that she might consult with ỳ principall personages within the Towne of Leith, requiring that it might be lawfull for hir to send to them to that effect, which was graunted, and so the next day she sent one Drummond a Trumpetter with a letter to Monsieur de la Broſſe, to the effect aforesaid, directing him to passe to the Englishe Campe, and to get a guide with him to goe to the Towne of Leith, as was agreed: and there was one appointed to goe with him. But immediately after his departing from the English Camp, he was suddainely called backe againe, and his letters taken from him, was commanded to repaire to the Castell of Edẽburgh to the Queene, and to declare to hir that they would not haue any talke, but would bee reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the slaughter of their men the night before. Thus the parlee ceasing, the siege was enforced with right sharpe pursute, and strong defending on either parte. The Englishmen cast trenches vpon the South east side of the Towne, and reysed a little Mont, which they named Mont Pellam, and placed theyr ordinance aloft thereon, but because it was so farre from the Towne, they did not so muche skath therto, as they intended. The Lord Grey Lieutenant of the English army lodged during this siege within the Towne of Lestalrike, in the Deanes house, and the most parte of theyr demilances and other horsemen, lay in ỳ same Towne. The footemen with their Captaynes lodged in Hales, tents, and Pauilions, vpon the South and South east syde of the Towne of Leith, and diuers Scottishe Lords encamped with them in the fieldes, as the Earles of Argile, Arrane, Morton, and Glẽcarne, the Lords Boyd, Ogiltree, the Prior of Saint Andrews, the maister of Marwell, and others. The Duke of Chatellerault and diuers with him remayned in Holy Rode house. And with ỳ Queene in the Castell, the Bishop of Saint Andrews, the Bishoppe of Dunkeld, the Earle Marshall, the Lorde Erskin, Captaine of the Castell, M. James Macgill, Clearke of the Register, the Prouost of Dunglas, called Maister Abraham Crichton, and diuers other.

The Englishe are desirous to reuenge the iniuries done vnto them.

A trench cast to little purpose.

On Easter Euen, Captaine Wood, and Captaine Dethicke, seruing on the Sea vnder M. Winter the English Admirall there, were appointed by him to passe vp ỳ riuer to Blacknesse, who with their bands going aboorde into a Barke, prepared for that purpose, sayled forward, and on Easter daye in the morning presenting themselues before the Castell, it was yeelded to them by certaine Frenchmenne that were within, and thervpon it was deliuered to the keeping of James Hamilton, an auntiente Gentleman, and Captaine Wood, beeing set on shore, came to the Camp before Leith by lande. On blacke Monday, the Frenchmenne issuing forth of Leith, set vpon the Englishmen in their trenches, and did muche harme, as in the Englishe Hystorie it further appeareth. During the siege thus afore Leith, the Queene Regent was sore vexed with sickneſſe, but neuertheleſſe, she continued to labour for agreemẽt, not ceasing to send to the Lordes for to haue the matter taken vp: and for the better accomplishing of hir desire, shee procured the Earle of Huntley to come forth of the North, who toke vp his lodging in Edenburgh, and toke greate paynes for to treate betwixt the Queene and Lords for some agreement: but when he perceyued his trauayle to be in vaine, hee returned into the North againe, and left the siege lying still as he founde it. In this meane while, the Englishmen lodging on the South syde of the Towne beside Mont Pellam, battered with their greate artillerie at the parishe Church of Leith, and at S. Anthonies Steeple, in the whiche the Frenchmen had laid certaine peeces of artillerie, and at length beate it downe, but perceiuing they could not do any great hurt to the walles on that side, they cast newe trenches vppon the South and Southwest side of the Towne, and reysed a Mount there, naming it Mont Somerset, and placed thereon certaine peeces in batterie, and so beate the walles that a great part thereof was ouerthrowen, and breach made, whereupon the Englishmenne and Scottes one morning came with their ladders, and presenting themselues to the assault, founde the breache nothing reasonable, so that although they egrely preassed forward to enter the Towne, yet they were fiercely beaten backe with great slaughter and bloudshed on both partes, but namely of the assaylants.

The Castell of Blackenesse wonne.

The Queene laboured for an agreement.

The Englishmen perceyuing that they were too rash in assaulting the Towne, beeing not assaultable, deuised other shifts to obteyne theyr purpose, reysing an other Mount of earth on the West side of the water of Leith, and named it Mont Faulcon. Aloft on this Mount when it was brought vp to a great heigth, they planted their greate artillerie, whiche continually beate into the Towne, sore annoying them within, but specially beating the houses and places by the shore side, so that none might goe vppe nor downe the Towne on that part, without danger to be slaine with shot from that Mount.

Mont Faulcon.

The Frenchmenne during the time of the siege, many times issued forthe towardes the sands, sands, and sometimes towards the trenches, so that sundry sore skirmishes chanced betwixte the Englishmen and them, with the slaughter of diuers, both of the one part and the other.

Amongst other of them within, there were slayne two Scottishmenne of name, to witte, Captayne Kenedie, and yong Henry Drummond: and of them without, there was slayne a Scottish Gentlemã, called the Lard of Cleisch.

The English army was throughly furnished with vittayles forth of all parts of the Realme, and that vpon reasonable prises, but the Frẽchmenne within the Towne could get none, more than they had prouided before the comming of the English army, whiche when it beganne to fayle them, they were constreyned to eate theyr owne Horses, whose flesshe seemed to them in that necessitie more delitious, than before that time any manner of venison. Those within Inskeith also were in greate necessitie of vittayles, but yet neither they within the one place nor those within the other, woulde render theyr strengthes, looking stil for ayde forth of France.

In the meane time the Queene Regent perceyuing hir sickenesse so to encrease, that shee looked for present death, sent for the Duke of Chatellereault, and all the Lords of Scotland that were in the Towne of Edenburgh, and in the Camp, who came vnto hir altogither into the Castell of Edenburgh, where shee made vnto them a graue and pithie exhortation, perswading them to vnitie and concorde with theyr auncient frendes of Fraunce, and nowe more stedfast to them than at any time before, by reason of the marriage of their Queene their Soueraigne, with the King of France: and heerewith brake out with certaine words, to dissuade them from the amitie contracted with the Englishmen, declaring that the Englishmen aided them not for any other respecte, than for theyr owne tourne and commoditie. Moreouer for hir owne parte shee sayd, that shee fauoured the weale of the Realme of Scotland, asmuche as Fraunce, considering shee had the honour to be Queene and Regent thereof, and hir daughter heritable Queene of the same: and if shee hadde attempted any thyng, that seemed or appeared to the noble men contrarie therevnto, the same came to passe rather for lacke of wisedome, and iudgemente, than for wante of any good will: and if it pleased God to prolong hir dayes, shee woulde bee glad to amende that had bene done amisse: and if hee called hir to his mercy, shee prayed them most hartily to acknowledge their duetie vnto the Queene their soueraigne, and to maintaine their auncient amitie with the King and Realme of Fraunce, and to make some good accorde with the Frenchmenne that were within the Towne of Leith, who would gladly accepte the same, to the end that as well they as the Englishmẽ should departe this Realme, for shee feared greatly (as shee saide) least if the Frenchmen departed, the Englishmenne would still remaine, and subdue the land to theyr obedience, and therfore she besought all good Scottishmen to haue respect to the libertie and weale of their Countrey. A mistrustfull minde.

After she had talked thus a good while with many teares, shee desired the Lordes to forgiue hir in any thing wherein she had offended anye of them during the time of hir beeing in Scotlande, whiche they gladly seemed to doe: and on the other parte shee forgaue them with all hir heart (as it appared) all offences which they had committed against hir, and thus diuers of them weeping, shee toke euery of them by the hande, and so they taking leaue of hir departed, and returned into Edenburgh, and to their Campe. The Queene taketh hir leaue.

Whilest the siege thus lay before the Towne of Leith, diuers great troubles rose in sundrye partes of the Realme, and specially betwixt the Erle of Huntley, and the Erle of Atholl, so that there was taking of Prisoners, and ouerthrowing of houses on either part, and greate preparation made, and armies put in a readinesse to inuade either others Countreys: but this busines was pacified by the trauaile and good mediation of Maister Alexander Gordõ, then Postulat of Galloway, Maister John Leslie, officiall of Aberdene, and William Leslie, the yõg Lard of Buchquhane, who agreed thẽ for all matters in controuersie, and caused them to goe to eyther others house. The Earle of Huntley and Atholl are at variance. The matter is pacified.

The same time, one Maister Donald Fraser, Archdeacon of Rosse, toke the Bysshoppes Castell of the Chanourie of Rosse, and kept the same against Maister Henrye Sinclair, then Bishop there, and the chiefest men of authoritie in that Diocesse, as Machenzee, Balnagoun, Foulis, and the Sheriffe Tramercy, who assẽbled about the same, and besieged the Castell, where great force was vsed, both by them without to winne it, and of them within to defende it. The Castell of Rosse taken. The Castell is besieged.

The Bishop being then resident in Cromercy Castell, hearing that the house would not be gotten without great slaughter, thought it against his conscience, his profit, and honor, to winne it in that manner, and therefore sending for Maister John Leslie, officiall of Aberdene, and Maister Alexander Dunbarre, Subchauntour of Murrey, by their labour, & diligent treating in the matter, the Bishop by reasonable appointmente recouered his Castell of them that held it against him. The Castell was restored againe.

streſſe his menne remayned that were beſieged within Leith, and perceyuing himſelfe not able to ſend an army to ſuccour them within ỳ time that their neceſſitie required, thought good to trie if the matter might be taken vp, and to that effect ſent two Ambaſſadors, the Earle of Randon, and Monſieur Monluc Biſhoppe of Valence, who declared to the Queenes Maieſtie of Englande the cauſe of their comming, whiche was, to deſire hir to retire hir armye fore the of Scotland, vpon ſome ſuche reaſonable conditions as might be agreed vpõ, and herewith they declared, that they were ſent to the Queene, and not vnto the ſubiectes of Scotlande, for it was not meete that the king ſhould ſend to his owne ſubiects (as they were by the marriage of theyr Queene) to requir peace, or to condition with them for agreement. The Queenes Maieſtie of Englande therefore ſente Sir William Cecill Knighte, hir principall Secretarie, and Doctor Wotton, Deane of Canterbury and of Yorke, one of the priuie Counſell, with the ſaid Ambaſſadors into Scotland.

The Lordes send to the Queene of Englande.

The Queene of England sent vnto the Queene of Scottes.

The King past the most part of that Winter in the Countreys of Fiffe, Stratherne, Striuelingshire, and Louthian, spending hys time in hawking.

The King went Hawking.

The Queene remained at Edinburgh with the Nobilitie, and because shee was conceyued with childe, trauailed little abroade.

In the meane time a Parliament was called

to

to bee holden in the moneth of Marche nexte ensuing, and commonaunce decreed agaynste the Earle of Murrey, and the other Lordes that remaynyd in Englande, and also againste the Earle of Irgile, lying then in hys Countrey of Argile to heare them forfalted.

The Frenche King sent Monsieur Rambeuellet into Scotlād, as Imbassador from him to the Queene, with commission, to make the King hir husbande Knighte of the order of S. Michaell, which with great solemnitie and reuerence, was accomplished in the Chappell of Holy Rode house the tenth of Februarye, beeing Sonday. After the which, the said Rambeuellet returned into Fraunce, being highly rewarded.

From ỳ time that the Parliament was proclaymed, and the commonaunce published, the Earle of Murrays friends being in Scotlande, neuer ceassed to seeke all the wayes and meanes they coulde deuise to slay the same, in so muche that the Earle of Morton, the Lorde Ruthuen, and the Lorde Lindsey, secretely perswaded the King to slay the Parliamente, and also to consent to the restoring of the Earle of Murrey, and hys complices, makyng to hym faithfull promise, that if hee would followe their counsell, hee shoulde bee made Crowned King of Scotlande absolutely, and the Queene so to haue lesse to doe with the gouernemente afterwardes, whereethrough hee agreed to them.

And so after the Parliamente was assembled, the Lords of the Articles being chosen the seauenth daye of Marche, they perceyuing the forfalter like to proceede, and iudgement thereof to be giuen, the eleuenth of Marche nexte following, the King with the assistance of the sayde Earle of Morton, the Lordes Ruthuen, and Lindsey, entred into the Queenes priuie Chāber about eyght of the clocke in the nighte, beeing Saterday, and the ninth of March, where beeing arrayed in warlike manner, the Lorde Ruthuen declared vnto the Queene, that they would not suffer hir any longer to haue the gouernemente of the Realme, to abuse the same by the counsell of straungers, as she had done, and therefore pulled violentlye forthe of hir Chamber Dauid Richeo, an Italian, that was one of hir Secretaries, crying pitcously, Iustice, Iustice: and in hir vtter Chamber they sundaynely stewe hym with greate cruelte: the King himselfe was also present, and his dagger was likewise found sticking in the dead body.

The Queene was shut vp within hir Chāber, and certaine appointed to attende hir, and to keepe all the doores and gates aboute the Palaice.

The Earles of Huntley and Bothwell escaped by a backe windowe forth of their chamber, whereof the King and his company were right sorye. The Earle of Huntley is fled and the residue also.

The Earle of Atholl and others beeing wyth hym, departed in the nyghte season by a Ferrie ouer the Forthe, called the Queenes Ferrie, and wente to Saint Johns Towne.

On the morrow, being Sūday the Queene beyng secretely kept) proclamation was made, that all the lords that had voice in Parliament, should departe forth of the towne of Edenburgh: and after noone the same day, the erles of Murrey and Rothes with other of their companies that came forth from Newcastell the Saturdaye beefore, came to the Abbey of Holy Rode House, about sixe of the clocke in the after noone, where they were thākfully receiued by the king and his company. The exiled Lords came in to Scotlande.

They spake also with the Queene, who had no greate comforte of their comynyng.

The morrowe following, beyng Monday, the erle of Murrey and the other that were commoned, past to the Tolbuith of Edenburgh, and made their protestation there, that they were readye to aunswere in Parliament, and none appeared to accuse them. They make their protestation.

After this, it was concluded to keepe the Queene in straight warde, but by hir politike demeanor, their purpose in that behalf was broken: for by secret conference wyth the King, she perswaded hym to thinke that he had ioyned himselfe with those that woulde be his destruction, if it happened with hir otherwise than well, as was no lesse to bee doubted, by reason of the highe displeasure that shee hadde taken beeyng quicke with childe: through the which perswasion, and other mislikyng of things, hee departed secretely with hir in the night season, accompanied onely wyth two men, and tyrste came vnto Seton, and from thence to Dunbar, vnthyther the Earles of Huntley and Bothwell hastily repaired, by whose counsell, and other then with hir, shee caused Proclamation to bee made in dyuers partes of the Realme, charging al manner of menne in feate of warre, to come vnto hyr to Dunbar, to passe from thence vnto Edenburgh, within fyue dayes after. The Queene had conference wyth the king. The King was soone perswaded. Huntley and Bothwell. Proclamatiōs made.

Shee also sente letters to the same effect vnto dyuers noble menne of the Realme, who prepared themselues with greate diligence to meete hir.

The Earle of Murrey and the reste of the Lordes beeyng wyth hym, hearyng the preparation that was made agaynſt them, and perceyuing themſelues not able to reſiſte, thought good euery of thē to ſeke ſome particular meane, to obteyn remiſſion at the Queenes hands, which they obteyned all of them, except the erle of Morton, the Lords Ruthuen, Lindſey, and ſuche other as were wyth them at the ſlaughter of Dauid Richeo. Wherbyō they diſpairing of pardon, fled into England, where the Lorde Ruthuen died at Newcaſtell ſhortly after as in place ye ſhall heare.

Pardon is craued and obteyned.

The murtherers are excepted.

The Earle of Lennox beeyng partaker with them, came to Dunbar, and gote pardon: the Earle of Glencarne and the Lorde of Cunningham head came thither alſo, and were pardoned.

Many pardoned.

Likewiſe the Earle of Rothes purchaſed his pardon the ſame time.

The Earles of Argile and Murray, and the Lord Boyd, beeing at Lithquo, ſente to the Q. for their pardon, and obteyned it, beeing commaunded neuertheleſſe to paſſe into Argile, and to remayne there during hir graces pleaſure, which commaundement they obeyd.

The Queene commeth to Edenburgh.

The eyghteenth of March, the Queene wel accompanyed, came to Hadington towardes nyghte, and on the nineteenth day, the Biſhoppe of Saint Andrewes, and the Hamiltons mette hir at Muſkelburgh, and ſo likewiſe dyd the Lords Leuingſton, Flemming, Hume, Boythwike, and manye other noble menne, and conueyd hir vnto Edenburgh: ſhee lodged in the Byſhoppe of Dunkeldes lodging, and tarried there a certaine ſpace, hauing with hir the Erles of Huntley, Athole, Bothwell, Crawfourde, Merſhall, Sutherland, Caithnes, the Biſhop of Sainte Andrewes and Roſſe, the Lordes Leuingſton, Flemming, and diuers other noble men, by whoſe counſell order was taken for redreſſing of the ſtate of the Realme, whereby the ſame was ſhortly brought to greate quietneſſe.

After this, the Queene perceyuing hirſelfe to drawe neere the tyme of hir deliuerance, wente to the caſtell of Edenburgh, there to remayne til ſhe were deliuered of hir birth.

In the moneth of May Thomas Scot the riffe deputie of Perth, and a Prieſte called ſir Henry Pair ſeruant to the Lord Ruthuen, were apprehended for being doers in the ſlaughter of Dauid, and were hanged and quartred. Their heades were ſette the one aloſte on the Tolbuth, the other on the Abbey, and the other on the nether bow.

Execution done vpon the murtherers.

In the moneth of Aprill this yeare the Byſhop of Brechin preſidente of the Seſſion, deceaſſed, and in his rowme ſucceeded to that biſhoprike, a friende and Couſin to the Earle of Argile, called Campbell.

In the ende of Aprill, the Queene willing to haue the Earles of Argile and Murrey ioyned with the reſidue of the Counſell, ſente for them to come to the Caſtell of Edenburgh, where all grieues and controuerſies that reſted betwixt them on the one ſide, and the Earles of Huntley, Athole, and Bothwell on the other ſide, were referred to the Queene, who agreed them, and they all remayned with hir the reſt of the Sommer.

The Queene agreeth all the Lords.

The Queene hearing that the Earle of Morton, the Lorde Ruthuen, and the other their aſſiſtantes were receyued in Englande, and remayned at Newcaſtell, ſhe ſente Maiſter James Thorneton, Chantor of Murrey, with letters to the Queene of Englande, and alſo to the King of Fraunce, and other hir friends, there declaring by the tenor of the ſame letters, the abuſe and preſumptuous attemptes of certayne hir hir subiectes against hir, desiring them not to receiue them within their Realmes nor Dominions: and shortly after, the Queene of Englande sente a Gentleman called Henry Killigrew into Scotlande, with letters and message to the Queene, promising to cause them to departe forthe of hir Realme of Englande, and withall sente vnto them warning to departe betwixte that presente time, and Midsommer then nexte ensuing. But in the meane time the Lorde Ruthuen departed this life at Newcastell, with great repentance of his former life, giuing God thankes for that he had lent him time to call to him for mercy and forgiuenesse whereof he did assure himselfe.

And from thencefoorth the Earle of Morton and the maister of Ruthuen remayned secretely neere to Anwicke, and other places on the borders, till they obteyned pardon, and were restored.

About this time, there came from the King of Fraunce a wise aged Gentleman, named Monsieur la Croc, as his Imbassador, and remayned in Scotlande all the Winter following.

In the moneth of June, the Queene perceiuing the tyme of hir deliuerance to approche, wrote vnto all the principall noble men of hir Realm, to come and remaine within the towne of Edenburgh, during the time of hir deliuerance, where they assembled, and the King hir husbande, with the Earles of Argile, Murrey, Atholl and Mar, remained with hir in the Castell, and the Erle of Huntley, Bothwel, & the remaynant of the Lords, lodged in the towne, and vppon the nineteenth daye of the same moneth of June, betwixte tenne and eleuen of the clocke before noone, hir grace was deliuered of a goodly manchild, to the greate comforte of hir highnesse, and all hir subiectes, whereof the nobilitie did greately reioyce, and incontinently all the artillerie in the Castell was shotte off, and all the Lords and people came togither in the Church of Saint Giles, to giue thankes to Almightie God for his great and beneficiall goodnesse shewed to thē, in giuing to thē a Prince, and withall made their humble prayers vnto hys deuine Maiestie, to endue hym wyth the feare of God, with vertue and knowledge to gouerne the Realme, and Subiectes thereof, whensoeuer the same shoulde fortune to come into his handes.

The same nyghte at euen, there were greate fyres of ioy made in the Towne of Edenburgh, and in all the Countrey aboute, and likewise throughout all the whole Realme, as the aduertisementes were certifyed thereof.

The Queene remayned still in the Castell of Edenburgh all the moneth of Julie following, till shee hadde recouered hir healthe and strength.

In the beginning of August, she passed vppe the water of Fourth to Alloway, where she remayned certaine dayes, the Earles of Murrey and Mar beeing in companye wyth hyr, and there the Kyng hyr husbande came to visit hir.

The same time Monsieur Maluoisir came into Scotland from the King of France, bringing letters to the Queene, who was conueyd by the Bishoppe of Rosse to Alloway, where he was ioyfully receyued, courteously entertayned, and highly rewarded.

The D. of Englande sent M. Henry Killegrewe to the Queene with the like message, reioysing for hir safe and happye deliuerance, who likewise was receyued in most thankefull manner, and well rewarded.

The Princes Godfathers and Godmothers.

Heere is to bee noted, that shortly after shee was brought to bedde, shee sente one of hyr Gentlemen called Monsieur Clarimoich, with letters to the King of Fraunce, and to the Duke of Sauoy, desiring them to sende Imbassadors, whyche in their name as Godfathers, myghte receyue hir sonne at the Baptisme.

Monsieur Clarimoich Duke of Sauoy.

Moreouer, shee sente James Meluine to the Queene of Englande wyth the lyke message, desyring hyr Maiestie to bee Godmother.

The Queene of Englande Godmother.

These Princes were glad heereof, and promised to sende Imbassadors to that effect, as afterwards they did.

In the later ende of August, the Queene accompanyed with the Kyng hir husbande, the Earles of Huntley, Murrey, Bothwell, and dyuers other, wente into Meggat lande, there to passe the tyme in Hunting, where they remayned certayne dayes, and returning to Edenburgh, caused the Prince to be conueyd vnto Striueling Castell, where he was committed in keeping to the Lord Erskin, after Earle of Mar, and his Ladye. And from thence, the Queene wente a Progresse, into Glen Arknay.

In January, the Kyng came to Glasquo, 1567 where he fell sicke, and remoouing from thence, wente to Edenburgh, and the Queene accompanyed him.

She lodged at Holy Rode House, but hee was lodged in a house within the towne neere to the Kirke a field, within the whiche, the tenth of Febzuary in the nighte, hee was shamefully murthered, togyther wyth one William Parat.

The Kyng murthered.

Hee was caste into an Orcharde, and heerewith the house was blowen vp wyth gũpowder.

The Earle of Bothwell murthered the King.

The Earle of Bothwell was euen at the first vehemẽtly suspected to be ỹ principall offẽdor in this most hainous & detestable murther, but the matter was so handled, that he was not only acquite by an assise, as they call it, but also shortely after married the Queene, by reason whereof, the suspition which mẽ had alreadye conceyued that shee shoulde be also priuie to the murder, was nothyng diminished. But as I haue not to deale in that matter, so yet it is manifest, that some of the Scottishe nobilitie sore repinyng and malignyng at suche the speedye aduauncement of Bothwell (who as euery mã perswaded hymselfe, was the principall author of the murther) gote them to armes on the suddayne, before the Queene or Bothwell were aduertised of their meaning, they being then at Borthwike Castell, eyght myles distante from Edenburgh.

The Lords get them to armes.

The deuisers and procurers of this enterprise were knowen to bee the Lardes of Tallibardin and Grange, who moued it firste to the Earle of Morton, then remayning in Douglas: William Maitlãd the yong Lard of Lethington, principall Secretary to the Queene, beeing departed from hir eyghte dayes before had also procured the Lord Hume to ioine with the other in that quarrell.

The chiefe mouers of the quarrell against the Q. and Bothwell.

Liberton Kirke.

The place of their meeting was appoynted at Liberton Kirk, two myles from Edenburgh, on Tewsday in the night the tenthe of June, whyther the Earle of Morton came first, the Lord Hume next.

And in the morning beeing Wednesday, there came to them the Earle of Mar, who hadde the Prince in his keeping within the Castell of Striueling, but because the Earle of Glencarne, the Lordes Lindsey, Ruthuen and Simple, the Maister of Grahame and others, came not to the place at the precise appoynted houre, they missed their purpose to take the Queene and Bothwell at Borthwike, as they had deuised, and so the Queene and Bothwell aduertised of their assemble, slipte away to the Castell of Dunbar.

The Lordes disappoynted of theyr purpose.

The Lordes heerevppon came the same Wednesday vnto Edenburgh, and within two dayes after, the Earle of Atholl also came vnto them.

The Queene gathereth forces.

The Queene in the meane time vsed what diligence shee might to gather forces, specially in the Mers and East Louthian, and thinking that the enterprise of the Lordes had bin broken and disappoynted, marched from Dunbar on Saterday the fourteenth of June, first to Hathington, and there resting till the euen set forwarde to Gladismore, and taking there deliberation in the matter, they lodged that nyghte at Seaton, and in the morning marched in order of battaile towardes Carbarry hill, and there chose forthe a plotte of ground of greate aduantage, appoynting to fyghte on sore, because the power of the Lordes in number of Horsemenne, was stronger than the Queenes, and of greater experience.

Carbarry hill.

There were with the Queene and Bothwell the Lordes Seaton, Yester and Borthwike: also the Lardes of Wauchton, Bas, Drumiston, Weaderburne, Blackater, and Langton.

They hadde with them also two hundred Harquebusiers waged, and of greate artillerie, some fielde pieces. Their whole number was esteemed to bee aboute two thousande, but the more part of them were commons and Countreymen.

The number of the Queenes Power.

The Earles of Morton, Athol, Mar, Glencarne, the Lords of Hume, Lindsey, Ruthuen, Simple and Sauquhar. The Lardes of Drumlanrig, Tulibarden, Grange, and yong Selforde, were assyncke together in Edenburgh with a power like in number to the Queenes, but for the more part consisting of Gentlemen, although not furnished with anye number of Harquebusiers, except a fewe of the Townesmen of Edenburgh, that willingly ioyned with them in that quarrell.

The power of the Lordes.

Upon the fifteenth of June, they came forthe of the Towne, and approched their aduersaries, but there was Monsieur La Croque, the frenche Kings Ambassadors, who toke greate paine in trauelling betwixte the parties to reduce them to some agreemente, but still the Queenes part beganne to decrease, diuers shrinking away from hir, so that after it beganne to growe towardes the euening, Bothwell fledde to the Castell of Dunbar, but the Queene desirous to talke with the Larde of Grange, wente to hym, accompanyed only with one Captaine, and after some talke wyth hym, shee passed to the Lordes, who toke hir with them to Edenburgh.

The Queene commeth to the Lords.

The Hamiltons were on the way commyng to assist the Queene, wyth seauen or eyghte hunnred Horsemenne, but before they coulde reache to the place, the Queene was in the handes of the Lordes, and so they returned.

The Larde of Cragmiller, then prouost of Edenburgh, and Sir James Balfour, also the Captaine of the Castell, were ioyned in this cõfederacie with the Lordes, as shortly after it appeared. The Queene after this, was conueyed ouer the Forth and brought to Lochleuen, where she was appoynted to remayne in warde vnder the sure keeping of Willia Dowglas Lard of that place. The Erle Bothwell escapyng to Dunbar founde meanes to flee into Denmarke, where he was stayed and committed to prison, wherein at lengthe he died. Diuers persons afterwardes were apprehended as parties to the murder of the King, and thereupon condemned, were executed, confessing the sayd Earle to be the principall executour of the same murder.

The nienteth of July Charles James the yong Prince of Scotlande, after a Sermon made by Iohn Knokes, was crowned Kyng of Scottes in Sterling Church, where were redde certayne letters of commission and procuration with the Queenes priuy seale at the for the establishing of the same coronation. The first for hyr resignation of the crowne and gouernment of the yong Prince hyr Sonne. The seconde to authorise the Earle of Murrey to be regent during the Kings minoritie. The thirde, to giue authoritie, and power to seuen other ioynyng with the sayde Earle of Murrey, in case he should refuse to exercise the same alone, that is to say, the Duke of Chatellerault, the Earles of Lennox, Argile, Athol, Morton, Glencarne, and Mar.

The tenors of whiche letters of commission and procuration do here ensue, as we find them imprinted at Edenburgh by Robert Lekprouic, Printer to the King of Scottes, the .vj. of Aprill Anno Christi, 1568. among the Actes of Parliament begonne, and holde at Edenburgh the .xv. of December in the yeare .1567. by James Earle of Murray Lord Abernethie, &c. The kings othe.

These Commissions being redde, the Bishop of Argile with two superintendentes proceeded to the Coronation, the Erle of Morton, and the Lord Hume toke the othe for the king, that he should rule in the faith, feare, and loue of God, and to mainteyne the religion then preached & exercised in Scotlande, and to persecute all aduersaries to the same. The whole ceremonie was done in the Scottes Englishe tongue, the Queene mother to the King remayning at that tyme prysoner in Lochleuin.

A Parliament holden at Edenburgh.

The .xb. of December a Parliament begonne being holden at Edenburgh before the Earle of Murrey Lord Regent, in the which diuers actes and Statutes were deuised, made and ratified: as firste concernyng the Queenes demission of hir Crowne, and resignation thereof made to hyr Sonne King James the firte. And likewise concernyng the instituting of the Earle of Murrey in the Regencie of the Realme, which he toke vpon hym the twoo and twentie day of Auguste laste paste, accordyng to hir letters of commission and procuration aboue specified.

An acte for the abolishing of the Popes authoritie in Scotland.

Also there was an Acte made for the abolishyng of the Pope, and his vsurped authoritie, and an other Acte for the annullyng of former Actes made in Parliament for maynteynaunce of superstition and Idolatrie, and hereunto was annexed a confession of the fayth and doctrine receyued by the Protestantes of the Realme of Scotlande, authorised in the same Parliament. There was also an acte made for the indempnitie of those that had leuied warre, and apprehended the Queene at Carbarrie hill, the fiftenth of July last past, and concernyng the deteyning of hir in Lochleuin.

The castell of Dunbar, and the fortresse of Inchkeith to be rased.

Moreouer it was ordeyned by an acte passed in this Parliament that the Castell of Dunbar, and the fortresse of Inskeith, shoulde bee demolished and rased downe to the earth. To be briefe, there were one & fourtie Actes or Statutes made and established in this Parliament, as by the Register thereof it may appeare.

1568. The queenes escape out of Lochleuin.

On Sunday the seconde of May, in the yeare 1568. at supper tyme the Queene escaped out of Lochleuyn, by the meanes and helpe of George Dowglas brother to the Laird of Lochleuyn. The Lorde Seaton, the Laird of Ricarton and James Hamilton of Orbiston were ready to receyue hyr, and conueyed hyr ouer the Queenes Ferry, firste to Mudry the Lorde Seatons house, and from thence to Hamilton Castell, where she remayned till the thirtenth day of May beyng thursday, gathering in the meane time such forces as she might from all places. The Queene gatheretha power.

The Earle of Murrey Lorde regent was in Glasquho, at what tyme shee thus escaped out of Lochleuin, and vpon knowledge had thereof, meant at the firste to haue withdrawen himselfe vnto Sterlyng, but suddenly changing his purpose in that behalf, he determined to continue at Glasquho, whiche is not passe an eyght myles from Hamilton, bycause hee was perswaded, that if she should shrynke backe neuer so little, he shoulde encourage his aduersaries, and discourage his frendes, and so consequently weaken his parte greatly. The Regent determineth to stay at Glasquho.

Herevpon the thirtenth day of May afore mencioned, the Queene with hyr power marched from Hamilton, by the South side of Clede towarde Dunbertane, and out of Glasquho on the other parte marched the Lorde Regent with his forces, so as at length bothe the armies meete at a place called the Langside, neare to the house of Catcart within twoo myles of Glasquho. The armies meete at the Langside.

There were on the Queenes parte the Earles of Argile, Cassilles, Eglinton and Rothes, Claude Hamilton sonne to the Duke of Chatellerault, the Lordes Seaton, Somerville, Yester, Boythwike, Leuingston, Herles, Maxwell, Sauquhar, Boyd and Ros, Lairdes & Knights Lochinwar, Bas, Wauchtō, Dalhowsy, Rosslen ẏ Sheriffe of Air, sir James Hamilton & many other. On the regents part were these accōpted as principall, ẏ erles of Morton, Mar, Glecarne, Menteith, the M. of Graham, the Lordes Hume, Lindsey, Ruthuen, Simpil, Ogiltree & Cathcart, of lairdes & knights, Bargawy, Blacquhā, Drumlanrig, Sclkyrd, Lus, Buchannane, Tuliberdin, Petcur, Grange, Lochleuin, Lethington, and sir James Balfour. At the firste ioyning there was a righte sharp encoūter, for after they had besteowed their shotte of Harquebusses and arrowes, they fell to it with speares and swordes, but at length after Lordes vpon the Queenes parte. Lordes on the Regents pt. They ioyne battayle.

ter.iij.quarters of an houres fight,the Queenes parte was put to flight, the victory remayning with the Regent,who suffered none to be slaine but those that were killed in the fighte, before they turned their backes; among the whiche were.xiiij. of the surname of the Hamiltõs killed. There were taken prysoners about a three hundred, of whiche number the principall were these: The Lordes Seaton, & Ros, Sir James Hamilton, and many other of that surname. Of the Regents parte, the Lorde Hume was hurte in the legge and face,and the Lord Ogiltree in the necke, by the lord Heries: the Lorde Lindsey,and the Lards of Drumlanrig, and of Grange, bare themselues right valiantly that day,fayling not in any poynt that belonged to the duetie of hardie Capitaines. The Queenes partie was thought to be neare at the poynt of vj.thousande men. & the Regents was reconed to be foure thousand, so that there were a tenne thousand men on the fielde that day,what vpon the one side and the other.

The Earle of Huntley was comming forewardes to haue assisted the Queenes parte, but the battel was strikē, and hir people discomfited as ye haue heard ere he could come,and so he returned. In this battayle the valiancie of an Hieland Gentleman named Mackerlane, stood the Regents part in great steede, for in the hottest brunte of the fight,he came in with two hūdred of his friendes and countreymen,& so manfully gaue in vpon the flanke of the Queenes people, that he was a great cause of the disordering of them. This Mackerlane had bene lately before as I haue heard condēned to die for some outrage by him committed,and obtayning pardon through suyte of the Countesse of Murray, he recompensed that clemencie by this peece of seruice now at this battayle.

The Queene perceyuing the ouerthrow of hir people,fled from the place where she stode to behold the battell, and withdrew to Crawforde towne,and so by the Sauquhar to Dūdrenane in Galloway, and after she had taried there two or three dayes, she toke ship and past to Workington in England,where she was stayed and conueyed to Carlile,and from thence to Bolton castel belonging to the lord Scroupe,who with sir Francis Knolles beyng sent downe for that purpose,had the custodie of hir, till at length she was committed vnto the Erle of Shrewsbury, with whom she yet remayneth. The Queene of Scots fleeth into England.

But now to the doings in Scotlande, the morrow after the battel being the.xiiij.of May, the Regent sent to somon Hamilton castell, but the answeare was respited till the next day, and then he that had the charge came to Glasquho, and offered the keyes to the Regent. The castell of Draffan was also yeelded the same time vnto the Regent.

The.xviij.of May the Regent made proclamatiō,that the inhabitāts of the shyres of Merues, Angus, Fife, Mers, Louthian, Kile and Carrick, shoulde prouide themselues of vitailes for.xv.dayes, and to meete him at Begger the tenth of June,to ride with him into the Southwest partes of Scotlande, to chastise certayne theeues and other disobedient persons.

Hereupon the.xj. of June the Regent marched forth of Edenburgh, and came that night to Begger. The army being assembled conteyned a.iiij.or.v.thousand horsemen very wel appointed beside a thousande footemen, gunners and Halberdiers, of boyes and pong men that went with the cariage, there were aboute foure thousande.

The Castell of Boghall perteyning to the Lorde Flemmyng was surrendred to them. The Castell of Boghall.

The.xij.of June Skirling castel was raced, a fayre house, to the ende that other vnderstanding thereof might bee put in the more feare.

Crawford.

That night they came to Crawford, where the Castell was to them surrendred. It belonged vnto Sir James Hamilton, whom they had in their handes.

Saucher.

The.xiij.of June they marched to Saucher a castell, the whiche beyng rendred they spared, bycause the Lord Chrighton the owner thereof promised at a certayne day to come to the Regent vnto Edenburgh. The.xiiij.of June they came to Barbacast, where they lay that night, & the Laird Wedderborne was sent to speake with the Laird of Louchinware. Wednesday the xv.of June, they marched to a place called S. John Sclaghan, staying there in trust of the Dunfreis.

The.xviij.of June they marched to Dunfreis, and remayned there all the nexte day. A strong house standing in that towne and apperteyning to the Lord Maxwell was offered vnto them. Diuers of the Maxwels, Johnstons, Pyrewines, Grahames & Belles came into the Regent, and offering themselues to be obedient, were receyued. Two dayes before this, the lord Maxwell, the Lairdes of Johnston, Cowhill, & Louchinwar, had bene at Dunfreis with a thousand men and spent al the vitayles. It was thought that the Lord Maxwell would haue come in if the other had not counsayled him to the contrary.

The.xx of June they marched to Hoddom, a place belonging to the Lorde Haries, a thousand of the broken men were assembled and offered skirmishe, two or three were taken: they lay within a myle of the Regent that night.

Hoddom yeeldeth to the Regent.

The.xxj.the house was yeelded, and the custodie thereof committed to the Laird of Drumlanrig that was appoynted Warden of those marches. It was thought very strong, so that the defendants might haue kept it longer if they had bene disposed. Great hunger began to pinch in the armie, a pinte of wine was solde at.vij. shillings Scottish, and no bread to be had for any money. The Regent sente forth the Earle of Morton, & the lord Hume with a thousande men, to trie if they might haue drawen the broken men to a chase, but it would not be, for they went their wayes, and would not tarrie it.

The Laird of Drumlanrig.

The.xxij.of June the campe lay still, but the Regent with a thousand men went to Annand and had it deliuered vnto him. Here hee mette with my Lorde Scroupe, and after returned to the campe. The.xxiij.of March they wente to Lochmaben and receyued the Castell, the which the Regent deliuered to Drumlanrig, but some of the Maxwelles beyng closely hidde within an odde corner of the house, after the regent was gone, brake out and seased the house againe into their handes. The same day two houses belongyng to the laird of Johnstone, the one named Lochwood, & the other Lowhowsly were take, but not brent bicause the laird Johnston had put in suretie to come in by a day vnto the Regent. The same day they toke greate store of cattell, and that night with a shot of the greate artillery, they slew two theeues among Ir. others, that came and approched very neere to the army as the maner of the pickers is. The army lay that night at Milton holmes.

Two houses of laird Johnston taken the regent.

The.xxiiij.of June they came to Peeples, & the next day to Edenburgh, so ending that iourney, in the whiche they had passed through the cotũreys of Clidesdale, Galoway, Mitheldale, Annandale, and Twedale.

Much a doe and greate trouble arose within Scotlande, by reason that the Hamiltons and their adherents made partes against the Regẽt, and those other Lordes that gouerned vnder the King, whereof as I haue no certayne notes, so I must passe the same with silence.

Great trouble in Scotland.

In the yeere.1569. the Erles of Northumberlande and Westmerlande reysed a rebellion against the Queenes Maiestie of England, but by the good diligence and prouident circumspection of the Erle of Sussex, then Lieutenant of the Northy partes, and of such direction as was giuen by hir Maiestie and hir Counsell, for the kruying of an armie vnder the leadyng of the Erle of Warwike, & the Lord Admirall Clinton, the sayd two Earles were kept so in feare, that they durst not aduaunce farre forewarde in their wicked begonne enterprize, but were constreyned to retyre backe towardes Durelme, wherevpon the Earle of Sussex supposing that their meaning was for their last refuge and saueguard to take the castels of Alnewike & Warkworth, he wrote vnto Sir John Forster Lord Warden of the middle Marches, eyther by force policie or some other meane, to gette into his handes the possession of those two Castels, and the same to fortifie with suche number and garnisons of menne, as to his discretion shoulde be thought conuenient, for the saufe custodie and garde thereof. Sir John Forster beyng at his house neare to Alnewike, when he receiued these letters, accompanied with his seruants, frendes, and tenants, and some souldiers that were come to him from Berwike, marched vp to the castell on foote, where finding the house garded with a great number of the Earle of Northumberlãds seruants and tenaunts, he made Proclamation before the castell gate, that euery of them within the castell should come forth and withdraw to theyr owne houses, vpon payne to be reputed rebelles to the Queenes Maiestie, and that which of them soeuer did refuse to obey this Proclamatiõ, staying either in the castell or els where in any vnlawfull assemblie, it should be lawfull for euery man to spoyle his goodes, and him to kill if he made resistance. This Proclamation notwithstanding, they within the Castel, at the first refused to yeelde it vp, & therevpon sir John Forster marched through the towne into the market place, and there made the lyke Proclamatiõ in behalf of all the inhabitants that were the Earle of Northumberlandes tenauntes, for their repayring home to their houses, and comming herewith backe towardes the castell, they within perceyuing themselues destitute of succour, & Sir John Forster to increase in power, they vpon better aduise yeelded themselues vnto him, who saued all theyr liues. After the same maner he got also the castell of Warkworth, & fortified them bothe with sufficient numbers of men.

This done, he assembled suche forces as hee was able to make, so that he got togither to the number of .xj. hundred horsemen, & tooke order to forlay, & stoppe the passages, so as the Erles frendes and tenants in Northumberlãd, should not go vnto him. After this hauing in his company ỳ L. Ogle, and Tho. Forster his brother and other Gentlemen, he went to new Castell, where with Thomas Gower Esquire, & ỳ had the principal rule therof at that present, he tooke order for the defence of that towne agaynst the rebelles. Hither came to him sir Henry Percy, offeryng his seruice agaynst his brother and other the rebelles to the vttermost of his power.

Herevpon diuers excursions were made forth of Newcastell into the Bishoprike, where the two Earles were encamped, and sundry skirmishes chanced betwixte the parties, though no great hurte followed thereof. The Earles yet one day came from Durham, and with theyr army marched towards Newcastell. Sir John Forster & sir Henry Percy, hauing intelligence thereof, issued forth of Newcastell with all their forces and certayne peeces of great ordinance. They had also with them certaine bands of the Souldiers of Berwike, meanyng verily to haue ioyned battel with the Erles, Sir Henry Percy shewyng himselfe as willing & forward therto as any other in all the cõpanies. At Chester Dean, midway betwixte Durham and Newcastel, the armies approched the one neare to the other, a small broke renning in a hollow, deuided them in sunder, so that there was no passage for them to conuey their ordinaunce ouer, the bankes on eyther side beyng so steepe and combersome. Wherevpon the Earles perceyuing that they were disappointed of their purpose, after some skirmishes betwixt the horsemen, they returned vnto Durham, and frõ thence the next day they went to Hexham, and after beyng in vtter dispaire fledde into Scotlande, where the Erle of Westmerlande light among those that shifted him away so from place to place, that he escaped out of that realme, when he coulde no longer remayne there in suertie: but the Earle of Northumberland fell into their handes, whiche deliuered him vnto the Regent, who thought he coulde do no lesse than to put him in safe keeping, considering the amitie that was betwixte the two Princes, the Queenes Maiestie of England and the King of Scottes.

But shortly after the Regent (as he was riding through Lithquho,) was wickedly shot in with an harquebuse by one James Hamilton, and so wounded, that the next day he died of the hurte. After whose death the Lordes of the Kings parte with generall consent wrote letters vnto the Earle of Lennox then remayning in England, to repayre home with all conuenient speede into Scotland. Ye may reade in the history of England, in what sorte the Earle of Sussex Lorde Lieutenant of the North partes entring into Tiuidale the .xvij. of Aprill, brent the Mosse tower, the towne of Crawling, the castell of Fernihirst, the towne of Howike, and the castell of Braunton, that belonged to the laird of Buclewgh, with diuers other castelles, Piles, Townes, and Villages, and Hamlettes belongyng to the lairdes of Fernihirst, Buclewgh and others in those parties: also how the Lorde Scroupe inuaded the West boundres of Scotlande the same time. And likewise how the sayde Earle of Sussex wanne the Castell of Hume, with diuers other maters which here I passe ouer, referring you to the sayd history.

But now about the same time the Earle of Leuenor hauing gotte licence of the Queene of Englande to make his returne into Scotlande, was set forwarde & came to Berwike towardes the later ende of Aprill, where being visited with sickenesse, he remayned by the space of fourtene dayes or more.

The earle of Lennox sent forewarde to returne into scotland.

In the meane time the Duke of Chatellerault, the Earles of Huntley, and Cassels, the Lord Flemmyng and sundry others of that faction, seeyng the time serued well for their purpose, now that the Regent was slayne and dispatched out of the way, gathered a power to the number of three thousande men, & came downe to Edenburgh, but after they had knowledge that the Earle of Lennox was cõming out of England with a power of Englishmen by the Queenes Maiesties appointment, aswel for the safegarde of the yong king, as also for the safeconduct of the Erle of Lennox home into Scotlande, the Duke and Erles aforesayde retyred themselues from Edenburgh to Glasquho, where they besieged the Castell by the space of fiue or sixe dayes, untill the Earle of Lennox approched thitherwardes. For ye haue to understand that after the Earle of Lennox was recouered of his sickenesse, there was appoynted a power of horsemen and footemen, to goe with him into Scotlãd, under the leading of sir Williã Drurie, as in the English history ye may reade more at large. There were diuers valiant capitaines and Gentlemen, that wente with him in that iourney, aswell such as had charge as those that went with him of their owne good willes, to see the order of things, and to help to aduance their Princes seruice. With charge there were these: Sir George Carie Capitayne of one hundreth lances, Henry Iustell capitaine of fiftie lances, William Gurley capitaine of fiftie lances: Master Henrie Carie Capitayne of two hundred light horsemen: Capitayne Case Lieutenant of the generals bande of light horsemen, beyng also two hundreth: Sir Robert Connestable Sergeant Maior of the footebandes: Sir Thomas Maners, capitayne Brickwell, capitayne Caruille, Capitayne Game, Capitayne Lambarde, capitayne Erington, John Connestable, and Humfrey Berwike leaders of the footemen. Capitayne Erington was also Lieutenant to sir George Caries company of lances. Other Gentlemen that went of their owne good willes there were diuers, as Master George Deuereux, Sir Jerome Bowes, Master Williã Knolles, Master Robert Knolles, Master Michell Carie, Master Gawdie, Master William Drury of Suffolke cosin to the General, Master Greuille, brother to Sir Foulke Greuille, Master Conwey, brother to sir John Conwey, Master Edmund Verney, & many other, whose names I coulde not learne.

Captaynes and Gentlemenne that wente wyth the Earle of Lennox into Scotlande.

The footemen lay the first night at Coldingham, the nexte day the Earle of Lennox himselfe with sir William Drurie and the horsemẽ ouertoke the footemen, and lodged that night at Dunbar. The next day they made such speede in their marche, that they came through to Edenburgh, where they found the Earles of Morton, Murrey, Glencarne, the Lordes Ruthuen, Lindsey, Simpil, Glamis, Methuen, Ogiltree, and Catcart, with diuers Gentlemenne of the Kings side, who receyued the sayde Earle of Lennox, and the Englishmẽ very courteously. From Edẽburgh they passed to Lithquho, as in the English historie it may appeare, and from thence the footemẽ passed to Faukirke, and there lodged, but the Earle of Lennox, and the Scottish Lordes, with Sir William Drury, and the horsemen rode to Sterlyng where the king lay, then beyng in the custodie of the Earle of Mar. From thence they went to Glasquho, where the Duke had besieged the castell, whiche was valiantly defended by the Laird of Minto and his brethern, with their seruantes being not past an eightene persons in all, and yet they kepte it fiue or sixe dayes against the Duke and his whole power, saying as hath bene reported aboue fourtie or fiftie of his menne, but in the ende they were in greate daunger to haue bene take, if they had not bene ỹ more speedely relieued, but the Duke and his adherentes understandyng of the commyng forewarde of the Erle of Lennox with the English forces, brake vp his siege and fledde away, with losse and dishonour as in the English historie we haue likewise noted.

After that the Earle of Lennox and his frendes were thus commen to Glasquho, finding the siege rayled, he remayned there by the space of fiue or sixe dayes, duryng whiche tyme there came to him of his kinrede and frendes, whiche ought to him their seruice, according to the vse of the countrey, the number of a foure thousande men, very well appoynted after their maner, the more parte out of the countreys of Lennox, and Darneley, whiche mustered before the sayde Earle, and sir William Drurie generall of the Englishmen there.

This done the Earle of Lennox accompanied with the Earles and Lordes afore mentioned, and lykewise with the Englishmenne, marched to Hamilton, where they entred into the Palayce belonging to the Duke, and lodged therein that night.

The nexte day they besieged the Castell, whereof Andrew Hamilton of Merinton was Capitayne, hauing vnder him fiftie Souldiers to defende it, and woulde not therefore deliuer it till that two peeces of greate ordinaunce being brought from Sterlyng, were planted in batterie: for then perceyuing themselues in danger to be taken by force, the Capitayne offered to yeelde the house to the Englishmenne, but not to the Lordes of Scotlande, with condition to haue the liues of al them within saued, which was graunted, vpon promise, that they shoulde neuer after beare armes against their King, and to departe the Realme within a certayne terme, and hereunto they were swoine, but they kept not long their othe: for the night nexte ensuyng, suyng, they besette the Lorde Simpil that was lodged at that presente in a house not farre off, and not able to keepe it, till reskewe came, yeelded it, and himselfe prisoner, so that he was kepte by the Hamiltons in safe custodie by the space of a twelue moneth after.

The Castell of Hamilton beeing yeelded (as ye haue heard) was blowen vp with powder.

Diuers other houses there in the Countrey about were brente also, as Roplocke, the Abbot of Kilwynnings house, with diuers other of the Hamiltons houses in Clidesdale.

After the Castell of Hamilton was thus wonne and ouerthrowen, the Lordes returned to the Palace, and lodged there againe that nighte, and on the morrowe, they set fire both vpon the same Palace, and also vpon the towne of Hamilton, and therewith the Englishmen taking leaue of the Lords in Scotlande, departed homewards (as in the Englishe historie yee may reade more at large. The Earle of Morton wente with them, but the Earle of Lennox and the other Earles and Lordes with theyr companies toke their way toward Glasquho, and from thence euery of the noble men departed home to their houses.

Shortly after, there was a conuention of the Lordes at Striueling, where the Earle of Lennox was made lord Lieutenant of Scotlande, and afterwardes in August following, there was an other conuention at Edenburgh, where by the consent of the three estates of the Realme, the sayd Earle was made Regent of Scotlande.

And about the same time, the Erle of Huntley toke vpon him to be Lieutenant of Scotland for the Queene of Scottes that remayned still in Englande, and thereupon in hir name sommoned a Parliament to be holden at Lithquho the one and twentith of September then next following, vnto the which Parliament, as well the Earle of Lennox then Regente, as all the residue of the Lordes of both the parties were sommoned. Whereof the Regent being aduertised, caused a Parliamente to be sommoned in the Kings name to be kept likewise at Lithquho, at the selfe same daye whiche was appointed by the Earle of Huntley, at which day, there appeared the Lordes of the Kings partie, and also sundry greate Lairdes, Knightes, and Gentlemen, to the number of eyghte thousand, verye well furnished, looking for the Earle of Huntleys commyng, according to his appointed order, but hee came no neerer than Brechin, whereupon it was decreed by the Regent and nobilitie there to pursue hym, and to that ende the Earle of Morton was sente before with a thousande Horsemen to haue taken him vpon the suddayne in the Towne of Brechin, before he should haue had any warning of their comming. the Regent following after with an army, but Huntley hauing warning of their approch escaped their handes, although very narrowly, in somuche, that some of his seruemenne were so put to their shiftes, that they were driuē for their refuge (being so beset on the suddayne) to take the Castell of Brechine, the Earle of Huntley promising before he went from them, to succour them within eyght dayes: but they being straitely besieged, and the Earle not keeping promise with them, after those eyght dayes were expired, they yeelded themselues and the Castell vnto the Regents mercy.

They were in all aboute three hundred, of which number. xxxj. of the chiefest were executed. Some of them had borne armes agaynste the King before that tyme, and had bin pardoned, and therefore were nowe thoughte by the Regent and his frendes the more worthy to die. After this, the Regent returned to Striueling, and from thence passed to the Castell of Downe, and besieged it, beeing kepte by the seruaunts of the Lorde of S. Colmes Inch, who yeelded it to the Regent after three dayes siege.

Execution.

The Castell of Downe yeelded.

During the time of the Regents being there, he sent one of his seruants called John Wynne, with letters into Englande, directed to the M. of Englands Counsell, who for his secret practising and conference had with suche as were enimies to the King and Regente before his departure out of Scotland, and for receyuing of their letters to be conueyd also, and herewyth discouering sundry secretes to them the whych were committed to his credite and trust, he was apprehended, and the same letters which he had secretely receyued beeing founde vpon him, and the matters aforesaid being proued against him he was executed.

About the same time the Erle of Morton, the Abbot of Dunfermeling, and James Magil, Clearke of the Register, wer sent into England Commissioners, vpon the Kings partie the Bishop of Rosse, the Abbot of Kilwinning, and the Lord Leuingston, appointed for the M. then being in Englād. In January following, the Regent then beeing at Edenburgh, Claude Hamilton, one of the Duke of Chatelleraultes sonnes entred the house of Paslay, then beeyng kepte by the seruantes of the Lord Simpil, and seazing vpon all things which he there found as stoode with his pleasure, hee fortified the house with men, munition, and victuales, such as he could get either in the towne of Paslay, or neere thereabouts. The Regent aduertised therof, repaired thither with a power in all speedy wise, and layd siege to the house. They within sewed for a truce whiche was graunted to them for the space of fiue dayes, the better to aduise of their owne estate, which tearme being expired, Proclamation was made by the Regent, that if they would yeeld the house, so many of them as had not borne armes before ẏ time againste the King and Regent, shoulde haue their lyues saued, the rest to remaine at the Regents pleasure.

Heerevppon contention rose among them within the house: for whereas the more part of thẽ hauing not serued in any iourney or exploit against ẏ King before that time, would needes yeelde, the other, beeyng the lesse number, were not able to defend it of themselues, wherevpon they were ready to drawe their weapons one against another, but yet in the ende they al agreed to surrender the house, and yeelded themselues, vpon such condition as the Regente had prescribed, wherevpon fyue of them were executed, and all the rest were pardoned of theyr liues, the Captayne John Hamilton, Lard of Coughnall and his two brethren excepted, who were sente to the Castell of Glasquho, there to remayne in prison, and shortly after the sayd John Hamilton was executed.

Pusslay is surrendred to the Regent.

In Marche following, the Regent returned to Glasquho, and for that the Earles of Cassill and Eglenton refused to shew themselues obedient to the King, and woulde not come in to the Regent, who had sente for them by letters, at sundrye tymes, the Regent gathered his power at Glasquho, and with the same marched towards Urwin and Air, and so forward to the Earle of Cassils Countrey, who hearing of the Regents comming, sent forth his brother to offer his submission, wherevpon it was concluded that the messenger shoulde remayne wyth the Regente as pledge for his brother by the space of twenty dayes, and then the saide Earle to make his appearance before the Regente at Striueling, to aunswere such matters as shuld be layd to his charge.

The Regent goeth againste the Earle of Cassels.

The same time also the Earle of Eglenton layd his hande in also to appeare and aunswere in like sort, and as well the one as the other according to their assurance giuen, appeared at the day appointed, but yet not agreeing to such articles as were required of them, they were both committed to prison, the one in the Castell of Dunbretayne, and the other in the Castell of Downe.

The Earles of Cassils and Eglenton committed to warde.

Afterwardes there was a truce taken betweene the Regent and the Hamiltons, and their adherentes for twenty dayes, viz. vntill the last of March, whiche truce once ended, the Regente determined with hymselfe to giue an attempte to the Castell of Dunbretayne, which had bin long kepte by the Lorde Flemming againste the King, and the Earle of Murrey, late Regente, who hadde besieged it for the space of halfe a yeare or more, but coulde not by any meanes compasse to winne it: but nowe the firste of Aprill, the truce being then expired, the Regent going forwarde with his purpose, caused all the passages round about the Countrey to be stopped, as well by land as by water, and the same night sente thytherwarde Captayne Crafort, and Captayne Hume, with an hundred Souldiers, chosen out for the purpose, who the seconde of Aprill, aboute foure of the clocke in the morning, came to the Castell, where the Souldiers with ladders, ropes, and other deuises, found meanes to climbe vppe the Rocke, whiche is of an exceeding great heigth, and so with greate paine and more daunger, at length gote vp to the wall of the Castell, standing vpon the heigth of the Rocke, to the which wall they reared vp a ladder, by the whiche entred firste one Ramsey, ensigne bearer to Captaine Crafort, and leaping ouer the wall, was straightwayes assayled by three of the watchmen, of the whiche hee slewe one: and a Souldiour named Wederborne that followed him, beeyng the second that entred, slewe another of them. The thirde of those watchmen was also slayne, as hee was aboute to flee from them.

The Castell Dunbretayne taken by a policy.

Heerewith Captayne Crafort and Captayne Hume gote ouer the wall, and entring the Castell with the rest of their Souldiers, stroke vp the drumme, cryed a Derneley, beeing their watch worde, and seazing vpon the ordinance, manned the same.

The Lorde Flemming Captayne of the Castell, hearing that suddayne fright and tumulte within the house, fledde out by the posterne gate at the neather baile, and so escaping, gote a fishers boate, and passed into Argile.

The Souldiours of the Castell perceyuing theyr Captayne fledde, and the Castell possessed by the enimies, yeelded themselues, and were pardoned. There were taken within the Castell the Archbishoppe of Saint Andrewes, Monsieur de Uiracke a Frenchman, sente thyther by the French King, also the Lady Flemming, wife to the Lorde Flemming, and John Flemming, Laird of Boghall, and John Hall, an Englishman, being partner of a new intended conspiracie in England, as was after proued agaynste hym, for the whyche hee was arreigned, condemned, and executed at London, (as in the Englishe history appeareth.) The thirde of Aprill, beeyng the morrowe after that Dunbretaine was thus straungelye wonne, the Regente came thither, thither, and entred the same, where hee calling the Capitaines and Souldiers togither caused them with hym to kneele down vpō their knees, & to giue to God humble thankes for their good successe in that enterprize, brought to passe rather by the prouidence of God than otherwise, sithe the Castell seemed to all those that knewe it impossible in maner to be wonne, by reason of the great heyght of the rocke, and the strange situation, beyng enuironed almoste rounde about with the water of Clide on the one side, and the water of Leuin on the other.

The reporte of the winnyng of this Castell was ioyfull to the Townes and Countries about, which before had bene a cōtinuall scourge to them, by reason that the Souldiers that kept it woulde issue out at sundry times, robbyng spoyling and caryng away the commodities of the inhabitants there aboutes, aswell by land as by water.

The Regent dealt very honorably with the Ladie Flemming, suffryng hir to departe away with all suche plate and Iewels, as appertayned eyther to hyr or to hyr husband. He graunted also a safeconduct vnto Monsieur de Verack, to passe homewardes throughe the countrey, but the Archbishoppe of Saint Andrewes was sent prysoner to Sterlyng. The spoyle of the goodes founde in the Castell was giuen to the Souldiers that ventured so daungerously to atchieue so highe an enterprize, bryngyng it to the wished effect by policie with so little bloudshed as deserueth perpetuall remembraunce.

The day next ensuyng beyng the fourth of Iyull, the Regent appointed Iohn Cunningham Laird of Drumwhassell, a man of good seruice, and seruaunt to the Regent to be Capitayne of that Castell, and leauyng him therein, departed to Sterlyng, where he caused the Archbishoppe of Saint Andrewes to be examined vpon certayne Articles, aswell touchyng the murder of the late King Henry, as also for the death of the Earle of Murrey the late Regent, at what time there came in a Priest without compulsion of any, as hath bene sayde, and before the Regent declared, that one Iohn Hamilton beyng in extreme sickenesse vnder confession, tolde him that the Bishoppe did sende him with three others to the murther of the King. And as touchyng the murther of the Erle of Murrey, the Bishoppes answere was, that hee might haue letted it if hee woulde: therewith the people that hearde him, cryed away with him, hang him, and so for these and other offences, for the whiche he had bene forfalted afore that tyme, he was nowe executed on a Gibette, sette vp in the market place of Sterlyng towne.

After this, the Regent summoned a Parliament to beginne at Edenburgh the xiiij. of May nexte ensuyng, & passed from Sterlyng to Lithquho, where the Earle of Morton with the reste of the Cōmissioners for the kings part, beyng returned out of Englande with other of the Nobilitie mette the Regent, and then they passed towards Edēburgh, where they thought to haue bene receyued, and so to haue kepte the Parliament there, but they were not suffered to enter that towne nor yet the Castell, the same beyng defended agaynst them by the Laird of Grange, who after the death of the Earle of Murrey, was reuolted from the Kings parte to the Hamiltons side, and had fortified bothe the towne and Castell, so that the Regent and Nobilitie beyng kepte out there, helde theyr Parliament in the Cannogate streete within the Suburbes of the towne, where sundry of the Queenes parte were forfalted.

A Parliament summoned.

The castell of Edenburgh kept by the laird of Grāge against the Regent.

This beyng done, and sundry skirmishes had with them that issued forth of the towne agaynste them without, the Regent returned to Sterlyng there to remayne for a season.

In this meane time the Earle of Morton hauing certaine shippe come forth of Englande by sea, and brought to lande at Leith, sente the Laird of Carmichell with his householde seruants, and two hundred shotte, to fetche the same from thence vnto Dalkith, beyng a fiue myles distant from Leith. As they returne with the shippe, they were set vpon by the Earle of Huntley, and the Lorde Hume, who issued out of Edenburgh with their power, so that betwixte them there was a very hoate skirmishe, but in the ende the Earle of Huntley, and the Lord Hume were constrayned to flee, and were pursued by Carmichell and his company euen vnto the gates of Edenburgh, some of theyr menne beyng slayne and other taken prysoners.

The laird of Carmichell.

The Erle of Huntley and Lord Hume put to flight.

For reuenge of which ouerthrow, shortly after the Earle of Huntley, and Claude Hamilton with theyr forces marched from Edēburgh to Dalkith, purposing to haue spoiled the towne, but the Earle of Morton hauing knowledge of theyr intention and commyng, sallyed forth of Dalkith with the power whiche hee had there with hym, although not comparable in number to his aduersaries, and meetyng them in the field, there was a sharp skyrmish betwixt them, and many hutte on bothe parties, but in the ende the Earle of Morton was put to the worse, fourtie or more of his menne beyng taken prysoners, and the cause was for that his footemen were to forewarde, wanting help of their horsemen that should haue succoured them.

The Erle of Morton put to the worse.

About the fiue and twentie of May fol-lowyng Capitayne Cullen issued forth of Edenburgh with two hundreth shotte, meanyng to intercept certayne Harquebusiers which were appoynted to come out of Fife ouer the riuer of the Fourth, vnto the Earle of Morton, who kepte still at Dalketh, wherevpon the sayd Erle hauyng knowledge of Cullens enterprise, aduertised the Regent thereof, who beyng then at Sterling, the nexte day came downe to Dunfermlyng in Fife, but before his cōming thither Cullen had met wt a boate vpon ỹ water, wherin were aboute .xxv. shot, whom he toke prisoners, & led them away with him to Edenburgh.

Capitayne Cullen.

The nexte day the Earle of Morton came to Leith, where he met with sir William Drurie, and there they lodged that night. The nexte morryng Sir William Drurie passing forth of Leith towardes Edenburgh, accompanied with sundry capitaynes and other Gentlemen for his conuoy thither, they within Edenburgh perceyuing them comming, imagined that they were come forth to offer a skirmish, wherevpon they issued out of the towne and castell to encoūtre them, so that beyng readie on eyther side to beginne the skirmishe, sir William Drurie beyng come to talke with the parties for some accorde to be had, toke in hande with great diligence to appeale them, and at length procured them to agree vpon a truce to endure till eyght of the clocke at night, but yet when bothe partes stayed in the fieldes for the space of an howre, bycause they could not agree whether companie should firste retyre from the fielde, they fell at length in skirmishe, notwithstandyng the truce, and sought right sharply for the tyme, till in the ende they of the Towne and Castell had the ouerthrow, the Abbot of Kilwinnyng beyng slayne with diuers other, and there were taken aboue an hundred prysoners, amongst the whiche the Lorde Hume, and capitayne Cullen were accompted principall. Those that escaped were chased and constreyned for theyr safegarde to flee into the towne of Edenburgh, capitayne Cullen was afterwardes beheaded.

The Regent immediatly after this skirmish came with all speede vnto Leith, aswell to fortifie the towne, as to make some further attempt against his aduersaries within the towne and castell of Edenburgh. Herevpon was Leith entrenched rounde aboute, beyng esteemed a place of great importance standyng bothe in the face of the enimies, and so ready to annoy the, and also serueng well to preuent them of suche succour as they looked for dayly out of France.

Leith fortified

In this meane time the Laird of Grangt then Capitayne of the Castell, and Prouost of the towne of Edenburgh, caused Proclamation to be made, that all those inhabitantes whiche were not willing to take parte with him in his doynges, should departe out of the towne, wherevpon many of them departed thence, togither with theyr wiues and children, and toke with them also suche goodes as they could secretely conuey, & cōming to Leith, offered theyr seruice vnto the Regent, who thankfully accepted theyr offer, and so they remayned at Leith, seruing against the cōtrary factiō vpō their own expēces.

A Proclamation.

After this, the Laird of Grange vnderstanding that reporte had bene made by some of the Kings parte, that he was a traytour to the king and an enimy to his countrey, offered the combatte to any that would iustifie the same: which beyng aduertised to them within Leith, diuers Gentlemen were desirous to vndertake the chalenge, but the Regent graunted it to the Laird of Farlisch, beyng a Stewarde, and his Kinsman, who had earnestly requested it, wherevpon after diuers messages by Heraultes sente to and fro betwixte them, the tyme and place was appoynted, but the matter went not forwarde, excuse beyng made on the behalfe of the Laird Grange, that by reason of the charge which was committed to him, it was not thought conuenient that he should hazarde the whole cause vpon his owne person.

The Laird Garlisch.

Shortly after, there came out of France one John Chesholme, who was sente with money to the Laird of Grange for the payment of his Souldiers: he brought with him also a certaine quātitie of powder and three hundred calliuers. Vpon his entring into the water of Fourth, and comming vp the same, he learned how the Regent was in Leith, whervpō he lāded at Brent yland, and afterwardes for feare hid himselfe betwixte two cliffes of a rocke, not farre from the Queenes ferie: but at length he was feūd out by the Abbot of S. Combes Inche, and deliuered to the Regent at Leith, in which towne the said Regent lay aboue two monethes, vsing sundry meanes, aswell by practise & politie, as by force to haue taken the towne of Edenburgh. In the meane time sundry skirmishes chanced betwixt them, & diuers prysoners were taken on eyther part. At length the Regent caused a Parliament to be summoned, appointing the same to be holden at Sterling the .xxij. of August nexte ensuing. And when that day approched, he lefte the Lord Lindsey at Leith in charge, as his Lieutenant to gouerne the towne, and all the men of warre appointed to remaine in garde therof, and repayred himselfe vnto Sterling, where at the prefixed day there assembled the Erles of Morton, Mar, Crafort, Sotherlād, Mōtros, Eglenton, Glencarne, the Lordes Ruthuen, Glamis, Methuen, Simple, Ogiltree, and Catcart, with many Lairdes and Gentlemenne.

A Parliament summoned.

The

The first day of this Parliament the King was conueyed thither, the Crowne, Scepter, & swoꝛd being boꝛne befoꝛe him.

When he had taken his place, he vttered certaine speech as had bin taughte hym, touching the assembling of that Parliament, which matter the Regent moꝛe at large declared vnto the whole house: and this done, they pꝛoceeded fuꝛther to other affayꝛes, concerning the state of the common wealth.

Moꝛeouer in this Parliamente, the Duke of Chatellerault with his two sonnes, the Ibbot of Inchoth, and Claude Hamilton, the Earle of Huntley, the Laird of Grange, and sundꝛy others were foꝛfalted.

This Parliament continued by the space of seauen dayes, at the ende whereof, to witte, vpon the seconde of September, Claude Hamilton, the Laird of Bucluigh, the Lairde of Dꝛmiston, and diuers other, to the number of thꝛee hundꝛed Hoꝛsemen, veꝛy earely in the moꝛning, entred the towne of Striueling, and suddainely beset not only the Regent, but also the rest of the nobilitie within their lodgings.

The Regente hearing a great vpꝛoꝛe ꝛeysed within the Towne, and not vnderstanding the cause, noꝛ who were the authouꝛs thereof, after hee perceyued how the house wherein he lodged was besette on each side, he defended the same againste the enimies foꝛ a good space, but at length, despairing of succoures, and doubting least the house had bin vnderleid with some barrels of powder, and that it would be blowen vp if hee yeelded not as some told him: and the enimie to encrease that doubte, cꝛying still blowe vp the house, what should we stande longer about him, at length he was contented to yeelde to the Laird of Dꝛmiston, but not befoꝛe he saw that some of his stoutest Captaines had yeelded themselues befoꝛe his face. He yeelded, with condition to haue his life saued: but pꝛomise in that behalfe was not long kepte, foꝛ those that hadde thus taken him, when they pꝛeceyued ꝛescue comming downe from the Castell, so that they should not bee able to carrie him away, Captayne Cauder with a pistolet, shotte him into the body befoꝛe he could be recouered out of their handes: The rest of the nobilitie, to witte, the Earles of Moꝛton, Eglenton, and Glencarne, and diuers other being taken pꝛisoners, were pꝛesently ꝛescued by those that issued out of the Castell.

The Earle of Moꝛton being in the handes of the Laird of Bouclugh, toke the same Laird pꝛisoner, hee yeelding himselfe vnto him: and likewise the Earle of Glencarne toke his keeper pꝛisoner, and so did sundꝛy others take their takers: but Claude Hamilton, and others with their companies, hauing firste got all the hoꝛses that were founde in the Towne into theyꝛ handes, when they hearde that the ꝛescue was coming, shifted foꝛ themselues, and fled away.

The Regent being moꝛtally wounded, but yet deliuered from his enimies, ridde vp to the Castell, and calling there vnto him the whole nobilitie, when he pꝛeceiued his ende to appꝛoch, hee vsed these woꝛdes oꝛ the like in substance, as followeth.

My Lords, it is not vnknowen vnto you al, that my comming hither to take this regimente vppon me, was not of mine owne seeking, but at the ꝛequest of you all: and that which chiefely moued me heꝛeunto, was, foꝛ the defence of the Kings pꝛeson, beeyng yet as you see an infante, of whome by nature and duetie I was bounden to haue carefull consideration, and that in hys minoꝛitie, the good and quiet goꝛernement of this common wealthe might bee aduanced, and iustice executed vpon those that most cruelly dyd murther the late King, my soune the Kyngs father, and his vncle the good Earle of Murrey, late Regent, whose mischieuous and diuelish deuises if in time you doe not pꝛeuent, by your wisedomes and discretions, they will pꝛocure the finall duetthꝛowe and destruction of you all. The Earle of Lennox his words before his death.

In this action as you see, I haue spente my bloud, and haue playd the last part of my Tragedie, and nowe I feele death to dꝛawe neere at hande, wheꝛefoꝛe I ꝛequire you all, foꝛ the due regarde that you haue of youre duelies, firste to Almighty God, and next to the king, your most lawfull and natuꝛall Pꝛince nowe in these hys tender yeares, wholly to employ your seruice in his defence, with care to mayntayne the state of this common wealthe, whereby you shall not onely accomplishe youre duelies towards God, but shall be assured to find in your King in time to come (God lending him life) all that good whych you can iustly ꝛequite.

And I shall further committe to your friendly pꝛotection, my poꝛe seruantes, who foꝛ theyꝛ good seruice haue well deserued, and yet remaine vnrecompenced, desiring you all to be good vnto them.

And lastly, I desire you to commend me to my Lady Margaret my deere Wife, now beeing in England, vnto whome I beseech God to be a comfoꝛter.

And now sith my spirites begin to fayle, and that my life dꝛaweth neere to an ende, I take my leaue of you al, desiring you to pꝛay foꝛ me.

These woꝛdes beeyng ended, hee called to God foꝛ mercy, and continuing in pꝛayer vnto the ende, within a while after hee departed thys life, and was buryed in the Kyngs The Earle of Lennox departeth this life.

After his decease, the Lordes assembled togither in the Towne of Sterling, and chose the Earle of Mar to bee Regent, who continued in that office till hee dyed, and then was the Earle of Morton elected Regente, who gouerneth at this day: of whose doings, for that I haue no certaine instructions, I omitte to make further report hauing hitherto continued this historie of Scotlande not so largely nor perfectly as I could haue wished, but shambled forwarde with it in such sort as you may see, hauing deliuered nothing vnto you to impaire the credite of the Scottish nation, otherwise than I haue founde in Authours, or learned by credible reporte, as I take it, hauyng put off the partiall affection, whiche I beare of duty to mine owne countrey, in this respect, that I should not seeme to wrast the wordes of Writers, eyther to the aduantage of the Englishe people, or disaduantage of the Scottes, specially in politique gouernemente, warlike exploytes, ciuill demeanor, and other vertuous exercises, whiche as I haue founde them eyther in anye one person particularly, or in the multitude in generall, so I haue reported the same, not sparing the trueth herein as I haue found it recorded, either for loue or hatred, dread, fauor, or enuy: but yet in no wise presuming (as else where I haue sayde) to vse mine owne censure, but rather leauing the iudgement of other mens reportes vnto the Readers discretion, to whome I wishe such vnderstanding and knowledge in ỹ trueth, as may satisfie him selfe, and redounde to the publique commoditie of hys Countrey, and pleasure of the almighty, in whose hands are the harts of Kings, and gouernours, guiding the states of Realmes, and common wealthes, as to his diuine wisedome seemeth most expedient: To whom be glory, honor and prayse for euer.

TO THE RIGHT

Honourable ſir Henry Sydney Knight,

Lorde Deputie Generall of Irelande, Lorde preſident of Wales, Knight of the moſte noble Order of the Garter, and one of hir Maieſties priuie Counſel within hir Realme of Englande.

*A king in hande right Ho-*norable, to gither the perticular Hiſtories of diuers Countries and Nations, to ioyn vvith a Coſmographie, vvhich one Reginald VVoulfe late Printer to the Queenes Maieſtie, meant to publiſhe in our Engliſh tounge: vvhen I came to cõſider of the Hiſtories of Ireland, I founde my ſelfe ſo vnprouided of helpes, to ſet dovvne any perticular diſcourſe therof, that I vvas in diſpaire to enterprice to vvrite any thing at all concerning that realme, othervviſe thã incidently, as fell to purpoſe, to touche the ſame in the Hiſtorie of England. At length yet as Maiſter VVoulfes vſe vvas to imparte to me all ſuche helpes as he might at any hande procure for my furtherance, in the collections of the other Hiſtories, vvherevvith I ſpecially dealte, his happe vvas to light alſo vpon a copie of tvvoo Bookes of the Iriſhe Hiſtories, compiled by one Edmond Campion, fellovv ſomtime of S. Iohn Baptiſts Colledge in Oxforde, very vvell penned certenly, but ſo briefe, as it vvere to be vviſhed that occaſion had ſerued him to haue vſed more leyſure, and thereby to haue deliuered to vs a larger diſcourſe of the ſame Hiſtories: for as he himſelfe confeſſeth, hee had not paſte tenne vveekes ſpace to gather his mater: a very ſhorte time doubtleſſe for ſuche a peece of vvorke. But hovve breefe ſo euer I founde him, at the perſuaſion of Maiſter VVoulfe, vpon the hauing of that copie, I reſolued to make ſhift to frame a ſpeciall Hiſtorie of Irelande, in like maner as I had done of other Regions, follovvyng Campions order, and ſetting dovvne his ovvne vvordes, excepte in places vvhere I had mater to enlarge that (out of other Authours,) vvhich he had vvritten in briefe: and this I haue thought good to ſignifie, the rather for that I eſteeme it good dealing in no vviſe to defraude him of his due deſerued prayſe.

But novv after I had continued the Hiſtorie, and enlarged it out of Giraldus Cambrenſis, Flatsbury, Henry of Marleburgh, and other, till the yeare. 1509 in vvhich that famous Prince Henry the. viij. began his reigne, ſome of thoſe that vvere to beſtovv the charges of the Impreſſion, procured a learned Gentleman Maiſter Richard Stanyhurſt, to continue it from thence forvvarde as he ſavv occaſion, being furniſhed vvith mater to enlarge the vvorke, vvhereof for thoſe later times I founde my ſelfe vtterly voyde, more than that vvhiche Campion had deliuered. VVhat I haue done herein, your Honours diſcretion ſhall eaſily cõceyue. For the imperfection ſith it is the firſt that hath bene ſet forth in Printe, I craue moſt humbly pardon of your good Lordſhippe, beſeeching you rather to reſpect my good vvill than the perfectneſſe of the vvorke, vvhiche the vvantes conſidered for the orderly furniſhyng thereof, is not to be looked for in the skilfull, muche leſſe in me the meaneſt of all, and leaſt able to performe it. Hauing preſented the right Honorable the Erle of Leyceſter vvith the Hiſtorie of Scotlande, to vvhome (as I haue hearde) Campion made Dedication of his booke, I coulde not remember me to vvhome I might more conueniently offer this my trauell in this Hiſtorie of Ireland, than to your Lordſhip, being hir Maieſties Lieutenant in that Realme. And therfore in moſt humble vviſe I exhibite the booke to your Honour, beſeeching the ſame to beare vvith my bolde attempt therein, and to receyue it in good parte from him that vviſhed to haue more amplie ſatiſfied your good Lordſhippes expectation, if abilitie might haue anſvvered good vvill.

Thus I beſeech the Lorde to guyde your harte in his holy vvayes, and to furniſh you vvith politike prudence and skilfull knovvledge, to gouerne in your eſtate and office, ſo as your doyngs may redounde to his glorie, the ſuretie of hir Maieſties dominion there, your ovvne aduancement in Honour, and conſequently to the ſure ſupporte and peaceable quietneſſe of the true and loyall ſubiectes of that Realme.

Your honours moſt humble to commaunde,
RAPHAEL HOLINSHED.

¶ A Treatise contayning a playne and perfect Description of Irelande, with an Introduction, to the better vnderstanding of the hystories, appartayning to that Iſlande: compyled by Richard Stanyhurſt, and written to the Ryght Honorable, Syr Henry Sydney Knight, Lorde Deputie of Irelande, Lorde preſident of Wales, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, and one of hir Maieſties priuie Counſell within hir realme of England.

MY VERY good Lorde, there haue bene diuers of late, that with no ſmall toyle, and great commendacion, haue throughly imployed themſelues, in culling and packing togither the ſcrapings and fragments of the Hyſtorie of Ireland. Amog which crew, my faſt friende, & inwarde compagnion, M. Edmond Campion, dyd ſo learnedly bequite himſelfe, in the penning of certayne briefe notes, cõcerning that countrey, as certes it was greatly to be lamented, that eyther hys theame had not bene ſhorter, or elſe his leaſure had not bene longer. For if Alexander were ſo rauiſht with Homer hys hyſtorie, that notwithſtading Therſites were a crabbed and a rugged dwarfe, being in outwarde feature ſo deformed, and in inwarde conditions ſo crooked, as he ſeemed to ſtande to no better ſtede, then to leade Apes in hell, yet the valiaunt capitayne weighing, howe liuely the golde Poet ſet forth the ougly dandepratin his coulours, dyd ſoner wyſhe to be Homer his Therſites, then to be the Alexander of that doltiſh rythmour, which vndertooke, with his wodden verſes to blaſe his famous and martiall exploytes: howe much more ought Irelande (being in ſundry ages ſeized of diuers good and couragious Alexanders) ſorte to long, & thirſte after ſo rare a clarcke, as M. Campion, who was ſo vpright in conſcience, ſo deepe in iudgement, ſo ryppe in eloquence, as the countrey might haue bene wel aſſured, to haue had their hyſtorie truely reported, pithily handled, and brauely poliſhed.

Howbeit, although the gloſe of his fine abridgement, being macht with other mens dwings, bare a ſurpaſſing kinde of excellencie, yet it was ſo hudled vp in haſte, as in reſpect of a Campion his abſolute perfection, it ſeemed rather to be a worke roughly hewed, then ſmoothly planed. Upon which grounde the gentleman being willing, ý his ſo tender a ſuckling, hauing as yet but greene bones, ſhould haue bene ſwadled and rockt in a cradle, till in tract of tyme the ioynces thereof were knit, and growen ſtronger, yet notwithſtanding he was ſo croſt in the nycke of thys determination, that his hyſtorie in mitching wyſe wandred through ſundry hands, and being therwithall in certaine places ſomewhat tyckle tongued (for M. Campion dyd learne it to ſpeake) and in other places ouer ſpare, it twitled more tales out of ſchole, and drowned weightyer matters in ſilence, then the Auctor vpon better view, and longer ſearche wouide haue permitted. This much being by the ſager ſorte pondered, and the perfection of the hyſtorie earneſtly deſired, I, as one of the moſt, that could doe leaſt, was fully reſolued, to enriche M. Campion his Chronicle, with further additiõs. But weighing on the other ſide, that my courſe pack threde coulde not haue bene ſutetably knit with his fine ſilcke, & what a diſgrace it were, bungerly to botch vp a riche garment, by clowting it with patches of ſundrye coulours, I was forthwyth reclayming from my former reſolution, reckening it for better, that my penne ſhoulde walke in ſuch wyſe in that craggie and baliſhe way, as the truth of the matter being forepriced, I would neyther openly borrow, nor priuily imbezell, ought to any great purpoſe from his hyſtorie. But as I was hammering that worke by ſtealthes on ỹ anuille, I was giuen to vnderſtande by ſome of mine acquaintaunce, that others had brought our rawe hyſtorie to that ryppeneſſe as my paine, therein woulde ſeeme but nedeleſſe. Whereupon being willing to be eaſed of the burden, and loath alſo in lurching wiſe to foreſtall any man his trauayle, I was contented, to leaue them thumping in the forge, and quietlye to repayre to mine vſuall and priſtinate ſtudies, taking it not to ſtande with good maners, lyke a flittering flye, to fall in an other man his diſhe. Howbeit, the little payne I toke therin was not ſo ſecretly mewed within my cloſet, but it ſlipt out at one chincke or other, and romed ſo farre abroade, as it was whiſpered in their eares, who before were in the hyſtorie buſied. The gentlemen conceyuing a greater opinion of mée, then I was well able to vpholde, dealt very effectually with mée, that aſwell at their inſtaunce, as for the affection I bare my natiue countrey, I woulde put mine helping hand, to the building and perfecting of ſo commendable a worke. Hauing breathed for a fewe dayes on this motion, albeit I knewe, that my worke was plumed with Deune, and at that time, was not sufficientlye feathered to flee, yet I was by them weighed not to beare my selfe coy, by giuing mine entier friendes in so reasonable a requeste a squaimish repulse. Wherefore, my singular good Lorde, here is layde downe to your Lordshippe his view a briefe discourse, with a ragged hystorie of a ragged Wealepublicke. Yet as naked as at the first blushe it seemeth, if it shall stande with your Honour his pleasure (whome I take to be an expert Lapidarie) at vacant houres to insearche it, you shall finde therein stones of such estimatiō, as are worthy to be couched in riche and precious colletes. And in especiall your Lordship, aboue all others, in that you haue the charge of that countrey, may here be schooled, by a right line to leuell your gouernement. For in perusing this hystorie, you shall finde vice punished, vertue rewarded, rebellion suppressed, loyaltie exalted, hautinesse displaced, courtisie beloued, bribery detested, iustice embraced, polling Officers to their perpetuall shame removed, and by right gouernours to their eternall fame extolled. And truely, to my thinking, suche magistrates, as meane to haue a vigilant eye to their charge, can not bestow their tyme better, then when they sequestre themselues frō the affayres of the wealpublicke, to recreate & quicken their spirites by reading the Chronicles, that decipher the gouernement of a wealepublicke. For as it is no small commendacion, for one to beare the dealings of many, so it breedeth great admiration, generally to haue all those qualities in one mā herboured, for which particularly diuers are eternized. And who so will be addicted to the reading of hystories, shall readily finde diuers euentes worthy to be remembred, and sondry sounde examples daily to be followed. Upon which grounde the learned haue, not without cause, adiudged an hystorie to be, the Marrowe of reason, the creame of experience, the sappe of wysedome, the pith of iudgement, the library of knowledge, the kernell of pollicie, the vnfoldresse of treacherie, the kalender of tyme, the lanterne of trueth, the lyfe of memorie, the doctresse of behauiour, the register of antiquitie, the trumpet of chiualrie. And that our Irishe hystorie being diligently hēded, yeldeth al these commodities. I trust the indifferent reader, vpon the vntwyning thereof, will not denie. But if any man his stomache shall be founde so tenderly nyced, or so deintily spyced, as that he may not, forsoth, digest the grose draffe of so base a countrey, I doubt not, but your Lordship, who is throughly acquaynted with the worthinesse of the Iland, will be sone perswaded, to leaue such quaint and licourous repastours, to fede on their costly and delicate Woodcockes, & willingly to accept the louing present of your hearty wellwiller.

The gift is small, the giuer hys good wyll is great, I stand in good hope, that the greatnesse of the one wyll countrepoise the smalnesse of the other. Wherefore, that I may the sooner vnboyde ỳ pelfish trash, that is wrapt wythin thys Treatise, I shall craue your Lordshippe, to lende me eyther your eares in hearing, or your eyes in reading the tenour of the discourse following.

The greater parte as well of Cosmographers, as Chronographers, with one accorde affirme, that Irelande (the vttermost Westerne Ile knowne) is halfe as bigge as Britannia. Which I take to be true, if the worde Britannia so farre displaye the signification, that it comprise England, Wales, & Scotland. To which opinion, Giraldus Cambriense relyeth, saying, that Britannia conteineth in length 800. myles, and 200. in breadth. Ireland he taketh to be in length from the mountaynes called Corrache (the author of Polychronicon termeth them Brendan hys hils) to S. Colube his Iland, eight dayes iourney, rating ol long Irish myles, 40. miles to the day: and in breadth from Dublin to Lpatrike his hilles, & the sea of Connaght foure dayes iourney, according to the former rate. So as by Cambriense his suruey (who was a curious enserarcher thereof) Ireland is 320. myles long of Irish myles, and 160. myles broade. And accompting 320. Irish myles to amount to 400. english miles, which maye well be reckoned according to their iudgementes, that haue trauayled in the Irish territories. Ireland wil be found halfe as big as Britannia, which Giraldus Cambriense auoucheth, saying: that Irelande is as bigge as Wales and Scotland. Irelande hath on the east, England, within one dayes saylyng: on the south east, it hath Fraunce: Hispayne on the south, distant three dayes sayling: on the west the mayne Ocean sea.

Touching the name Iuernia, Hystoriographers are not yet agreed frō whence it is deduced. Some write it Hybernia corruptly, & suppose that the estraungers finding it in an odde end of the world, foulsy and moisty, tooke it at the first for a very cold countrey, & therof named it Hybernia, as to say, the Winterland. But this errour beyng vpon short experience reformed, it could not be, that the name should haue lined long, especially the first imposi-positours sufficiing the triall, and able to alter the first nominatiō. Others bring a guesse, that it should be named of Iriamale. But because I read nothing of them in any probable history, I purpose not to builde vpon that cōiecture. Most credibly it is holden, that the Hispaniardes, the founders of the Irish, for deuotion towardes Hispayn, called then Iberia of Iberius the sonne of Iuball, and the rather, for that themselues had dwelled beside the famous riuer Iberus, named the land Iberia (for so Leland and many forreine chronicliers write it) or Ibernia, adding the letter N. for difference sake. And fro Ibernia procēdeth Iberland or Iuerland, from Iuerlande, by contractiō, Ireland, for so much as in corruption of commō talke we find that V. with his vocale, is easily lost, and suppressed. So we say ere for euer, nere for neuer: shole for shouell: ore for ouer: ene for euen: ryle for deuil. At the same tyme it was also named Scotia in reuerence of Scotach, the wyfe of Gathelus, auncient capitayne of those Ibertans that sitted from Hispayne into Ireland, and the sayd Scotach was olde grandame to Iberus and Hermon after the Scottish Chronicles, who in any wise will haue their countreymen deriued from the Irish, and not frō the Britōs. The name Scotia is of late yeres so vsually taken for that parte of Britayne, that compriseth Scotland, that diuers auncient Irish authours are holden to be borne in Scotland, whereas in very deede their natiue soyle is Ireland. As the famous schole man Iohannes Duns Scotus, otherwise named, doctor Subtilis, for his subtill quiddities in scholasticall controuersies, was an Irishe man borne, and yet is taken for a Scotte. Some hold opinion, that he was born in Tathmon, a market towne, fiue myles distaunt from Wexford. Others auouche, and that more truely, that he was borne in Doune, an olde auncient citie in the North of Ireland, and therof they gesse hym to be named Dunensis, and by contraction Duns, which terme is so triuiall and common in all scholes, that who so surpasseth others either in cauilling sophistry, or subtill philosophy, is forthwith nicknamed a Duns. Wherfore as Scotland is named Scotia minor, so Irelande is termed Scotia maior, as the hed from whence ỳ name of Scotia minor toke his offspring. The Irish also were named of the forsayd Gathelus, or Gaudeilus, Gaudeili. In their Irish rythmes, they terme Ireland very often Banno. I can not deuine what reason should lead their makers therto, vnlesse it be the riuer in the countie of Wexford, named the Banne, where the Britons vpon the conquest first arriued. The place otherwise is called Bagganbun, according to the olde auncient rithme.

For the remembraunce of which riuer so notoriously famoused, it carieth great likelyhode that the name should be to the whole realme generally ascribed. Sundry latin authors write Ireland, Inuerna, others Iuerna, diuers Ierna. Claudius nameth it Iberna. The diuersitie of which names grew, for that in their tyme the true and certayne name was not knowen, so that they were contented to take it, as they found it, which matter is hādled by Hermolaus Barbarus.

There are some of the ruder sort so quaint in seuering the name Irish and Ireland, as that they would be named Ireland men, but in no wyse Irishmen. But certes, in my fantasie suche curious distinctors may be very aptly resembled to the foolishe butcher, that offred to haue sold his mutton for xv. grotes, and yet would not take a crowne. Who so will grate vpō such nice diuersities in respect ỳ he is ashamed of his country, truly in mine opinion, his country may be ashamed of him.

The name Irishe and Ireland curiously seuered.

Ireland is deuided into foure regiōs, Leinster, east: Connaght, west: Vlster, north: Mounster, south: and into a fift plot, defalked from euery fourth parte, and yet nearyng on eche part, called therof Media, Meth, comprising as well east Meth, as west Meth. Leinster buteth vpō England: Vlster vpō ỳ Scottish Iles, which face w̄ Hebrides scattered betwene both the realmes, wherein at this day the Irish Scot, successor of ỳ elder Scythian, Pict, or Redshanke dwelleth. Eche of these fiue, where they are framable to ciuilitie, and answer the writtes of the Princes courtes, be sundred into Shieres or Cōties in this maner. In Leinster lyeth the Counties of Dublin, Kildare, Wexford or Gueilford, Catherlach, Kilkenny, the Countyes of Leise and Ophaly, called the King & Quenes counties, these two lately so named by Parliament, in the raignes of Phillip and Mary, hauing shiretownes accordaunt, Phillipstowne and Maryborough. Connaght hath the countie Clare. Vlster the countyes of Louthe, Doune, Antrim, one moyetie of the towne of Droghedagh (for ỳ rest is in Meth) and Carregfergus. In Mounster, lye the Countyes of Waterford, Lymmericke, Corcke, Countie Palentine of Tipperary, Keary, and the crosse of Tipperary. Mounster was of olde tyme deuided into east Mounster, Dsmond, West Mounster, Desmonde, South Mounster, Townmound. The occasion why Ireland was parted into these v. princi-pall regions grew of this. There arriued in Ireland fiue brethren, that were fiue valiant and martiall gentlemen: to witte, Gandius, Genandius, Sagandus, otherwyſe named Gangandius, Rutheragus, or Rutheranius, and Slanius. Theſe fiue perceiuing that the countrey was not ſufficiently peopled, were agreed, as it were, to caſt lottes, and to ſhare the whole realme betwene themſelues. The foure elder brethren ſeuering the country into foure partes, and beyng loath to vſe theyr yongeſt brother lyke an outcaſt or ſtepſonne, condeſcended that eche of them foure, ſhould of their own portion allotte to Slanius a paryng or parcell of their enheritaunce. Which beyng as hartily receiued by Slanius, as it was bountifully graunted by them, he ſetled himſelfe therin, and of that partition it toke the appellation of Media, Méethe. The foure partes méete at a certayne ſtone at Méethe, néere the caſtle of Kilayre, as an indifferent meare to ſeuer the iiij. regions. But although Slanius in the beginning had the leſt parcel, yet in ſhort ſpace he ſtode ſo well to his tacklinges, and encroacht ſo far vpon his neighbors, that he obtayned the whole Monarchie of Irelād. At which tyme he did not ſuppreſſe in oblition his enheritance of Méethe, but did enlarge it, and decréed it ſhould be a country appendant to the Monarch his diet or table. And albeit the confines thereof were by Slanius ſtretched, yet it conteyneth not ſo much land, as any of the other foure partes cōprehendeth, but rather by indifferent ſurney, the halfe deale, wherof alſo it is not vnlikely, named Méeth. For where as in the tyme of Slanius eche of the foure partes compriſeth 32. cantaredes. Méeth conteineth but xvj. cantaredes. A cantarede is named ſo much land as conteyneth an hundred townethips. This Slanius is entombed at an hill in Méethe, which of hym is named Slane.

There hath bene in ancient tyme one Galfride Geneuile, Lord of the liberty of Méeth. This noble man became a Frier preacher, and deceaſed in the yeare of our Lorde, 1314. the xx. of October, and was entombed in the Abbey of the blacke Friers at Trimme.

There is alſo an other diuiſion of Irelande, into the Engliſh pale and Irithry. For when Ireland was ſubdued by the Engliſh, diuers of the conquerors planted themſelues nére to Dublyn and the confines thereto adioyning, and ſo as it were enclosing and empaling themſelues within certayne liſtes and territories, they feazed away the Iriſh, in ſo much as that countrey became méere Engliſh. And therof it was termed, the Engliſh pale: which in auncient tyme ſtretched from Dondalke to Catherlagh or Kilkenny. But now, what for the ſlackneſſe of marcheures, and the encrochyng of the Iriſh enemy, the ſcope of the Engliſh pale is greatly empayred, and is cramperned and coucht into an odde corner of the countrey named Fingall, with a parcell of the king his land, Méeth, the countries of Kyldare & Louth, which partes are applied chiefly with good huſbandry, and take for the richeſt and ciuileſt ſoyles in Ireland. But Fingall eſpecially from tyme to tyme hath bene ſo addicted to all the poyntes of Huſbandry, as that they are nicknamed by their neighbors, for their continuall drudgery, Collonnes of the latin worde Coloni, wherunto the clipt Engliſh worde, Clowne, ſéemeth to be aunſwerable. The worde Fingall, counteruayleth in engliſhe, the race or ſept of the engliſhe or eſtraungers, for that they were ſoly ſeized of that part of ỹ Iſland, grippyng with their tallantes ſo firmely that warme neall, that from the conqueſt to this day, the Iriſh enimy could neuer rouſe them from thence. The inhabitantes of the engliſh pale haue bene in olde tyme ſo much addicted to all ciuilitie, and ſo farre ſequeſtred from barbarous ſauageneſſe, as their only mother tongue was Engliſh. And truely as long as theſe empaled dwellers did ſunder thēſelues as wel in land as in language, frō the Iriſhe: rudenes was day by day in the countrey ſupplanted, ciuilitie engraffed, good lawes eſtabliſhed, loyaltie obſerued, rebellion ſuppreſſed, and in fine the eyone of a yong England, was lyke to ſhote in Ireland. But whē their poſteritie became not all togither ſo wary in kéeping, as their auncеſtors were valiant in conquering, and the Iriſh language was frée dennized in ỹ Engliſh pale: this canker toke ſuch déepe rote, as the body that before was whole and ſounde, was by little and little feſtered, and in maner wholy putrified. And not onely this parcel of Ireland grew to that ciuilitie, but alſo Vlſter and the greater part of Mounſter, as by the ſequele of the Iriſhe hiſtory ſhall plainely appeare. But of all other places, Weiſeforde with the territorye bayed, and percloſed within the riuer called the Pill, was ſo quite eſtranged from Iriſhry, as if a trauailer of the Iriſh (which was rare in thoſe dayes) had pight his foote within the pile and ſpoken Iriſhe, the Weiſefordians would commaunde hym forthwith to turne the other ende of his tongue, and ſpeake Engliſhe, or elſe bring his trouchman with him. But in our dayes they haue ſo acquainted theſelues with the Iriſhe, as they haue made a mingle mangle, or gallamaulfrey of both the languages, and haue in ſuch medley or checkerwyse so crabbedly tumbled them both togyther, as commonly the inhabitants of the meaner sort speake neyther good English nor good Irishe.

There was of late dayes one of the Peeres of England sent to Weisforde as Commissioner, to decide the controuersies of that countrey, and caring in affable wise the rude complaintes of the countrey clownes, he conceyued here and there, sometyme a worde, other whyles a sentence. The noble man beyng very glad that vpon hys first comming to Irelande, he vnderstood so many wordes, told one of hys familiar frends, that he stoode in very great hope, to become shortly a well spoken man in the Irishe, supposing that the blunte people had prated Irishe, all the while they iangled Englishe. Howbeit to this day, the dregs of the olde auncient Chaucer English, are kept as well there as in Yngall. As they terme a spider, an attercop, a wisp, a wad, a lumpe of bread, a pocket or a pucket, a Sillibuck, a coppronse, a faggot, a blease, or a blaze, for the short burning of it, as I iudge, a Phisition, a leache, a gappe, a sharde, a base court or quadrangle, a bawen, or rather, as I suppose, a barton: y household or folkes, meany: Sharppe, keene, eskraunge, vncouth, easie, eth or efe, a dunghill, a mizen, as for the worde bater, that in English purporteth a lane, bearing to an high way; I take it for a meere Irishe worde, that crepte vnawares into the English, thorough the daily entercourse of the English and Irish inhabitants. And where as commonly in all countreys, the women speake most neately and pertely; whiche Tully in hys thirde booke de Oratore, speakyng in the person of Crassus, seemed to haue obserued, yet notwithstandyng in Irelande it falleth out contrary. For the women haue in theyr English tongue an harrish and broade kynd of pronunciation, with vttering their wordes so peuishly & faintly, as though they were halfe sicke, and ready to call for a possette. And most commonly in wordes of two sillables, they giue the last the accent. As they say; Markeate, Baskeate, Gossoupe, Pussoate, Robart, Niclase, &c. which doubtlesse doth disbeautifie their Englishe aboue measure. And if they could be weaned from that corrupt custom, there is none that could dislyke of their English.

Here percase some snappish carper will take mee at rebounde, and snuskingly snibbe me, for debacing the Irish language. But truely whosoeuer shall be founde so ouerthwartly bent, he takes the matter far awrie. For as my skill is very simple therein, so I would be loath, to disseyle my rashnesse, in giuing light verdict in any thing to me vnknowen: But onely my short discourse tendeth to this drift, that it is not expedient, that the Irishe tongue shoulde be so vniuersally gagled in in the English pale, bycause that by proofe & experience we see, that the pale was in neuer more flourishing estate, the when it was wholly English, & neuer in worse plight, the since it hath entraunchysed the Irishe. But some will say, that I shewe my selfe herein as friuolous, as some losing gamesters seeme superstitious, when they play theinselfes dyce, they gogle with their eyes hither and thyther, and if they can pype out any one, that giueth them the gaze, they stande lumping and lowring, fretting and fuming; for that they imagine, that all theyr euill lucke proceeded of hym. And yet if the stander by departe, the loser may be founde as dyrshauen, as he was before. And euen so it fareth with you, bycause you see all things runne to ruine in the Englishe pale, by reason of great enormities in the countrey, either openly practised, or couertlye wyncked at, you glaunce your eye on that, which standeth nert you, & by beating Iacke for Iyll, you impute the fault to that, which perhappes woulde little further the wealepublicke, if it were exiled. Now truely you shote very nere the mark. But if I may craue your patience, to tyme you see me shote my bolt, I hope you will not deny, but that as nere the pricke as you are, & as very an hagler as I am, yet the scantling shall be myne. First therefore take this with you, that a conquest draweth, or at the least wyse ought to drawe to it, three things, to witte, law, apparayle, and languague. For where the countrey is subdued, there the inhabitants ought to be ruled by the same law that the cõquerour is gouerned, to weare the same fashion of attyre, wherewith the victour is vested, & speake the same language, that the vanquisher parleth. And if anye of these three lacke, doubtlesse the conquest limpeth. Now whereas Irelande hath beene, by lawfull conquest, brought vnder the subiectiõ of Englande, not onelye in king Henry the second his reigne, but also as well before, as after (as by the course of the Irish hystorye shal euidently be deciphered) & the conquest hath beene so absolute and perfect, that all Leinster, Meth, Vlster, the more parte of Connaght and Mounster, all the Cinties & Burroughes in Irelande, haue beene wholly Englished, and with Englishe conquerours inhabited, is it decent, thinke you, that theyr owne auncient natiue tongue shal be shrowded in oblision, and suffer the enemies language, as it were a tetterre, or ringworme, to herbozow it self within the iawes of Englishe conquerours: no truely. And nowe that I haue fallen vnawares into this discourse, it will not be far amisse to stande somewhat roundly vpon this poynt. It is knowen, and by the hystozie, you maye in part perceyue, how brauely Ulifer Whillon flozished. The Englishe families were there implanted, the Irish, eyther vtterly expelled, oz wholly subdued, the lawes duely executed, the reuenue great, and onely English spoken. But what brought it to this present ruine and decaye? I doubt not, but you gesse, before I tell you. They were enuironned & cõpassed with euill neighbours. Neighbourhode bredde acquaintance, acquaintance wafted in ỹ Irish tõgue, the Irishe hooked with it attyre, attyre haled rudenes, rudenesse engendred ignozãce, ignoraunce brought contempt of lawes, the contempt of lawes bred rebellió, rebellion raked thereto warres, and so cõsequently the vtter decay and desolatió of that wozthy countrey.

If these chinkes, when first they beganne to chappe, had bene diligently by the dwellers stopt, hir Maiestie at this daye, to hir great charges, shoulde not haue bene occasioned, to damme vp with many thousand poundes, yea & with the wozthy carkasses of valiaunt souldiours, the gaps of that rebellious Nozthren countrey. Now put the case that the Irishe tongue were as sacred as the Hebrewe, as learned as the Greeke, as fluent as the latin, as amarous as ỹ Italian, as courtious as the Hispanish, as courtelike as ỹ French, yet truely (I know not which way it falleth out) I see not, but it may be very well spared in the Englishe pale. And if reason will not leade you to thinke it, truely experience must force you to graunt it. In olde time when the Romaines were first acquaynted wyth the Greeke tongue, as it is cõmonly the nature of mã to be delighted with newfangle wares, so he was accompted no gallant among the Romaines, that coulde not prattle & chatte Greeke. Marcus Cicero, father vnto Tully, being at that tyme kept in peres, perceyuing hys countreymen to become changelings, in being bylwyse and polmadde, & to suck with the Greeke the conditions of the Grecians, as to be in wozdes talkatiue, in behauiour light, in condicions quaint, in maners haute, in promises vnstedfast, in othes rash, in bargaines wauering (which were reckened foz Greekish properties in those dayes) the olde gentleman not so much respecting the neatenesse of the language, as the naughty fruite it brought wyth it, sayde, that his countreymen, the Romaynes, resembled the bonde slaues of Suria. Foz ỹ moze parfit they were in the Greeke, the wozse they were in theyr maners and lyfe. If this gentleman had bene now liuing and haue seene what alteratiõ hath happened in Irelãd, through the entrecourse of languages, he woulde, I dare saye, breake patience, & woulde demaunde, why the Englishe pale is moze giuen to learne the Irishe, then the Irishman is willing to learne Englishe? we must embrace their language, and they detest oures. One demaunded merply, why O Neale, that last was, would not frame himselfe to speake English? what: quoth the other, in a rage, thinkest thou, that it standeth with O Neale his honoz, to wreyth his mouth in clattering Englishe? and yet forsoth we must gagge our iawes in gybbrishing Irish. But I dwelt to long in so apparẽt a matter. As all the cities and townes in Irelande, wyth Fingall, the king his lande, Meth the Coũtey of Kildare, Louth, Wexford, speake to this day Englishe (whereby the simplicitie of some is to be derided, that iudge the inhabitantes of the Englishe pale, vpon their first repayre to England, to learne their English in three oz foure dayes, as though they had bought at Chester a groates wozth of Englishe, and so packt vp the reast to be caryed after them to London) euen so in all other places their natiue language is Irishe.

Why the Irish would learne English.

I finde it solemly aduouched, aswel in some of the Irish pamphlets, as in Giraldus Cambrienſe, that Gathelus oz Gaidelus, and after him Simon Breck deuised the Irish language, out of all other tongues then extant in the woꝛlde. And thereof, sayeth Cambrienſe, it is called Gaydelach, partly of Gaidelus the first founder, partly foz that it is cõpounded of all languages. But considering the course of enterchaunging and blending of speaches togyther, not by inuention of arte, but by vse of talke, I am rather led to beleeue (seeing Irelande was inhabited within one yeare after the deuision of tongues) that Baltolenus a braunche of Japhet, who first seized vppon Irelande, brought thither the same kinde of speache, some of the 72. that to this familie befell at the desolatiõ of Babell. Vnto whom succeeded the Scitians, Grecians, Egiptiãs, Hispanyardes, Danes, of all which, the tongue must néedes haue borowed part, but especially retayning the steps of Hispanish, then spoken in Granado, as from their mightiest auncestours. Since then to Henry Fitz Empresse the Conquerour, no such inuasion happened them, as wherby they might be driuen to infect their natiue language, vntouched in maner foz the space of seauentéene hundred yeres after the arriuall of Iberius. It séemeth to borow of ỹ Hispanish the commõ phrase,

o. Commestato, that is, how doe you? or howe fareth it with you? It fetcheth sundry woords from the Latine, as Argette, of Argentum, money: salle, of Sal, salt: Cappoulle, of Caballus, a plough horse, or according to the olde English terme, a cabalie, or caple; Birreate, of the olde motheaten Latine woorde, Birretum, a bonnet. The tongue is sharpe and sentencious, offereth great occasion to quicke apothegmes and proper allusions. Wherefore their common tellours & rithmours, whome they terme, Bardes, are sayde to delight passingly those that conceyue the grace and propertie of the tongue. But the true Irishe in deede differeth so much from that they commonly speake, that scarse one in fiue hundred can eyther, reade, wryte, or vnderstande it. Therfore it is preserued amōg certaine their poetes and antiquaries. And in very deede the lāguage carryeth such difficultie with it, what for the estraungenesse of the phrase, and the curious featnesse of the pronunciation, that a very fewe of the countrey can attayne to the perfection thereof, and much lesse a forreinner or estraunger. A gentleman of mine acquaintance reported that he dyd see a woman in Rome, which was possest with a babbling spirite, that coulde haue chatted any language sauing the Irishe, and that it was so difficult, as the very Deuyll was greeued therewith. A gentleman that stoode by, aunswered, that he toke the speache to be so sacred & holy, that no damned fenne had the power to speake it, no more then they are able to say, (as the reporte goeth) the verse of S. Iohn the Euāgelist. Et verbū caro factū est. Nay by God his mercy, mā, quoth the other: I stande in doubt, I tell you, whether the Apostles in theyr copious marte of languages at Ierusalem, coulde haue spoken Irishe, if they were opposed, wherat the company hartily laughed. As fluent as the Irishe tonge is, yet it lacketh diuers woords, & borroweth thē, verbatim of the English. As there is no vulgare Irish woord, (vnlesse there besome odde terme) ẏ lurcketh in any obscure shrowdes or other of their storehouse) for a Cote, a Gowne a Dublet, an Hatte, a drinking Cup, but only they vse ẏ same woords wᵭ a little inflexion; they vse also ẏ contracted english phrase, god morrow, ẏ is, God giue you a good morning.

I haue opposed sundry times, the expertest menne, that coulde be had in the country, and all they coulde neuer fynde out an equiualēt Irish woord for Knaue. The Grecians according to Tully his iudgement, were in ẏ same predicament, as touching the terme, Ineptus. His woordes are these. Ego mehercule ex omnibus latinis verbis, huius verbi vim vel maximam semper putaui: Quem enim nos ineptū vocamus, is mihi videtur, ab hoc nomen habere ductum, quod non sit aptus, idque in sermonis nostri consuetudine perlatè patet. Nam qui aut tempus, quo quid postulet, non videt, aut plura loquitur, aut se ostentat, aut eorum, quibuscum est, vel dignitatis vel commodi rationem non habet, aut denique in aliquo genere aut inconcinnus aut multus est, is ineptus esse dicitur. Hoc vitio cumulata est erudissima illa græcorum natio: Itaque ꝙ vim huius mali Græci non vident, ne nomen quidem ei vitio imposuerunt. Vt enim quæras omnia, quomodo Græci. Ineptum appellent, non reperies.

Certes, I haue bene of opinion, sayeth Tully, that among the whole crue of Latine termes, the woorde, Ineptus, hath bene of greatest importance or weight. For he whome we name Ineptus, semeth to me, to haue the etimologie or offspring of his name, here hence deriued, that he is not apt, which stretcheth farre and wyde, in the vsuall custome of our dailye speache or communication. For he that doth not perceyue, what is sitting or decent for euerye season, or gabbleth more then he hath commission to doe, or that in bragging, boasting, or peacockwise setteth hymselfe forth to the gaze, by making more of the broth, then ẏ flesh is worth, or he ẏ regardeth not the vocation and affayres of them, with whō he entermedleth: or in fine, who so is stale wont grace or ouer tedious in any matter, he is tearmed Ineptus, (which is asmuch in Englishe, in my phantisy, as sausy, or malapart) The famous and learned Greeke nation is generally dusked with this fault. And for that the Grecians could not espy the innormity therof, they haue not so much framed a term therto. For if you should ransacke the whole Greeke language you shall not finde a woorde to counteruayle Ineptus. Thus far Tully, yet Budæus, would not seeme to acknowledge this barrennesse, but that the Greeke woord ἀπειρόκαλος, is equipolent, to Ineptus, but that I referre to the iudgement of the learned, being very willing to finde out some other Budæus; that coulde fashion an Irysshe woorde for Knaue, whereof this discourse of Ineptus grewe. As the whole realme of Ireland is sundred into foure principall parts, as before is sayd, so eche parcell differeth very much in ẏ Irishe tongue, euery country hauing his dialect or peculiar maner, in speaking the language: therfore commonly in Irelande they ascribe a properye to eche of the foure countryes in this sorte. Ulster hath the right Irishe phrase, but not the true pronunciation: Mounster hath ẏ true pronunciation, but not the phrase: Leinster is deuoyde of the right phrase, and true pronun-

The Irish both in auncient tyme and to this day commonly vse it, & therfore the English Conquerors called them Irishe poghes, or pogh Maurice, which taunting terme is at this day very wrongfully ascribed to them of the English pale. The English interiection, foagh, which is vsed in lothing, a ranke, or strong sauour, seemeth to be sibbe to the other.

Of the nature of the soyle, and other incidentes. Chap. 2.

The soyle is lowe and watrish, encludeth diuers little Iflandes, enuironned wyth lakes and marrish. Highest hilles haue standyng poles in theyr tops. Inhabitantes especially new come, are subiect to distillations, reumes and fires. For remedy wherof, they vse an ordinary drinke of Aquá vitæ, so qualified in the makyng, that it dryeth more, and enflameth lesse then other whote confections. One Theoricus wrote a proper treatise of Aqua vitæ, wherein he prayseth it to the ninth degrée. He destinguisheth three sortes therof, Simplex, composita, and Perfectissima. He declareth the simples and ingrediences thereto belongyng. He wisheth it to be taken as well before meate as after. It dryeth vp the breakyng out of handes, and killeth the fleshe wormes, if you wash your handes therewith. It shoureth all skurfe and skaldes from the head, beyng therewith daily washte before meales. Beyng moderately taken, sayth he, it floeth age, it strengtheneth youth, it helpeth digestion, it cutteth fleume, it abandoneth melancholy, it reliseth the hart, it lightneth the mynd, it quickeneth the spirites, it cureth the hydropsie, it healeth the strangury, it pouldreth the stone, it expelleth grauell, it putteth away all Ventositie, it kepeth and preserueth the hed from whirlyng, the eyes from dazelyng, the tongue from lispyng, the mouth frō mafflyng, the teth frō chatteryng, the throte from ratling, the weasan from sneesyng, the stomacke from wambling, the harte from swellyng, the belly from wirtchyng, the guts from rumblyng, the handes from shiuering, the sinowes from shrinkyng, the beynes frō crumpling, the bones from akyng, the marrow from soakyng. Vlstadius also ascribeth thereto a singuler prayse, and would haue it to burne beyng kindled, which he taketh to be a token to know the goodnesse therof. And truly it is a soueraigne liquour, if it be orderly taken.

The ayre is very holesome, not generally so cleare and subtill as that of Englande. The weather is more temperate, beyng not so warme in Sommer, nor colde in winter, as it is in Englande and Flaunders. The countrye is steared with Bées, contrarye to the opinion of some writers, who both in this & other errours, touching this countrye, maye easily be excused, as those that wrote by hearesay. No Vineyards, yet Grapes growe there as in Englande. They lacke the Roe buck, as Polichronicon writeth. They lack ỹ Bird called the Pye. Howbeit in the Englishe pale to thys daye, they vse to tearme a slye cosener, a wyly Pye. Cambrienſe in his time cōplaineth, that Irelande had excesse of wood, and very little champayne grounde, but now the English pale is to naked. Turfe is their most fewell and seacoale. No venemous creping beaste is brought forth, or nourished, or can liue in Irelande, being brought or sent. And therfore the spyder of Ireland is wel known not to be venemous, onely because a frogge was found lying in the medowes of Waterforde somewhat before the conquest they construed it, to importe their ouerthrowe.

Camb. 1. dist. 1.

Bede writeth that serpentes conueighed to Irelande did presently die, beyng touched with the smell of the lande, that whatsoeuer came from Irelande was then of soueraigne vertue against poyso. He exemplifieth in certayne men, stung of Adders, who dranke in water, the scrapings of bookes, that had bene of Irelande, and were cured. Generally it is obserued, the farther west, the lesse annoiance of pestilent creatures. The want whereof is to Irelande so peculiar, that whereas it laye long in question, to whether realme Brytayne or Irelande the Ile of man should appertayne, the sayd controuersie was decyded: that forsomuch as venemous beastes were knowen to breede therein, it coulde not be a naturall part of Ireland. And contrarywise the Orchades are adiudged to be appendaunt to Irelande, because those Iflandes, neyther breede nor foster any venemous worme, as Hector Boethus auoucheth. Giraldus Cambrienſe, writeth that he hearde certayne Merchaunts affirme, that when they had vnladen theyr shippes in Irelande, they founde by hap some toades, vnder theyr balast. And they had no sooner cast them on the shore, then they would puffe and swell vnmeasurably, & shortly after turning vp theyr bellyes, they would burst in sunder. And not onely the earth & dust of Irelande, but also the verye thonges of Irishe leather, haue the same force and vertue. I haue seene it, saith Cambriēſe, experimēted, that a toade being encompassed with a thong of Irishe leather, and creppyng thitherward, endeuouring to haue skipt ouer it, sodenly reculed backe, as though it had bene rapte in the hed: wherupon it began to spraule to the other side. But at length perceiuyng that the thong did embay it of all partes, it began to thyrle, and as it were to dig the earth, where findyng an hole, it sluncke away in the presence of sondry persons.

It happened also in my tyme, sayeth Giraldus Cambriense, that in the North of Englãd a knot of yonghers toke a nap in the fieldes. As one of them lay snorting with his mouth gaping, as though he would haue caught flies, it happened that a Snake or Adder skipt into his mouth, and glyded downe into his bellye, where herbering it selfe, it beganne to roame vp and downe and to fede on the young man his entralles. The pacient being sore distracted and aboue measure tormented wyth the byting pangues of this grædie guest, incessantly prayed to God, that if it stode wyth his gracious will, eyther wholly to bereue him of his lyfe, or else of his vnspeakeable mercie to ease him of his payne. The worme would neuer cease from gnawing the pacient his carkasse, but when he had taken his repast. And his meate was no sooner digested, then it would giue a freshe onset in boaring his guttes. Diuers remedies were sought, as medicines, pilgrimages to Saintes: but all could not preuayle. Being at length schooled by the graue aduise of some sage and expert father, that willed him to make his spædie repayre to Ireland, would trãct no time, but busked himselfe ouersea, and arriued in Irelande. He dyd not sooner drinke of the water of that Iland, and taken of the victuals of Ireland, but forthwith he kilde the Snake, auoyded it downeward, and so being lustye and liuely he returned into Englande. Thus farre Giraldus Cambriense. There be some, that moue question, whither the want of venemous Wormes be to be imputed to the propertie of the soyle, or to be ascribed to the prayers of S. Patricke, who couerted that Iland. The greater parte father it on S. Patricke, especially such as wryte hys lyfe aswell a parte, as in the legende of Irishe Saintes. Giraldus Cambriense disaffirmeth flatly that opinion, and taketh it to be a secret or hidden propertie naturally vnited to the soyle, from whome Polichronicon doth not swarue. For my part as I am wedded to neither of both the opinions, so I would haue bene easily perswaded being neyther hote nor colde in the matter, to rest as a lukewarme Neuter in omitting the one and the other vnskande, were it not that one M. Alan Cope, or some other that masketh vnder hys visours, more sclaunderously then pithily had busied himselfe therin. Wherfore sith I may with better warrant defende my natiue coũtrey, then he or his betters may reproue it, especially, where his sclaunderous reportes are vnderpropt wyth slimme flamme surmises: I purpose vnder M. Cope his correction to coape and buckle with hym herein, and before he beare the ball to the goale, to trippe him, if I may, in the way. And because (gentle Reader) I minde to make thee an indifferent vmpyre in this controuersie, for the better vnderstanding of the matter, I will laye downe M. Cope his wordes, in such wise as they are imprinted in his booke. First therfore thou must vnderstande, that his booke is made in dialogue wise, a kinde of writing as vsed, so commended of the learned. In these dialogues Ireneus an Englishman and Critobulus a Germaine play the partes. Ireneus entreth into the stage, and in this wyse beginneth.

Sententia definitiua. Solin.c.35.

„ I will begin sayth Ireneus, with S. Paule.
„ You know that in Melita (which at this day „ is called Malta) S. Paule flung into the fire
„ a Viper that stucke or did cleaue to his hand.
„ In that Iland, Scorpions which are elsewhere deadly or venemous, are become tho-„ row the gift of S. Paule (as it is supposed) „ harmeles.
„ Tush, quoth Critobulus, that may be percase
„ incident to the nature of the soyle.
„ Nay then, replyeth Ireneus, you are in a „ wrong bore. For the Islanders, as S. Luke „ mencioneth, shewed, that a parentquellour „ was brought thither, and because he was not „ swalowed in the gulfes of the sea, the Gods
„ beyng in their fustian fumes, sent serpentes
„ to slay hym. And they loked for nothyng sooner, then to see hym euen at a twincklyng to „ perish. But whē they perceyued hym to be so „ far distant frō death, as that he suffeyned no
„ harme, ne felt any paine, the people therwith „ amazed, sayd, he far surpast mans estate, and „ that he was a God inuested in mā hys shape.
„ You haue reason, answereth Critobulus, you
„ haue hit the naple on the hed.
„ Yea, but I pray you, clip not my tale, sayth „ Ireneus, but take me with you. Stones are „ culled in the caue or denne, wherin S. Paul is „ sayd to haue bayted or soiorned, which stones
„ in maner in all Europe are soueraigne me„ dicines to cure the bitynges and stinges of „ Scorpions and serpentes. Furthermore they
„ that are borne the xxv. of January (which day „ is named the conuersion of S. Paul) in what „ part so euer of the world they are borne, they „ feare not or grudge not at snakes: Yea, that „ which is more to be admyred, the stinginges
„ of poysoned wormes are healed by the very „ spittle of this January brode. Which thyng
„ hath bene of late published by a well lettered „ man, Thomas Fazellus, to haue bene curiously noted of hym as well by proofe and experience, as by sure and substantiall examples, if „ I take not the matter amisse. Thē commeth
„ in Critobulus, whom M. Cope maketh, I will „ not say the vice or hicksoorner, but the pleasaunt conceited gentleman of hys enterlude, „ and fetcheth a long leape (for I am sure he „ could not iumpe so farre) from Malta to Ireland, and frameth hys tale in this sort.

„ By the fayth of my body sir, here is stuffe
„ worth the noting. And now I call to mynde,
„ that I haue red and often heard, that the like „ benefite hath bene imparted to Ireland, tho„ rough the prayers of S. Patrike the Apostle
„ of the sayd Iland, that is to say, that Ireland
„ bredeth no venemous worme. And therupon
„ percase some are accustomed to say, ỳ there
„ is no poysoned or venemous thing in Irelād,
„ but onely the people, which is taken to haue „ bene sayd of most men for their brutishe and „ sauage maners.
„ To this sayth Ireneus. I am done to vnder-
„ stand by the report of diuers, & also by Bede,
„ that no poysoned or venemous thing is bred
„ in that realme, in so much, that the earth of „ ỳ countrey being brought into other realms,
„ killeth all venemous and poysoned wormes.
„ But let the matter fall out which way it wil.
„ I ascribe that propertie not to S. Patricke, Judge-
but to the nature of the soyle, because it hath bene knowen long before S. Patricke was borne; that Irelande was indued with that property, which is elsewhere easy to be foūd. Hitherto M. Cope.

In thys discourse (gentle Reader) thou seest that M. Cope handleth two principall points, the propriety of Malta and the nature of Irelande in destroying venemous wormes, the one he ascribeth to ỳ blessed Apostle S. Paule, the other he will not in any wyse impute to S. Patricke. Touching the first, as I haue no occasion to entermeddle therin, so I purpose not, for the quarell I haue to the person, to disproue hys opinion so farre as it standeth with troth. Wherefore that God, that of his bountifull goodnesse gaue the grace to Moses, to turne Aaron his rod into a serpēt, Exod.7. vers.10.

any of his blessed seruauntes woulde herborowe there. And as I doubt not, but Simon the Tanner his house was nothing ỳ worse, for lodging so happie a guest as Peter, so I am sure, Malta was far the better, for herbowring so blessed a trauayler or passenger as Paule. Which S. Luke letteth not to tell, declaring that all they, which were sicke in the the Iland, flocked to Paule and were cured: and also that the pacient that was father to Publius, in whose house they were thre daies very courteously intertayned, was by Saint Paule healed. Which cure aswell of that pacient, as of the residue of the Islanders, dyd not onely extende to their bodies, but chiefly and especially to their soules, according to the opinion of the learned Diuines. For as our saiour Jesus Christ was neuer thought to cure any one his bodie, but he woulde also heale his soule, so it muste be thought of his Apostles, in whose steppes both in lyfe and myracles they traced. And therefore the learned holde opinion, that S. Paule, being in Malta, expelled from diuers of their soules the olde Serpent, that decepued our Progenitours, Adam & Eue. For which God is to be magnified and glorified. Thus much I thought good here to enserte, as a clause not wholly swaruing from that we treate of, and also that I woulde be founde prest and readie, as farre as my simple skill stretcheth, to vnderpinne any opinion, that tendeth to the honor and glorie of God. Howbeit for so much as M. Cope hath so straightly dealt with Irelād, as wyth a countrey nothing appertaynyng to his matter, I trust he will pardon me, to be somewhat bolde with him, touching the hystorie of Malta, that as his negligence shal be in the one disshowed, so his sclaunderous iudgemēt may be in the other reuersed. First therefore where he writeth, that the inhabitantes of Malta clamabant, that is, cryed, or showted, it was not so. The Greke text runneth, ἔλεγον πρὸς ἀλλήλους. Dicebant adinuicem, that is to say, they muttred one to another. And S. Luke paraphraseth his meaning after. For when they perceyued, that the Uiper dyd not anoy Paule, then sayth S. Luke, Conuertentes se, dicebant, eum esse Deum. They turning one towardes the other, whispered or mutterd, that Paule was a God. Nowe put the case they cryed, as M. Cope sayeth, is it lyke that Paule was so busie in making of a fire, or that his eares dyd wander so far of, as that he could not heare them? And if he heard thē, thinke you that he would haue bēne whist, in hearing God so far blasphemed, as that he woulde suffer himselfe to be deified? No truely. He woulde haue taken on, as he and Barnabas dyd at Lystris, whē the inhabitants named them Goddes, Barnabas to be Jupiter, and Paule, for that he was well spoken, to be Mercurie. For when the Apostles hearde of their Idolatrie, renting their clothes, they rusht into the thrōge, crying and speaking, that they were mortall men, &c. In which place S. Luke putteth an expresse difference, as it were of set purpose, betwēne both the wordes, Clamantes & Dicentes. M. Cope addeth further, Delatum eō paricidam; and yet the Greke hath πάντως φονεύς. Omnino interfector; or as the Vulgar text is, Vtiq; homicida est homo hic. So that they toke him to be but a manquellour, yet M. Cope maketh hym a Paricide, which is worse. For although euerye Paricide be a manquellour, yet è conuerso, euery manquellour is not a Paricide.

M. Cope procedeth further, Irati dij, serpētes, qui eum tollerent, immisissent. The Gods being angry sent serpents to dispatch Paule. And yet forsoth, all these serpentes were but one Uiper, as is plainely expresst in the text, vnlesse M. Cope would teache S. Luke, to tell his tale after the fineſt fashiō, least the Apostle should haue bene thought to haue fitoned. As the Parson that preached to his Parochians of the Gospell, wherin mention is made of them that Christ fed in the desert, or wildernesse. O, quoth the Parson, what a Christ that was, that with fiue barly loaues, & fiue fishes fed fiue hundred persons. The clarke hearing his maister to grate ouerlōg on that point, for he dyd often iterate that sentence, stoke vp to the pulpit, & plucking the person by his gowne, whispered in his eare ỹ Christ fed fiue thousand. Holde thē contented thou foolishe fellow, quoth the Parson, if I shoulde tell nine hearers of so great a nūber, I shold but discredite the Gospeller, and they woulde not beleeue me. So it fareth with M. Cope, belike he misstrusted, that if he had sayde, that one Uiper coulde haue slayne Paule, the reader woulde haue suspected the vntruth of the matter, bycause it carryeth great likelyhode with it, that one man coulde withstande one Uiper; and therefore to saue S. Luke hys credite, he increaseth the number by putting the plurall for the singular. Whereas therefore it standeth with M. Cope his pleasure, to florish in his rhetoricall figure, named, Veritatis superlatio, in terming muttering, showting, a manquellour, a paricide, one Uiper, serpentes: he must be borne withall, if in the heate of his figure he steppe a little awrie in the remnaunt of his discourse. For thus he sayeth.

A Parson his sermō.

M. Cope hys rhetoriche.

And therevppon it is reported perchase, by some men, that there is nothing venemous or poysoned in Irelande, but the men and women. Which is taken to haue bene spoken by most men for their brutish and saluadge maners. Here (good Reader) thou must vnderstande that M. Cope putteth the text downe & the glose, the text is, there is nothing in Irelande venemous but the inhabitauntes. The glose gloſe is, this is sayde to haue bene ſpoken for their brutiſh and ſauage conditiõs. Now well harpt by S. Lanckfield. Here is a gloſe, I vndertake you, ſuteable to the text. But let vs ſée, how cunningly M. Cope bequiteth him ſelfe. Firſt he obſerueth not decorũ perſonæ, ſecondly he followeth not decorum dialogi, thirdlye he ſheweth herein little diuinitie. Touching the firſt point, who knoweth not, that theſe iapes and gybes are onely fitte for ruffians, vices, ſwashbucklers and tospottes. And truly they beſet a diuine aſwel, as for an Aſſe to twange chyppaſſa on a harpe or gyttarne, or for an Ape to friſcke trenchemore in a payre of buſkins and a dubblet. The heathen miſliked in an orature ſquirilitie, what ſhoulde be thought then of a diuine, whom S. Paule would haue to be ſober, modeſt, graue and wiſe. Vnleſſe M. Cope leaning to the letter of S. Paule his wordes woulde beare vs in hande, that S. Paule would haue modeſtie to reſt onely in byſhops. We are commaunded, in the olde and newe teſtament, to loue our neighbors as our ſelues. Which doth imply, that we ought not to ſclaunder our neighbours. And ſhall a diuine then ſpeake vncharitably, not onely of one, but of an whole royalme, and not only ſpeake but alſo write, yea and that in the language that is vniuerſally ſpoken, through out the greater part of the worlde, vpon no ſure ground, but onely vpon hearelay weighing not what ỹ Prophet writeth, perdes omnes qui loquuntur mendaciũ, thou ſhalt deſtroye all them that ſpeake vntruthes. And were it that any ſuch ſlimme ſlamme ſirtes were ſothed by any perſonne of credite, yet, as me ſéemeth, it would ſtand more with the grauitie of a diuine, that ſuch childiſhe quippes, & ſcornefull tauntes ſhould ſomer by his meanes charitably bée whiſſed, thẽ through his procuremẽt carpingly publiſhed. I will ſtand no longer on this point, but onelye craue M. Cope to reſort to the 5. of Mathew, and there peruſe Chriſt his verdict, touching ſclaunderous tongues. To come to the ſeconde parte, in which he obſerueth not decorum dialogi, thou ſhalt vnderſtand (good Reader) that Critabulus, or Critobulus, whom M. Cope maketh his bagpipe to belche out his rancour, is a Germaine borne, as M. Cope ſaith, who ſemeth to be Critobulus his godfather. Now let any one, that is acquainted wt the maners of Germaines, iudge, if it be decent, that one of thẽ ſhoulde ſcoffe & ſcorne the conditions and faſhions of other countries. I wil not ſpeake by heare ſay, as M. Cope doth, but by eyeſight. I could neuer eſpye nor probably haue I hearde it reported no not of the méere ſauage Iriſh, ſuch quaffing, ſuch ſwilling, ſuch bowling, ſuch gulling, ſuch brutiſh drunkennelle, ſuch ſurfeyting, ſuch vomiting as I haue ſéene ſome Germaines doe. In good ſooth it is knowen, and for my part I haue ſéene it being beyonde the ſeas, that in their carowſing & cup friendſhip, they threaten ſuch kindneſſe on their companions, that leaſt their fellowes ſhould miſtruſt them, with double dealing, they will not ſticke to ſhewe them the botome of their ſtomackes, & to the ende they ſhould take the better view therof, they will place it now & then in their neighbours boſome.

The Germaine his friendſhip.

Thus whẽ they haue caſt their gorges, they clap on theyr thrumde hats, and runne lyke bedlem barretors into the ſtréetes with their naked flatchets, and there they kéepe ſuch a ſtinkyng ſturre with hackyng of ſtones, with hewyng of blockes, with thwitting of ſtocks, with ſtrikyng of ſtalles, with thumpyng at doores, that it would make a horſe breake hys halter, to ſée ſo dronken a pageant. In fine, this qualitie is ſo naturally engraffed in the greater part of them, that a famous deuine did not ſticke of late to ſay openly in his Lecture that dronkennes in that countrey men, was eyther peccatum originale, or accidens inſeparabile. I write not this, I take God to record, to the reproch or ſlaunder of that coũtrey (beyng lothe to commit the ſelfe ſame fault that I reprehend in any other,) but only my meanyng is to ſettle before the Reader his eyes the abſurditie of M. Cope, in framyng poze Critabolus to flout Ireland, conſideryng that if he caſt his eye homeward, he ſhall finde as filthy puddle in his owne countrey, as in other realmes. And therfore thys quippe ſate as vnſéemely in his mouth, as for an whore to reprehend bitchery, or for an Vſurer to condemne Simonie. For as there is nothyng leſſe to be tollerated, thẽ for any one to haue an other to accompt for his lyfe, that can yéelde no accompt of his owne: ſo there is nothyng that ought to mortell vp any one from rebuking other nations, then to ſée the miſdemeanor of hys owne native country. I would wiſhe M. Critabolus or M. Cope, if it ſhall pleaſe him to make vp the muſter, with indifferency to weigh the eſtate of Ireland, and ſo without partiality to frame his iudgement. Ireland, and eſpecially the ruder part is not ſtored with ſuch learned men as Germany is. If they had ſounde preachers, & ſincere liuers, that by the embawming of theyr carian ſoules with the ſwéete and ſacred flowers of holy writ, would enſtruct them in the feare of God, in obeying their prince, in obſeruyng the lawes, in vnderpropping in eche man his vocation the weale publike. I doubt not,

Ireland how it may be reformed.

not, but within two or three ages M. Critabulus his heyres should heare so good a reporte run of the reformatiō of Ireland, as it would be reckoned as ciuill as the best part of Germany. Let the soyle be as fertile and fatle as any would wish, yet if the husband man wyll not manure it, some tyme plough and care it, sometyme harow it, sometime tyll it, sometyme marle it, sometyme deluc it, sometyme dig it, and sowe it with good and sound corne, it will bryng forth weedes, bynde corne, cockle, darnell, brambles, bryers, and sondry wylde shootes. So it fareth with the rude inhabitantes of Irelande, they lacke Vniuersities, they want instructors, they are destitute of teachers, they are without preachers, they are denoyde of all such necessaries as appertayne to the trayning vp of youth, and notwithstandyng all these wantes, if any would be so frowardly set, as to require them, to vse such ciuilitie, as other regions, that are sufficiently furnished with the lyke helpes, he might be accounted as vnreasonable, as he that would force a cripple that lacketh both his legs to runne, or one to pipe or whistle a galliard that wanteth hys vpper lippe. But such is the corrupt nature of vs worldlings, and me thinketh such vayne humors are not vtterly dryed vp in our sage & mortyfied diuines, we are most commonly giuen rather to taunt that which is amisse, then to prayse that which is good, and rather we followe the spider in soakyng the poyson, then in imitatyng the Bee by sucking the hony. Now that it appeareth, that it was not sittyng for the author beyng a deuine, to write so vncharitably, nor for M. Critabulus beyng a Germain, to carpe other countreys so snappishly: let vs see, what wholesome diuinity hath bene here vttered, and how well the sinewes of M. Critabulus his argument shall be found to hang togither, when the Anatomy therof by peecemeale shall be examined.

I call to mynd, q̄ M. Critabulus, that I haue read & often heard that the like benefite hath bene graūted to Irelād through the prayers of S. Patrike. M. Critabulus hath read & heard, that by the prayers of S. Patricke, Ireland hath no venemous worme: ergo some holde opinion, that the poyson resteth onely in the people.

Truly this argument hangeth togyther by very straunge gymbols. And I dare say, M. Cope neuer learned this kynde of reasonyng in the famous colledge of Magdalene in Oxford, what so euer M. Critabulus did in Germany. But let vs put the Logique apart, and scan the singular poynt of diuinitie. I wonlde gladly learne in what part of scripture, or in what auncient father M. Critabulus reade or heard (for most of hys learning hath bene, as it seemeth, purchased by hereſay) that any holy prelate, that came of mere charity, to conuert a countrey from night to light, frō rudenesse to knowledge, from infidelitie to Christianitie, from vice to vertue, from the deuill to God, (which doth implye an especiall zeale in sauluyng their soules) would purge the soyle of all venemous wormes, and leaue the soules, that haue more nede to be weeded, wholy infected with the contagion of vice & sinne. Wherby ensueth that the place is better then the inhabitaunts, and so consequently the saying of the Machabees must be falsified. Non propter locum gentem, sed propter gentem, locum Deus elegit. God did not chose the people for that place, but hee elected the place in respect of the people. Our sauiour Iesus Christ dispossessing the pacient of the legion of deuils, permitted them to enter into an hierd of hogges. Critabulus would haue Christes saintes do the cōtrary, to dispossesse the hogs, and to leaue the men possessed with deuils. For so he reporteth S. Patrike to haue done, by riddyng the lande of all poysoned wormes, and leauyng the rancour to lurke in the people. Truly if the matter stoode so farre out of ioynt, I doubt not, but the Islanders mought haue come as lawfully to hym, as the Gerasenes came ingratefully to Christ, requiring hym to depart their country. For such a scoffing prelate, hys rowme had bene better thē his company, sith his abode would tende rather to the peruerting, then the conuertyng of their Island.

Hytherto thou hast heard (gentle Reader) how gallauntly Critabulus hath played hys parte, now shall I desire thee to viewe, how sagely Ireneus claspeth vp all the whole controuersie. He saith it is the nature of the soile, not to breede any venemous worme, and that was incident thereto, before S. Patrike was borne. How proue you that sir? Pleaseth you to shew your eye towardes the margent, and there shall you finde the 35. chapiter of Solinus solemnly quoted. Touchyng this matter, there is nothyng in Solinus but this. Illic anguis nullus, auis rara. In Ireland is no snake, and seldome a byrde, and yet byrdes are as commonly there as in any other countrey. But I would gladly vnderstand how this authoritie of Solinus furthereth M. Ireneus hys opinion. Ireland bred no snake before S. Patrick was borne: ergo, it engendered no toade, no Adder, no Frogge, nor any other virulent worme. As if a man would reason thus. Before S. Patricke his tyme there was no horsemyll in Ireland: ergo, before his tyme there was no mylthorse. Certes he that woulde winde vp his conclusion so fondly might be thought, to haue almuch witte, as a rosted horse. This auctoritie of Solinus is so farre from vpholding Ireneus his assertion, as that it plainely semeth to quite ouerthrow it, and as it were in his owne turne, it giueth him a fall.

For the cause why S. Patricke was moued, to expell all the venemous wormes out of Irelande, might probably haue bene coniectured, to haue proceded of this, ỳ he perceyuing, the lande to breede no Snakes, therof was occasioned, for the furthering of Christian fayth, to expell other kinde of wormes, that lurcked there before his comming, as Toades, Adders, Blindwormes, Frogs. &c.

Obiection. Here perchase M. Cope may blenche me, in replying that Anguis may be construed generally for all kynde of Vermine, and so I might be taken tardie in buylding my discourse vpon a misconstruction.

Answer. In good soth to omitte what straunge and absurde signification Anguis should beare, by notifiyng a poysoned spider and such lyke, and, in mine opinion, further from the purpose, the the father that disswading his sonne from playing on Sunday fortified his reason with the olde sayde saw, non est bonum ludere cum sanctis, it is not good, quoth he, to play on Sondayes or holy dayes, is it, thinke you, fellonie or treason, to bring the credit of Solinus in question, for mistaking Anguis as well as Auis. For as he was grosly deceyued in the one, in writing, that birdes were rare in Ireland, so might he haue strayed as likely in the other, by disburdening Irelande of all venemous wormes, bycause the Iſande wanted in his time but one or two kindes, as a Snake and a Toade. Where a man buyldeth vpon euerye twatling and prattling rumour, and his eye is not his iudge, he may be sure, that such lying tales will catche many feathers before they come at him, that is as farre distaunt from their nestes, as Solinus was frō Ireland, when he wrote his pamphlet. The prose whereof as it is dayly tryed, so not many yeres past hath ben very prettily verysied. There was a gentleman of mine acquaintance that mette his enemie in the fieldes, where they both vpon a trysling quarell fought so friendly as they had more mynde to haue bene grapled togither with cables, then parted by indifferent sticklers. Howbeit bycause the gentleman was neuer before sleght, and yet nothing at all that day, for eche of their blowes dyd commonly light on the medowe, where they fought, a friende of hys reported well of him to an other, saying, that he was lyke in tyme to proue a proper man of hys handes, for the well handeling of hys weapon in his late combate. Whereupon some after the other doubling the gentleman his prayse, gaue notice to an other, that such a gentleman, naming him, fought valiauntly such a day, in such a place. Immediately vpon this in a shyre or two of, it was noysed that the partie praysed, fought with two at once in such a place, naming the medowe. At length it was bruted, that he fought foure seuerall daies, and I am well assured that was the first fray that euer he made, & I thinke, it will be the last, vnlesse he be forced maugre his heart, to the contrarie. Not long after, it happened, that a gentlyman and I trauepled abroade the countrey of set purpose to disport our selues, and so to returne a freshe to our bookes, where entering in communication with a blunt countrey lobbe (yet such an one as toke his halfe peny to be good syluer) that knew the foresaid champion. My companion and I made wyse, as though we were not acquainted wyth him, or euer heard of the combate, now in good fayth gentlemen, quoth he, you would doe very well to enter in acquaintaunce with him, for ouer this, that he is a gentleman aboundantly endued wyth singular good qualities, he is become of late so valiant a cutter, as he maketh blading his dayly breakefast, By S. Mary, quoth my companion, that is very colde rosse, & if his breakfastes be no better then a peece of colde Iron, I little weigh, howe seldome I take a repast in his companie at any such ordinarie. Nay my meaning is, quoth the other, that he vseth to fight freshe and fasting euery morning, in so much ỳ of late, I dare byde by it, he fought eyght dayes in one weeke. At which wordes I for my part coulde not refrayne frō laughyng, seeing how demurely the fellow kept his countenaunce, & how that he spake bona fide. Whereupon I shaped him an answere, and sayde, that I neuer heard of any that fought eyght dayes in one weake, but onely in olde tyme, when fiue quarters made vp the yeare. The fellow perceyuing, that he ouershot himselfe, replyed: Sir, you take me very shyrte, as long and as very a lowbie as you imagine to make me: my meaning is, that he fought eyght seuerall tymes in one weeke. Eyght tymes? quoth my companion, then belike he fought once aboue commons. For you tolde vs right now, that he made his fray his morning breakefast, and whereas there are but seuen dayes in the weeke, and he fought, as you reporte, eyght times, and you knew, that eyght maketh one aboue seuen, & seuen maketh fiue & one vnder eight, eyther you must conconfesse that he fought out his breakfast, dinner, beuer or supper, or else you must graunt, that there be eyght dayes in one weake, or at the least two breakefastes in one day, & that, I am sure, you will confesse to be as great an absurdity, as ỹ other. Nay, quoth the clowne, and you intrap me with such sophistrie, you shall dine, suppe and breake your fast alone for me, and therewithall departed. Whereby may be gathered, that if he had bene lothed vp, and his tongue let to run at libertie vncontrouldo, like a bowle that runneth in a smoth allye without any tub, he would haue brought himselfe to that bay, as he would not sticke to say, that his friende had fought eight dayes in one houre. Wherefore as this puddyng his pricke grewe at length by reporte to an huge poste, so the wand of one venemous wormo in Irelande, being buted in for raine royalmes, might haue bene so thwytted and mangled in the carriage before it came to Solinus his eares, as he might haue bene enformed, that the countrey was deuoyde of all venemous Wormes, whereas in deede there lacked but one linde.

Lyke as God of his iuste punisheth a countrey, that is harde hearted, with outwarde wormes, so of his mercie, they are remoued from a royalme, that is plyaunt, to followe his lawes and preceptes. As when Pharao would not listen to God his threates denounced hym by the preaching of God, Moses and Aaron, Egypt was punished with frogges & diuers kinde of flyes, as is expresse at full in holy writte; and agayne vpō Pharao his feyned promises (the secretes of whose hollowe heart God perfectly knewe) at the instaunce of Moses, these plagues were appeased, & the vermine quite extinguished, so, I pray you, is it so absurde a position to holde, that Saint Patricke finding the Irish priest to embrace the Gospell, as he dyd in very deede, might stande so highly in God his fauor, as through his earnest petition made to God, the poysoned wormes shoulde be abandoned? This is not so rare a thing vppon the implanting of Christian fayth in any region, but rather a propertie incidēt thereto, according to Christ his promise. Signa autem eos, qui crediderint, hæc sequentur, In nomine meo dæmonia eijcient: linguis loquentur nouis: Serpentes tollent: & si mortiferum quid biberint, non eis nocebit: super ægros manus imponēt, & bene habebunt. And these tokens shal follow them that beleeue, In my Name shall they cast out Deuils, they shall speake with new tongues: they shall dryue awaye Serpentes, and if they drinke any deadly thing, it shal not hurt them: they shall lay handes on the sicke, and they shall be cured. Wherefore, sith it is so euidently warranted by Scripture, that in the name of Iesus, Serpentes may be driuen away, if Irelande be found through any such meanes to be deuoyde of poysoned wormes, we are to ascribe the glory hereof to God, according to the saying of the Prophete, A domino factum est istud, & est mirabile in oculis nostris; That hath beene done by God, and it seemeth wonderfull in our eyes. Psal. 117. vers. 22.

Thus farre (gentle Reader) encroching vpon thy patience I haue employed my trauaile in defending my natiue countrey, against such as labour to distayne it with their sclanderous scoffes. Touching the principall question, whether S. Patricke dyd expell poysoned Wormes out of Irelande, or whether it be the nature of the soyle, as I sayd in the entrie of this discourse, so I saye agayne, that I weigh not two chippes, which way the winde bloweth, bycause I see no inconuenience that may insue either of the affirmatiue or negatiue opinion. And therefore if M. Cope had dealt as modestly as Cambriense, the auctour of Polichronicon, or others, that stode to the denyall, haue done, he shoulde haue gone shotfree with his complices, and haue made in Mountebanck wyse the most he coulde of his wares. But for that he woulde needes see further in a millstone, then others, & not onely slenderly disproue the tryall opinion, but scornefully sclaunder an whole royalme, wherein he shall finde his superiours in honour, his betters in parentage, his Peeres in learning, his mates in wisedom, his equalles in courtesie, his matches in honestie: I must craue him, to beare it patiently, if, by crying him quittaunce, I serued him with a dishe of his owne cookerie. And if for this my straight dealing wyth him (whereto I was the sooner led, for that as it is courtesie to mollifie wilde speaches with milde aunsweres, so I recken it for good policie nowe and then to cleaue knurd knobbes with crabbed wedges) he will seeme to take pepper in the nose, for any recompence he is like to haue at mine handes, he may wype his nose in his sleeue. And if it shall stande with his pleasure, to reply either in English, or in Latine (the occasiō of which is rather of him growen then by me giuen) he shall finde me willing, if God spare me health, to reioyne with him in so good a quarell, eyther in the one language or the other, and when both tales are heard, I beseeme him, for my part, that shall be driuen to the wall.

Cambriense reporteth of hys owne knowledge, and I heare it auowed by credible persons, that Bernacles thousandes at once are The Bernacle.

Æneas Syluius writeth hymselfe to haue pursued the like experiment in Scotlande, where he learned the truth hereof to be found in the Islandes Orchades. Giraldus Cambriense gathereth hereof a pretye conclusion against the Jewes in this wyse.

Respice infœlix Iudæe, respice, vel serò, primam hominis generationem ex limo sine mare & fœmina: Secundamque ex mare sine fœmina, ob legis veneration em; diffiteri non audes: Tertiam solam ex mare scilicet & fœmina, quia vsualis est, dura ceruice approbas & affirmas. Quartam verò, in quâ sola salus est ex fœmina scilicet sine mare obstinata malitia in propriam perniciem detestaris. Erubesce miser, erubesce, & saltem ad naturam recurre, quę ad argumenta fidei, ad instruction em nostram noua quotidie animalia sine omni mare vel fœmina procreat & producit. Prima ergo generatio ex limo, & hæc vltima ex ligno. Illa quidem quoniam à domino naturæ tantum semel, ideo semper obstupenda processit. Istam verò non minus admirabilem, minus tamen admirandam (quia sæpe fit) imitatrix natura administrat. Sic enim composita est humana natura, vt nihil, preter inusitatum & rarò contingens vel precioſum ducat vel admirandũ. Solis ortum & occasum, quo nihil in mundo pulchrius, nihil stupore dignius, quia quotidie videmus, sine omni admiratione præterimus. Eclipsin verò solis, quia rarius accidit, totus orbis obstupescit. Ad idem etiam facere videtur, flatũ solò, & occulta quadam inspiratione citra omnem mixturam apum ex fauo procreatio. Marke thou wretched Jew, sayth Cambrien se, marke yet at length, the first creation of man (that is of Adam) of earth without male or female. As for the seconde, of a man without a woman (that is to saye Eue) for that thou hast the olde law in reuerence, thou darest not deny. As for the third, both of man and woman, because it is daily vsed as stiffe necke as thou art, thou doest acknowledge and confesse. But the fourth procreation, in which consisteth our onely iustification (he meaneth the incarnation of Christ) of a woman without man, with sturdy and obstinate rancor to thine vtter destruction thou doest detest. Blush therfore thou vnhappy Jew, be ashamed of this thy folly, and at the lest wyse haue recourse to nature, and settle hir workes before thine eyes, that for the encrease of fayth, & to the lessonyng of vs, daily breedeth and engendreth new liuing creatures, without ỹ coupling of masle of female. Adã was created of earth, the Bernacles are engendered of wood, because Adam was once created by him, who is Lord of nature, therfore it is continually admired. But for that dame nature the counterfaytresse of ỹ celestial workman, eftsones breedeth Bernacles, therefore they? breede is accompted more marueilous, then to be marueiled, more wonderfull then wondered. For such is the frampng of man his nature, as he deemeth nothing precious or wonderfull, but such thinges as seldome happen. What may be thought more beautifull then the course of the sunne? And yet because we see it daily rise and set, we let it ouerslip vs, as an vsuall custome, without any staring or gazyng. Yet we are amazed and astonied at the Eclipse, because it happeneth very seldome. The Bées that are engendred of the horny combe onely by a puffe or secrete breathing, without any coupling, seme to vpholde this procreation of Bernacles. Hitherto Cambriense, with whome concerning the engendryng of Bées, Iohannes de sancto Geminiano accordeth.

Bées how they are increased.

Iohan. de. s. Gem. in lib. de exempl. & simil. rerum lib. 4. c. 31.

The inhabitantes of Ireland are accustomed to moue question, whether Bernacles be fishe or flesche, and as yet they are not fully resolued, but most vsually the religious of strictest abstinence doe eate thẽ on fish dayes. Giraldus Cambriẽse, and after him Polichronicon, suppose, that the Irishe cleargy in this poynt stray. For they hold of certaintie, that Bernacles are flesche. And if a man say they had eaten a collop of Adam his leg, he had eaten flesh. And yet Adam was not engendred of masle or female, but only created of clay, as the Bernacles of wood and rotten timber. But the Irishe clergy did not so farre straye in their opinion, as Cambriense and Polichronicon, in their disprose. For the framing of Adam and Eue was supernatural, only done by God, and not by the helpe of Aungels, or any other creature. For like as it surpasseth natures course to raise the dead, to lighten or enlight the blynd, so it stode not with the vsuall and common linage of nature, but onely with the supereminent power of God, to frame a man of clay, & a woman of a mans rib. But the engendring of Bernacles is naturall, and not so wonderfull as Cambriense maketh it. And therfore the examples are not lyke. Now it should seeme that in Cambriense his tyme, the Irishe clergy builded their reason vpõ thys plot. What so euer is flesh, is naturally turally begotten or engendred of flesh. Bernacles are not naturally engendred of flesh, but onely of tymber and woode, Bernacles therfore are not flesh, vnlesse you would haue them to be wooden flesh. And if the reason be so knit, it may not be diffoincted by Cambrienses his example. As if a man should argue thus. She that is begotten of any man, must be of force daughter to that mā. Melcha was begotten of Aran: ergo, Melcha was Arans daughter. This argument is of all partes so fortified, as it semeth of all sides to be empregnable. Yet a busie brayne Sophister caulling on the terme (begottē) might say, that Eue was begotten of Adam, and yet she is not Adams daughter. True it is that Adam was not Eues father, no more thē Eue was Adames mother, neither by that engendring was there any degrée of consanguinitie spōg betwene them. But because the word (begotten) is taken in the argument for the naturall engendring of man and woman, the instance giuē of Eue doth not disproue the maior. And for the better vnderstanding of the question, it is to be noted that the philosophers distinguish animalia sensitiua, that is, sēsible liuing thinges, into two sortes, perfect and imperfect. The perfect are they that are engendred of sæde, the vnperfect without sæde. Those that are naturally engendred with sæde, can neuer be naturally engendred without sæde. Albeit Auicenna very erroniously holdeth ỹ contrary. As for example. Because man is naturally engendred of man and woman, no man may naturally be engendred without the copulation of man and womā: yet supernaturally it may be. As Adam was made without man and woman: Eue framed without woman: Our Sauiour Christ begotten without man. And therfore the Deuill could not haue attainted hym of originall sinne. Contrarywise, the vnperfect may be engendred without sæde by myre, mudde, dung, carien, rotten timber or any other thyng, and chiefly by the secret influence and instillation of the celestiall planets, as the sunne and such other. As if you put the heire of an horse taile, in mire, puddle, or in a dunghill for a certaine space, it will turne to a little thin sprawlyng worme, which I haue often sene and experimented. And they are termed vnperfect, not in respect of their own nature, in which they are perfect, but in comparison of other sorte of liuyng thinges. Amonge this crew must Bernacles be setled. But here some will say: let them be perfect or vnperfect. What then? I would fayne knowe, whether Cambrienses be in an errour, or the Irishe clergy. For hitherto I sée nothyng, but Cambrienses his reason disproued. And it is often séene that a sound opinion may be weakened by a feeble reason, as we sée many fayre garmentes marde in the makyng. It is true: And if any be desirous, to know my mynd herein, I suppose, according to my simple iudgement, vnder the correction of both parties, that ỹ Bernacle is neither fishe nor flesh, but rather a meane betwene both. As put the case it were enacted by parliament, that it wer high treason, to eate flesh on Friday, and fish on Sonday. Truely I think that he that eateth Bernacles both these dayes, should not be within the compasse of the statute: yet I would not wish my frend, to hazard it, least the Bernacle should be found in law fishe or flesh, yea and perhaps fishe and flesh. As when the Lyon, king of beastes made proclamation, that all horned beastes should auoyde his courte, one beast hauing but a bunche of flesh in hys forehead, departed with the reast, least it had bene founde in law that his bunche were an horne. But some wyll peraduenture meruaile, that there should be any liuyng thyng, that were not fishe nor flesh. But they haue no such cause at all. Neates, fleshewormes, bées, butterflies, caterpillers, snailes, grasshoppers, bectels, earewicks, reremise, frogs toades, adders, snakes, and such other, are liuyng thinges, and yet they are neither fishe, nor flesh, nor yet red hering. As they that are trayned in scholasticall poyntes may easily iudge. And so I thinke, that if any were so sharpe set (the statute aboue rehersed, presupposed) as to eate fryed flies, buttered bées, stued snailes, either on Friday or Sonday, he could not be therfore endited of haute treason, albeit I would not be his guest, vnlesse I toke his table to be furnisht with more wholsome and licorous viaund. The like question may be moued of the sell, and if it were well canualled, it would be found at the least wyse a mote case. But thus farre of Bernacles.

Irelande is stored of Cowes, of excellent horses, of hawkes, of fishe and of foule. They are not without wolues and grayhoundes to hunt them, bigger of bone and limme then a colt. Their cowes, as also ỹ rest of their cattaile, and commonly what else so euer the countrey engendreth (except man) is muche lesse in quantitie then those of England, or of other realms. Egle. groweth so ranke in the north partes, that ofttymes it rotteth theyr cattell. Egles are well known to brede in Ireland, but neither so big, nor so many as bookes tell. The horses are of pace caste, in running wonderful swift in gallop both false and full indifferent. The nagge or the hackney is very good for trauelling, albeit others report the contrary. And if he be broken accordingly, you shall haue a litle tytte, that will trauerse a whole day without any bayt. Their horses of seruice are called chiefe horses, being well broken, they are of an excellent courage. They reyne passingly, and champe vppon their bridles brauely, commonly they amble not, but gallopp and run. And these horses are but for skirmishes, not for trauelyng, for their stomaches are such, as they disdaine to be hackneid. Thereof the report grew, that the Irish hobby wyll not hold out in trauellyng. You shall haue of the third sort, a bastarde or mongrell hobby, neere as tall as the horse of seruice, strong in trauellyng, easie in ambling, and very swift in running. Of the horse of seruice they make great store, as wherin, at tymes of nede, they repose a great peece of safetie. The names of the ciuities, borroughes and hauen townes in Irelande. Cap. 3.

Dublinium. DUblin, the beautie and eye of Irelande, hath bene named by Ptolomie, in auncient time, Eblana. Some terme it Dublina, others Dublinia, many write it Dublinum, auctours of better skill name it Dublinium. The Irish call it, Balleé or Cleagh, that is, a towne planted vpon hurdelles. For the common opinion is, that the plotte, vppon which, the ciuitie is buylded, hath bene a marishe ground, & for that by the arte or inuention of the first founder, the water could not be voyded, he was forced to fasten the quakemyre with hurdles, and vpon them to buylde the citie. I heard of some that came of buildyng of houses to this foundation: and other holde opinion that if a carte or wayne runne with a round and maine pace, through a streete called the high streete, the houses on eche side shal be perceyued to shake. This Citye was buylded, or rather the buildings therof enlarged, about the yeare of our Lorde 455. For about this tyme there arriued in Irelande three noble Easterlings that were brethren, Auellanus, Sitaracus, and Yuorus. Auellanus beyng the eldest brother, buylded Dublin, Sitaracus Waterforde, and Yuorus Limmerick. Of the founder Auellanus, Dublin was named Auellana, and after by corruption of speache Eblana. This Citie, as it is not in antiquitie inferiour to any citie in Irelande, so in pleasaunt situation, in gorgeous buildings, in the multitude of people, in martiall chiualrie, in obedience and loyaltie, in the aboundaunce of wealth, in largenes of hospitalitie, in maners and ciuilitie it is superiour to all other Cyties and townes in that realme. And therfore it is commonly called the Irishe or yong London. The seate of this citie is of all sides pleasant, comfortable, and wholsome. If you would trauerse hils, they are not farre of. If champion ground it lyeth of all partes, if you be delited with freshwater, the famous riuer called the Liffie, named of Ptolome Lybnium, runneth fast by. If you wil take the view of the sea, it is at hande. The onely faulte of thys Citie is, that it is lesse frequented of merchant estrangers, because of the bare hauen. Their charter is large, King Henry the fourth gaue this Citie the swoorde, in the yere of our Lord 1409. and was ruled by a Mayor and two Bailifs, which were chaunged into Shirifs by a charter graunted by Edwarde the firte, in the yeare of our Lorde 1547. In which yeare John Ryan and Robert Jans, two worshipfull gentlemen, were colleages in that office, and therof they are named the last Bailifs and first Shirifes, that haue bene in Dublin. It appeareth by the auncient scale of thys Citie, called Signum præposituræ, that this Citie haue bene in olde tyme gouerned by a Prouost.

The Hospitalitie of the Mayor and the Shyriffes, for the yeare being is so large and bountifull, that sothly, London forepriced, a very few such Officers vnder the crowne of Englande kepe so great a porte, none, I am sure, greater. The Mayor, ouer the number of Officers, that take their daily repast at his table, kepeth, for his yeare, in maner, open house. And albeit in tearme time his house is frequented aswell of the Nobilitie as of other Potentates of great calling, yet his ordinarie is so good, that a very few set feastes are prouided for them. They that spende least in their Mayoralte (as those of credite, yea and such as bare the office haue informed me) make an ordinary accopt of 500. pounds for their diaunde & dyet that yeare. Which is no small somme to be bestowed in housekeping, namelye where victualles are so good cheape, and the presentes of friendes diuers and sundry.

The Hospitalitie of the Mayor & Shyrifs

There

There hath bene of late yeares a worshipfull gentleman, named, Patrike Sarcefield, that bare the office of the Mayoralte in Dublynne, who kept so great porte in his yeare, as his hospitalitie to his fame and renowne reacheth as yet in fresh memorie. One of his especiall and entyre frendes entering in communication with the gentleman, his yeare being well nere expyred, moued question, to what, he thought, his expenses, that yeare, amounted? Truely, James (so hys friende was named) quoth M. Sarcefield, I take betweene me & God, when I entered into mine office, the last S. Hierome his day (which is the morrowe of Michaelmasse, on which day the Mayor taketh his othe before the chiefe Baron, at the Eschequer, within the castle of Dublinne) I had three barnes well stored & thwackt with corne, and I assured my selfe, that any one of these three had bene sufficient, to haue stored myne house wyth breade, Ale, and bere for this yeare. And nowe, God and good companie be thanked, I stande in doubt, whether I shall rubbe out my Mayoralte with my thirde barne, which is well nigh wyth my yeare ended. And yet nothing smiteth me so much at the heart, as that the knot of good fellowes, that you see here (he ment the sergeantes and officers) are readie to flit from me, and make their next yeares aboade with the next Mayor. And certes I am so much wedded to good fellowshippe, as if I coulde maintayne mine house, to my contentation wyth defraying of fiue hundred pounds yearely, I woulde make humble sute to the citizens, to be theyr officer these three yeares to come. Ouer this, he dyd at the same tyme protest with othe, that he spent that yeare in housekeping twentie tonnes of Claret wine, ouer and aboue whyte wine, Sacke, Paulmesey, Muscadel &c. And in very deede it was not to be maruelled. For during his Mayoralte his house was so open, as commonly frō fiue of the clocke in the morning to tenne at night his buttrey and cellars were with one crew or other frequented. To the haunting of which, guestes were the sooner allured, for that you should neuer marck him or his bedfellowe (such was their bureinnesse) once frowne, or wrinckle their foreheads, or bende their browes, or glome their countenaunces, or make a sower face at any guest, were he neuer so meane. But their entertaynmēt was so notable, as they woulde sauce their bountifull and daintie fare with heartie and amiable chere. His Porter or any other Officer durst not for both his eares giue the simplest man, that resorted to his house, Tom drum his entertaynement, which is, to hale a man in by the heade, and thrust him out by both the shoulders. For he was fully resolued, that his worshippe and reputation coulde not be more disrayned, then by the currish entertaynement of any guest. To be briefe (according to the golden verses of the auncient and famous Poet, Geffray Chaucer.

Chaucer in the prologue of his Canterbury tales.

An housholder, and that a great, was he,
Sainct Iulian he was in his countre.
His breade, his Ale, was alway after one.
A better viended man was no where none.
Without bakte meate was neuer his house,
Of fishe and flesshe, and that so plenteouse,
It snewed in his house of meate and drinke.
Of all deinties, that men coulde thinke.
After the sundry seasons of the yere,
So chaunged he his meate, and his suppere.
Full many a fat Partriche had he in mew,
And many a breme, and many a Luce in stew.

Some of his frendes, that were snudging pennyfathers, woulde take him vp verye roughly, for his lauishing and his outragious expenses, as they tearme it. Twise, my maisters, woulde he saye, take not the matter so hote. Who so commeth to my table, and hath no neede of my meate, I knowe, he commeth for the good will, he beareth me, and therefore I am beholding to thanke him for his companie: if he resorte for neede, how may I bestow my goodes better, then in releeuing the poore? If you had perceyued me so farre behinde hande, as that I had bene like to haue brought Haddocke to Paddocke, I woulde patiently permit you, both largely to controule me, and friendly to reprowe me. But as long as I cutte so large thonges of mine owne leather, as that I am not yet come to my buckle, and during the time I keepe my selfe so farre a flote, as that I haue as much water as my ship draweth, I pray you, pardon me, to be liberall in spending, sith God of his goodnesse is gracious in sending.

And in deede so it fell out. For at the ende of his Mayoralte he ought no man a dothin. What he dispended was his owne. And euer after during his life, he kept so worthy standing house, as that he seemed to surrender the Princes sworde to other Mayors, and reserued the porte and hospitalitie to himselfe. Not long before him was Nicolas Stanihurst their Mayor, who was so great and good an housholder, that during his Mayoraltie, the Lord Cancellour of the royalme was his dayly & ordinarie guest. There haue bene of late worshipfull portes kept by M. Fyanne, who was twyse Mayor, M. Sedgraue, Thomas Fitz Symons, Robert Cusack. Walter Cusack, Nicholas Fitz Symons, James Bedlow, Christofer Fagan, and diuers others.

theirs. And not onely their officers so farre excell in hospitalitie, but also the greater parte of the cuntrie is generally addicted to such ordinarie and standing houses, as it woulde make a man muse, which way they are able, to beare it out, but onely by the goodnesse of God, which is the Upholder and Furtherer of hospitalitie.

What shoulde I here speake of their charitable almoyse, dayly and hourely extended to the nēedie? The poore prisoners both of the Newgate and the Castle, with three or foure hospitalles, are chiefly, if not onely, relæued by the citizēs. Furthermore there are so many other extraordinarie beggers, that dayly swarme there, so charitablye succoured, as that they make the whole citie in effect theyr hospitall. The great expenses of the citizens may probably be gathered by the worthy and Fayrelike markets wēekely on Wenesday and fryday kept in Dublinne. Theyr shambles is so well stored with meate, and their market with corne, as not onely in Ireland, but also in other countreys you shall not sée any one shambles, or any one market better furnisht with the one, or the other, then Dublinne is. The Citizens haue, from time to time, in sundry conflicts, so galde the Irishe, that euen to this daye, the Irishe feare a ragged and tagged blacke standarde that the Citizens haue, almost, through tract of tyme, worne to the harde stumpes. This standarde they carie with them in hostings, being neuer displayed, but when they are readie to enter in battaile, and to come to the shocke. The sight of which daunteth the Irish aboue measure. And, for the better training of their yougth in martial exployctes, the Citizens vse to musker foure times by the yere: on Blackmonday, which is the morow of Easter day, on Mayday, S. Iohn Baptist his eue, and S. Peter his eue. Whereof two are ascribed to the Maior & Shirifes, the other two, to witte, the musters on Mayday & S. Peter his eue are assigned to the Mayor and Shirifes of the bullering. The Mayor of Bullering is an office elected by the citizens, to be, as it were capitaine or gardayne of the batchelers and the vnwedded youth of the citie. And for the yeare he hath auctoritie to chastise & punishe such, as frequent bothehouses, and the like vnchast places. He is termed the Mayor of the Bull ring, of an Iron ring that sticketh in the corne market, to which the bulles, that are yearely bayted, be vsually tyed: which ring is had by him and his compayne in so great price, as if any citizen batchelor happe to marry, the Mayor of the bulring & his crewe conduct the bridegrome, vpon hys returne from Church, to the market place, & there with a soleme kisse, for hys Vultumum vale, he doth homage to the bull ring.

The Blackmonday musker sprong of hys occasion some after Irelande was conquered by the Britons, and the greater part of Leinster pacified, diuers townes men of Bristow flytted from thence to Dublin, and in shorte space the cuntrie was by them so well inhabited, as it grew to be very populous.

The black monday.

Dublyne inhabited by ỹ Bristollians. This was about the yeare of our Lorde 1209.

Whereupon the citizens hauing ouer great affiaunce in the multitude of the people, and so consequently being somewhat retcheleste in héeding the mountayne enemie, that lurcked vnder their noses, were wont to roame and royle in cluskers, somtime three or foure myles from the towne. The Irishe enemyes espying, that the Citizens were accustomed to fetche such odde vagaries, especiallye on the holy dayes, and hauing an ynckling withall by the meanes of some false clatersert or other, that a companie of them woulde haue ranged abroade, on mondaye in the Easter weeke, towards the woodde of Cullen, which is distaunt two myles from Dublinne, they lay in stale very well appointed, and layde in sundry places for their comming. The Citizens rather minding ỹ pleasure, they shoulde presently enioy, then forecasting the hurt, that might ensue, sloent vnarmed out of the cluttie to the wood, where being intercepted by the, that lay howling in ambush, they were to the number of fiue hundred miserably slayne. Whereupon the remnaunt of the Citizens deeming that vnluckie time to be a crosse or a dismalle daye, gaue it the appellation of Blackmondaye. The Citie sone after being peopled by a freshe supply of Bristollians, to dare the Irishe enemie, agréede, to banket yearely in that place. Which to this daye is obserued. For the Mayor and the Shirifes with the Citizens repayre to the wood of Cullen, in which place the Mayor bestoweth a costly dinner within a mote or a roundell, & both ỹ Shirifes within an other, where they are so well garded with the yougth of the citie, as the mountayne enemie dareth not attempt, to snatche as much, as a pastey crust from thence.

The churches of Dublyne.

Dublinne hath at this daye within the citie and in the suburbes these churches that ensue, of which the greater number are paroche churches, onely Christ his church with a few oratories and chappels excepted.

Christes church.

Christes his church, otherwise named ecclesia S. Trinitatis, a cathedrall church, the ancientest that I can finde recorded of all the churches now standyng in Dublin. I take it to haue bene builded, if not in Auellanus hys tyme, tyme, yet sone after by the Danes. The building of which, was both repayred and enlarged by Citrius prince of Dublin, at the earnest request of Donate the bishop, and sone after the conquest it hath bene much beautified by Robert Fitz Stephens & Strangbowe the erle of Penbroke, who with his sonne is in the body of the church entumbed. The chapell that standeth in the choze, commonly called the new chappell, was builded by Girald fitz Thomas, erle of Kildare, in the yeare of our Lozd 1510. where he is entumbed.

S. Patrikes churche, a cathedzall churche, endued with notable liuings, and diuers fatte benefices. It hath a chappell at the nozth doze which is called ỳ paroch church. This church was founded by the famous and wozthy pzelate John Commyn, about the yeare of our Lozd. 1197. This foundation was greatly aduaunced by ỳ liberalitie of king John. There hath risen a greate contention betwixt thys churche and Chzistes churche foz antiquitie, wherein doubtlesse S. Patricke hys churche ought to giue place, vnlesse they haue further matter to shew, and better reasons to builde vpon, then their foundations, in whiche this churche by many yeares is inferiour to the other.

S. Werberolle, oz S. Warburge, so called of a Chesshire Virgin. The citizens of Chester founded this church, with two chappels thereto annexed, the one called our Ladies chapel, the other S. Martines chappel. Hir feast is kepte the third of Febzuary. This churche, wyth a great parte of the Citie was burnt in the yeare 1301. but agayne by the parochians reedified.

S. John the Euangelist.

S. Audoen, which is cozruptly called saint Owen, oz Owen. His feast is solemnised the xxiij. of August. The paroche of this churche is accounted the best in Dublin, foz that the greater number of the Aldermē and the wozshippes of the Citie are demurraunt within that paroche.

S. Tullock, now pzophaned. In this church in olde tyme, the familie of the Fitzsymons was, foz the moze part, buried. The paroche was meared from the Crane castle, to the fishambles, called the cockehil with Pzeston hys Innes, and the lane thereto adioyning, which scope is now vnited to S. John hys paroche.

S. Katherine.

S. Michan, oz Wighanne.

S. James: his feast is celebzated the xxv. of July, on which day in ancient time was there a wozthy fayze kept at Dublin, continuing sixe dayes, vnto which resozted diuers merchantes as wel frō England, as frō France, & Flaunders. And they afcurded their wares so doggecheape, in respect of the Citie merchantes, that the countrey was yere by yere sufficiently stozed by estrangers, and the citie merchants not vttering their wares, but to such as had not redy chinckes, and therupon fozced to run on ỳ scoze, were very much empouerished: wherfoze partly thozough the canuassing of the towne merchantes, & partly by the winching of the rest of the Citizens beyng wan vpon many gay glosed pzomises, by playing boepēpe to beare themselues ouerly in the matter, that famous marte was suppzest, and all fozreyne sale wholy abandoned. Yet foz a memoziall of this notable faire a fewe cottages, bouthes, and alepoles, are yerely pitcht at S. James his gate.

S. Michael of Poules, aliàs, Paules.

S. Bzigide.

S. Keuyn.

S. Peter de monte, oz on the hil, appendant to S. Patrikes church.

S. Stephen. This was erected foz an hospitall, foz powze, lame, & impotent lazers, where they abide to this day, although not in suche chaste and sincere wise, as the founders wyll was vpon the erection thereof. The Maioz with his bzethzen on S. Stephen his daye (which is one of their station daies) repaireth thither, and there doth offer.

Edward Bzuise a Scot, and bzother to Robert Bzuise king of Scottes arryued in the nozth of Ireland. From whence he marched on fozward with his army, vntil he came as farre as Castleknock. The citizens of Dublin being soze amazed at the sodayne & scarbozough appzoche of so puissaunt an enemy, burned all the houses in S. Thomas his stréte, lest he should vpon his repayze to Dublin haue any succour in the suburbes.

The Mayor (named, Robert Notingham) and communaltie being in this distresse razed down an Abbay of the Fryer preachers, called S. Saluiour his Monastery, & brought the stones thereof to these places, where the the gates now stande, and all along that way dyd cast a Wall for the better fortifying of the ciuitie, misrusting that the Walles that went along both the keyes, shoulde not haue bene of sufficient force to outholde the enemie. The Scottes hauing intelligence of the fortifying of Dublyne, and reckening it a folye to laye siege to so impregnable a ciuitie, marched towarde a place not far from Dublyne, called the Salmon leape, where pytching there tentes for foure dayes, they remoued towardes the Naas. But when the ciuitie was past this danger, king Edwarde the seconde gaue straight commaundement to the citizens to builde the Abbey they rased, saying that although lawes were squatted in warre, yet notwithstanding they ought to be reuiued in peace.

Gurmund his gate, harde by the cuculle, or Cockolds post. Some suppose, that one Gurmundus buylded this gate, and therof to take the name. Others iudge, that the Irishe assaulting the ciuitie, were discomfited by the Earle of Ormonde, then by good hap soiourning at Dublyne. And bycause he issued out at that gate, to the ende the valiaunt exployte and famous conquest of so worthy a Potentate shoulde be engrayled in perpetuall memorie, the gate bare the name of Ormonde his gate.

But the inhabitantes being dayly and hourely molested and preded by their prouling Mountaine neighbours, were forced to suffer their buyldinges fall in decay and embayed themselues within the citie Walles.

Among other monuments, there is a place in that lane called now Collets Innes, which in olde tyme was the Escacar, or exchequer. Which shoulde imply that the Princes court woulde not haue bene kept there, vnlesse the place had bene taken to be cocksure. But in fine it fell out contrarie. For the Baron sitting there solemlye, and as it seemed, retchlesly: the Irishe espying the opportunitie, rushed into the court in plumpes, where surprising the vnweaponed multitude, they cõmitted horrible slaughters, by sparing none that came vnder their dynte: and withall, as far as their scarborrough leasure coulde serue them, they ransacke the Prince his thesaure, vpon which mishappe the exchequer was frõ thẽce remoued. There hath bene also in that lane, a chappell dedicated to S. George, likelye to haue bene founded by some worthye knight of the Garter. The Mayor with hys brethren was accustomed with great triumphe and pageantes yearely on S. George his feast to repayre to that chappell, and there to offer. This chappell hath bene of late rased, and the stones thereof by the consent of the assembly turned a common Quen, conuerting the auncient monumẽt of a doughty, aduenturous, and holy knight, to the coalerake swéping of a puddoale baker.

The varlet was so swifte on foote, as he hath eftsones outrun the swiftest and luskiest yong men in all Oxmantowne, maugre theyr heds, bearing a potte or a panne of theyrs on his shoulders, to his den. And now and then, in derision of such as pursued hym, he would take hys course vnder the gallowes, which standeth very nigh hys caue (a fitte signe for such an Inne) and so beyng shrowded within his lodge, he reckened himself cocksure, none beyng found at that tyme so hardy as would aduenture to entangle himselfe within so intricate a maze. But as the pitcher that goeth often to the water, commeth at length home broke: so this lusky youth would not surcease from open catchyng, forcible snatchyng, and priuy prowling, to time he was by certain gaping gromes that laye in wayte for him, intercepted, fleeing toward his couch, hauyng vpon his apprehension no more wrong done hym, then that he was not soner hanged on that gallowes, through which in his youth & follitie he was wont to run. There standeth in Oxmantowne greene, an hillocke, named little Johns hyll. The occasion proceeded of this.

In the yere 1189. there ranged three robbers and outlawes in England, among which Robert hode and little John were chiefetaines, of all theeues doubtlesse the most courteous. Robert hode beyng betrayed at a Nonry in Scotland, called Bricklies, the remnaunt of the crue was scattered, and euery man forced to shift for himselfe. Wherupō little John was fayne to flie the realme, by sayling into Ireland, where he sojourned for a few dayes at Dubline. The citizens beyng done to vnderstand, the wanderyng outcast to be an excellent archer, requested hym hartily to trie how far he could shote at randone. Who yeldyng to their behest, stode on the bridge of Dublin, and shotte to that mole hill, leauyng behynde him a monument, rather by his posteritie to be wondered, then possibly by any man liuyng to be counterfeited. But as the repayre of so notorious a champion, to any countrey, would soone be published, so his abode could not be long concealed: and therefore, to eschew the daunger of lawes, he fled into Scotland, where he dyed at a towne or village called Horany. Gerardus Mercator, in his Cosmographye affirmeth, that in the same towne the bones of an huge and mighty man are kept, which was called little John, amōg which bones, ỹ huckle bone or hipbone was of such largenesse, as witnesseth Hector Boethius, ỹ he thrust his arme through ỹ hole therof. And the same bone beyng suted to the other partes of his body, did argue the man to haue bene 14. foote long, which was a prety length for a little John. Whereby appeareth, that he was called little John ironically lyke as we terme him an honest man, whom we take for a knaue in grayne. Here vnto the citie of Dubline are the foure auncient Manours annexed to the crowne, which are named to this day, the kinges lande: to wit, Newcastle, Tassaggard, Eschyre, & Crumlyn. The manour of Crumlyn payeth a greater chiefe rent to the prince, then any of the other three, which proceeded of this. The Seneschall beyng offended with the tenants for their misdemeanor toke them vp very sharply in the court, and with rough and minatory speaches began to menace the. The lobbishe and desperate clobberlousnesse, takyng the matter in dudgeon, made no more wordes, but knockt their Seneschald on the coskard, & left hym there sprawling on the grounde for dead. For which detestable murder their rent was enhaunced, and they pay at this day ix. pence an acre, which is double to any of the other three manours.

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus, as is aforesayd in the yere 155. Ptolome nameth it Manapia, but why he appropriateth ỹ name to this citye, neither doth he declare, nor I gesse. This city is properly builded, and very well compacte, somewhat close by reason of their thicke buildinges and narrowe stretes. The hauen is passing good, by which the citizens through the entercourse of forreine traphike in short space attayne to aboundaunce of welth. The soyle about it is not all of the best, best, by reason of which the ayre is not very subtill, yet natheless the sharpnesse of theyr wittes seemeth to be nothyng rebated or dulde by reason of the grosenesse of the ayre. For in good soth the townesmen, and namely ỳ studentes are pregnant in conceiuing, quicke in takyng, and sure in keppyng. The citizens are very heedy and wary in all their publique affaires, slow in determining matters of weight, loning to loke ere they leape. In chosing their magistrate, they respect not onely his riches, but also they weigh his experience. And therfore they elect for their Maior neyther a riche man that is young, nor an olde man that is powre. They are cherefull in the entertaynement of straungers, hartye one to an other, nothing giuen to factions. They loue no idle benche whisklers, nor luskishe saytoures, for yong and old are wholy addicted to thryuing, the men commonly to traffike, the women to spinnyng and carding. As they distill the best Aqua vitæ, so they spin the choysest rugge in Ireland. A friend of myne beyng of late demurrant in London, and the weather by reason of an hard hoare frosse beyng somewhat nippyng, repayred to Paris garden, clad in one of these Waterford rugs. The maskieles had no sooner espyed him, but deeming he had bene a Beare, would sayne haue bayted him. And were it not that the dogs were partely mosseled, and partly chayned, he doubted not, but that he should haue bene well tugd in hys Irishe rugge, wherupon he solemnly vowed, neuer to see Bearebayting in any such weed. The city of Waterford hath continued to the crowne of Englande so loyall, that it is not found registred since the cõquest to haue bene disfeyned with the smallest spot, or dasked wᵗ the least freckle of treason, notwithstandyng the sundry assaults of trayterous attemptes, and therfore the cities armes are deckt with this golden worde, Intacta manet, a poesie as well to be hartily followed, as greatly admired of all true and loyall townes.

Limmericke, called in Latine Limmericũ, was builded by Pyrrus, as is before mentioned, about the yere 155. This citie coasteth on the sea hard vpon the riuer Senan, wherby are most notably seuered Mounster and Connaght: the Irish name this city Loumneagh, and thereof in Englishe it is named Limmerick. The town is planted in an Iland, which plot, in olde tyme, before the buildyng of the citie, was stored with grasse. During which tyme it happened, that one of the Irishe potentates raysing warre against an other of his pieres, encamped in that Ile, hauyng so great a troupe of horsmen, as the horses eate vp the grasse in xvij. howers: wherupon for the notorious number of horses, the place is called Loum ne augh, that is, the horse bare, or a place made bare or eaten vp by horses. The very maine sea is three score myles distaunt from the towne, and yet the riuer is so nauigable, as a ship of 200. tunne, may sayle to the key of the city. The riuer is termed in Irishe, Shaune amne, that is, the olde riuer: for shaune is olde, and amne is a riuer, deducted of the latine worde amnis. The buildyng of Limmericke is sumptuous and substantiall.

Corcke. Corcke in Latine, Coratium, or Corratium, the fourth citie of Irelande, happily planted on the sea. Their hauen is an hauen royall. On the landside they are encombred with euill neighboures, the Irishe outlawes, that they are fayne to watch their gates howerly, to kepe them shut at seruice times, at meales from sunne to sunne, nor suffer any estraunger to enter the citie with his weapon, but ỳ same to leaue at a lodge appointed. They walke out at seasons for recreation wᵗ power of men furnished. They truck not the countrey adioining, but match in wedlock among themselues only, so that the whole city is wel nigh linked one to the other in affinitie.

Drogheda. Drogheda, accounted the best towne in Ireland, and truely not far behynde some of their cities. The one moyetie of this towne is in Meath, the other planted on the further side of the water lieth in Ulster. There runneth a blynde prophesie on this towne, that Rosse was, Dublin is, Drogheda shall be the best of the three.

Rosse. Rosse, an hauen towne in Mounster not far from Waterford, which seemeth to haue ben in auncient tyme a town of great port. Wherof sondry and probable coniectures are giuẽ, as well by the olde ditches that are nowe a myle distaunt from the walles of Rosse, betwene which walles and ditches, the reliques of the auncient walles, gates and towers placed betwene both are yet to be seene. The towne is builded in a barren soyle, and planted among a crew of naughty and prowlyng neighbours. And in olde tyme when it flourished, albeit the towne were sufficiently peopled, yet as long as it was not cõpassed with walles, they were forced with watche and warde, to kepe it from the greedy snatchyng of the Irishe enemies. With whome as they were generally molested, so the priuate conseyng of one peasaunt on a sodayne, incensed them to inuiron their towne with strong and substantiall walles. There repayred one of the Irishe to this towne on horsebacke, and espying a piece of cloth on a merchants stall, toke holde thereof, and bet the clothe to the lowest lowest pyece he could. As the Merchaunt and he stode dodging one wyth the other in cheaping the ware, the horsman considering that he was well mounted, and that the merchant and he had growen to a pyece, made wyse as though he woulde haue drawen to his purse, to haue defrayed the money. The cloth in the meane whyle being tucked vp and placed before him, he gaue the spurre to his horse and ranne away with the cloth being not imbard from his pelting pase, by reason the towne was not perclosed eyther wyth ditch or wall. The townes men being pincht at the heart, that one rascall in such scornefull wyse should giue them the slampame, not so much weighing the sclenderneſſe of the losse, as the shamefulneſſe of the foyle, they put their heades together, consulting how to preuent eyther the sodaine rushing, or the posthast flying of any such aduenterous rakehell hereafter.

In which consultation a famous Dido, a chaste wydowe, a politicke dame, a bountifull gentlewoman, called Rose, who representing in sincerities of lyfe the swætneſſe of that herbe, whose name she bare, vnfolded the deuise, howe any such future mischaunce shoulde be preuented, and withall opened hir coffers liberally, to haue it furthered: Two good properties in a counsaylour. Hir deuise was, that the towne shoulde incontinently be inclosed with walles, and there wythall promised to discharge the charges, so that they would not sticke to finde out labourers. The deuise of this worthie Matrone being lyke, and the offer liberall, the townes men agreed to follow the one, and to put their helping handes to the atchieuing of the other. The worke was begunne, which through the multitude of handes seemed light. For the whole towne was assembled, ragge & ragge, cutte and long tayle: none exempted but such as were bedred & impotent. Some were talked to delue, others appointed wᵗ mattockes to digge, diuers allotted to the vnheaping of rubbishe, many bestowed to the carryage of stones, sundry occupyed in tempering of morter, the better sorte busied in ouerseing the workemen, eche one according to hys vocation employed, as though the ciuitie of Carthage were a freshe in buylding, as it is featlye described by the golden Poet Virgil, and neately Englished by M. Doctour Phaer.

Rose, of Rosse.

The Moores with courage went to worke
some vnder burdens grones:
Some at the walles and towers with handes were tumbling vp the stones.
Some measured out a place to buylde their mansion house within:
Some lawes and officers to make in Parliment dyd begin.
An other an hauen had cast,
and deepe they trenche the grounde,
Some other for the games and playes
a stately place had founde.
And pyllers great they cut for kings, to garnish forth their walles.
And lyke as Bees among the flowers,
when fresh the sommer falles,
In shine of sunne apply their worke,
when growne is vp their yong:
Or when their hiues they ginne to stoppe,
and hony sweete is sprong,
That all their caues and cellers close with dulcet liquour filles,
Some doth outlade, some other bringes
the stuffe with ready willes.
Sometime they ioyne, and all at once doe from their mangers fet
The slouthfull drones, that woulde consume, and nought woulde doe, to get.
The worke it heates, the hony smelles of flowers and timy wet.

But to returne from Dido of Carthage, to Rose of Rosse, and hir worke, the labourers were so many, the worke, by reason of round and exchequer payment, so well applyed, the quary of fayre marble so nære at hand. (For they affirme, that out of the trenches and ditches hard by their rampyers, the stones were had, and all that plot is so stony that the foũdation is an harde rocke) that these Walles with diuers braue turrettes were sodainly mounted, and in maner sooner finished, then to the Irishe enemies notified. Which ỹ wisse was no small cosise to them. These walles in circuit are equall to Londõ walles. It hath three gorgious gates, Bishoppe his gate, on the East side: Allegate, on the East southeast side: And South gate, on the south parte. This towne was no more famoused for these walles, then for a notable wodden bridge that stretched from the towne to the otherside of the water, which must haue bẽene by reasonable surucy xij. score, if not more. Diuers of the poales, legges & stakes, with which the bridge was vnderpropt, sticke to this daye in the water. A man woulde here suppose, that so flourishing a towne, so firmely buylded, so substantially walled, so well peopled, so plenteously with thryfty artificers stored, woulde not haue fallen to any sodaine decay. But as the secret & deepe iudgements of God are veiled within the couerture of his diuine Maiestie, so it standeth not with the dulneſſe of man his wit, to beate his braynes in the curious enserarching of hidden misteries. Rosse decaped.

ries. Wherefore I, as an hyſtorian vndertaking in this Treatiſe, rather plainely to declare, what was done, then rashly to inquyre, why it ſhoulde be done: purpoſe, by God his aſſiſtaunce, to accompliſh, as nére as I can, my duetie in the one, leauing the other to the friuolous deciding of buſie heads. This Roſe, who was the foundreſſe of theſe former rehearſed walles, had iſſue thrée ſonnes, (howbeit ſome holde opinion, that they were but hir Nephewes) who beyng bolſtered out through the wealth of their mother, and ſupported by their trafficke, made diuers proſperous voyages into forraine countreys. But as one of the thrée chapmen was imployed in his trafficke abroade, ſo the prettie popelet his wyfe began to be a freſhe occupying gigglotte at home, and by report fell ſo farre acquainted wyth a religious cloyſterer of the towne, as that he gate wythin the lyning of hyr ſmocke. Bothe the partyes wallowing ouerlong in the ſtincking puddle of adulterie, ſuſpicion begainne to créepe in ſome townes mens braines, and to be brieſe, it came ſo farre, through the iuſt iudgement of God, to light, whether it were, that ſhe was with childe in hir huſbande his abſence, or that hir louer bled hir fondly in open preſence, as the preſumption was not onely vehement, but alſo the fact to too apparent. Hir vnfortunat huſband had not ſoner notice gyuen him vpon his returne of theſe ſorowfull newes, then his fingers began to nibble, hys téeth to grinne, hys eyes to trickle, his eares to dindle, his heade to dezell, in ſomuch as his heart being ſheared wyth ialouſie, & his wits enſtalde through Phrenetie, he became as madde, as a marche hare. But howe heauily ſoeuer hir huſbande toke it, Dame Roſe and all hir friendes (which were in effect all the townes men, for that ſhe was their common benefactreſſe) were galde at their hearts, aſwell to heare of the enormyous aduoutrie, as to ſée the bedlem panges of brainſicke ialouſie. Whereupon diuers of the townes menne grunting and grudging at the matter, ſayde that the fact was horrible, and that it were a déede of charitie vtterly to grubbe away ſuch wilde ſhrubbes from the towne: and if thys were in any diſpunishable wyſe rakte vp in the aſhes, they ſhoulde not ſoner trauerſe the ſeas, then ſome other woulde enkendle the like fire a freſhe, and ſo conſequently diſhoneſt their wyfes, and make their huſbands to become changelinges, as being turnde frō ſober mode to be hornewod, becauſe rutting wyues make often rammiſhe huſbandes, as our prouerbe doeth inferre. Others ſcothing their fellowes in theſe mutynies turned their priuate iniurie to a publicke quarell, and a number of the townes men conſpiring togyther flockt in the dead of the nyght, well appointed, to the Abbeye, wherein the fryer was cloyſtered (the monument of which Abbaye is yet to be ſéene at Roſſe on the South ſyde) where vnderſparring the gates, and bearing vp the dormitorie doore, they ſtabbed the adulterer with the reaſt of the couent thorough wyth their weapons. Where they left them goaring in their bloude, roaring in their cabannes, and gaſping vp their fitting goaſtes in their couches. The vproare was great, and they to whom the ſlaughter before hande was not imparted, were wonderfully thereat aſtonyed. But in eſpeciall the remnant of the cleargy, bare very hollow hearts to the townes men, and howe friendly theyr outward countenances were, yet they would not with inwarde thought forget, nor forgiue ſo horrible a murder, but were fully reſolued, whenſoeuer opportunitie ſerued them, to ſit in their ſkirtes, by making thē ſoulſe as ſorowfull a kyrie. Theſe thrée brethren not long after this bloudy exployte ſpedde thē into ſome outlandiſh countrey to continue their trade, The religious men being done to vnderſtād, as it ſeemed, by ſome of their neighbours, which forerayled them homeward, that theſe thrée brethren were ready to be imbarckt, ſlunckt priuily out of the towne, and reſorted to the mouth of the hauen, nére a caſtle, named Hulck tower, which is a notable marck for Pilottes, in directing them, which way to ſterne their ſhips, and to eſchew the daunger of the craggy rockes there on euery ſide of the ſhore peaking. Some iudge, that the ſaid Roſe was foundreſſe of this tower, and of purpoſe dyd buylde it for the ſaftie of hir childrē, but at length it turned to their bane. For theſe reuengers nightly dyd not miſſe to laye a lanterne on the toppes of the rockes, that were on the other ſide of the water. Which practiſe was not long by thē continued, when theſe thrée paſſengers bearing ſayle with a luſty gale of winde made right vpon the lanterne, not doubting, but it had bene the Hulck tower. But they toke theyr marke ſo farre amiſſe, as they were not ware, to tyme theyr ſhip was daſht and paſht agaynſt the rockes, & all the paſſengers ouerwhyrled in the ſea. This heauy hap was not ſo ſorowfull to the townes men, as it was gladſome to the religious, thincking that they had in part cryed them acquittaunce, the more that they, which were drowned, were the Archebrochers of their brethrens bloude. Howbeit they would not crye hoa here, but ſent in poſte ſome of their couent to Rome, where they inhaunced the slaughter of the fraternitie so haynously, & concealed their owne prankes so couertly, as the Pope excõmenged the towne, ỹ towne accursed the Friers: so that there was suche cursing and banning of all handes, and such discentious hurly burly rayled betwéene thẽselfes, as the estate of that flourishing towne was tourned arsye versye, topside tholherway, & from abundaunce of prosperitie quite exchanged to extréme penurye.

The walles stand to this day, a few stréets & houses in the towne, no small parcell thereof is turned to Orchardes and Gardeines. The greater part of the towne is stéepe and steaming vpwarde. Theyr church is called Christchurche, in the northside whereof is placed a monument called the king of Denmarke hys tumbe, whereby coniecture maye ryse, that the Danes were the founders of that church. This Rosse is called Rosse noua, or Rosse ponti, by reason of theyr brydge. That which they call olde Rosse, beareth east thrée myles from thys Rosse, into the countrye of Weisford, an auncient manour of the Earle of Kyldares. There is the thyrde Rosse on the otherside of the water, called Rosse Ibarcanne, so named, for that it standeth in the coũtrey of Kylkenny, which is deuyded into thrée partes, into Ibarcanne, Ida and Idouth.

Weisford. Weisford, an hauen towne not farre from Rosse. I finde no great matters therof recorded, but only that it is to be had in great price of all the Englishe posteritie planted in Ireland, as a towne that was the first fostrelle & harborelle of the Englishe conquerors.

Kylkennie Kilkenny, the best vplandish towne, or, as they terme it, ỹ proprest dry towne in Irelãd. It is parted into the high towne, & the Irishe towne. The Irish towne claymeth a corporation apart from the high town, wherby great factiõs growe daily betweene the inhabitants. True it is, that the Irish towne is the auncienter, and was called the olde Kilkenny, beyng vnder the bishop his becke, as they are, or ought to be at this present. The high town was builded by the Englishe after the conquest, and had a parcell of the Irishe towne therto vnited, by the bishop his graunt, made vnto the founders vpon their earnest request.

In this towne in the chore of the Frier preachers, William Marshal Erle Marshal and Erle of Penbroke was buried, who departed this lyfe in the yere 1231. Richard brother to William, to whome the inheritaunce descended, within thrée yeres after deceased at Kilkenny, beyng wounded to death in a field gíuen in the heath of Kyldare, in the yere 1234. the 17. of Aprill, & was entumbed wyth hys brother, according to the olde epitaph. 1234.

The churches of Kylken. This town hath thrée churches, S. Kennies church, our Ladies churche, aliâs S. Maries church, and S. Patrikes church, with the abbey of S. John. S. Kennies churche is theyr chiefe and cathedrall church, a worthy foundation as well for gorgeous buildinges, as for notable liuyngs. In the West ende of the churchyard of late haue bene founded a Grãmer schole by the right honourable Pierce or Peter Butler Erle of Ormond and Ossory, and by his wife the countesse of Ormond, the lady Margarete fitz Girald, sister to Girald fitz Girald the Erle of Kyldare that last was. Out of which schole haue sprouted such proper ympes through the painefull diligẽce, and the laboursome industry of a famous lettered man M. Peter White (sometyme fellow of Oriall colledge in Oxford, and schole-maister in Kilkenny) as generally the whole weale publike of Ireland, and especially the southerne partes of that Iland are greatly therby furthered. This gentlemans methode in trayning vp youth, was rare and singuler, framyng the education according to the scholers paine. If he found him frée, he would bridle hym like a wyse Socrates frõ his booke: if he perceiued hym to be dull, he would spur hym forwarde: if he vnderstode that he were ỹ worse for beating, he woulde win him with rewardes: finally, by interlacing study wyth recreation, sorrow with mirth, payne with pleasure, sowernesse with swéetenesse, roughnesse with myldenesse, he had so good successe in schooling his pupils, as in good soth I may boldly byde by it, that in the realme of Irelãd was no Grãmer schole so good, in Englande I am well assured, none better. And because it was my happy happe (God & my parentes be thanked) to haue bene one of his crewe, I take it to stand with my duety, sith I may not stretch myne habilitie in requiting hys good turnes, yet to manifest my goodwill in remẽbryng his paines. And certes, I acknowledge my selfe so much bound and beholding to him and his, as for his sake, I reuerence the meanest stone cemented in the walles of that famous schole. This town is named Kilkenny of an holy and learned Abbot called Kanicus, borne in the countie of Kilkenny, or (as it is in some bookes recorded) in Connaght. through the prouidence of God, with the milk of a cow, and baptized and bishopped by one Luracus, thereto by Gods especiall appoyntment, deputed, grew in tracte of tyme to such deuotion and learnyng, as he was reputed of all men, to be as well a mirrour of the one, as a paragon of the other: wherof he gaue sufficient coniecture in hys minoritie. For beyng turned to the kéepyng of shéepe, and hys fellow shepeheards, wholy yelding themselues like luskish vagabonds to slouth and sluggishnesse; yet would he still finde himselfe occupied in framing with Osiars and twigs, little wodden churches, and in fashioning the furnitures thereto appertaining. Beyng stepte further in yeares, he made his repayre into England, where cloysteryng himselfe in an abbey, wherof one named Doctus, was abbot, he was wholy wedded to his booke and to deuotion: wherin he continued so painefull and diligent, as being on a certaine tyme penning a serious matter, and hauing not fully drawn the fourth vocall, the abbey bell tingde to assemble the couent to some spirituall exercise. To which he so hastened, as he left the letter in semicirclewyse vnfinished, vntill he returned backe to his booke. Some after being promoted to ecclesiasticall orders, he trauailed by the consent of his fellowmonkes to Rome, and in Italy he gaue such manifest proofe of his pietie, as to this day in some partes thereof he is highly renowmed.

Thomas towne, a proper towne builded in the countie of Kilkenny, by one Thomas fitz Antony an English man. The Irish thereof name it Bally macke Andan: that is, the towne of fitz Antony. This gentleman had issue two daughters, the one of them was espoused to Deuise, the other maried to Archdeacon, or Mackodd, whose heyres haue at this day the towne betweene them in coparcenary. But bicause the reader may see in what part of the countrey the cities & chiefe townes stand, I take not farre amisse to place them in order as ensueth.

Camb.lib.1. Topo.dist.2. rub.3.&4. Cambrienſe obſerued in his time, that when the ſea doth ebbe at Dublynne, it ebbeth alſo at Wixilow, and floweth at Wylford & Weiſford. At Wyckloa the ſea ebbeth when in all other partes it commonly floweth. Furthermore this he noted, that the ryuer, which rūneth by Wyckloa, vpon a lowe ebbe is ſalte, but in Arckloa, the nert hauen towne, the ryuer is freſhe when the ſea is at full. He writeth alſo, that not farre from Arckloa ſtandeth a rocke, and when the ſea ebbeth in one ſide therof, it floweth in the other ſide as faſt. Cambrienſe enſearcheth diuers Philoſophicall reaſons in finding out the cauſe, by obſeruing the courſe of the Mone, who is the empreſſe of moyſture. Of the eſtraunge and wonderfull places in Irelande. Cap. 4.

S. Patrikes Purgatorie.

I Thinke it good to beginne with S. Patrike his Purgatorie, partly bycauſe it is moſt notoriouſly knowen, & partly the more, that ſome writers, as the auctor of Polichronicon, and others that were miſcaryed by him, ſeeme to make great doubt, where they neede not. For they aſcribe the finding out of the place not to Patrike that conuerted the countrey, but to an other Patricke an Abbot, who likewiſe they affirme to haue bene employed in conuerting the Iſlande from heathentie to Chriſtianitie.

But the auctor, that broacheth this opinion, is not founde to carie any ſuch credite with him, as that a man may certainly affirme it, or probably conjecture it, vnleſſe we relye to the olde writhered worme eaten Legend, loded with as many lowde lyes, as lewde lines. The better and the more certaine opinion is, that the other Patricke founde it out, in ſuch wiſe as Cambrienſe reporteth. There is a pole or lake, ſayeth he, in the partes of Vlſter that enuironneth an Iſland, in the one part wherof there ſtandeth a Churche much lightned with the brightſome recourſe of Aungelles: the other part is ougly and gaſtly, as it were a bedlem allotted to the viſible aſſemblies of horrible and griſly bugges. This part of the Iſlande contayneth tyne caues. And if any dare be ſo hardye, as to take one night his lodging in any of theſe Innes, which hath bene experimented by ſome rache and hare brayne aduenturers, ſtraight theſe ſpirites claw him by the back, and tugge him ſo ruggedly, and toſſe him ſo crabbedly, that nowe and then they make him more franche of his bumme then of his tongue, a payment correſpondent to his intertaynemēt. This place is called S. Patricke his purgatorie of the inhabitours. For when S. Patrike laboured the conuerſion of the people of Vlſter by ſet-ting before their eyes in great heate of spirite, the creation of the worlde, the fall of our progenitours, the redemption of man by the blessed and precious bloude of our Sauiour Jesus Christ, the certayntie of death, the immortalitie of the soule, the generall resurrection, our latter dumbe, the ioyes of heauen, the paynes of hell, howe that at length euery man, small and great, young and olde, riche and poore, king and keaser, potentate & peasaunt must eyther through God his gracious mercy be exalted to the one, to flourish in perpetuall felicitie, or through his vnsearcheable iustice tumbled downe to the other, to be tormented in eternall miserie: these and the like graue and weightie sentences, wherewith he was aboundantly stored so farre suncke into their heartes, as they seemed very flexible in condescending to his beheest, so that some proofe of his estraunge preaching coulde haue bene verified. Whereupon, without further delay, they spake to the prelate in this wyse.

Syr, as we like of your preaching, so we dislyke not of our libertie. You tell vs of many gye galwes and estraunge dreames. You woulde haue vs to abandonne infidelitie, to cage vp our libertie, to bridle our pleasure: For which you promise vs for our toyle and labour a place to vs as vnknowen, so as yet vncertayne. You sermon to vs of a dungeon appointed for offenders and miscredentes. In deede, if we coulde finde that to be true, we woulde the sooner be weaned from the sweete napple of our libertie, and frame our selues plyaunt to the will of that God, that you reueale vnto vs. S. Patricke cõsidering, that these scaly soules were (as all vnlearnanes for ỹ more part are) more to be terrified from infidelitie through the paynes of hell, then allured to Christianitie by the ioyes of heauen, most heartily besought God, so to frode wyth his gracious pleasure, for the honour and glorie of his diuine name, to giue out some euident or glimsing token of the matter they importunatly requyred. Finally by the especiall direction of God, he founde in the North edge of Ulster a desolate corner, hemmed in rounde, and in the middle thereof a pit, where he reared a Church, called Reglis or Reglas, at the East end of the Churchyarde a dore leadeth into a closet of stone lyke a long ouen, which they call S. Patricke hys purgatorie, for that the people resorted hither euen at this day for pennaunce, and haue reported at their returne estraunge visions of paine and blisse appearing vnto them.

The author of Polichronicon writeth that in the reigne of king Stephane a knight named Owen, pilgrimaged to this purgatorie, being so appalled at the straunge visions that there he sawe, as that vpon his returne from thence, he was wholly mortified, and sequestring himselfe from the worlde, he spent the remnaunt of his lyfe in an Abbay of Ludensis. Also Dionisius a Charterhouse Muncke recordeth a vision scene in that place by one Agneius, or Egneius, whereof who so is inquisitiue, may resorte to his Treatise written De quatuor nouissimis. Iohannes Camertes holdeth opinion, which he furnisheth vpon the gueshe of other, that Claudius writeth of this Purgatorie. Which if it be true, the place must haue bene extant before S. Patricke, but not so famously knowen. The Poet his verses are these.

There is a place towarde Ocean sea

Wherein Vlysses pilgrime straunge
wyth offred bloude ygoare,
The people there dyd mooue,

There onely shapes are seene to stare

They that repayre to this place for deuotion his sake vse to continue therin foure and twenty houres, which doing otherwhyle with ghostly meditations, and otherwhyle a dread for the conscience of their desertes, they saye they see a playne resemblaunce of their owne faultes and vertues, with the horrour & comfort thereunto belonging, the one so terrible, the other so ioyous, that they verily deeme themselues for the time to haue sight of hell & heauen. The reuelatiõs of men that went thither (S. Patricke yet lyuing) are kept written within the Abbeye there adioyning: When any personne is disposed to enter (for the dore is euer sparde) he repayreth first for deuise to the Archebishop, who casteth all perickles, and disswadeth the pylgrime from the attempt, because it is knowen, that diuers entering into that caue, neuer were seene to turne backe againe. But if the partie be fully resolued, he recommendeth him to the Prior, who in like maner fauourably exhorteth him to chose some other kinde of pennaunce, and not not to hazard such a daunger. If notwithstanding he finde the partie fully bent, he conducteth him to the Church, enioyneth him to beginne with prayer, and fast of fiftéene dayes, so long togither as in discretion can be endured. This tyme erpyred, if yet he persever in his former purpose, the whole conuent accōpanyeth him with sollem procession and benediction to the mouth of the caue, where they let him in, and so barre vp the doore vntill the next morning. And then wyth lyke ceremonies they awayte his returne and reduce him to the Churche. If he be séene no more, they fast and pray, fiftéene dayes after. Touching the credite of these matters, I sée no cause, but a Christian being perswaded, that there is both hell and heauen may without vanitie vppon sufficient information be perswaded, that it might please God, at sometyme, for considerations to his wisedome knowen, to reueale by myracle the vision of ioyes and paynes eternall. But that altogyther in such sorte, and by such maner, and so ordinarily, and to such persons, as the common fame doth vtter, I neyther beléeue, nor wishe to be regarded. I haue conferde with diuers, that had gone this pilgrimage, who affirmed the order of the premisses to be true, but that they saw no sight, saue onely fearefull dreames, when they chaunced to nodde, and those they sayde, were exceéding horrible. Further they added, that the fast is rated more or lesse according to the qualitie of the penitent.

Camb. lib. 1. topog. distinct. 2. rub. 5.

Cambrienſe affirmeth, that in the North of Mounſter there be two Ilandes, the greater and the leſſe. In the greater there neuer entereth womā or any liuing female, but forthwith it dyeth. This haue béene often proued by bytches and cattes, which were brought thither to trie this concluſion, and presently they dyed. In this Iland the cocke or maſcle byrdes are ſéene to chirppe, and pearche vp & downe the twigs, but ỹ hēne or female by inſtinct of nature abādoneth it, as a place vtterly poyſoned. This Ilande were a place alone for one that were vered with a ſhrewd wyfe.

Inſula viuentium.

The leſſe Iland is called Inſula viuentium, becauſe none died there, ne may dye by courſe of nature, as Giraldus Cambrienſe ſayeth.

Howbeit the dwellers, when they are sore frusht with ſickeneſſe, or ſo farre wythered with age as there is no hope of life, they requeſt to be cōueighed by boate to ỹ greater Iland, where they are not ſoner inſhored, then they yéelde vp their ghoſtes. For my part, I haue béene very inquiſitiue of this Iland, but I coulde neuer finde this eſtraunge propertie ſoothed by any man of credite in the whole country. Neither truely would I wiſh any to be ſo light, as to lende his credite to any ſuch fayned gleſes, as are neyther veryfied by experience nor warranted by any couleurable reaſon. Wherefore I ſée not why it ſhoulde be termed Inſula viuentium, vnleſſe it be that none dyeth there, as long as he liueth. Cambrienſe telleth further, that there is a Churchyarde in Vlſter, which no female kinde may enter. If the Cocke be there, the Henne dareth not followe. There is alſo in ỹ weſt part of Connaght an Iſlande, placed in the ſea, called Aren, to which S. Bzendan had often recourſe. The dead bodies néede not in that Iſland to be graueled. For the ayre is ſo pure that the contagiō of any carryen may not infect it. There, as Cambrienſe ſayeth, may the ſonne ſée his father, his graundfather, hys great graundfather. &c. This Iſland is enemie to Myce. For none is brought thither, but eyther it leapeth into the ſea, or elſe being ſlayed, it dyeth preſently.

Cambrien coēé loca.

Arenne.

There was in Kyldare an auncient monument named the Fyrehouſe, wherein, Cambrienſe ſayeth, was there continuall fire kept day and night, & yet the aſhes neuer encreaſed. I trauelled of ſet purpoſe to the towne of Kyldare to ſée this place, where I dyd ſée ſuch a monument lyke a vaute, which to this day they call the firehouſe.

The fyrehouſe of Kyldare.

Touching the heath of Kyldare Cambrienſe wryteth that it maye not be tylde, and of a certayntie within theſe fewe yeares it was tryed, and founde, that the corne, which was ſowed, dyd not proue. In this playne, ſayth Cambrienſe, ſtode the ſtones that now ſtande in Salisbury playne, which were conueyed from thence by the ſleight of Merlyne the Welſhe prophete, at the requeſt of Aurelius Ambroſius king of the Britons.

The heath of Kildare

The ſtones of Salisbury playne.

There is alſo in the countye of Kyldare a goodly fielde called Mollaghmaſt betwéene the Nerough and Kylka. Diuers blinde prophecies runne of this place, that there ſhall be a bloudie fielde fought there betwene ỹ Engliſhe inhabitantes of Irelande and the Iriſh, and ſo bloudy forſooth it ſhall be, that a mylle in a vale harde by it ſhall runne foure & twentie houres with the ſtreame of bloude that ſhall powre downe from the hill. The Iriſh doubtleſſe repoſe a great aſſiaunce in this baldocktom dreame. In the top of this height ſtande motes or roundels very formally faſhioned, where the ſtrength of the Engliſh armie, as they ſay, ſhall be encamped.

Mollaghmaſt.

The Earle of Suſſex being Lorde Lieutenaunt of Irelande was accuſtomed to wiſhe, that if any ſuch propheſie were to be fulfilled, it ſhoulde happen in his gouernement, to the ende he might be generall of the fielde.

The Erle of Suſſex

Not

Not farre from Molleagh mask, within a myle of Caſſledermot, or Thrifledermot, is there a place markt with two hillockes whiche is named the Giraldine his throw, or caſt. The length of which in very deed is wonderfull. The occaſion proceeded of this. One of Giraldines, who was auncestour to thoſe, that now are Lordes of Lackagh preded an enemie of his. The Earle of Kyldare hauing intelligence thereof, ſurpaſſing affection of kinred, and moued by zeale of iuſtice, purſued him with a great troupe of horſemen, as the other was bringing of the prede homewarde. The Giraldine hauing notice giuen him, that the Earle was in hoate purſute, and therfore being warned by the meſſenger to hye hym with all ſpede poſſible, the gentleman being netled, that his kinſman wouldе ſeeme to reſcue the prede of his deadly foe, and as he was in ſuch fretting wyſe frying in his greaſe, he brake out in theſe colericke wordes. And doth my coſin Kyldare purſue me in dede? Now in god fayth, whereas he ſeemeth to be a ſuppreſſour of his kinred, and an vpholder of my mortall enemie; I wouldе wiſh him no more harme, then that this dart were as farre in his bodie, as it ſhall ſticke forthwith in the grounde: and therwithall, giuing the ſpurres to his horſe, he hurlde his dart ſo farre, as he abacht with the length thereof aſwell his cõpanye, as his poſteritie. The Giraldine was not very farre from thence, when the Earle with his bande made hoate ſote after, & dogging ſtill the track of the predours, he came to the place, where the dart was hurld, where one pyckthanck or other lette the Earle to vnderſtande of the Giraldine his wilde ſpeaches there deliuered. And to inhaunce the haynouſneſſe of the offence, he ſhewed howe farre he hurled his dart, when he wiſht it to be pitcht in his Lordſhip his body. The Earle aſtonyed, at the length thereof, ſayde: Nowe in god ſooth my coſin in behauing himſelf ſo couragiouſly is worthie to haue the prede ſhotte free. And for my parte, I purpoſe not ſo much to ſtomacke his colericke wiſhe, as to imbrace his valiaunt proweſſe. And therwithall cõmaunded the retraite to be blowen and reculed backe. There is in Meth an hill called the hill of Taragh, wherin is a playne twelue ſcore log, which was named the Kemp his hall. There the countrey had their mee-tinges and folcmoates, as a place that was accompted the high pallace of the Monarch. The Iriſh hyſtorians hãmer many fables in this forge of Finne macke Coyle & his champions, as the Frenche hyſtorie doth of king Arthur and the knightes of the rounde table. But doubtleſſe the place ſeemeth to beare the ſhow of an auncient and famous monument.

There is in Caſſleknock, a billedge not far from Dublyne, a windowe not glazed nor latized, but open, & let the weather be ſtormie, the winde bluſter bouſterouſly of euer ſide of the houſe, yet place a candle there, and it will burne as quietly, as if no puffe of wind blew. This may be tryed at this day, who ſo ſhall be willing to put it in practiſe. Caſtleknock. Touching the eſtraunge Welles that be in Ireland, I purpoſe to ſpeake little more then that which I finde in Cambrienſe, whoſe wordes I wyll Engliſhe, as they are latined in his booke. The eſtraunge Welles. There is, ſayth he, a Well in Mounſter, with the water of which if any be waſht, he becommeth forthwith hoare. I haue ſeene a man that had one halfe of his beарde, being dyed, with that water, hoare, the other halfe vnwaſht was brown, remaynyng ſtill in his naturall coulour. Cambri. lib. 1. topog. diſt. 1. rub. 8. & 10.

Contrarywyſe there is a ſountayne in the further edge of Ulſter, and if one be bathed therewith, he ſhal not become hoare, in which Well ſuch as loath gray heares are accuſtomed to diue. There is in Connaght a Well that ſpringeth on the top of an hill farre and diſtaunt from any ſea, ebbing and flowing in foure and twentie houres, as the ſea doth, and yet the place is vplandiſhe, & the water freſh. There is an other ſpring in the ſame countrey the water of which is very wholeſome to men and women, but poyſon to beaſtes, & if a man put but the grauell of this Well into his mouth, it quencheth preſently his thirſt.

There is in Ulſter a ſtanding pole thirtye thouſande paces long, and fiftéene thouſande paces broade, out of which ſpringeth the noble Northẽ riuer, called the Bãne. The fiſhers complayne more often for bruſting of their nettes with the ouer great lake of fiſhe, then for any want. In our time vpon the conqueſt a fiſhe ſwamme from this pole to the ſhore, in ſhape reſembling a Salmon, but it was in quantitye ſo huge, that it coulde not be drawen or carped wholly togyther, but the fiſhmõgers were forced to hackt it in gobbets, and ſo to cary it in peeremeale throughout the countrey, making thereof a generall dole. And if the report be true, the beginning of this pole was eſtraunge. There were in old time wher the pole now ſtãdeth vicious & beaſtly inhabitants. At which time was there an olde ſayde ſaw in euery man hys mouth, that as ſone as a Well there ſpringing (whiche for the ſuperſticious reuerence they bare it, was continually couered and ſigned) were left open & vnſigned, ſo ſone would ſo much water guſh out of that Well, as would forthwith ouerwhelme the whole territorie. It hapned at length, that an olde trot came thither, to fetche water, and hearing hir childe whine, she ranne wyth might and mayne to dandle hir babie forgetting the obseruaunce of the superstitious order to fore vsed. But as she was returning backe to haue couered the spring, the lande was so farre ouerflowen, as that it past hir helpe, and shortly after she, hir suckling and all those that were within the whole territorie were drowned. And this séemeth to cary more likelyhode with it, because the fishers in a cleare sunny daye sée the steeples and other pyles playnly and distinctly in the water. And here woulde be noted, that the ryuer of the Bane flowed from this head spring before this floude, but farre in lesse quantitie, then it doth in our tyme. Hytherto Giraldus Cambriense. Hector Boëthius recordeth an estraunge propertie of a pole in Irelande, and for that he maketh himselfe an eye witnesse of the matter, he shall tell his owne tale. Ac quoniam Hiberniæ incidit mentio, præter infinita in ea rerum miracula haud importunum fore existimem, si vnum, quod ob portentuosam nouitatē fidem omnium excedere videatur, nos tamen veru experti sumus, adiunxerimus. Lacus in ea est, circa quem amplissimo circunquaq; spatio nec herba, nec arbor vlla nascitur. &c. in quem si lignum infigas anni circiter vnius curriculo id quod in terra fixum erit, in lapidem conuertetur, quod deinceps aquâ operietur, in ferrum: reliquum aquâ exstans ligni formam naturámq; seruabit. Ita coniuncta, lapis, ferrum & lignum eodem in stipite inaudita nouitate conspectātur.

Hector Boeth. in Scot. reg. descript. pag. 9. Sect. 50.

But for that mention is made of Irelande ouer and aboue the infinite number of wonders in that lande, it will not be wholly beside the purpose, to insert one marueylous thing, which although it may séeme to some, to haue no coulour of truth, yet bycause it hath bene by vs experimented, and found out to be true, we maye the better auouche it. There is a standing pole in that Iland, nere to which of all sydes groweth neyther herbe, shrubbe, nor bushe. If you sticke a rod or pece of tymber in this pole, that which sticketh in the earth within the space of one yeare turneth to a stone, asmuch as is dipt in the water, is conuerted to yron, all that is aboue the water remayneth still in the pristinate and former wodden shape. So that you may sée, that which is estrange, in one stock, or sticke, stone, yron and woode linckt and knit togither. This much Hector Boëthius. In the countey of Kylkenny and in the borders thereto confining, they vse a solem tryall by a water they cal Melalshæ, the propertie of this water is, as they say, that if a perturde person drincke therof, the water will gush out at his belly, as though the drincker his nauill were borde with an auger. The ryuer, that runneth by Dubline named the Liffye hath this propertie for certayne, and I haue obserued it at sundry times. As long as it rayneth, yea if it stode powring fiue dayes, you shal finde diuers shallow brookes, and the riuer will be nothing thereby encreased, but within foure and twentie houres after the showres are ceast, you shall perceyue such a sodayne spring flowe, as if the former rayne were great: a very few places or none at all will be founde passable. Cambriense writeth, that in the south part of Mounster betwéene the mayne sea coasting on Hilspanie, and S. Brendane his hilles, there is an Iland of the one side encompassed with a riuer abundantly stored with fish, and on the other part enclosed with a little brooke. In which place S. Brendane was very much resaunt. This plotte is taken to be such a Sanctuary for beastes as if any hare, fere, stagge, or other wylde beast, be chased nere that Iland by dogges, it maketh straight vpon the brooke, & assone as it passeth the streame, it is so recksure, as the hunter may perceyue the beaste resting on the one banche, and the dogs resting on the other brimme, being as it were by some inuisible rayles imbarde from dipping their féete in the shallowe forde to pursue the beast chased. On the other side of this Iland there runneth a ryuer stored aboue measure with freshe water fishe, and in especiall with Salmon. Which abundaunce, as Cambriense writeth, procéeded of God, to maintayne the great hospitalitie, that was kept there. And bycause the dwellers thereabout shall not, like pinching coystrels make any sale of the fishe, let it be powdered as artificially as may be, yet it will not kéepe as though it were Manna, aboue the first night or day that it be taken. So that you must eate it wythin that shorte compasse, otherwyse it putrifyeth and standeth to no séede. This ryuer ouerfloweth a great rocke, vsually called the Salmon leape, for as it is commonly the property of all fish to swim against the tyde, as for byrdes to flitter against the winde, so it is naturally giuen to the Salmon to struggle agaynst the streame, and when it approcheth nére this highe rocke, it bendeth his tayle to his heade, and sometime taketh it in his mouth, and therwythall beareth it selfe ouer the water, and sodaynly it fetcheth such a round Whirke, that at a trice it skippeth to the top of the rocke. The lyke Salmon leape is nére Leyslippe, but not so highe as this. There be also, as witnesseth Cambriense, in the further parte of Ulster, certayne hilles nere to S. Bean his Church, where cranes yearely breede. And when they haue layed their egges, if any purpose to ransacke their nestes, let him but attempt, to touch the egs, they will shew like young shrawling pullets without fether or doune, as though they were newe hatched, and presently brought out of their shels. But if the partie plucke his hand from the nest forthwith they shew (whether it be by any Metamorphosis, or some iugling legyer de mayne by dazeling the eyes) as though they were transformed into egges. And further, sayeth Cambriense, let two at one instaunce be at the nest, and let the one of them onely giue the gaze, and the other attept to take away the egges, they will seeme to the loker on as egges, and to the taker as yong red little cranettes, being as bare as a byrde his arse.

The towne of Armach is sayde to be enemy to rattes, and if any be brought thither, presently it dyeth. Which the inhabitauntes impute to the prayers of S. Patricke.

But to omitte the estraunge places, that eyther by false reportes are surmised, or by proofe and experience dayly verified: there are in this Iland such notable quaries of grey marble and touch, such store of pearle & other riche stones, such aboundaunce of cole, such plentie of leade, yron, latten and tinne, so many rich mynes furnished withall kinde of metals, as nature seemed, to haue framed this countrey, for the storehouse or iewelhouse of hir chiefest thesaure. Howbeit she hath not shewed hirself so bountifull a mother in powring forth such riches, as she proueth hir self an enuious stepdame, in that she instilleth in the inhabitants a drousie lyethernesse to withdraw them from the ensearching of hir hourded and hidden iewelles. Wherein she fareth lyke one, that, to purchase y name of a sumptuous franckelyne or a good viander, would bidde diuers guestes to a costly and daintie dinner, and withall for sauing of his meat wt some secrete inchauntment would benumme them of their limmes, or with some hidden lothsomnesse would dull their stomackes, as his guestes by reason of the one are not able, or for the other not willing, by taking theyr repast, to refresh themselues, in so much as in my phantasie it is harde to decide whether estate is the better: eyther for a diligent labourer to be planted in a barrayne or stony soyle, or for a luskishe loyterer to be setled in a fertill grounde, byeause the one will, & may not, the other may and will not through hys paynefull trauayle reape the fruite and commoditie, that the earth yeeldeth.

Of the Lordes Spirituall of Irelande. Cap. 5.

The spirituall iurisdiction is ordered into foure prouinces, whereof the primacie was euer giuen (in reuerence of S. Patrike, that conuerted the countrey) to the Archebishop of Armach, who is called Primas totius Hiberniæ, and the Archebishop of Dublyne Primas Hiberniæ. This custome was sithens confirmed by Eugenius tertius, in the yeare 1148. or rather 1152. who sent withall, three other palles of Archbishops to be placed, one at Dublyne, one at Cashill, y last at Tuene. To these are suffragannes in right nyne and twentie, & they all to the Primas of Armach, vnder whose prouince are the bishoppes of Meath & Deren, Ardach, Kylmore, Clogher, Doune, Coner, Clonknos, Rabo, Dromore. Under Dublyne wherevnto Innocentius the thirde vnited Glandelagh, the bishop of Elphine, Kyldare, Fernes, Ossory and Leighlyne. Under Cashill, the bishop of Waterforde, to whome Lismore is vnited, Corck & Clone, Rosse, Ardigh, Lynmyrick, Emely, Kyllalow, and Ardfert. Under Tuen, Kylmaco, Dilyne, Auaghdoune, Clonfert, Morro. In this recount some difference hapneth by reason of personall and reall vnion of the sees, and for other alterations. I haue obserued in peruling of olde bookes the names of certayne Byshoppes and Archbishoppes of Dublyne, and albeit I coulde not finde a iust register or catalogue of them, yet I take it to be better to place such as I coulde finde, then to omitte the whole.

Cormachus was one of the first Bishoppes that I haue reade of, but I am well assured, that there were dyuers others before hys time. He florished about the yeare 893. of this Bishoppe Hector Boëthius maketh mention. Lib. 10. Scot. Hist. fol. 212. sect. 40.

Dunanus was Bishop of Dublyne long after Cormachus, for Dunanus dyed in the yere 1074. He was buryed in Christchurche in Dublyne, in the vpper part on the chauncell on the right hande.

Patricius was consecrated Bishop of Dublyne in Paule his Church at London, by the Archbishoppe of Canterbury Lanifranus, or Lanfraucus. The reason of this consecration was, for that as yet y Metropolitanes of Irelande receiued not theyr palle. A Pall is an endowment appropriated to Archbishoppes, made of white silcke the breadth of a scarfe, but it is of an other fashion. And where you shall espie the armes of any Archebishoppe blazed, there you may perceyue the Pall set cut in white wyth a great manye of blacke crosses vpon it. An Archbishop within three monethes after his consecration or confirmation ought to demaunde his pall, otherwyse he may be remoued: neyther ought he to name himselfe Archbishop before the receyte, neither may he before summon or call a councell, make Chrisme, dedicate churches giue orders, consecrate Bishoppes. He may not were his pall without the church, neither in other prouinces, albeit in an other prouince he may be in his Pontificalibus, so that Pontificalia differeth from the pall.

Furthermore, an Archbishop may not lend his pall to an other, but it ought to be interred wyth him. But to returne to Patricius, hys tyme was but short, for some after, as he was crossing the seas to Dublyne warde, he was drowned with his copassengers, ỳ same yeare that he was consecrated, the nynth of October.

1075. Donatus of some called Bungus succeeded Patricious & likewyse consecrated by Lanfrancus Archbishoppe of Canterbury, at the instaunce of Terdilnacus king of Irelande, the bishoppes of Irelande, the cleargie & the Citizens of Dublyn, he deceased in the yeare 1095. Samuel succeeded Donatus, and dyed in the yeare 1122. Gregorius dyd not succeede immediately after Samuel for there be thirtie yeares betweene them both. This Gregorius was the first Metrapolitan of Dublyne and was consecrated Archbishop in the yeare 1152. and dyed in the yeare 1162.

1162. S. Laurentius Othothille. This Prelate was first Abbot of S. Beuins in Glindelagh, and after he was solemnely consecrated and installed in Christchurch at Dublyne by Gelacius the Primas of Armach, and not by Canterbury as the Bishoppes of Dublyne were before the pall giuen them. He dyed in Normandie, and was buryed in our Ladye churche of Angy in the yeare 1180. the fourteene of November.

Johanne Commin, an Englishman succeeded Laurence. This famous Prelate being cloysthered vp in the Abbeye of Eusham in Worcestershyre was highly renowmed of all men as well for his deepe learning, as for the integritie of his lyfe. The cleargie of Dublyne being giuen to vnderstande of so worthie a clarcke became hũble peticioners to the king his maiestie, Henry the seconde, that through his meanes such an vnualuable iewell shoulde be installed in Laurence hys dignitie. The king bowing to their earnest suite agreed, he shoulde be consecrated their Archbishop. Which was an happy houre for that countrey. For besides the great trauaile he endured in edifying his flocke in Christian religion, he was founder of S. Patricke hys churche in Dublyne, as is before specifyed. He deceased in the yere 1212. and was entumbed in the choare of Christchurch.

Henry Londres succeeded Commin. This man was nicknamed Scorchebyll, or Scorchebilleyn, through this occasion. Being setled in his see he gaue cõmandement to all his tenauntes to make their apparaunce before him at a day appointed, and for that he was rawe as yet in his reuenues, he toke it to stande best with their ease and quietnesse, and his cõmoditie, that eche of them should shew their euidences, whereby he might learne, by what tenure they held of him. His tennants misstrusting no sluttish dealing, but cõstruing all to be ment for the best, deliuered their euidences to their Lande lorde, who dyd scantly well peruse them, when he flung them all in the fire. The poore tenauntes espying this subtyll prancke to be verye vnfitting for a Bishoppe, coulde not bridle their tonges, but brake out on a sodayne: Thou an Archebyshop? Nay, thou art a Scorchebilleyn. But it could not be guessed to what ende this fact of his tended, for notwithstanding this, the tenants enioyed their landes, vnlesse he did it bycause they should be but tenauntes at will, and so to stande to his deuotion. This prelate doubtlesse was politicke & well lettered, and for his wysedome and learning he was elected L. Justice of Irelande. He was the founder of the castle of Dubline as is before mentioned. He deceased in the yeare 1225. & lyeth buryed in Christchurch. Whereby appeareth that Mathæus Parisiensis dyd ouershote himselfe in writing one Hu, or Hugo, to be Archbishop of Dublyne in the yeare 1213. whereas Londres at that tyme was in the see, as from his consecration to his death may be gathered, being the space of thirteene yeares.

Johanne Stamforde succeeded Londres, but not immediately, and was consecrated in the yeare 1285. this man, vpon the death of Stephan Fulborne, Archbishoppe of Tune, was made L. Justice of Ireland in the yeare 1287. And some after being in Englande he was sent from Edwarde the first as Ambassadour to the Frenche king, and vpon his returne he deceased in England, and some after was buryed in S. Patricke his Churche at Dublyne.

Willielme Hothom is placed by some antiquaries to be Archbishoppe of Dublyne much about this time, but whether the man haue beene installed in this See at all or no, I am not able to affirme, nor to denye, but certayne it is that the date is mistaken, for vpon Johanne Stamforde his death, Richard Fleringes was consecrated Archbishop of Dublyne, betwéene whome & the Lord Edmund Butler there arose a great controuersie in law, touching the maner of Hollywood with the appurtenances. Which manour the Lord Butler recouered by an arbitrement or composition taken betwéene them in the king his benche at Dublyne. This prelate departed this lyfe in the yeare 1306.

Richard de Haueringes was successour to Fleringes, who after that he had continued nére the space of fiue yeares in the Sée, was sore appalled by reason of an estraunge and wonderfull dreame. For on a certayne night he imagined that he had séene an vgly monster standing on his breast, who, to his thinking, was more weightie, then the whole worlde, in so much as being, as he thought in maner squised or prest to death with the heft of this huge monster, he woulde haue departed with the whole substaunce of the worlde, if he were thereof possest, to be disburdened of so heauie a loade. Upon which wish he sodaynly awoke. And as he bette his braynes in diuining what this dreame should import, he bethought himself of the flocke committed to his charge, howe that he gathered their fléeces yearely by receyuing the reuenue and perquisites of the Bishopricke, and yet suffered his flocke to starue for lacke of preaching and teaching. Wherefore being for his former slacknesse, sore wounded in conscience, he trauepled with all spéede to Rome, where he resigned vp his Bishopricke, a burden to heauie for his weake shoulders, & being vpon his resignation competently benificed, he bestowed the remnaunt of his life wholly in deuotion.

Johanne Leche nephew to Haueringes, vpon the resignation, was consecrated Archbishop. This prelate was at contention wyth the Primas of Armach, for their iurisdictiõs, insomuch as he did imbarre the Primas frõ hauing his crosse borne before him within the prouince of Leinster, which was contrarie to the Canon law, that admitteth the crosier to beare the crosse before his Archbishop in an other prouince. This man deceased in the yeare 1313.

Alexander Bigenor was next Leche consecrated Archebishop with the whole consent aswel of the chapter of Chrisschurch as of S. Patrickes. Howbeit vpon the death of Leche there arose a sysme and diuision betwéene Walter Thorneburg L. Cãcelloure of Irelande & Bigenor then threasaurer of the same countrey. The Cancellour to further his election determined to haue posted to Rome, but in ỹ way he was drowned wt the number of 156. passengers. Bigenor staying in Irelande, with lesse aduenture and better spéede with the consent of both the chapters was elected Archbishop. And in the yere 1317. there came bulles from Rome to confirme the former election. At which tyme the Archbishop and the Earle of Ulster were in Englande. This prelate sone after returned L. Iustice of Irelande, and sone after he had landed at Poghpll, he went to Dublyne, where as well for his spirituall iurisdiction, as his temporal promotion he was receyued with procession and great solemnitie. In this man his tyme was there an Uniuersitie foũded in Dublin, whereof M. William Rodyarde was chauncellour, a well learned man and one that procéeded Doctor of the canon lawe in this Uniuersitie. Bigenor deceased in the yeare. 1349.

Johanne de saint Paule was consecrated Archbishop vpon Bigenor his death. He deceased in the yeare. 1362.

1349.

Thomas Mynot succéeded Johanne, & dyed in the yeare 1376.

1363.

Robert Wyckesord succéeded Thomas, & dyed in the yeare 1390.

1375.

Robert Waldeby succéeded Wykesorde. This prelate was first an Augustine Fryer, and a great Preacher, and accompted a bertuous and sincere liuer. He deceased in the yeare 1397.

1390.

Richard Northalis was remoued from an other Sée and chosen Archbishop of Dublyn, who likewise deceased the same yeare that he was elected.

1397.

Thomas Crauly an Englishe man succéeded him the same yeare, and came into Ireland in the companie of the Duke of Surrey. This Archbishoppe was chosen L. Iustice of Ireland in the yere 1413. In whose gouernement the English did skirmish with the Irish in the countye of Kyldare nére Kilka, where the English banquished the enemie, slue and hundred of the Irishe, during which time the Archbishop being Lord Iustice went in procession with the whole cleargy in Trisseldermot, or Castledermot, a towne adioyning to Kylka, praying for the prosperous successe of the subiects, that went to skirmishe with the enimie. This prelate was of stature tall, well featured, and of a sanguine complexion, decking his outwarde comlynesse with inwarde qualities. For he was so liberall to the riche, so charitable to the powre, so dépe a clarcke, so profounde a Doctor, so sounde a Preacher, so bertuous a liuer, and so great a builder, as he was not without good cause accompted the Phœnix of his time. In daily talke as he was short, so he was swéete. Harde in promising, Chap. 6.

GIrald fitz Girald, Erle of Kildare. This house was of the nobilitie of Florence, came from thence to Normandy, and so with Erle Strangbow his kinsmā, whose armes he giueth, into Wales, nere of bloud to Rise ap Griffin, prince of Wales by Nesta the mother of Maurice fitz Girald and Robart fitz Stephannes, with the sayd Earle Maurice fitz Girald remoued into Ireland, in ỹ yeare 1169. The family is very properly touched in a Sonet of Surreys, made vpon the Erle of Kildares sister, now Countesse of Lincolne:

1169.

From Tuscane came my Ladies worthy race,
Fayre Florence was sometyme hir auncient seate:
The Westerne Isle, whose pleasant shoare doth face
Wylde Cambers cliffes, did gyue hir liuely heate.
Fostred she was with milke of Irish brest.
Hir sire an Earle, hir dame of princes bloud:
From tender yeares in Britayne she doth rest
With kinges childe, where she tasteth costly foode.
Hunsdon did first present hir to mine eye,
Bright is hir hew and Geraldine she hight.
Hamptoune tanght me wisshe hir first for myne:
And Wyndsor alas, doth chase me from hir sight.
Hir beauty of kinde, hir vertues from aboue,
Happy is he, that can obteyne hir loue.

The corrupt Orthography that diuers vse in writing this name, doth incorporate it to houses thereto linked in no kinrede, and consequētly blemisheth diuers worthy exploites atchieued as well in England and Irelande, as in forreine countreis and dominiōs. Some write Geroide, sundry Geralde, diuers very corruptly Gerrot, others Gerarde. But the true Orthography is Giralde, as may appeare both by Giraldus Cambrienſe, and the Italian authors that make mention of the family. As for Gerrot, it differeth flatte from Giralde, yet there be some in Irelande, that name and write themselues Gerrottes, notwithstanding they be Giraldines, wherof diuers gentlemen are in Meth. But there is a sept of the Gerrots in Irelād, and they seeme forsoth by threatning kyndnesse and kinrede of the true Giraldines to fetch their petit degrees from their auncestours, but they are so nere of bloud one to the other, that two bushels of beanes wouldе scantly counte their degrees.

An other reason why diuers estrange houses haue bene shuffled in among this familie, was, for that sundry gentlemē at the christening of their children, would haue them named Giraldes, and yet their surnames were of other houses, and after it happened that Girald had issue Thomas, John, Robert, or such lyke, then would they beare the surname of Girald, as Thomas fitz Girald, and thus taking the name of their auncestors for their surname, within two or three descentes they shoue themselues among the kinrede of the Giraldines. This is a generall faulte in Ireland and Wales, and a great confusion and extinguishment of houses. This noble & auncient family of the Giraldines, haue in sundrye ages flourished in the most renoumed countries of Europe. Warring fitz Giralde was one in great credite with king John. I finde an other Giraldine Archiepiscopus Burdegalensis, who flourished in king Henry the thirde his tyme. There was an other Giraldine Patriarch of Jerusalem, in the yeare 1229. as witnesseth Mattheus Parisiensis. There was one Girald of Berneyl an excellēt Poet in the Italian tongue: an other named Baptist Girald, was a famous citizen of Ferra-ra, an expert phisition, and an exquisite philosopher, beyng publike professor of philosophy in the said city, during the space of ten yeres. I haue seene a worke of one Gregorius Giraldus Ferrariensis de deis gentium, dedicated to Hercules Duke of Ferraria, a pithye booke and very well penned. Also Siluester Giraldus Cambriense hath ben one of this family, nere of kinne to sir Maurice fitz Girald. This gentleman was borne in Wales, and thereof he is named Cambriense, of the worde Cambria, that in olde tyme was adapted to that part of Britannia. He was very inward with Henry the second, conquerour of Irelande, beyng at that tyme the kinges secretary. And for that especial affiance king Henry reposed in him, he was appointed to accompany prince John the kinges sonne into Ireland, as one of hys chiefest and discreetest counsailors. This gentleman was very well learned, a tollerable diuine, a commendable philosopher, not rude in phisike, skilfull in Cosmography, a singuler good antiquary, an orator, in endeuour cõparable to the best, in his style not in those dayes taken for the worst, rather eschewyng the name of a rude writer, then purchasing the fame of an eloquent chronicler. Among other hys workes, he wrote one booke of the description of Ireland, other two of the cõquest therof. John the Abbot of S. Albones sayeth, that this Clarke was somewhat spare in wordes, and liberall in sentences. What he meaneth by this verdict I know not, vnlesse he taketh the man to be ouer lauish of his pen in frumping hys aduersaries with quippyng tauntes, which as I gesse, flowed rather frõ a flaunting ostentation of a roysting kynde of rhetorike, then from anye greate malice hee bare anye one. Howbeit, I maye not gainesay, but as he was kind where he tooke, so he was somwhat bityng where he disliked. But what his iudgemẽt is of the Giraldines may plainly appeare in his chronicle, out of which I haue culled this sentence ensuyng.

Hoc est huius generis omen & hæc conditio. Semper in armata militia chari, semper primi, semper rebus in Martijs ausu nobili præstantissimi. Cessante vero necessitatis articulo, statim exosi, statim vltimi, statim ad ima liuore depressi. Veruntamen tantæ generositatis syluam liuor ad plenum extirpare non potuit. Vnde & vsq; in hodiernum gens hæc nouis plantularũ succrementis vires in insula non modicas habet. Qui sunt, qui penetrant hostium penetralia? Giraldidæ. Qui sunt, qui patriam conseruant? Giraldidæ. Qui sunt, quos hostes formidant? Giraldidæ. Qui sunt, quos liuor detractat? Giraldidæ. Si principem tantæ strenuitatis merita dignè pensantem reperissent, quàm tranquillum, quàm pacificum olim Hiberniæ statum reddidissent? sed horum sine causa semper est suspecta strenuitas.

This hath ben continually, sayth Cambriense, a destenye or fatall property annexed to this house. In warre and martiall broyles they are dandaled, they are coffed, they are lulled, who but they? they rule the roste. But when these martiall garboyles are appeased, they are either through false informations wrongfully behated, or els by enuious carpers sinisterly suspected. How be it, enuy with all hir malicious driftes, could neuer wholy supplant the fertile grone of this couragious and noble progeny. And maugre the heads of all malicious promoters, this sept, yea euen at this day beareth, with ẏ fewe slips there engrafted, no small stroke in Ireland. Who are they that scale the enemies fortes? the Giraldines. Who are they, that defend their countrey? the Giraldines. Who are they that make the enimy quake in hys skinne? the Giraldines. And who are they whom enuy backbiteth? the Giraldines. If it had stode with the good fortune of the Giraldines, that ẏ king with equall balance would poise their valure, long ere this had all Ireland ben put in quiet and peaceable stay. But their valiantnesse and power hath bene from tyme to tyme without sufficient cause suspected. Hitherto Cambriense.

And sothly, as often as I call to mynde the saying of this historiographer, I may not but muse how iumpe he hitteth the nayle on the hed. And who so will conferre their continual successe from the pennyng of this sentence (which was written aboue 400. yeares, and vpward) with this age of ours, shal sone perceiue, that these wordes were rather prophesies of future mishappe, then complaintes of former iniuries. At this day let them behaue themselues valiantly in warre, and loially in peace, yet notwithstandyng, such slaunders are raysed, such rumors noysed, such tales bruted, such fables twitled, such vntrue reportes twatled, such malicious inuentiõs forged, that such as are in authoritie cannot but of force suspect them, vnlesse they were able, like Gods, to pry in the bottome of ech mans conscience. But who so wisheth any goodnesse to that miserable countrey, and noble progeny, let him with all the paynes of his hart besech God, first that the higher powers be sloe in beleuyng the despitefull reportes of enuious backbiters. Secondly, that ẏ Giraldines beare themselues in all their affaires so dutifully, that these curious enserchers be not able to depaint their feygned gloses with any probable colours. So shall suspicion be abandoned, so shall malicious slaunders be squatted: so shall that noble house be trusted, and consequently the batterd weale publique of Ireland reedified. The family is English, & it is well knowen, that the Irish rather feare their force, then loue their persons. And reason good pardye. For the Irishe bearyng in mynde, that the Giraldine beyng thereto deputed by the prince, hath in all ages conquered their landes, abated their courages, discomfited their men, vāquished their armies, daunted their power, suppressed their force, and made them become true and tributary subiectes to the crowne of England, they haue good cause to beare that sept but holow harts, what shew so euer they make in outward apparaunce. Thus much generally of the Giraldines, now I purpose perticulerly to treat of the house of Kyldare.

Maurice fitz Girald, one of the Erles progenitors, was L. Iustice of Ireland in ỹ yere 1242. at which tyme he builded the castle of Sligagh.

The castle of Sligagh.

This Maurice was L. of Tyreconille, and beyng entierly seised of the whole country, he gaue the one moyetie thereof to Cormocke, mack Dermot, mack Rory.

Tyreconil.

I read the Giraldine baron of Ophaly, in the yere 1270.

Baron of Ophaly.

I haue seene it registred, that there dyed a Giraldine the fourth Erle of Kyldare, in the yere 1287. But I take that calender to beare a false date.

Wherefore the truth and certaintie is, that Iohn fitz Giralde, sonne to Thomas fitz Girald, was the first Erle of Kyldare, and was created Erle vpon this occasion.

The first Erle of Kyldare.

In the yere 1290. and in the 18. yere of Edward the first, William Vesey was made L. Iustice of Ireland. This man beyng eyther negligent or raw in the gouernement of the country, emboldened the Irish enemy to endamage the kinges subiectes more oftsomes then they were accustomed to do. These enormities beyng for the space of foure yeres tolerated, the subiectes misliking of the slacknesse of their Gouernour, gaue out such sinister speaches of the L. Iustice, as he was gald to the hart rote. Sone after as the nobles in open assembly wer ripping vp by peecemeale the seuerall harmes their tenantes suffeyned, the L. Iustice willyng to disburden hymselfe of the crime, began with milky kynd of speaches to lay the whole fault on the L. Iohn fitz Giraldes shoulders, saying in parable wyse, that he was a great occasiō of these disorders, in that he bare himselfe in priuate quarels as fierce as a Lyon, but in these publike iniuries he was as meke as a Lambe. The Baron of Ophaly spelling and putting these sillables together, spake in this wyse.

1290. Vesey L. Iustice.

Vesey accuseth the L. fitz Girald.

My Lord I am hartily sory that among all this noble assembly, you make me your onely marke wherat to shote your bolt. And truely were my desertes so haineus, as I suppose, you would wish them to be, you would not labour to cloude your talk with such darke riddles, as at this present you haue done, but wold playne & flat English, your Lordship wouldd not sticke to empeache of felony or treason. For as myne auncestours with spendyng of their bloud in their seueraignes quarell aspired to this tippe of honour, in which at this day (God and my king be thanked) I stande: so your Lordship taking the nigher way to ỹ woode, by charging me with treason, would gladly trip so roundly on my top, that by shedding of my bloud, and by catching my landes into your clouches, that but so nere vpō your manours of Kyldare and Kathymgan, as I dare say they are an eye sore vnto you, you might make my maister your sonne a proper Gentleman.

The L. Girald answereth.

A Gentleman? quoth the L. Iustice. Thou bald Baron, I tell thee the Veseies wer gentlemen before the Giraldines were Barons of Ophaly, yea and before that Welsh bankrupt thyne auncestour (he ment sir Maurice fitz Girald) fethered his nest in Leinster. And where as thou takest the matter so farre in snuffe, I will teache thee thy lyrypups after an other fashion, then to be thus malipertly cockyng and billing with me that am thy gouernor. Wherfore, albeit thy taunts are such, as they might force the pacientest philosopher that is, to be chokte with choler: yet I would haue thee ponder my speaches, as though I deliuered them in my most sober and quiet mode.

The L. Iustice replieth.

I say to the face of thee, and I will auowe what I say vnto thee, that thou art a supporter of theeues, a bolsterer of the kynges enemies, an vpholder of traytors, a murtherer of subiectes, a firebrand of dissention, a ranke theefe, an arraunt traytor. And before I eate these wordes, I will make thee eate a piece of my blade.

The Baron bridelyng with might & maine hys choler, bare himselfe as colde in countenance, as the L. Iustice was hote in wordes, and replied in this wyse.

My Lorde I am very glad, that at length you vnwrapped your selfe out of that nette, wherein all this while you masked. As for myne auncestor, whome you terme a bankerupt, how rich or how powre he was vpon his repayre to Irelād, I purpose not at this time to debate. Yet thus much I may boldly say, that he came hither as a byer, not as a begger.

ger. He bought the enemies land by spending his blood: but you lurking lyke a spider in his cobweb to intrappe flies, endeuor to beg subiectes liuinges wrongfully by dispoyling the of their innocent lyues. And whereas you charge me with malipertnesse, in that I presume to chop Logike with you beyng Gouernour, by answering your snappish quid, with a knappish quo, I would wishe you to vnderstand, now, that you put me in mind of the distinction, that I as a subiect honour your royall authoritie, but as a noble man I despise your dunghill gentilitie. Lastly, whereas you charge me with the odious termes of traitor, murtherer and the lyke, & there with all you wish me to resolue my selfe, that you rest vpō reason, not vppon rage: If these wordes proceede from your Lordshippe, as from a magistrate, I am a subiect, to be tryed by order of lawe, and am sorry that the Gouernour, who ought by vertue of his publike autoritie to be my Iudge, is by reason of priuate malice become myne accuser.

But if you vtter these speaches as a priuate person, then I Iohn fitz Girald, baron of Dephaly, doe tell thee William Uesey, a single sole gentleman, that I am no traytor, no felon, and that thou art the onely buttresse, by which the kinges enemies are supported, the meane & instrument by which his maiesties subiectes are daily spoyled. Therefore I as a loyall subiect say traitor to thy teeth, and that shalt thou wel vnderstand when we both shal be brought to the rehearsall of these matters before our betters. Howbeit, during the tyme you beare office, I am resolued to gyue you the maistry in wordes, and to suffer you lyke a brawling curre to barcke, but when I see my tyme, I will be sure to byte.

These biting speaches passing to and fro, great factions on both sides were raised, with high and mighty wordes, and deepe othes to time eyther part appeased his owne. The baron of Dphalye not sleeping nor slacking hys matter, scudded with al halke into England, where he was no sooner enshoared, then Uesey, after he had substituted Wylliam Haye in his roume, was imbarckt, making as hote spote after the baron as he coulde. The kyng and his counsaile vnderstanding the occasion of their sodaine arriualles, to thend the truth shoulde be brought to light, appointed a set day for the deciding of their controuersie, and that eche of them shoulde speake for himselfe what he could. Whereupon Uesey being cōmaunded to beginne, spake to this effect.

My dread soueraigne, as I must acknowledge my selfe somewhat agreeued, to bee entangled in so intricate a matter, so I am as glad, as heart can thinke, that so weighty a controuersie is brought to the deciding of so vpright an vmpire. And whereas it stode vō your Maiesties pleasure, with the aduise of this your honourable counsaile, that I, as vnworthy, shoulde haue the gouernment of your royalme of Ireland, and during my time, your Maiesties subiects, haue beene, I may not deny it, diuerslye annoyed, for my discharge, as I sayde in Ireland, so I auow here in England, that he kneeleth here before your highnesse (poynting to the baron of Dphaly) that is the roote and crop of all these enormities. For it is well knowne, that he beareth that stroke with the Irish, as if he once but frowne at them, they dare not be so hardy as once to peake out of their cabans. And whereas hys force doth greatlye amaze them, thinke you but his countenaunce doth wonderfullye encourage them? To the furtherance of which, it is apparently knowne, and it shall be proued, that he hath not onely in hucker mucker, by sundry messages, emboldened your Maiesties enimies, to spoyle your subiectes, but also by his personall presence, in secrete meetings, he gaue them such courage, as neyther the royaltie of your highnesse, nor the autoritie of your deputie, neyther the force of your lawes, nor the strength of your puissaunt army, was able to quenche the flame of these hurlye burlyes, that through his trayterous driftes were enkindled. These and the lyke enormities through his priuye packing wyth rebels being dailye committed, to bring mee, your Maiesties gouernour, in the hatred of the people, his adherentes both secretly muttered, and openly exclaimed against mee, and my gouernment, as though the redresse of all these harmes had wholy lyen in mine hands.

Whereupon being in conference wyth such as were the chiefetens of your roialme of Ireland, albeit I toke it, to be expedient, to point wyth my finger to the verye sinke or headspring of all the treasons, that by secrete conspiracies were pretended and practised against your Maiestie and your subiects, yet notwithstanding hauing more regarde to modestie, then to the deserts of the Baron of Dphalie, I did but glaunce at his packing in such secret sort, as none, or a very fewe of the companye coulde gueesse, whome with my milkye speaches I did touche. And as commonly the galde horse doth soonest kick, so this gentleman being prickt, as it should seeme with the sting of hys guiltye conscience, brake out on a sodaine, and forgetting his allegeaunce to your highnesse, and his duty to me your deputy, he toke me vp so roughly, as though I had bene rather his vnderling then his gouernour. The summe of which dispitefull speaches, I refer to the testimonye of the honourable audience where they were deliuered.

As for hys manifolde treasons, I am ashamed to rehearse such thinges, as hée dyd not sticke, to commit. And if it shall stande wyth your Maiesties pleasure, to adiourne the tryall for a fewe dayes, I will charge hym wyth such apparent Items, as were his face made of brasse, he shall not be able to deny any one article that shall be bokte agaynst him.

When Uescye had ended, the Baron of Dphaly prest himselfe somewhat forward, and in this wise spake.

The Lord Giraldes oration.

Most puissaunt Prince, and my dread soueraigne, were master Uescy his mouth so iust a measure, as what he spake, shoulde bée holden for gospell, this had béene no fit place for so arraunt a traitour, as he with his feigned glosing woulde gladlye prowe me to be. But sith it pleased your Maiestie, wyth so indifferent ballance, to ponder both our tales, I am throughly perswaded, that my loiall innocencie shall be able, to ouerpoyse his forged treachery. Your Maiestie haue hard many wordes to small purpose. And as his complaynt hytherto haue béene generallye hudled vppe, so mine aunswere thereto may not particularly be framed.

Whereas therefore he termeth mée a supporter of théeues, a packer with rebels, a cõspiratour with traytours, If I shoulde but with a bare worde deny the premisses, all his gape glose of glittering speaches woulde soone daynlye fade away. Yea, but he craueth respit, for the boking of his articles. Truely so he hath néede. For loytring and lingring is the onely waye he maye deuise, to cloake hys feigning and forging. Wherein hée sheweth himselfe as craftye, as the Philosopher was accounted wise that promised a tyraunt, vpon menacing wordes, to schoole his Asse in philosophy, so he had seuen yeares respite, because that in that space he was perswaded, that eyther the tiraunt, the Asse or he woulde dy. In likewise master Uescy, vpõ respite graunted him, woulde hang in hope, that eyther the life of your Maiestie (which God forbid) shoulde be shortned, or that I, in tract of time, woulde be disauoured, or that he by one subtil prank or other should be of this heauy loade disburdened.

But if I haue béene as many yeares a malefactour, as he aduoucheth, howe happeneth it, that his tongue was tyed, before this late discention begun? why did he not from tyme to time aduertise the counsaile of my treasõs? Whereas nowe it may be probably conjectured, that he was egd to this seruice rather for the hatred he beareth mée, then for anye loue he oweth your royall Maiestie.

Touching the wordes I spake in Ireland, I purpose not, for ought I heard as yet, to eate them in England. And when I shall be calde, to testify such speaches, as I deliuerd there, I will not be founde so raw in my matter, as to lose my erraunt in the carriage, as master Uescy hath done, or to craue further respite, for the regestring of his manifolde treasons. As for my secret metings with Irish rebels, were I perswaded, master Uescye, that you were able to prowe them, I would be founde willing, to acknowledge them. For if my cõscience were so deepelye stronge, as you pretende, I woulde take it for better pollicie, by acknowledging my trespasse, to appeale to my King his mercye, then, by denying my faultes, to stand to the rigour of his iustice.

And as for métings, I had neuer so many in woods wyth rebels, as you, master Uescy, haue had in your chamber with cowes. For it hath béene manifestlye apparented, that when the Baron of Dphalye, and the best of the nobilitie of Irelande, haue béene embard from entring your chamber, an Irishe cowe shoulde haue at all times accesse vnto you.

No, master Uescye: a cowe, an horse, an hauke, and a siluer cup haue béene the occasion of your slacknes. When the subiects were preyed, you woulde be content, to wincke at their miserye, so that your mouth were stopt wyth bribery. And when you had gathered your crummes sufficiently togither, you held it for a prettye pollicie (and yet it was but a bare shifte) to charge the nobilitie wyth such packing, as you daily did practise.

But you must not think, that we are babes, or that wyth anye suche stale deuise, or grose iuggling trick, you may so easily duske or dazell our eyes.

Can any man, that is but sclenderly witted, so farre be caryed, as to beléeue, that master Uescy, being the Kinges deputie in Ireland, hauing hys Maiesties treasure, hauing the nobilitie at his beck, the Kings armie at hys commaundement, but that, if he were disposed to besturre himself, he were able to ferret out such barebrich bratts, as swarme in the English pale. If he say he could not, we must smyle at his simplicitie, if he could and would not, how may he coulour hys disloyaltie?

Yea, but I beare such stroke with the Irish, as that vpon any priuate quarrel I am able, to annoy them. What then? Bicause the baron of Dphaly can reuenge his priuate iniuryes wythout the assistaunce of the deputye, therfore the deputy may not vanquish weake and naked rebels, without the furtheraunce

" of the baron of Ophaly, whereas the contrary " ought to be inferd, that if a pryuate person can " tame the Irish, what may thē the publique Ma- " gistrate doe, that hath the Princes pay.

" But in deede it is harde to take Hares with " Foxes. You must not thinke, master Uesey, that " you were sent gouernour into Ireland, to dan- " dle your trulles, to penne your selfe vp within a " towne or citie, to giue rebels the gaze, to pill the " subiects, to animate traytors, to fil your cofers, " to make your selfe by marring true men, to ga- " ther the birdes whilest other beate the bushes, & " after to impeach the nobilitie of such treasons, as " you onely haue committed.

" But for as much as our mutual complaints " stande vpon the one his Yea, and the other hys " Nay, and that you would be taken for a cham- " pion, and I am knowen to be no cowarde: let " vs, in Gods name, leaue lying for varlettes, " berdyng for ruffians, facing for crakers, chat- " ting for twatters, scoldyng for callets, bookyng " for scriueners, pleadyng for Lawyers, and lette " vs try with the dynt of swoorde, as become mar- " tiall men to doe, our mutuall quarrelles. Wher- " fore to iustifie that I am a true subiect, and that " thou, Uesey, art an archetraytor to God and to " my King, here in the presence of hys highnesse, and in the hearyng of this honourable assembly I challenge the combat. Whereat all the audi- tory shouted.

Nowe in good fayth, quoth Uesey, with a right good will. Whereupon bothe the parties beyng dismist vntill the Kings pleasure were further knowne, it was agreed at length by the counsayle, that the fittest tryal should haue bene by battayle. Wherefore the parties beyng as well thereof aduertised, as the day by the King appoynted, no small prouision was made for so eager a combat, as that was presupposed to haue bene. But when the prefixed day ap- proched neere, Uesey, turnyng his great boastes to small rost, beganne to crye creake, and secrete- ly sayled into Fraunce. King Edwarde, there- of aduertised, bestowed Ueseyes Lordships of Kyldare and Rathymgan on the Baron of O- phaly, saying that albeit Uesey conueyed hys person into Fraunce, yet he left his lands behind him in Ireland.

The Baron returned to Irelande with the gratulation of all his friendes, and was created Earle of Kildare, in the ix. yeere of Edward the second his raigne, the xiiij. of May. He deceased at Laraghbryne (a village neere to Maynooth) in the yeare 1316. and was buried at Kildare, so that he was Erle but one yeare.

The house of Kildare among diuers giftes, wherewith God hath aboundauntly endued it, is for one singuler pointe greatly to bee admi- red, that notwithstandyng the seuerall assaults of diuers enimies in sundry ages, yet this Earle that now liueth, is the tenth Earle of Kildare, to whom from Iohn the first Earle, there hath alwayes continued a lineall descent from father to sonne, which truely in mine opinion is a great blessing of God.

And for as much as this Erle now liuyng, as his Auncestors before him, haue bene shrewd- ly shooed at by his euill willers, saying that he is able, but not willyng to profite hys countrey: the Posie that is framed for him, runneth in this wise.

This noble man was in his gouernment suche an encourager and furtherer of seruitors, as that hee dubb'd on Saint Michael the Archangels day xxx. knights in the castle of Dublin. Barnewal, Baron of Trimlestowne. They came from little Britayne, where they are at this day a great surname. Upon their first arriuall, they wan great possessions at Beirhauen, where at length by conspiracy of the Irish, they were all slayne, except one young man, who then studied the common lawes in Englād, who returning, dwelt at Drūnagh besides Dublin, where his heyres to this day are setled. Drumnagh.

This house as well for antiquitie, as for the number of worshipfull gentlemen that be of the surname, beareth no small stroke in the English pale of Ireland. Howbeit of late it hath bene greatly maymed thorough the decease of three worthy and famous Barnewalles. The first was Robert Barnewall L. of Trimlestowne that last was, a rare noble man, and endued with sundry good gifts, who hauyng wholy wedded hymselfe to the reformation of hys miserable countrey, was resolued, for the whetting of his wit, which nathelesse was pregnant & quicke, by a short trade and methode he toke in his study, to haue sipt vp the very sappe of the common law, and vpon this determinatiō sayling into England, sickened shortly after at a worshipfull Patrones house at Cornubery, named Margaret Tyler, where he was to the great griefe of all hys countrey pierced with death, when the wealepublike had most nēede of his lyfe. Robert Barnwal. 1572.

The second Barnewall, that deceased, was M. Markus Barnewall of Donbroa, whose credite and authoritie had it bene correspondent to hys valure and abilitie, he woulde, I doubt not, haue bene accompted and knowen for as odde a gentleman (none dispraysed) as any in the English pale of Ireland. 1574. Marcus Barnwal.

The third of the surname that departed this lyfe, was sir Chrystofer Barnewall knight, the lanterne and light as well of his house, as of that part of Ireland where he dwelt: who, beyng sufficiently furnisht as well wyth the knowledge of the latin tongue, as of the common lawes of Englande, was zealously bent to the reformation of his countrey. A dēepe and a wyse gentleman, spare of speache, and therwithall pithy, wholy addicted to grauitie, beyng in any pleasaunt conceit rather giuen to simper, thē smile: very byright in dealing, measuryng all his affayres with the safety of conscience, as true as steele, close and secret, fast to his friend, stoute in a good quarell: a great householder, sparing without pinching, spendyng without wastyng, of nature mylde, rather chosing to pleasure, where he myght harme, then willyng to harme, where he might pleasure. He sickened the 23. of July of an hote burning ague, and ended his lyfe at his house of Turuy the fift of August, to the great losse as well of his friendes as of hys countrey, vpon whose death a sonne in law of his framed this epitaph. Sir Chrystofer Barnewal knight. 1575.

Læta tibi, sed mœsta tuis mors accidit ista.

Regna

Regna dat alta tibi, damna dat ampla tuis.
Lætus es in cœlis vllo sine fine triumphans,
Mœstus at in terris diues inopsq; iacet.
Nam sapiente caret diues, qui parta gubernet,
Nec, qui det misero munera, pauper habet.
Te gener ipse caret, viduæ, te rustica turba,
Atq; vrbana cohors, te (socer alme) caret.
Non est digna viro talis respublica tanto,
Nam sanctos sedes non nisi sancta decet.
Mira loquor, sed vera loquor, nō ficta reuoluo,
Si maiora loquar, nil nisi vera loquar.
Mortuus es? nobis hoc crimina nostra dederūt.
Mortuus es? virtus hoc tibi sacra dedit.
Viuus es in cœlo, dedit hoc tibi gratia Christi
Viuus vt in mundo sis, tibi fama dabit.

Baronets. There are besides these noble men, certain gentlemen of worship, commonly called Baronets, whom the ruder sort doth register among the nobilitie, by termyng thē corruptly Barons, wheras in very deede they are to be named neyther Barons, nor Baronets, but Banrets. He is properly called a Banret, whose father was no carpet knight, but dubd in the field vnder the banner or ensigne. And because it is not vsuall for any to be a knight by birth, the eldest sone of such a knight with his heyres, is named a Bannerret, or a Banret. Such are they that here ensue.

Howbeit Iohanes maior, a Scottish Chronicler, woulde faine proue him to be a Scotte. Lelande on the other side sayeth, hee was borne in England: so that there shall as great contencion rise of him, as in olde tyme there rose of Homers countrey. For the Colophonias said that Homer was borne in their citie, the Chyans claymed him to be theirs, the Salamynians auouched, that hee was their countrey man, but the Smyrneans were so stifly bent, in proouing him to bee borne in their territory, as they would at no hand take no nay in the matter, and therevpon they did consecrate a church to the name of Homer. Cic. in orat. pro Arch. poeta. But what countreye man soeuer this Scotus were, he was doubtlesse a subtil and profound clearke. The onely fault, wherewith he was dusked, was a litle spice of vaine glory, being giuen to carpe and taunt his predecessour deuines, rather for blemmishing the fame of hys aduersaryes, then for aduaunceing the truth of the controuersies. Wherevpon great factions are growen in the scholes betweene the Thomistis and ỹ Scottistis, Thomas being the ringleader of the one sect, and Scotus the Thomist. Scotist. belweather of the other. Hee was fellowe of Merton colledge in Oxforde, and from thence he was sent for to Parise to be a professour of Diuinitie. There did (sayeth Ioannes Camertes) of late yeres one Mauritius borne in Ireland excell, a gray Frier professe, very well sẽne in Logike, depely grounded in philosophy,both morall and naturall,learned in the Metaphisikes, in deuinitie pẽreselle. Scantly may I tell with how great curtisie and vertue he was endued. Whẽ he had professed at Padua the liberall Artes many yeres with no small renowme. He was created by Julius the second, not onely for hys profound knowledge,but also for the sincerities of his lyfe,Archbishop of Tuen. When he was trauelyng thitherward, beyng departed from Italy,by reason of the vproares that there were daily encreasing,he ended his lyfe to the great losse of learnyng,before he was full fifty yeres olde. He had sundry workes in hand, which he coulde not haue finished by reason of his vntimely death. How dere and entier frendes he and I were one to the other during his life,the letters he addressed me from tyme to tyme, to the number of fyre hundred, thwackt with loue and kyndnesse,do manifestly declare. And by perusing of them after his death(such is ẏ force of friendship) I am greatly comforted. Thus far Camertes. This Mauritius wrote.

Non mea penna notet, buccina fama sonet.
Hoc scripsisse satis, talem quandoq; parentem
Est habuisse decus, sed caruisse dolor.
Filius hæc dubitans talẽ vix comperit vsquam,

Dauid Wolfe, a deuine. Wolfe.

Thus farre gentle reader, haue I endeuored to heape vp together a Catalogue of suche learned Irishmē, as by diligent ensearch could haue ben found. Howbeit, I am to request thée not to measure the ample number of the learned of that countrey by this briefe abstract: cōsideryng, that diuers haue ben, yea and are yet liuyng, of profound knowledge that to me are vnknowen, and therefore in this register, not recorded.

The disposition and maners of the meere Irish, commonly called the wyld Irishe. Chap. 8.

BEfore I attempt the vnfoldyng of the maners of the mére Irish, I thinke it expedient, to forewarne thée reader, not to impute any barbarous custome that shall be here layde downe, to the citizens, townesmen, and the inhabitants of the english pale, in that they differ little or nothyng from the auncient customes and dispositions of their progenitors, the English and Walshmen, beyng therfore as mortally behated of ỹ Irish, as those that are borne in England. For the Irishe man standeth so much vpon hys gentilitie, that he termeth any one of the English sept, and planted in Irelād, Bobdeagh Galteagh, that is, English churle: but if he be an Englishman borne, then he nameth Irish gentilitie.

meth hym, Bobdeagh Saronnegh, that is, a Saxon churle: so that both are churles, and he the onely gentleman, and therupon if the baleſt peſant of them name hymſelfe with hys ſuperiox, he will be ſure to place himſelfe firſt, as I and Oneyle, I and you, I and he, I & my maiſter, whereas the curteſie of the Engliſhe language is cleane contrary.

The people are thus enclined, religious, feäke, amozous, irefull, ſufferable of infinite paynes, very glozious, many ſozcerers, excellent hozſemen, delighted with wars, great almesgiuers, paſſing in hoſpitality. The lewder ſozte, both clearkes and lay men are ſenſuall & ouer loſe in liuyng. The ſame beyng vertuouſly bzed vp oz reformed, are ſuch myzroꝛs of holynes and auſteritie, that other nations retaine but a ſhadow of deuotion in compariſon of them. As foz abſtinence and faſting, it is to them a familiar kynd of chaſtiſement.

They follow the dead cozpes to the graue wꝺ howlyng and barbarous outeries, pitiful in apparaunce, wherof grew, as I ſuppoſe, the pzouerbe, to weepe Iriſh.

Gréedy of pzayſe they be, and fearefull of diſhonoz, and to this ende they eſteme theyr Poets, who wzite Iriſh learnedly, and pen their ſonets heroicall, foz the which they are bountifully rewarded, if not, they ſende out libels in diſpzayſe, whereof the Lozdes and gentlemen ſtand in great awe. They loue tenderly theyr foſter childzen, and bequeath to them a childes pozcion wherby they nouriſh ſure friendſhip, ſo beneficiall euery way, that commonly, 500. cowes and better, are giuen in reward to win a noble mans child to foſter, they loue & truſt theyr foſter bzethzen, moze then their owne.

The men are cleane of ſkin & hew, of ſtature tall. The women are well fauoured, cleane coloured, faire handed, big and large, ſuffered frō theyr infancy to grow at will, nothing curious of theyr feature and pzopoztion of body.

Their infantes of the meaner ſozt are neither ſwadled noz lapped in lynnen, but folded vppe ſtarke naked in a blanket till they can go.

Pzoud they are of long criſped buſhes of heare which they terme glibs, and the ſame they nouriſh with all their cūning, to crop ẏ front thereof, they take it foz a notable piece of villany.

Water creſſes, which they terme ſhamrocks, rootes and other herbes they fēde vpon, otemeale and butter they cramme together, they dzinke whey, mylke, and bieſe bzothe. Fleſhe they deuour without bzead, and that halfe raw: the reſt boyleth in their ſtomackes with Aqua vitæ, which they ſwill in after ſuch a ſurfet by quartes & pottels: they let their cowes bleud, which growen to a gelly, they bake and ouerſpzed with butter, and ſo eate it in lumpes. No meat they fanſie ſo much as pozke, and the fatter the better. One of Iohn Oneales houſhold demaunded of his fellow whether bieſe were better then pozke, that, quoth the other, is as intricate a queſtion, as to aſke whether thou art better then Oneale. Pozcke.

Their noble men, and noble mens tenauntes now and then make a ſet feaſt, which they call, cosshering, whereto flocke all theyr retayners, whom they name followers, their rithmoues, their bardes, theyr harpers that fēde thē with muſike, and when the harper twangeth oz ſingeth a ſong, all the company muſt be whiſt, oz elſe he chaſeth like a cutpurſe, by reaſō his harmony is not had in better pzice. In their cosherring they ſit on ſtraw, they are ſerued on ſtraw and lie vpon mattreſſes and pallets of ſtrawe. The antiquitie of this kynde of feaſting, is ſet foꝛth by Virgill, where Dido entertayneth the Troyā pzince and his company. They obſerue diuers degrées, accozding to which ech man is regarded. The baleſt ſozt among them are little yong wags, called Daltinnes, theſe are lackies, & are ſeruiceable to the gromes oz hozſeboyes, who are a degrée aboue the Daltins. Of the third degre is the kerne, who is an ozdinary ſouldioz, bling foz weapon his ſwozd & target, and ſometimes hys pēce, beyng commonly ſo good markemen as they will come within a ſcoze of a great caſtle. Kerne ſignifieth, as noble men of dēepe iudgement infozmed me, a ſhower of hell, becauſe they are taken foz no better then foz rakehels, oz the deuils blacke garde, by reaſon of the ſtinkyng ſturre they kēepe, where ſo euer they be. Cosshering. Folowers. Lib. pri. En. circa finem Daltyn. Grome. Kearne. Righeyzen

The fourth degre is a galloglaſſe, bling a kind of pollar foz his weapon. Theſe men are commonly wayward rather by pzofeſſion then by nature, grim of countenāce, tall of ſtature, big of limme, burly of body, wel and ſtrongly timberd, chiefly fēding on bēefe, pozke and butter. Gollogla ſſe.

The fift degrée is to be an hozſman, which is the chiefeſt nert the lozd and capitaine. Theſe hozſemen when they haue no ſtay of their own, gad and range from houſe to houſe like arrant knights of the round table, and they neuer diſmount vntill they ride into the hall, and as far as the table. Hozſeman.

There is among them a bzotherhood of Barrowes, that pzofer to play at chartes all ẏ yere long, and make it their onely occupation. They play away mantle and all to the bare ſkin, and then truſſe themſelues in ſtrawe oz in leaues, they wayte foz paſſengers in the high way, inuite them to game vpon the grene, & aſke them no moze but companions to holde them ſpoꝛte. Foz default of other ſtuffe, they panne theyr glibs, the nailes of their fingers and toes, their dimiſſaries, which they léeſe oz redéeme at the Barrow.

A taleteller. One office in the house of noble men is a taleteller, who bringeth his lord a sleepe with tales vayne and friuolous, whereunto the number giue ſoth & credite. Without eyther preceptes or obſeruation of congruitie, they ſpeake latin lyke a bulgar language, learned in their common ſchooles of leachecraft and lawe, whereat they begin childrē, and hold on 16. or 20. yeres, conning by rote the Aphoriſmes of Hypocrates, and the ciuill inſtitutes, with a fewe other parings of thoſe faculties. In their ſchooles, they grouel vpō couches of ſtraw, their bookes at their noſes, themſelues lye flat proſtrate, & ſo they chaunt out with a lowd voyce their leſſons by peecemeale, repeating two or three wordes 30. or 40. tymes together. Other lawyers they haue lyable to certaine families, which after the cuſtome of the countrey determine & iudge cauſes. These cōſider of wrongs offered and receyued among their neighbors: be it murther, felony, or treſpaſſe, all is remedied by compoſition (except the grudge of parties ſeeke reuenge) and the tyme they haue to ſpare from ſpoyling and preding, they lightly beſtowe in parling about ſuch matters. The Breighon. Breighon (ſo they call this kinde of Lawyer) ſitteth on a banke, the lordes and gentlemen at variance round about him, and then they proceede. To robbe and ſpoile their enemies they deeme it none offence, nor ſeeke any meanes to recouer their loſſe, but euen to watch them the lyke turne. But if neighbors and friendes ſend their purueyors to purloyne one an other ſuch actions are iudged by the Breighons aforeſaid.

Religious fauoured. They honour and reuerence Friers and pilgrimes, by ſuffring them to paſſe quietly, and by ſparing theyr manſiōs, whatſoeuer outrage they ſhew to the countrey beſides them. The lyke fauour do they extend to their Poetes and Rithmours.

Matrimony abuſed. In olde tyme they much abuſed the honourable ſtate of marriage, either in contractes vnlawfull, metyng the degrees of prohibition, or in diuorcementes at pleaſure, or in retaynyng concubines or harlots for wyues: yea euen at this day where the clergy is ſainte, they can be content to marry for a yeare and a day of probation, and at the yeres ende, or any tyme after, to returne hir home with hir marriage gwdes, or as much in valure, vpon light quarels, if the gentlewomans friendes be vnable to reuenge the iniury. In lyke maner may ſhe forſake hir huſband.

Latin ſpoken as a vulgare language.

Superſtitiō in baptiſme. In ſome corner of the land they vſed a damnable ſuperſtition, leauyng the right armes of their infantes vnchriſtened (as they terme it) to the intent it might giue a more vngracious & deadly blowe. Others write that gentlemens childrē were baptized in mylke, and the infantes of poore folke in water, who had the better or rather the onely choyce.

Iohn Caius 2. Cant. ans

Diuers other vayne and execrable ſuperſtitions they obſerue, that for a complete recitall, would require a ſeueral volume. Wherto they are the more ſtifly wedded, becauſe ſuch ſingle preachers as they haue, report not in theyr ſermons the pieuiſhneſſe and fondneſſe of theſe friuolous dreamers. But theſe and the like enormities haue taken ſo deepe rote in that people, as commonly a preacher is ſoner by their naughty lyues corrupted, then their naughty lyues by his preaching amended. Againe the very Engliſh of birth, conuerſant with the ſauage ſort of that people become degenerate, & as though they had taſted of Circes poyſoned cup, are quite altered. Such a force hath education to make or marre.

Irelande why ſuperſtitious.

God with the beames of hys grace, clariſie the eyes of that rude people, that at length they may ſee theyr miſerable eſtate: and alſo that ſuch, as are deputed to the gouernment therof, bend their induſtry with conſcionable pollicye to reduce them from rudeneſſe to knowledge, from rebellion to obedience, from trechery to honeſty, from ſauageneſſe to ciuilitie, frō idleneſſe to labour, from wickedneſſe to godlyneſſe, wherby they may the ſoner eſpy their blyndeneſſe, acknowledge their loſeneſſe, amende their liues, frame thēſelues pliable to ỳ lawes and ordinaunces of hir Maieſtie, whom God with his gracious aſſiſtance preſerue, as wel to the proſperous gouernment of hir realme of England, as to the happye reformation of hir realme of Ireland.

FINIS.

THE HISTORIE of Irelande.

ALthough vndoubtedlye, the Originall of all nations for the moze part is so vncertaine, that who so euer shall enter into the searche thereof further than hee syndeth in the holie scriptures, may seeme (as it were rather to talk with men that dreame) than to gather authorities sufficient wherevpon to grounde any warranted opinion: yet for as muche as the authors (whom in this Irish hystorie we chiefly followe) haue set downe what they haue founde in the Irishe antiquities, concerning the firste inhabitation of this countrey of Ireland: and bycause the reader also maye be peraduenture desirous to vnderstande the same, we haue thoughte good to recite what they haue written thereof, leauyng the credite vnto the due consideration of the circumspecte reader, and where the errours are to grosse, giuing by the waye some cautions, in lyke sorte as oure Authours themselues haue done.

Accozding therfoze to the ozder of al other nations and people that seeke to aduaunce the glozy of their countreyes in fetchyng their beginnyng with the farthest from some one of auncient antiquitie: so lykewise the Irishmen haue registred in their Chronicles, that their Countrey was firste inhabited by one of Noes neeces after this maner.

In the yeare of the world. 1525. the Patriarke Noe began to admonish the people of vengeance to followe for their wickednesse and abhominable sinnes, to buyld his arke, to foreshew his kinsfolk and frendes, of that vniuersal floud whiche was to come, wherewith the whole face of the earthe shoulde be couered with water, and that within fewe yeeres, except they amended in tyme. This did he before the generall Floud one hundred and xxb. yeeres. But when euery man seemed to neglect this wholsom admonition, one Cesara that was neece to Noe, hearyng hir vncles fearefull prophecie, doubted least the same should come to passe, and therfoze determined with certayne hir adherents to seeke aduentures in some forrayne region, perswading hir selfe, that if she might finde a countrey neuer yet inhabited, and so with synne vnspotted, the generall sentence of Gods wrathe shoulde not there take effecte. Wherevpon rigging a nauie, she committed hir selfe to the seas, sayling forth, till at length she arriued in Irelande only with three men, and fiftie women, hauing losse the residue of hir companie by misfortune of sundrie shipwracks made in that hir long & troublesome iourney. The names of the men wer these, Bythi, Laigria, and Fintan. The coast where she firste set foote a lande, and where also she lyeth buried, is called Nauiculare littus, ỳ is the shipping riuage or shore. The stones wherin the memorie hereof was preserued from violence of waters, haue bin seene of some (as they them selues haue reported,) but how truly I haue not to say. Within. xl. days after hir comming a land there, the vniuersall floud came and ouerflowed al that coast as well as all other partes of the worlde. But where this tale bewrayeth it selfe too manifestly to be a mere vntruth, if the time & other circūstances be throughly examined, I wil not stād longer about the proofe or disproufe therof, sauing that it is sufficient (as I thinke) to bring it oute of credite, to consider, how that the Arte of sayling was vnknowne to the world before the vniuersall floud, and no parte inhabited except the continent of Syria, and thereabouts. But to passe such a forged fable, with the recorde thereof grauen in a stone (A deuise borowed from Iosephus, as some thinke) it shal be sufficient for the glorie of the Irish antiquitie to graunt that Irelande was discouered and peopled by some of Noes kinrede, euen with the first Flandes of the world (if they will needes haue it so, as the likelyhood is great) according to that whiche is sette forth in their hystories, when aboute. 300. yeeres after the generall Floud immediately vpon the confusion of toungs, Japhet and his posteritie emboldened by Noes example, aduentured to cōmitte themselues by shippe to passe the seas, and to searche out the vnknowne corners of ỳ world, and so finding out diuers yles in these west parts of the worlde.

There was (saye they) in that retinue one of the same progenie named Bertolenus, or Bastolenus, who encouraged with the late attempte and successe of Nimrod, kinsman to Ninus, (then newely intruded vpon the Monarchie of Assyria) reached so farre west, intending to atteyn vnto some gouernement where hee might rule

Here he ſettled himſelfe with his thzee ſonnes, Languinna, Salamis, and Ruthurgus, right actiue and ſtout Gentlemen, who ſearching the lande from ſyde to ſyde, and from ende to ende, lefte remembzaunces of their names in certayn notable places named after them as Languini, Stragruus, and mount Salanga ſince named Sainte Dominickes hill, and Ruthurgus his poole. Little is remembzed of Bartolenus, ſauing that in ſhozte ſpace with many handes wozking at once, he ridde and made playne a great part of the countrey ouergrowen with woddes and thickets.

Thus was Irelande inhabited by this people vnder the gouernemente of thoſe thzee ſonnes of Bartholenus and their offzyng, aboute the ſpace of thzee hundzed yeares.

Gyzunns.

Together wyth Bartolenus arriued in Ireland certayn godleſſe people of Nemrods ſtocke, wozthily termed Giants, as thoſe that in bodily ſhape exceeded the common pzopozcion of others, and vſed their ſtrengthe to gayne ſouereignitie, and to oppzeſſe the weake with rapine and violence. That linage (Chams bzode) grewe in ſhozte whyle to greate numbzes, and alway endeuozed them ſelues where ſo euer they came to beare ẏ rule ouer others. One cauſe herof was, their bodily ſtrength anſwerable to their hugeneſſe of ſtature, an other the examples of Cham oz Zozoaſtres that Magician & Nemrod grandfather to Ninus. Whiche two perſons in themſelues & their pzogenies were renoumed thzough the wozld, as victozious pzinces, ruling ouer two mighty kingdoms, Egypt and Aſſyzia. A thirde cauſe ther was, as this: They repined at the bleſſings beſtowed bpō Sem and Japhet, thinking it neceſſarie to withſtand and pzeuent all lawfull rule and dominion, leſt the curſe of ſlauerie pzophecied by Noe ſhould light bpon thē as at lēgth it did. Herebpon rebellioufly withdzawing theyz due obedience from their lawfull gouerners here in Irelande, and taking head, ſet bp a king of their own faction, maintepning his eſtate to ẏ oppzeſſion of the ſubiects, by bzinging them into continual bondage. The ſucceſſe was variable on both ſides, betwixt the lawful gouernozs & theſe vſurpers, with dayly reiſes & ſkirmiſhes, ſo much to ẏ griefe of them that coueted to liue in quiet vnder their rightful pzinces, that they determined with the chaunce of one general battayle eyther wholly to ſubdue thoſe pzoud rebellious tyzants, oz els to end their lyues in freedom, & ſo to be rid of further miſerie. But firſt, where there had growen certain debate & eminitie amōg thēſelues, wherby they had enfebled their own fozces, they thought gwd to make peace togither, befoze they put their whole ſtate in hazard of one bataile againſt the Giants, concluding therfoze an agreement, & ioyning in league, with pzomiſe to aſſiſte eche other to ſubdue their cōmon enimies, they aſſemble theyz power fozth of all parts of the land, and comming to ioyne batail with the Giants, after they had fought righte fiercely togither foz the ſpace of certaine houres, the victozie enclined to the the rightful part, ſo that the lawful kings preuayling againſt ỹ wicked tyrãts, great ſlaughter was made on the whole brode of that miſchieuous generation. For the kings meaning to deliuer themſelues of all daunger in tyme to come, vſed theyr happie victorie with great crueltie, whiche turned to their owne confuſion: for where they neyther ſpared man woman nor chylde that came in the way for more deſpite, & fuller ſatisfying of theyr whole reuenge, they did not vouchſafe to bury the carkaſſes of their ſlayne enimies, but caſte them out lyke a ſort of dead dogges, wherof thorough ſtenche of the ſame, ſuche an infectiue peſtilence enſewed in all places thorough corruption of ayre, that fewe eſcaped with lyfe, beſyde thoſe that got them away by ſea.

And hereby lyeth a vayne tale among the Iriſhmen, that one of the Giants named Ruanus chancing to be preſerued from this mortalitie, liued forſoth about. 2041. yeres, which is more thã twice the age of Mathuſalem. By this man (ſay they) S. Patrike was enformed of all the eſtate of the countrey: and after that vpon requeſt he had receiued baptiſme of the ſayd Patrike, he deceaſed in the yere after the birth of our ſauior. 430. as in the Iriſhe hiſtories hath bene vnaduiſedly regiſtred. But ſuche fooliſhe tales and vayne narrations may warne the aduiſed reader how to beware of yelding credite vnto the lyke idle fantaſies & forged tales, when they hap to lyght vpon ſuche blynde Legendes. For where ſome of the Poets vſed for inuention ſake to fayne ſuch dreãming Fables, for exerciſe of their ſtiles and wits, afterwarde thorough errour and lacke of knowledge, they haue ben taken with the ignorant for verie true and moſte aſſured hiſtories.

But nowe to the matter as we fynde it recorded of an infinite number of Giants ſlayne and made away in maner afore reherſed, certain there were that got them into ſome lurking dennes or caues, and there kept them till lacke of victuals enforced them to come forth, and make ſhift for ſuſtenaunce, and perceyuing no reſiſtance becauſe the lande was in maner lefte deſolate, they waxed bolder, and when they vnderſtode howe things had paſſed, they ſettled them ſelues in the beſt part of the countrey, eaſily ſubduing the poore ſillie ſoules that remayned, and ſo reuiuing theyr lignage, they became lordes of the whole Iland, keping the ſame in ſubiection for the ſpace of three ſcore yeares together.

Among Japhets ſonnes we reade in Geneſis, that Magog was one, who planted his people in Scythia neere Tanais, from whence aboute the yeere of the worlde. 2317. Nemodus with his. iiij. ſonnes Starius, Earbaneles, Inuinus, Fergus ſins capitaynes ouer a faire companye of people, were ſent into Ireland, who paſſing by Grecia, and taking there ſuche as were deſirous to ſeeke aduentures with them, at length they landed in Irelande inhabited the countrey, and multiplyed therein, although not without continuall warre, which they helde with the Giauntes, for the ſpace of two hundred and ſixteene yeres, in the ende of whiche terme the Giauntes preuayling, chaſed them thence again, ſo that they retired into Syria.

Irelande eſſõnes inhabited by the offſpring of Iapher.

The Giaunts preuayle.

This was aboute the yeere after the creation (as by their accounpte it ſhoulde ſeeme) 2533. from whiche tyme the Giauntes kepte poſſeſſion of the lande without forrain inuaſion till the yeare. 2714. but yet in all that ſpace they were not able to frame a common welth: for falling at diſſaunce among them ſelues, and meaſuring all things by might, ſeditiouſly they vexed eche other. Whiche thyng comming to the knowledge of the Grecians, moued fiue brethren, ſonnes to one Dela, being notable ſea men and ſkilfull Pilots to rigge a nauie, and to attempte the conqueſt of this Iſlande. Theſe were of the poſteritie of Nemiodus, and named Gandius, Genandius, Sagandus, Rutherantus, and Slanius. When all things were readye and their compaynies aſſembled, they toke the ſea, and finally arriuing here in Irelande, founde the puiſſance of the Giants ſore weakened thoughe their owne ciuill diſſention, ſo that with more eaſe they atchieued theyr purpoſe, and wanne the whole countreye, vtterly deſtroying and rooting out that wicked generation, enimies to mankinde, and after deuided the Iſlande into fyue partes, and in eche of them they ſeuerally reigned.

2533.

The ſonnes of Dela a Grecian ſkilfull in the arte of ſayling.

They paſſe into Ireland, and deſtroyed the Giaunts.

They deuide the countrey into four parts.

Furthermore to ſatiſfie all fydes, and auoyde contention, they concluded to fire a mereſtone in the myddle poynte of Irelande, to the whiche eche of their kyngdomes ſhoulde reache, ſo as they myght bee equally partakers of the commodities founde within that countrey ſoyle.

Theſe are alſo ſuppoſed to haue inuented the diſtribution of ſhires into Cantredes, euery cantred or baronie conteyning one hundred townſhippes. At lengthe deſyre of ſouereaigntie ſette the fyue brethrene at variance, and greatly hindered theyr growyng wealthes. But Slanius gettyng the vpper hande, and bringing his four brethren to a lowe ebbe, toke vpon him as chiefe aboue his other brethren, encrochyng rounde aboute the myddle ſtone for the ſpace of certayne myles, whiche plotte in tyme obteyned the priuiledge and name of one entier parte, and nowe maketh vp the number of fyue partes, (into the whiche Irelande is ſayde to bee deuided) and is called Methe, and in Latine Media, taking that name (as ſome haue gueſſed) for that in reſpecte of the other, it conteyned but the moytie of cantredes, that is, xxx. middeſt of the lande. This parte Slanius ioyned as a ſurpluſage ouer and aboue his inheritaunce, vnto the Monarchie, whiche parte notwithſtanding grewe to a ſeuerall kingdome. Thirtie yeares the monarchie yet continued in this order, but finally Slanius departed this lyfe, and was buryed in a mountayne of Meth, that beareth hytherto (as they ſay) the name after him.

Slanius departed thys lyfe.

Then the Princes ſubiecte to him, beganne to ſtomacke the matter, and denied their obeyſaunce to his ſucceſſour, wherevpon enſued continuall warres betwixte them, falling ſtill at debate for the lande of Methe, whiche ſtrife of long tyme might neuer fully be appeaſed.

In the necke of theſe troubles alſo there arriued in Irelande a new armie of Scythians, who made clayme to the land by a title of right which they pretended from their forfather Nemodus: & ſo taking and making partes, they ſet all in an vproare, that hauocke was made on eche ſide with fire and ſworde in moſte miſerable maner.

Partakings.

To be ſhort, they ſpent themſelues in purſuing one an other with ſuche outrage, that nowe they cared not what nation or what Souldiour they receiued to their ayde, to keepe vp or beate downe a ſyde.

By whiche occaſion the Britons alſo put in a foote among them, who procured Brennus the brother of Belinus, to directe his courſe thyther with the ſame nauie whiche he had made ready to paſſe ouer into Gallia, now called Fraunce, to the ayde of Segwin then kyng of the Allobroges that inhabited the countreis called Sauoy and the Delphinate.

Brennus called into Ireland to ayde one parte of the factious people.

Segvvyne. Allobroges.

But his enterpriſe into Ireland toke ſmal effect though there were other kings of the Britons that got dominion there, in ſo muche that Gurguntius, or Gurgwintius, the ſonne of Belinus, accompted Ireland among other his dominions, to belong to him by lineall deſcente, notwithſtanding the Britiſh Princes neuer enioyed the quiet poſſeſſion thereof longer than they helde it by mayne force, but were often repulſed and put to the worſe with ſeeking after it, finding there ſmall gaine other than ſtripes, wherof they bare away great plentie.

But nowe to come to the Spanyards, that laſtly vnder the conduct of foure Capitains paſſed into Irelande from Biſkaye, and inhabited that Iſlande, it ſhall not bee impertinent in following the order whiche oure Authour keepeth, to ſpeake ſomewhat of their originall, that it maye appeare from whence the Iriſhe nation had their firſt beginning.

2436. In the yeare of the worlde. 2436. after the vniuerſall floud. 780. whyleſt the Iſraelites ſerued in Egypte, Gathelus the ſonne of one Neale, a great lord in Grecia, was vpon diſfauor exiled his countrey with a number of his factious adherents and frendes. This noble Gentleman being right wiſe, baliant, and wel ſpoken, comming into Egipte, gote honourable entertainmente of Pharao ſurnamed Opus, as in the Scottiſhe hiſtorie more plainly appeareth. And afterwards departing that countrey, trauerſed the ſeas, and landing firſt in Portingall, after ſome bickering with the inhabitants, at length yet he got by their conſent a portion of the countrey lying by the banks of the riuer auncientlie called Munda, and nowe Mondego, where ſhortly after he began to buyld a citie firſt named Brachara but nowe Barſalo, as Hector Boetius hath. After this, when Gathelus his people began to increaſe in power, thorough perſuaſion of the Spanyardes their neighbors, they remoued into Galicia, where they alſo builded a citie named Brigantium, whiche is nowe called Coruna. Finally when they grew into ſuche an huge multitude, that Galicia was not able to ſuſteyn them, Gathelus with a certain number of thē paſſed ouer into Irelande, and there grewe into ſuch eſtimatiō with the barbarous people, that for his knowledge ſpecially in all languages, he was highly honored: for he not only enriched and beautified the Iriſh toung, but alſo taught them, letters, ſought vp their antiquities, practiſed their youth in warlyke feates after the manner of the Grekes and Egyptians, from whence he deſcended.

See more of this matter in the beginning of the Scottiſh hiſtorie.

The ryuer of Munda, nowe Mondego. Brachara. Brachara nowe Braga.

Brigantium.

See more hereof in Scotland. Gathelus paſſeth into Irelande.

To conclude, he was ſo acceptable to thē, that to gratifie ſuch a benefactor, they agreed to name the Iland after him Gathelia, and after his wyfe Scotia.

The name of Irelande, and vvherof the ſame vvere deriued, as they hold opinion.

This is one opinion but yet incredible, not onely to Humfrey Lluyd, but alſo to other learned men, and diligent ſearchers of antiquities, by reaſon of the ſundry arguments of improbabilitie, aſwel in the miſcompt of yeres, as other vnlikelyhoods found therin, when the circumſtances come to be duly examined, throughly weyed and well conſidered.

Yet certaine it is, that Irelande was auncientlye named Scotia, and the people Scottes, as by diuers olde writers it may bee ſufficiently proued, albeit by what occaſion it firſt toke that name, or from whence they came, it is as yet doubted,

But to proceede with the hiſtorie as we fynde it. The reſidue of Gathelus his people whiche remayned in Spayn, founded the citie of Bayon in the confines of Gaſcoigne, and replenifhed the ſea coaſtes of Spayn with ſtore of inhabitants, and well neere aboute two hundred yeeres after their firſt arriuall there, when they were eftſoones peſtered with multitude of people) they beganne to fanſye a newe voiage, but whether at that tyme they paſſed ouer into Irelande, or ſome whiwhither elſe it is vncertayne.

Notwithſtanding, ſure it is, that in the dayes of Gurguntius kyng of the Britons the chiefe gouernour of Bayon with .iiij. brethren Spaniardes of the whiche two are ſayde to be Hyberus and Hermion not the ſonnes (ſome thynke) of Gathelus, (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but ſome other perhappes that were deſcended from him, who vnderſtanding that diuers of the Weſterne Iles were emptye of inhabitantes, aſſembling a greate number of men, women, and children, embarqued with the ſame in. 60. great veſſels, and directing their courſe Weſtward, houered a long time in the ſea aboute the Iles of Orkeney, vntill by good happe they met with Gurguntius then returning frō the conqueſt of Denmarke (as in the Britiſhe hiſtorie it appeareth) whome they beſoughte in conſideration of theyr wante of victuals and other neceſſaries, being ſuche as they were not able longer to abyde the ſeas, encombred with a ſort of women and children, to direcke and appoynt them to ſome place where to inhabite, promiſing to holde the ſame of hym, and to become liege people to hym and to his heyres for euer.

Gurguntius aduiſing himſelf hereof, remembred with what trouble he held the Iriſhe in ſubiection, and conceyuing hope that thoſe ſtrangers ſhould eyther ſubdue or wholly deſtroy that vnruly generation, toke the othes of thoſe Spanyardes with hoſtages, and furniſhyng them and theyr ſhippes with all things needfull ſet them ouer into Irelande, where aſſiſted with ſuch Britons as Gurguntius had appointed to goe with them for their guides, they made a conqueſte of the whole countrey, and ſettled them ſelues in the ſame.

Some write, that Ireland was before ỳ preſent, voyde of all inhabitants, yet they agree that theſe Spanyards wer guided thither by the Britons, and that vnder ſuche conditions (as before is recited) ſo that it apereth, the kings of thys our Britayn had an elder right to the realme of Ireland than by the conqueſt of Henry the ſeconde, whiche title they euer mainteyned, and ſomtimes preuayled in purſuing thereof, as in the dayes of king Arthure, to whome the Iriſhe (as in ſome hiſtories is remembred, (acknowledged their due ſubiection, with payemente of their tribute, and making their appearance at the Citye called in in the Britiſhe toung Caer Lleon. Whereunto when their owne free aſſente, the ſubmiſſion of their princes with lawfull conqueſt and preſcription are adioyned, an inuincible title muſte needes be enforced.

But now to oure purpoſe: The Spanyardes ſubſtanciallye ayded by the Britons, ſettled them ſelues, and deuided theyr ſeates in quarters, ỳ foure brethren raigning ſeuerally a part in foure ſundry portions in good quiet and increaſe of wealth vntill their pryde and ambition armed two of them agaynſt the other two, as Hiberus and one of his brethren, againſte Hermion and the other brother. In this diſſention Hermion ſlewe his brother Hiberus. Of whome at the ſame tyme the countrey (as ſome holde) was named Hybernia, as in the deſcription therof further appeareth, althoughe ſome rather holde, that it toke the name of yron, of the plentifull myncs of that kinde of mettall wherwith that lande aboundeth: And ſo thoſe auncient writers which name it Ierna, named it more aptely after the ſpeeche of the inhabitantes than others, whiche name it Hibernia.

Diſſention betwixt the brethren.

Suche are the frutes of ambition.

See more hereof in the deſcription.

But to proceede, Hermion hereupon to auoide the yll opinion of men for that he had thus attained to the ſouerantie by the vnnaturall ſlaughter of his brother in that vnhappie ciuil warre purged hymſelfe to his ſubiects, that neyther maliciouſly nor contentiouſly, but for his neceſſarie defence and ſafetie he had borne armes againſte his brethren: and to witneſſe how farre he was from all deſire to rule alone, he appointed certaine Capitaines as kings, to rule vnder him ſeuerall countreys, reſeruing to hymſelfe but one fourth parte, and the portion of Meth allotted to the Monarchie for the better mayntenance of his eſtate.

No crime ſo manifeſt or deteſtable that vvanteth a colourable preteuce to excuſe it.

Theſe partes appoynted forth in thys wyſe at lengthe grew to fiue kingdoms, Leynſter, Connagh, Vlſter, and Mounſter deuided into two partes, and ſometyme to more, by blurping or compoundyng among themſelues, but euer one was choſen to be chief ſouereigne Monarke ouer them all.

Ireland deuided into fiue kingdomes.

One ſouerayne ruler ouer the reſt.

Thus it ſeemeth that certaynely the Spanyardes of the north partes of Spayne, inhabiting the countreys about Biſkeye and Galicia, came and peopled Ireland (as both their owne hiſtories and the Britiſhe do wholly agree) but frō whence they came firſte to inhabite thoſe countreyes of Spayne, verily I haue not otherwiſe to auouch: For no other writers that I can remember, but (ſuch as haue regiſtred the Scottiſh Chronicles) make mencion of the commyng thither of Gathelus with his wyfe Scota and their people, in manner (as by the ſayde Chronicles is pretended.

But nowe to oure purpoſe: An hundred and thirtie chief kings are reckned of this nation from Hermion to Laogirius, the ſonne of Nealus Magnus, in whoſe tyme that holye eſteemed man Patrike conuerted them to Chriſtianitie.

But nowe in the meane tyme whyleſt the Iriſhmenne lyued in ſome tollerable order and reſte vnder their ſeuerall kings, one Rodorike a Scythian Prince with a ſmall companye of men, being weather driuen rounde about the coaſts of Britayn, was by chaunce caſt vpon the ſhore of Irelande.

Pictes arriue in Irelande.

Theſe were Pictes, and the firſt that hadde bin heard of in theſe parties (as ſome authors haue recorded) a people from their verie cradle giuen to diſſention, landeleapers, mercyleſſe, fierce and hardy. They being brought and preſented to the Iriſhe king, craued interpreters, which granted, Roderike their chieftain made this requeſt for him and his, as followeth:

The oration of Roderik K. of the Pictes king of Ireland.

Not as degenerate from the courage of our anceſtours, but faſhioning our ſelues to fortunes courſe, wee are become to craue of Irelande, as humble ſuppliantes that neuer beefore this preſent haue ſo embaſed our ſelues to any other nation. Beholde ſir king, and regarde vs well, no light occaſion cauſeth theſe luſty baliant bodies to ſtoupe. Scythians we are, and Pictes of Scythia, no ſmalle portion of glorie reſteth in theſe two names. What ſhal I ſpeake of the ciuill warre that hath expulſed vs from our natiue homes, or rip vp old hiſtories to moue ſtraungers to bemoane vs, let our ſeruantes and children diſcourſe therof at leyſure, if perhappes you will. vouchſafe to graunt vs ſome time of abode in your land, to the whiche effecte and purpoſe our vrgent neceſſitie beſeecheth your fauors, a king of a king and men of men, are to craue aſſiſtance: princes can well diſcerne and conſider howe neere it toucheth their honour and ſurette to vphold and relieue the ſtate of a king, by treaſon decayed: And manifeſt it is to all men of reaſonable conſideration, that nothing more beſeemeth the nature of mã, than to be moued with compaſſion, and as it were to feele themſelues hurte, when they hear and vnderſtand of other mennes calamities. Admit (we beſeeche you) and receyue amongſt you theſe fewe ſcattered remnauntes of Scythia: if your romes bee narrowe, wee are not manye: if the ſoyle of your countrey be barreyne, wee are borne and enured to hardeneſſe: if you liue in peace, wee are at commaundemente as ſubiectes: if you warre, we are readie to ſerue you as ſouldiours: we demaunde no kingdome, no ſtate, no pompous triumph in Irelande: we are heere alone, and haue lefte ſuche things behynde vs with our enimies: howſoeuer you eſteeme of vs, we ſhall content our ſelues therwith, and learne to frame our liking to yours, calling to mynd not what we haue bin, but what we ar.

Great conſultation was had about this requeſt of theſe ſtrangers, and many things debated to and fro. In concluſion, the Iriſhe layde forth for anſwere the opinions of their Antiquaries, that is, ſuche as were ſkilfull in old hiſtories & ſayings of their elders, wherunto they gaue credite, & therfore they gathered, it coulde not be expedient to accept the Scythians into the land, for that mingling of nations in one realme, breedeth quarels: moreouer that the multitude of the inhabitantes was ſuche, as ſcarſly in the whole Ile was vneth able to receyue them, and therefore thoſe fewe newe commers being placed among ſo many olde inhabitants, might breede quickely ſome diſturbance to bring al out of ioynt. But (ſaid they) though we may not cõuenientlie receiue you among vs, yet ſhall you fynd vs readie to further you to be our neighbours.

Doubtfull conſultation.

The anſwere of the Iriſhe to the requeſt of the Pict.

Not farre hence there lyeth the great Ile of Britayne, in the northe parte whereof, beeing voyde of inhabitantes, your manhode and policies maye purchaſe for you roomthes to place yourſelues at eaſe, we ſhall appoynt you captaines to guide you thither, we ſhall aſſiſt to ſettle you with oure forces in that countreye, make readie your ſhippes that ye maye paſſe thither with all conuenient ſpeede. Encouraged with this perſuaſion they toke their courſe towardes the northy parts of Britain now called Scotland, where contrarie to their expectation Marius king of Britayne was readye to awayte their comming, and with ſharp battayle vanquiſhing them in fielde, ſlewe Roderike with a greate number of his retinues. Thoſe that eſcaped with lyfe, and ſoughte to him for grace, he licenced to inhabite the vttermoſt end of Scotland. This Marius Hũfrey Lluyd taketh to bee the ſame whome the Romain writers name Aruiragus, and reigned about the yere of our Lord. 70. a Prince of a noble courage and of no ſmall eſtimation in his dayes (as ſhould ſeeme by that which is written of him.) His right name (as the ſayde Humfrey Lluyd auoucheth) was Meurig.

The Iriſh perſuadeth the Pictes to place themſelues in Britayn.

Marius otherwiſe called Aruiragus king of Britons.

But now concerning the Pights, whether that thoſe that eſcaped with lyfe, got ſeates by

king

king Meurigs graunte (as aboue is ſpecified,) or that getting to their ſhippes, they withdrew into the Iles of Orkeney, and there remayned. Wiues they wanted alſo to increaſe their iſſue: and bycauſe the Britons thoughte ſkorne to matche their daughters with ſuch an vnknown and newe comen nation, the Pictes continued theyr firſte acquaintaunce with the Iriſhe, and by entreatie obteyned wyues from them, with condition, that if the crowne ſhould happe to fall in contention, they ſhoulde yelde thus muche to the prerogatiue of the woman, that the Prince ſhoulde be elected rather of the bloud royall of the female kind than of the male. Which order (ſayth Beda) the Pictes were well knowne to keepe vnto his tyme.

But howe ſoeuer wee ſhall giue credit to this hiſtorie of the firſt comming of Pictes into this lande, if we grant that to be true which Geffrey of Monmouth reporteth of this victorie obteyned by Marius agaynſt the Pictes, yet haue I thought good to aduertiſe the Reader, that the Britons of this Ile were diſquieted by ỹ nation long before the ſuppoſed tyme of the ſayde king Marius. For Mamertinus in his Oration entitled Panegiricus, Max. Dictus hathe theſe wordes, (ſpeakyng of the conqueſt whiche Julius Ceſar had heere agaynſt the Britons) but in that age (ſayeth he) Britayn was neyther furniſhed with anye ſhippes of warre for battayle on the Sea, and the Romaynes after the warres of Affrike and Aſia, were well practiſed wyth the late warres agaynſte Pyrates, and after that agaynſte Mithridates, in whiche they were exerciſed as well by ſea as lande.

Moreouer, the Britiſhe Nation was then vnſkilfull, and not trayned to feates of warre, for the Britons then beeyng onely vſed to the Pictes and Iriſhe enimyes, people halfe naked throughe lacke of ſkill, eaſily gaue place to the Romayns force, ſo that Ceſar myght onely as it were glorie in this, to haue paſſed in that iourney ouer the Ocean ſea.

Hereby it ſhoulde ſeeme, that the Pictes and Iriſhe, did diſquyet the Britons before the commyng of Julius Ceſar into thys Ile of Britaine: But whether they inhabited at that tyme in ſome parte of Irelande, or in ſome of the out Iles by Scotlande, eyther in any parte of Germanye, or Scandinauia, or elſe whether they were already ſettled in the farthеſt partes of Scotlande, as in Cathneſſe, towardes Dungeſbie heade, wee haue not to affirme, other than that whyche in Scotlande wee haue written, in followyng Hector Boetius, whoſe opynion howe farre it is to bee ſuſpected in matters of antiquitie, I leaue to the conſideration of others.

But for the fyrſte comming as well of the Pictes as Scottes, (whome hee maketh inhabitauntes within thys Iſle ſo long before) eyther the name of the one nation or the other is remembred to haue had any gouernement heere, by any auncient or approued writer. I can not perſwade my ſelfe, that eyther Scottes or Pictes hadde any ſettled ſeates within the boundes of this Iſle of Britayne, till after the birthe of oure Sauiour: but that rather the Scottes, as yet inhabiting in Irelande, and in the weſterne Iſles called by the Romayne writers Hebrides, and the Pights, in the Iles of Orkneye called in Latin Orchades, dyd vſe to make often inuaſions vppon the Britons, dwelling vpon the coaſtes that lye neere to the ſea ſyde ouer againſte thoſe Iſles.

From whence they comming ouer in ſuche veſſells or boates, as the Fiſhermenne yet vſe, at lengthe the Pights firſt aboute the yeare of our Lord. 290. as Humf. Lhuyd hath noted, entred nerally into Cathneſſe, and other the north partes of Britaine, where they ſettled them ſelues, and remoued the Britons that there inhabited before that time: and ſhortely the Scottes likewiſe came ouer and got ſeates in the weſt partes ouer againſte the Northe of Irelande, and in thoſe Weſtern Iles, which Iles they firſt got into their poſſeſſion. And in this ſorte thoſe nations Pightes and Scottes came firſt to inhabite here in this our Iſle of Britayn, as the ſayd Humfrey Lhuyd not without aduiſed coniecture grounded vpon good reaſon and ſufficient authorite to leade him ſo to eſteeme, hath written in his ſhort commentaries of the deſcription of Britayn.

And verily I thinke we maye more ſafely beleue that whiche he auoucheth in this behalf than that which Hector Boetius ſetteth down, ſith for any thing I can perceiue, his authorities bryng no ſuche warrant with them, but wee may with good reaſon ſuſpecte them. But for the man himſelfe, euen as he hath verie orderly, and with no leſſe cunning than eloquence, ſet downe dyuers thinges incredible, and reported ſome other contrarie to the truth of the hiſtorie, for the glorie of his nation, as we may take it, ſo in his excuſe it may be alledged, that hee was not the Authour of thoſe matters, but wrote what hee founde in Cambell, Veremounde, Cornelius Hibernenſis, and ſuche other in lyke caſe, as Geffreye of Monmouth wrote what hee founde in olde auncient Britiſhe monumentes, and was not the deuyſer him ſelfe (as ſome haue ſuſpected) of ſuche thinges as in hys Booke are by hym expreſſed.

But now to returne to the Pictes. It may be that they came at ſeuerall tymes in like manner as the Scottes didde out of Irelande, of whome the fyrſte is remembred to be Ferguſe, the ſonne of Ferquhard, a man right ſkilful in blaſon of armorie, hee himſelfe bare a Lion gules in a field of gold. The marble ſtone wherof in the Scottiſhe hiſtorie is mencioned, brought into Ireland by Symon Brechus, and kepte tyll thoſe dayes as a precious iewell, this Fergus obteyned towardes the proſpering of his iourney, for that it was thoughte, who ſo had the ſame in poſſeſſion, coulde not but obteyne ſouerayntie and rule ouer others as a king, namely thoſe of the Scottiſhe nation.

The marble ſtone.

This ſtone Fergus brynging into Scotland left it there. But although that Fergus be put in ranke among thoſe Scottiſhe kings that ſhuld reigne in Britayn, yet he bare ſmal rule there, and was diuers tymes beaten back into Irelande, where finally he was drowned by myſfortune within the creeke of Knockfergus.

Knockfergus.

That hee encountred with Coilus king of Britons (as the Scots write) is not poſſible, as oure author hathe verie well noted, excepte they myſtake the name of Coilus for Cailus, with whome the age of Fergus might well meete: the rather for that in the firſte yeare of Cailus reigne the Pictes entred, Fergus immediately after them. 330. yeeres ere Chriſte was borne, where Coilus reigned in the yeare after the incarnation. 124. about whiche tyme befell the ſecond arriuall of the Pictes in Britayne.

124.

And thus it maye bee they miſtake, by errour of the name, Coilus for Cailus, and the ſecond arriuall of the Pictes for the firſt.

But now to the courſe of the hiſtorie. Whileſt the Pictes were ſeated in the north of Britaine, and grew to a great multitude, the Iriſh made ſundry errandes ouer, to viſite theyr daughters, nephues and kinſfolk: and by their often comming and going, they were aware of certayn waſte corners, and ſmall Ilandes boyd of inhabitants, as that which ſeemed rather neglected and ſuffred to lye waſte.

Reuther, or, Reuda.

Hereof they aduertiſed their princes, namely Reuther or Reuda, who beeing deſcended of Fergus, determined to inueſt himſelf in certaine portions of lande beſide the Pictes. He therfore wel appointed, paſſed ouer, and partly by compoſition, & partely by force, got poſſeſſion of thoſe quarters, whiche were deſolate, and began to erecte a kingdome there, by little and little: encreaſing his limites and finally got betwixte the Pictes and Britayns, poſſeſſing that countrey which toke the name of him called Rheuderdahal, and now Riddeſdale, (as you would ſay) Rheudas part, for dahal in ỹ old Scottiſh tong, ſignifieth a part.

In theſe quarters he coulde not ſettle hymſelfe, but that he was oftentymes aſſayled by the Britons that bordered next vnto him, and at length his chaunce was to be ſlayne, but the kingdome continued ſtill in the handes of his ſucceſſours: and the Pictes and Scottes grew in frendſhip togither, permitting eche other to lyue in quyet.

The amitie betwixt Scotes and Pictes.

The Scots neſtled them ſelues in the Iles and coaſts alongſt the ſea ſide. The Picts held the middle part. But ſhortely after, the peace began to hang doubtfull betwixt them: for the diuerſitie of people, place, cuſtom & language, together with the memorie of olde grudges, moued ſuch iealoſy and inward hate betwixte thoſe nations, that it ſeemed they were redy to breake out into open diſſention vpon the firſte occaſion. And as in ſuche caſes there neuer wanteth one deuiſe or other to rayſe tumults: it chaunced that certaine of the Scottiſh nobilitie had got out of Greece (as ſome write) a Molollian hound, which both in ſwiftneſſe of foot, and pleaſantneſſe of mouth, was accompted peerleſſe.

Their falling out.

This hounde being ſtollen by a Picte, was cauſe of the breache of peace, ſo that cruell warres therof enſued (as in the Scottiſh hiſtorie more at large appeareth. But where ſome write, that Eugenius ſhoulde reigne ouer the Scottes, when this quarell fell out for ſtealing of this hound, Hector Boetius ſayeth, it was in king Crathlinths dayes.

Stryfe about a dogge.

Moreouer it ſhould ſeme by that which the ſame Boetius writeth, that the hound or greihound for the which this trouble roſe, was not fetched ſo far as out of Grecia, but rather bred in Scotland: notwithſtãding bicauſe the Latiniſts call ſuch kinde of dogs Moloſſi, for that the firſt generation of them, or the like, came from a citie of Gretia called Molоſſe, it may be, that ſome haue thoughte, that this greyhounde came from thence, for that he was ſo called after the name of that place frõ whence the breed of him firſt came. But to returne to the hiſtorie.

After the Scottes and Pictes had tugged togither a whyle at lengthe one Carauſius a Bryton, laboured a frendſhip betwixt them and bringing his purpoſe to paſſe, perſwaded them to lend him their help to expulſe the Romaines out of Britayne: but his happe was ſhortly after to be ſlayne by the Romaine capitayne Alectus. And ſo newe ſturres were in hand betwixt the Britons and Romaines, the Scottes and Pictes, for the moſt parte taking parte with the Britons, till at length Maximus the Romayne lieutenant founde meanes to ſet the Scots and Picts at variance, & ioyning with the Picts in league, vſed their ayde againſt the Scots, whome he ſo earneſtly purſued with all the power he might make, that in the end they were vtterly expulſed out of all the coaſtes of Britayne, ſo that they fledde ſome into one parte, ſomme into an other, but the moſte number gotte them ouer into Irelande, and the Iles, wher they remained for the ſpace of. 43. yeares, and then at length returned thither, vnder the leading of their prince Fergule, being the ſecond of that name, as they accompt him. From thencefoorth the Scots kepte ſuche foote in Britayn, that they encroched vpon their neighbors, in ſuche wyſe as they waxed ſtronger then the Pictes, whom in the end they quite roted forth, and neſtled themſelues in their ſeates, althoughe nowe at their firſte retourne, they concluded a firme amitie with the ſame Pictes, that ioygning theyr forces together, they might the better make head againſt bothe Romayns and Britayns, whome they reputed as common enimies to them bothe.

Thus the Scots a liuely, cruell, vnquiet, antient and victorious people, got place within this Ile of Britayne, mixed firſt with Britons, ſecondly with Pictes, thirdly and chiefly with the Iriſhe, whiche after this tyme lefte their name of Scots vnto thoſe in Britayne, and choſe rather to be called Iriſhe: and then came vp the diſtinction of the name, as Scotia maior for Irelande, Scotia minor, for the countreye inhabited by the Scots within Britayne.

But Cambrenſis ſayth, that the Scots chiefly preuailed vnder the leading of. 6. valiant gentlemen, ſonnes to Murious king of Ulſter, who in the time of Neale, ſurnamed the greate, that enioyed the Monarchie of Ireland, paſſing ouer into Scotlãd to ſuccour their coũtreymen there, at length toke vp for themſelues certain parcels of ground, which their poſteritie were owners of in the time that Cambrenſis liued, to wit, about the yeare of our Lord. 1200. who treateth hereof more largely in his Booke intitled Topographia Britanniæ. Sith which time they haue bene euer taken, reputed and named Scots, the Pictiſh nation being driuen into corners, albeit the mountaine partes and out Iles euen vnto thys day are inhabited with a wilde kinde of people called Redſhankes, eſteemed by ſome to be mingled of Scots and Pictes.

The Scottes write, that their king Gregorie the ſonne of Dongall, who began his reigne in the yeare of oure Lorde. 875. pretending a title to Irelande, as belonging to hym by ryghte of lawfull ſucceſſion, made a iourneye thither, and wythin a ſmall tyme made a conqueſte of the countrey.

Thys Gregorie lyeth buryed in one of the out Iles called Iona, or Colmekyll, where they ſpeake naturally Iriſhe: and therefore ſome of the Scottes woulde ſeeme to make the conqueſt of Henry the ſeconde in Irelande, a reuoltyng from the righte inheritours, although they confeſſe they can not tell howe they came from the poſſeſſion of it, otherwyſe than by forging a tale that they willingly forewent it, as reaping leſſe by reteyning it, than they layde forthe, and ſo not able to diſcharge that whiche was to bee defrayed aboute the keeping of it, they gaue it ouer, perſwading themſelues, that the Kyngs of Englande haue gayned little or nothyng by the hauyng of Irelande. And yet in the tyme whyleſt Syr Henry Sydney was gouernor there, Sir Henry Sydney. when the Countie of Ulſter was auouched to belong to the Crowne, it was proued in open Parliament, that the reuenues of that Erledom, in the dayes of Edwarde the thirde were reckened, and founde to amounte vnto the ſumme of xxxj. thouſande markes yearely, the ſame being but a fyfte parte of Irelande: ſo that if thinges were well loked vnto, and ſuche enprouemente made as mighte bee, Irelande woulde ſuffice to beare the neceſſarie charges, and yelde no ſmall ſurpluſage vnto the Princes coffers.

But nowe as it falleth forthe in the hiſtorie. We haue thoughte good heere to ſhewe in what ſorte Irelande came to receyue the Chriſtian fayth. We fynde in deede that immediatly after Chriſtes tyme, Saynt James the Apoſtle, and other, trauayling into theſe Weaſt partes, didde firſt inſtructe the Iriſhe people, and teache them the glad tidyngs of the Goſpell, ſo that diuerſe amongeſt them euen then were chriſtened, and beleeued, but not in ſuche numbers (as maye be thought) wherby it ſhould be ſayd, that the coũtrey was generally conuerted. Ireland inſtructed in the faithe by S. Iames the Apoſtle.

Notwithſtanding, the Scottiſhe Chronicles auouche, that in the dayes of their king Fincomarke, who departed this lyfe in the yeare of our Redemption. 358. Irelande was conuerted to the faith by this meanes.

A woman of the Pictiſh bloud, chaunced (ſay they) to ſerue in thoſe dayes the Queene of Irelande, whiche woman being a chriſtian hir ſelfe, firſt inſtructed hir miſtreſſe in the faith and true pointes of Chriſtianitie, and the queene hir huſbande, who conuerted the whole Iriſhe nation. Howbeit, by report of ỹ Iriſh writers thẽſelues, this ſhoulde not ſeeme altogether true: for they affirme, that their countrey was rather ſtil eſteemed as one of the vnchriſtened Iſles, tyll about the yeare foure hundred twentie and ſixe, whileſt Celeſtine the firſt of that name, gouerned the ſea of Rome, who vpon conference hadde wyth his Clergie, touching the reſtoring of the chriſtian Faythe in the Weaſte partes of the Worlde greatly decayed there by the hereſie of Pelagius, vnderſtode that Ireland alſo by reſon of diſtance from the hart of Chriſtendome, and rudeneſſe of the nation, had receyued little fruite at all of true religion, a thing muche to be lamented.

Paladius offereth to go into Irelande.

Among other that then were aſſembled to treate of thoſe matters was one Paladius Archdeacon of Rome, who offered his charitable trauayle towardes the conuerſion of any of thoſe landes whether it ſhould pleaſe them to appoynt hym to goe.

He is conſecrated bishop.

Celeſtine knowing the ſufficiencie of the mã, conſecrated him Biſhop, authoriſed his iourney by letters vnder his ſeale, furniſhed his wantes, and aſſociating to him ſuche Religious perſones and other, as were thoughte neceſſarie to aſſiſte him, deliuered to him the Bible with greate ſolemnitie and other monumentes in furtherance of his good ſpeede.

Paladius landed in Irelande.

At length he landed in the north of Irelande, from whence he eſcaped ryght hardely with hys lyfe into the Iles adioyning, where hee preached the Goſpell, and conuerted no ſmal number of Scots to the chriſtian beleef, and purged that part that was chriſtened from the infection of the Pelagians, as in the Scottiſhe hiſtorie more at large apereth. He was required by ẏ Scots that inhabited here in Britayne, to leaue the Iles & to come ouer vnto them, there to inſtruct the people in the way of true ſaluation, to the whiche with the Popes licence, he ſeemed willyng ynough, and the Biſhop of Rome the more readily condeſcended thereto, for that in the inſtante tyme when Paladius was to departe, one Patrike attended at Rome ſuyng for licence to be ſent into Irelande.

Patrike ſente into Ireland.

The Pope therefore graunted, that Paladius might paſſe ouer to the Scottes in Britayn, and appoynted Patrike to goe with authoritie from hym into Ireland, where vpon his arriuall hee founde the people ſo well bent to heare his admonitions, contrarye to their accuſtomed frowardneſſe, that a man woulde haue thought that had ſeene their readineſſe, howe that the lande hadde bin reſerued for him to conuerte, and bycauſe it pleaſed God to beſtow ſuche an vniuerſall benefite to thys lande by his meanes, we haue thoughte good in following our Authour herein to touche ſome part of the courſe of his life.

Paladius apointed to go into Scotland.

The towardneſſe of the Iriſhmen to hear Patrikes preaching.

VVhere ſaint Patrike vvas borne.

This Patrike in Latin called Patricius, was borne in the marches betwixte Englande and Scotland, in a towne by the ſea ſyde called Eyburne, whoſe father hight Calphurnius, a Deacon and ſonne to a Prieſt. His mother named Conches, was ſiſter to Saint Martine that famous Biſhoppe of Towers in Fraunce.

The life of S. Patrik in brief.

Patrike of a chylde was brought vp in learning, and well inſtructed in the faith, and muche giuen to deuotion.

The Iriſhmenne in thoſe dayes aſſiſted with Scottes and Pictes were become archpyrates, ſore diſquieting the ſeas about the coaſts of Britayne, and vſed to ſacke little ſmall villages that laye ſcattered along the ſhore, & wold often leade awaye captiue the inhabitantes home into theyr countrey.

S. Patrike vvas taken priſoner vvhen he vvas yong.

And as it chaunced, Patrike being a ladde of xvj. yeares olde, and a ſcholer then in ſecular lerning, was taken among other, and became ſlaue to an Iriſh lord called Mackbuain, from whom after. vj. yeares terme he redeemed himſelfe with a peece of gold which he found in a clod of earth, that the ſwyne had newly turned vp as he followed them in that tyme of his captiuitie, beeyng appointed by his maiſter to keepe them.

Affliction maketh men religious.

And as affliction cõmonly maketh men religious, the regarde of his former education, printed in him ſuche remorſe and humilitie, that beyng thencefoorth weaned from the worlde, he betoke himſelfe to contemplation, euer lamenting the lacke of grace and truthe in that land: and herewith not diſpairyng, but that in continuaunce, ſome good might bee wrought vpon them, he lerned their tong perfectly, and alluring one of that nation to beare him companie for exerciſe ſake, he departed from thence, & got him into France, euer hauing in his mynd a deſire to ſee the conuerſion of the Iriſhe people, whoſe babes yet vnborne ſeemed to him in his dreames (from oute of theyr mothers wombes) to call for chriſtendome.

He paſſeth into Fraunce.

In this purpoſe he ſought out his vncle Martine, by whoſe meanes he was placed with Germanus the biſhop of Auxerre, continuing wyth him as ſcholer or diſciple for ẏ ſpace of. xl. yeres: All whiche tyme he beſtowed in like ſtudie of the holie ſcriptures, prayer, and ſuch godly exerciſes. Then at the age of. lvij. yeares, being renoumed through the Latine Churche for his wiſedome, vertue and ſkill, he came to Rome, bringing letters with him in his commendation, from the Frenche biſhops vnto Pope Celeſtine, to whome he vttered his full mynde and ſecrete bow, which long ſithence he hadde conceyued touching Irelande.

Patrike is inueſted archbiſhop of Irelande.

Celeſtine inueſted him Archbiſhoppe and primate of the whole Iſlande, ſette him forewarde with all fauor he could deuiſe, and brought hym and hys diſciples onwarde of theyr countrey.

In the 23. yere therfore of the Emperor Theodoſius the yonger, beyng the yeare of our Lorde 430. Patrick landed in Irelande, and bycauſe hee ſpake the tong perfectly, and withall beeing a reuerente perſonage in the eyes of all menne, many lyſtened and gaue good eare to hys preachyng, the rather for that as wryters haue recorded) hee confirmed his doctrine wyth diuers miracles: but ſpecially thoſe regarded his wordes before all other that had ſome taſte of the chriſtian faith afterwarde, either by the cõming into thoſe parties of Paladius and his diſciple one Albius an Iriſhe Biſhoppe, or otherwyſe, by ſome other: for it is to be thought, that continually there remayned ſome ſparke of knowledge of Chriſtianitie, euer ſith the firſte preaching of the Goſpel, (whiche was ſhortly after the Aſcention of our Sauior) by S. James, (as before is mencioned.) In continuaunce of time Patrike wan the better part of that kingdom to the faith.

Irish diſciples.

Laigenus ſon of Neale the great Monark, although he receyued not the Goſpell him ſelfe, yet permitted all that would to embrace it. But ſith he refuſed to be baptiſed, and apply to his doctrin, the Biſhop denounced againſt him a curſe from God accordingly, but tempered yet with mercye and iudgement, as thus: that during his lyfe he ſhoulde be victorious, but after him neyther the kingdom ſhould ſtande, nor his lignage inherite. From thence he toke his way vnto Conill lorde of Conagh, who honourably receyued him, and was conuerted with al his people. And after ſent hym vnto his brother Logan king of Leyniſter, whome he likewyſe conuerted.

In Mouniſter he found great frendſhippe and fauour by meanes of an Erle there, called the erle of Daris, who honoured him highly, and gaue hym a dwelling place in the eaſt angle of Ardmagh called Sorta, where he erected many celles and monaſteries both for religious men and women. He trauailed .xxx. yeres in preachyng thorough the lande, planting in places conuenient Biſhops and Prieſtes, whoſe learning and vertuous converſation by the ſpeciall grace and fauour of GOD, eſtabliſhed the fayth in that rude nation. Other thirtie yeares he ſpent in his prouince of Ardmagh among his brethren, placed in thoſe houſes of Religion, whiche by his meane were founded, and ſo he liued in the whole about one hundred twentie two yeares, and lyeth buryed in Downe.

Of Saint Patrikes Purgatorie, ye ſhal fynd in the deſcription of the countrey, and therefore we dor here omitte it: but yet becauſe we are entred to ſpeake of the fyrſt fundation of Churches and religious houſes here in Irelande, in following our Authour in that behalfe, wee will ſpeake ſomewhat of ſuche other holye men and women as are renoumed to haue liued in Irelande, as ornamentes to that Ile, more glorious than all triumphes and victories of the worlde, if their zeale hadde bin ſeaſoned with true knowledge of the Scriptures, as it maye well be, that in ſome of them it was, howſoeuer myſtaken by the iudgement and report of the ſimple, which hath reſted not only of theſe perſons, but alſo of the very Apoſtles themſelues, certaine fantaſticall tales which with the learned are out of all credite.

But this matter I will leaue to diuines to diſcuſſe, truſting that the Reader will contente himſelfe to heare what we fynde recorded by olde writers, whiche we ſhall ſette downe, and offer to their conſiderations to thinke therof, as reaſon may beſt moue them.

Giral. Camb. telleth, that in S. Patriks tyme flouriſhed Sainte Bride the Virgine, and S. Colme, which two, with the ſame Patrike, were buryed in Downe, (as in the Scottiſhe hiſtorie ye may fynde) and (as the ſame Giraldus ſayth) their three bodies were founde there ſhortly after the conqueſt. Giraldus Cambrenſis.

Sir John Conway being preſidẽt of Vlſter, in viewyng the ſepulture, teſtifyed to haue ſeene three principall iewels, whiche were then tranſlated, as honourable monumentes worthie to be preſerued. Of ſainct Colme it is doubted in what age he lyued. Brigide, otherwyſe called Bride, was baſe daughter to one Dubtacius, a Capitayne in Leyniſter, who perceyuyng the mother wyth chylde, ſolde hir ſecretely (fearing the ielouſie of his wyfe) to an Iriſhe Peet, reſeruing to himſelfe the fruite of hir wombe. Sir Iohn Conwvey preſidente of Vlſter. Saint Colme. Peet, that is, Magus in latin or (as vve may ſay) a Magitia or ſoothſayer in English.

She was there delyuered of thys Bridget, whome the Peet trayned vp in learning, and vertuous education, and at lengthe brought hir home to hir father. An. do. 439.

The damoſell alſo was inſtructed in the faith by ſaynte Patrike, that preached then in thoſe quarters, wherupon ſhe became ſo religious and ripe in iudgement, that not only the multitude of people, but alſo a whole Synode of Biſhops aſſembled neere to Dinelyn to heare hir aduiſe in weightye cauſes. Suche eſtymation they had of hir. One fact of hir beyng yet a childe, made hir famous. The eſtimation vvherin she vvas had.

The king of Leyniſter had giuen to hir father Dubtacius as a token of his good liking towardes him for his valiant ſeruice a riche ſworde, the furniture wherof was garniſhed with many coſtly iewels. And as it chaunced, the Damoſel viſiting the ſicke neighbours, diuerſly diſtreſſed for wante of neceſſarie relicke (hir father beeing a ſterne man and his ladie a cruell ſhrew) ſhe could deuiſe no other ſhift to helpe to relieue the wante of thoſe poore and needye people, but to impart the ſame iewelles of that yolde ſworde among them. The king of Leyniſter.

This matter was heynouſly taken, and being brought to the kings eares, it chaunced that ſhortely after he came to a banket in hir fathers houſe, and calling the maide afore him that was not yet paſt .ix. yeres of age: He aſked hir howe ſhee durſte preſume to deface the gyfte of a king,

a king in such wise as she had done his. She answered that the same was bestowed vpon a better king than he was, whom (quoth shee) finding in such extremitie, I woulde haue giuen all that my father hath, and all that you haue, yea your selues to and all, were ye in my power to giue, rather than Christ should starue.

She professed virginitie.

She professed virginitie, and allured other noble yong Damosels vnto hir felowship, with whō she continued in hir owne Monasterie, where she was first professed, vnto the yere of our lord. 500.

and then departing this life, shee was buryed in Downe in Saint Patrikes tombe.

Geraldus Cambrensis reporteth of his owne knowledge, that among other monumentes of hirs, there was founde a Concordaunce of the foure Euangelystes, seeming to be written with no mortall hande, beautifyed with mysticall pictures in the Margent, the colours and cunning workemanshippe whereof, at the first blushe appeared darke and nothing delectable, but in the heedfull viewe of the diligent beholder, very liuely and wonderfull artificiall.

A concordance of the foure Euangelistes.

Cenanus that was first a Souldier, succeeded Saint Patrike in the Sea of Ardmagh, after he had certaine yeares followed the warres.

Abbot Brendan.

Brendan Abbot, at the age of tenne yeares was of such incomparable holynesse (as they say) and therewith so wise and learned, that hys father and mother thinking themselues to haue gayned the mosse worthie fruite that myght ensue of theyr maryage, by mutuall consent professed continencie, and abandoned matrimoniall companie. He flourished in the dayes of Saint Brygget, and lyued in familyer societie wyth Saynt Arons the Bysshoppe, and Fyntan the Abbot.

Madoc.

Madoc, alias Edan of noble parentage taken prysoner by the king of Temore and kept in his Court with dyuerse yong men his schoolefelowes, openly adiured the king to licence him and them to depart, that they might serue God as they were accustomed, ꝑ which being now kept in sunder and restrayned of libertie, they were forced to discontinue. Hereupon immediately they were dismissed.

He dyed Bishoppe of Fernes, and layde the foundation of that Borow.

Melingus.

His successor Melingus, although hee was Bishop, gaue himselfe yet to voluntarie labour, and with his owne handes derued and brought a running spring to his Monasterie, enduring that trauayle dayly after prayer and studie, for the space of. viij. yeares togither.

Colm king of Leynister.

Fyntan Abbot was had in such reuerence, that where as Colm king of Leynister kept Cormake the kings sonne of Tensil prisoner, he went boldly with. xij. of his disciples through the preasse of all the souldiers, and in sight of the king was suffered to borow the yong Prince. For the Irishe are not sterne agaynst those of whome they haue conceyued an opinion of holinesse.

I remember (sayth our Author) that Cambrensis writeth himselfe merily to haue obiected to Moyice then Archbishop of Cashell, that Ireland in so many hundred yeares had not brought forth one Martyr. The Bishop answered pleasantly (alluding to the late dispatching of Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury) our people (quoth he) notwithstanding their other enormities, yet haue spared euer the bloud of vertuous men. Marie now we are deliuered to such a nation that is well acquainted with making Martyrs, so that from henceforth I trust no complaynt shall need for want of Martyrs.

The answere of the archbishop of Cashell to Geraldus Cābrensis.

Malachias was borne in Ardmagh of noble progenie, brought vp in vertue by the example of his mother, and trayned forth in learning, profited greatly in deuotion, so that being yet a very babe, he was espied diuerse tymes to steale away from his companions to pray in secrete. He was so graue and modest, that of himselfe he chose the most graue and seuere Schoolmaisters, refusing an excellent Clearke, because he sawe him somewhat lightly demeaning himselfe at game.

Malachias.

In the beginning of his youthfull yeares, he became the disciple of Imarius an olde recluse, whose austeritie of conuersation the whole towne had in great reuerence.

There hee became a Deacon, and at. xxv. yeares a Priest. The Archbishop for the fame and opinion of his worthinesse receyued him to be assistant to him in office, in the which he so behaued himselfe, that he reformed superstitions, and reuiued ꝑ force of religion, namely in the vniformitie of their Church seruice, wherein before time they iarred.

The famous Monasterie of Banchor he redified of the patrimonie and legacies by his vncle left him. The same Monasterie was of old time gouerned by Congellus, and after him by Columbanus the father of many religious houses in Fraunce.

The Monasterie of Banchor repaired.

This Abbey being spoyled, and nintie of the brethren murthered in one day by the Prior, the possessions whereof being come to the handes of Malachias by his vncles assignement, he restored forthwith and aduaunced the foundation. At the age of. xxx. yeares, he was by canonicall election forced to accept the Bishoprike of of Concreth, a people of all the Irish then most sauage and wild, whome with inestimable trauaile he reclaymed from theyr beastly maners.

In the meane while died Celsus Bishop of Ardmagh, after whom succeeded Malachias, at the age of. xxxviij. yeares. But before this neare hande the ſpace of two hundred yeares togither, a cuſtome had crepte into the countrey, that the Metropolitane ſea was conferred vpon ſuch Biſhops as were maried, and were of the bloud royall) in maner by way of inheritance: Wherfore Nigellus or Neale the next of kinred, animated by the parcialitie of ſome princes, and getting into his cuſtodie the Bible and ſtaffe, & other monumentes of S. Patrike, whereunto opinion of the common people tyed the prelacie, came to his Palace with a bande of ſouldiors to haue ſlayne the Biſhop: When al the people wept and howled for his perill, he alone ſtepped into the boſome of his enimies, demaundyng what was theyr purpoſe: The bloodie ſouldiers letting fall theyr weapons in ſted of executing the pretenced murder, fell to reuerence him, and at length departed from him as freendes.

Three yeares he ſate in the primacie rather to diſcontinue the horrible corruption before vſed, than with intent to ſettle himſelfe there.

After he hadde remoued the abuſe, he procured Malachias to ſucceede him in the Archbiſhops ſea, and he returned to his former ſea of Downe, to the which as then was annexed the Biſhoprike of Conor, but Malachias vnderſtanding that in tymes paſt they were.vj. ſeuerall ſeas, he deuided them againe, & ordeined an other to the Biſhoprike of Conor, deſirous rather to leſſen his cure than to enlarge the frutes by taking more charge vpon hym.

Malachias being demaunded of his brethren the Monkes of Benchar, where and when hee would wiſh to die and to be buried, if it lay in his choyce, he anſwered: If in Irelande, beſide the bodie of S. Patrik, if beyond the ſeas at Clareuale where S. Bernarde was then reſiant, and in the feaſt of all ſoules. He purpoſed within few dayes to ſue to Pope Eugenius for increaſe of the nũber of Metropolitans, whiche requeſt was ſhortly after accompliſhed. And in this voyage which he thus made, hee ſtayed at Clareuale, and there diuers tymes openly foreſhewed, that the yere of his departure forth of this worlde was come, and accordingly when he had taken leaue of Sainte Bernarde and the brethren, hee wente downe from his chamber to the churche, and there diddo communicate: Whiche donne, hee returned to his lodgyng, and there on All Soule daye in the yere of his age. 54. he gaue vp the ghoſt ſo mylde lye and quietlye that it ſeemed rather a ſleepe than a death.

Malchus, thoughe borne in Irelande, yet he ſpente the moſte parte of his tyme in the monaſterie of Wynchceſter in Englande, and from thence was taken & admitted biſhop of Liſmore. Saint Bernard remembreth of him by occaſion, he cured a lunatike childe in confirming, or elſe (as they termed it, in biſhopping him.) This miracle ſeene and conſtſſed by many hundredes of people was blowen throughe the worlde.

The ſame tyme happened diſcord betwixt the king of Mounſter and his brother, and as the matter was handled, the king was ouermatched and fled into England, where he viſited Malchus in his Abbey, and would by no meanes departe from hym, but remayne there vnder his rule and gouernmente ſo long as it pleaſed God to denie hym quiet returne into his countrey: hee contented himſelfe with a poore celle, vſed dayly to bathe himſelfe in colde water, to aſſuage the wanton motions of his fleſhe, and for dyet receyued none other delicates than breade, water and ſalte, daye and nyghte ſobbing and bewayling with greate remorſe of conſcience his former myſdemeaned lyfe. Diſcorde betwixt the king of Mounſter and his brother.

At lengthe the other Kings and people of Irelande beganne to repine at the vſurper, ſet vpon him with open warre, banquiſhed him in a pight fielde, and called home the rightefull Prince his brother agayne, to reſume his kingdome, who with many graue perſwaſions of Malchus and Malachias coulde vneth bee broughte to forſake that trade of lyfe and companye, the whyche he had wyth ſuche delectation enured him ſelfe vnto.

Thus farre of the Iriſhe Sainctes. Of the whyche (as ſome of them are to bee eſteemed right vertuous and godlye menne, ſo other of them are to bee ſuſpected, as perſons rather holye by the ſuperſtitious opinion of the people, than induced with any ſuche knowledge of true godlyneſſe and ſyncere Relygion, as are worthye to be Regiſtred in the number of thoſe that of right ought to paſſe for ſayntes, as by certayne late writers may appeare. Foxe. Bale.

But this we leaue to the iudgemente of the aduiſed Reader, for that in ſuche matters wee mynde not to preiudice any mans opinion, but onely wiſhe the Reader to take heed howe he giueth credite to that whych oftentymes is found written by Authours touching feigned miracles, and other vayne ſuperſtitious dealings, wherethorough many zelous perſons haue often bene deceyued.

Nowe therefore to leaue Sayntes, and returne to other matters, touchyng the Iriſhe hiſtorie.

In the yeare. 586. the Norwegians had got dominion ouer the Flandes in the north Weaſt Ocean called the Iles of Orkeney, and ſkoured the Seas that none other nation durſte vnnethe appeare in ſight for dread of them. A people giuen greately to ſeeke the Conqueſtes of other Realmes, as they that coulde not fayle to fynde more warme and fruitefull places for to in- 586. The Norwregians ſkoure the ſeas, and inuade the yles of Orkney.

to inhabite than theyr owne.

They inuade Irelande.

These fellowes chaunced to light into Irelande by this meanes, Caraticus king of Brytaine ranne into suche hatred of his people that they rayled warres agaynst him.

The Saxons that possessed now fiue seuerall kingdomes in the Ile of Brytayne, reioyced not a little at this ciuill discorde betwixt the Brytayne king and his subiects, whereupon meaning to make a full conquest of the Brytaines, and vtterly to expulse them forth of the whole Ile, assembled their powers & ioyned to the same Gurmundus, a notable rouer of the Norwegians, who hauing at all tymes a Nauie in a readinesse, and men to furnishe it, holpe the Saxons to chase the Brytaynes into the Marches of Wales. For from thence (being retyred into the Mountaynes and Woodes) they coulde not dryue them.

Gurmundus an Archpyrate of the nation of Norway.

This Gurmound (as some thinke) buylded at the same tyme the towne of Gurmondchester, and after being assysted by the Saxons, hee made a voyage into Irelande, where hee spedde not greatly to his desire, and therefore the Irishe account not this for any of theyr conquests, as some of their antiquaries informed oure Authour.

Champion.

Gurmounde therefore fynding but sorie successe, buylt a fewe sleight Castelles and Fortes in the frontiers, and so lefte the lande, and sayled from thence into Fraunce, where at length hee was slaine. Our Chronicles in deede name him King of Irelande, but the Irishe affyrme that before Turgesius there was none of the Easterne people that obteyned dominion in theyr Countrey.

Turgesius.

Geraldus Cambrensis, to make the matter whole, (a Gods name) thinketh Turgesius to haue conquered the lande as Lieutenaunt or Deputie vnder Gurmundus. But thys being graunted, there ryseth a more manifest contradiction than the former, for hee himselfe numbreth betwixte Laogirius King of Irelande, that lyued in the yeare. 430. and Edlumding, whom Turgesius vanquished, xxiij. Monarkes, whose raignes comprehended foure hundred yeares, so that Turgesius lyued in the yeare after the incarnation. 830.

Laogerius. 430

Then it is too playne, that hee coulde not haue any doynge wyth Gurmundus, who ioyned with the Saxons agaynst Careticus, in the yeare. 586.

The doubt resolued.

This knotte (saith our Authour) might be vntwyned with more facilitie thus. Gurmundus made much of that little he gotte, and wrote himselfe King, which title our Hystories doe allowe him, because hee made the waye playne, enioyed it a whyle, and set open the gate vnto his Countreymen.

Turgesius atchieued the whole exployte, and brought it to perfection, and in these respectes eyther of them may bee called King and Conquerour of Irelande.

Turgesius what he did.

Turgesius therefore with hys Norwegyans the seconde tyme inuaded Irelande, susteyned diuerse losses and ouerthrowes: but in the ende forsakyng himselfe by the Sea coastes, and receyuing thereby hys friendes at hys pleasure, waxed so strong that hee subdued the whole Ile, styll erecting Castelles and Fortresses as hee wanne grounde, so to mayster the Irishe, that with suche maner of strengthes of Walles and Rampyres had not as yet beene acquaynted, for tyll those dayes they knewe no defence but Woods, Bogs, or strokes.

He buylded Fortresses.

Turgesius so bryded the Irishe Kinges, and kepte them in awe, that without interruption hee raigned lyke a Conquerour thirtie yeares.

Turgesius raigned in Ireland. xxx. yeares.

He cryed hauocke and spoyle where anye riche pray was to bee had, sparing neyther those of the laytie, nor of the Cleargie, neyther Church nor Chappell, abusing hys victorie verie insolently, Omalaghlilen King of Methe, was in some trust with the tyrant. His onely daughter Turgesius craued for his Concubine.

Omalaghlilen king of Meth.

The father hauing a readie witte, and watching his tyme, beganne to breake with Turgesius in this wise, sauing your fancie (my Lorde quoth he) there are dyuerse Ladyes of bloud in thys Countrey meeter bedfellowes for a King than that browne gyrle, and therewyth he beganne to recken vppe a number of hys Neeces and Cousins, indowed (as he set them forth) with such singular beautie, as they seemed rather Angels than mortall creatures.

The tyrant as it were rauished, and doting in loue of those Peereleese peeces before hee sawe them, by reason of such exceeding prayses as hee thus heard of them, doubted yet least Omalaghlilen extolled them to preserue his daughter out of hys handes, and the subtile father cloked his drift with modest behauiour, lyngering tyme to enflame the Leachers folly, as he that wished anye thing more to bee suspected than that which hee ment most earnestly to bring to passe.

The policie of Omalaghlilen.

At length when Turgesius seemed to take his delaying thus of tyme somewhat displeasantly, he bled thys or the like speech.

If I shoulde saye (quoth hee) that I gaue you my sole daughter wyth good wyll to be deflowred, your highe wisedome woulde some gesse that I didde but flatter you, and yet if tenne Daughters were dearer to mee than your good pleasure and contentation, by whose bountifull goodnesse both thee and I, and wee all are supported,

ſuppozted, I were vnwozthie that ſecrete and neare frendſhip wherin it lyketh you to vſe me. As foz the wenche it will be in parte honourable to hir to be required to the bedde of ſuch a prince, ſith Queenes haue not ſticked to come from far and yelde the vſe of their bodyes to noble conqueroꝛs, in hope by them to haue iſſue: and how ſoeuer it be taken, tyme will weare it out, and redeeme it: but ſuche a friende as you are to mee and myne, neyther I noꝛ myne ſhall lyue to ſee. And verily I mean not to hazard your diſpleſure if it were foꝛ a greater matter than the value of twentie maydenheads, ſeeyng fathers haue not ſticked to giue vp their owen wiues to quench the luſtes of their ſonnes. Therefoꝛe am I thus agreed, name the daye and place, ſeparate youre ſelfe from the viewe of your court, conferre with thoſe that haue a deyntie inſight and ſkilfull eyes in diſcerning beauties, I wil ſend you my daughter, and with hir the choyce of .xij. oꝛ .xvj. gentlewomẽ, the meaneſt of the which may be an Empreſſe in compariſon: when they are beſoꝛe you, make youre game as you lyke. And then if my chylde pleaſe your fantaſy, ſhe is not too good to be at your cõmaundement. Only my requeſt is, that if any other ſhall preſume vpon youre leauings, your maieſtie will remember whoſe chyld ſhe is. This liberal proffer was of Turgeſius accepted (whoſe deſire was inſaciable) with many good woꝛdes, thankes and faire promiſes.

To be ſhoꝛte, the ſame day Omalaglilen put his daughter in princelyke apparell, attired after the trimmeſt wyſe, and with hir .xvj. proper yong men, beautifull and amiable to behold: and ſo being ſent to the king were preſented vnto him in his priuie chamber, hauyng none aboute him but a fewe diſſolute youthfull perſons wherupon thoſe diſguiſed yong ſtripplyngs drew forth from vnder their long womanniſhe garmentes theyr ſkeynes, and valiauntly beſturring them ſelues, firſt ſtabbed their weapon poyntes, thoꝛough the bodie of the tyrant, and then ſerued all thoſe yonthes that were aboute him with the lyke ſawce, they making ſmall oꝛ no reſiſtance at all.

The bruite of this murder was quickly blowen abroade thoꝛoughe all Irelande, and the Princes readye to catche holde on ſuche aduauntage, roſe in armes wyth one aſſente in purpoſe to delyuer themſelues from bondage, and recouer libertie.

All Meathe and Leyniſter were ſpeedyly got together, reſoꝛtyng vnto Omalaglilen the authour of this practiſe, who lyghtly lept to horſſe, and commending their foꝛwarde readyneſſe in ſo naturall a quarrell, ſayd: My loꝛdes and frends, this caſe neyther admitteth delaye, noꝛ requireth a policie, Harte and haſte is all in all, whyleſt the matter is freſhe and greene, and that ſome of oure enimies lye ſtill and ſleepe, ſome lamente, ſome curſe, ſome are togither in counſell, and all the whole number diſmayed, lette vs preuente theyr furye, diſmember theyr force, cut off their flyght, ſeyſe vppon theyr places of refuge and ſuccoure. It is no victoꝛie to plucke their feathers, but to breake their neckes: not to chaſe them in, but to roufe them out: to weede them, not to rake them: not to treade them downe, but to rote them vp. This leſſon the tyraunt himſelfe did teache me: I once demaunded of him as it were in a parable, by what good huſbandrie the lande might be ridde of certayne rauening fowles that anoyed it. He aduyſed vs to watch, where they bredde, and to hyre their neſts aboute their eares. Goe wee then vpon theſe Cozmozantes whyche ſhowde themſelues in oure poſſeſſions, and let vs ſo deſtroye them, that neyther neſt noꝛ rote, neyther ſeede noꝛ ſtalke, neyther braunche noꝛ ſtumpe ſhall remayne of this vngratious generation.

The perſuaſion of Omalaglileñ.

Scarce hadde he ended his tale, but that wyth greate ſhoutes and clamoures they extolled the Kyng, as defendoure of theyr lyues and libertyes, aſſuring hym both of theyr bolde and hardye ſtomackes and ſpeedfull expedition ioyned with theyr confederates, and with a runnyng Canpe ſwepte euerye cozner of the lande, raſed the Caſtelles to the grounde, chaſed away the ſtraungers, ſhewe all that abode battayle, eche man recouerynge hys owne, wyth the ſtate of gouernement.

Thus in effecte haue the Iriſh writers reꝛted of Turgeſius a Noꝛwegian, whether he did reygne before the ſuppoſed tyme of Gurmond, oꝛ whether that hee came thyther as Lieue-tenaunt to him, whiche if it ſhoulde bee true, no doubte the ſame Gurmonde was ſome Kyng of the Danes, or Norweygians, and not of the Affricanes, (as ſome of our countreymen name hym.) Which errour is ſone committed, Gurmonde. in takyng one Heatheniſhe nation for an other, as thoſe haue done that haue named the Hungarians (when they inuaded Gallia before they were Chriſtians) Sarazins: And ſo lykewyſe might that authour (who ſo euer he was) whom Geffrey of Monmouth followeth, fynding Gurmonde written to be a king of the myſcreantes, miſtake the Norwegians for Affricanes, becauſe both thoſe nations were Infidels: and therefore ſith haply the Affricanes in the dayes when that Author lyued, bare al the brute aboue other Heatheniſhe nations then, as the Turkes do nowe, he named them Africanes.

Howe ſoeuer it was, certayne it is, that the Danes or Norwegians made ſundrie inuaſions into Irelande, and that at ſeuerall tymes. But for Turgeſius, whether hee were an abſolute Kyng, or but a Lieutenant of ſome armye, vnder ſome other king named Gurmonde, or peraduenture Gormo, (as ſuche names are ſone corrupted,) I can not affirme, becauſe that no certayne tyme is ſette downe in the Chronicles, whyche are written of thoſe Nations, whereby they maye bee ſo reconciled together, as ſuffiſeth to warrant any lykely coniecture in this behalfe.

But if I ſhoulde ſaye, (with the Readers licence) what I thinke, this Gurmonde what ſo euer he was, made no ſuche conqueſt of Irelande nor of this our Ile of Britayn (as by ſome writers is ſuppoſed:) but yet myght he peraduenture lande in Wales, and eyther in fauoure of the Saxons, then enimyes to the Britons, or in hatred of the Chriſtian name, perſecute by cruell warres the Britiſhe nation, and vſe ſuche crueltie as the Heatheniſhe nations then were accuſtomed to practiſe agaynſt the Chriſtians, in all places where they came, and chaunced to haue the vpper hande. The chiefeſt cauſe that moueth me to doubte therof, is for that I fynd not in any of our approued auncient Engliſhe writers, as Bede, Malmeſburye, Huntingdon, Houeden, or ſuche lyke, anye playne mention made of hym, whereby I may be throughly induced to credite that whyche I fynde in Geffrey Monmouth and others, recorded of hym, except his name be miſtaken, and ſo therby ſome errour crept in, which I am not able to reſolue.

But ſith we are entred to ſpeake thus farre of the Norwegians, heere by the waye I haue thoughte it not impertinente to the purpoſe of thys Iriſhe hiſtorie to write what wee fynde recorded in the Chronicles of thoſe northernlye Regions Denmarke, Norwey, and Sweden, written by Saxo Grammaticus, Albertus Crantz, and others, concernyng the ſundry inuaſions made by the Danes, Norweygians or Normans, (whether we lyſt to cal them) into Irelande. Alber. Crantz, Saxo Gram.

Fridley or Fridleuus king of Denmarke, that ſucceeded Dan the thirde of that name, ſurnamed the ſwift, arriuing in Irelande, beſieged the citie of Dublyn, and perceyuing by the ſtrength of the walles, that it wold be an hard matter to wynne it by playne force of hand without ſome cunning policie, he deuiſed to catche a ſorte of ſwallowes that had made their neſtes in the houſes within the towne, tyed wylde fire to their wyngs, and therwith caſte them vp, and ſuffered them to flye their wayes, wherupon they comming to their neſtes, ſet the houſes on fire, whiche whyles the citizens went aboute to quenche, the Danes entred the citie, and wanne it. Fridleuus. Dublyn beſieged. Dublyn ſet on fyre, and vvon by the Danes.

Secondly

Secondly, Frotho King of Denmarke, the thirde of that name, after he had ſubdued the Britons here in this Ile, made a voyage into Ireland alſo, where hee landed with ſome daunger, for the Iriſhmen had ſtrawed all alongſt ẏ ſhore a great number of Caltroppes of iron, with ſharp prickes ſtanding vp to wounde the Danes in the feete as they ſhoulde come forth of theyr Ships to follow them, for they meant to flee of a pretẽded policie for that purpoſe. But Frotho perceyuing their deceytfull craft, followed them more aduiſedly than raſhly, and ſo put their Captayne named Keruill to flighte, and ſlewe him in the fielde, whoſe brother remaynyng in life, and miſtruſting his owne puiſſance, yeelded hymſelfe to Frotho, who deuiding ẏ pray amõgſt his Soudiers and men of warre, ſhewed thereby, that hee only ſought for glory, and not for gayne, referuing not a peny of all the ſpoyle to his owne vſe. After this, in the dayes of king Frotho the fourth of that name, which raigned ouer the Danes, one Starcater a Giant, in cõpany of Haco a Daniſh Captaine, made a iourney likewiſe into Ireland, where in the ſame ſeaſon, one Huglet raigned as Monarke ouer that Ile, who hauing plentie of treaſure, was yet ſo giuen to couetouſneſſe, that by ſuch vnprincely partes as he played, to ſatiſfie his gredy deſire to fill his cofers, he became ryght odible, and farre out of all fauor with his ſubiects, yet there were of his nobles, very valiaunte and worthy men, namely two, Gegathus, and Suibdauus: wherevpon, when it came to paſſe that he ſhoulde ioyne in battell with his enimies the Danes, the moſt parte of all his people fledde out of the fielde, ſo that Gegath and Suibdaue were in maner left alone: for they regarding their honors and dutie that appertayned to menne of their calling, woulde not flee, but manfully dyd what lay in theyr powers, to beate backe the enimies, in ſo much, that Gegathus raught Haco ſuch a wound, that the vpper part of his liuer appeared bare. Hee alſo wounded Starcather in the head righte ſore, ſo that in all his life dayes, he had not before that time receyued the like hurt, in the ende yet Huglet the Monarke of Irelande was ſlayne, and Starcather obteyning the victory, made greate ſlaughter of the Iriſhe ſubiectes the which had followed their King to this battell, being menne through his corrupt example and ſlouthfull trade of lyfe, degenerate from all warlike order and vſe of manlike exercyſe.

Keruil gouernor of the Iriſhme ſlayne.

After this, the Danes went to Dublin, which towne they eaſily tooke, and founde ſuche ſtore of riches and treaſure therein, that euery man hadde ſomuche as hee coulde wiſhe or deſire, ſo as they needed not to fall out among themſelues for the partition, ſith there was ſo muche for each mans ſhare as hee coulde conueniently carrie away.

Dublin wonne

Thus hath Saxo Grammaticus written in effect of Starcaters comming into Irelande, of whome the Daniſh writers make ſuch mention, both for his huge ſtature and greate manhode. Some haue thoughte, that Starcater was the very ſame man whiche the Scottes name Finmackcole, of whome in the Scottiſhe Hiſtorie we haue made mention: but where as the Scottiſh writers affirme that he was a Scottiſhman borne, the Daniſh writers reporte that hee was borne in Eaſtlande, among the people called Eſtones.

Reignirus the ſonne of Siwardus, the ſecond King of Denmarke, hauyng atchieued ſundry victories in England and Scotlande, and ſubdued the Iſles of Orkney, hee paſſed likewiſe into Irelande, ſlewe Melbricke King of that lande, and tooke the Citie of Dublin by ſiege, where hee remayned the whole tearme of twelue moneths before he departed from thence.

Reignirus.

Melbrick K. of Irelande ſlayne.

Gurmo the third of that name king of Denmarke.

He marieth Thira daughter to Ethelred King of Englande. Canute and Harolde.

After this, Gurmo the third of that name king of Denmarke, although an Infidell hymſelfe, and a cruell perſecuter of the Chriſtian Religion, yet toke to wife a Chriſtian Ladie named Thyra, daughter to Etheldred King of Englād, who had iſſue by him two ſonnes Knaught, or Canute, and Harold, proning men of high valiancie and notable prowes, in ſo muche, that after the atchieuing of dyuers worthy victories againſte the enimies neere houne, they made a voyage into Englande, not ſparing to inuade the Dominions of theyr Graundfather King Etheldred, who rather reioycing, than ſeeming to be offended with thoſe manlike enterpriſes of his couſins, proclaymed them hys heyres to ſucceede after hym in all hys landes and dominions, although of ryghte, the ſame were to deſcende fyrſt vnto theyr mother Thira.

They inuade Irelande. Canute is ſayne.

The yong menne beeyng encouraged with theyr Graundfathers bountifull magnificence, attempted the inuaſion of Irelande, where at the ſiege of Dublin, Canute or Knought the elder brother was ſhotte into the body with an arrowe and dyed of the wounde, howbeit, hys deathe was kept cloſe by hys owne commaundemente gyuen before hee dyed, till hys people hadde gote the Citie into their poſſeſſion. But the gayne was ſmall in reſpect of the loſſe whiche was thoughte to redounde vnto the whole Daniſhe nation by the deathe of that noble yong Gentleman Canute, who for hys high prowesſe and valiancie was moſt tenderly beloued of all menne, but namely, of his father King Gormo, in ſo muche, that hee ſware to kill hym with hys owne handes who ſo euer ſhoulde firſt tell hym newes of hys deathe.

The policie of Thira to ſignifie to hir husband the death of theyr ſonne Canute.

This Gormo was nowe a man farre ſtriken in age, and blinde, hauyng ſmall ioy of anye worldly pleaſures otherwiſe, than to heare of the welfare & proſperous proceedings of his ſonnes. When therefore hys wife Queene Thira hadde perfect aduertiſemente of hir ſonnes deathe, and that neyther ſhe nor any other durſt breake the matter vnto hir husbande, ſhe deuiſed a ſhifte how to ſignifie that to hym by outwarde ſignes, whyche by worde of mouth ſhe was afrayde to expreſſe, as thus, She cauſed mourning apparell to be made for hir husbande, and putting off hys royall robes, cladde hym therewith, and other thyngs appertayning to mourners, ſhe alſo put about hym, and prepared all ſuche furniture and neceſſaries as were vſed for funerall exequies, witneſſing the lamentable griefe conceyued for the loſſe of ſome friende, with that kinde of mourning weede and funerall ceremonies. Whiche when Gurmo perceyued: Woe is mee (ſaith hee) you then ſignifie the death of my ſonne Canute. Whereunto ſhee made aunſwere, that hee and not ſhee dyd diſcouer the trueth of that whiche was meante by thoſe mourning garmentes, and with that ſpeeche miniſtred cauſe of hir husbandes deathe, whereby ſhee became preſently a Widdowe, not openly mourning for hir ſonne, before ſhee mourned likewiſe for hir husbande: for hee toke ſuche griefe for Canutes deathe, that immediately he dyed through ſorowe and dolor, ſo as Thyra was thus driuen to lamente, as well the deathe of hir ſonne, as of hir husbande both at once: but nowe to the purpoſe of the Iriſh hiſtorie.

Gurmo dyeth of ſorowe.

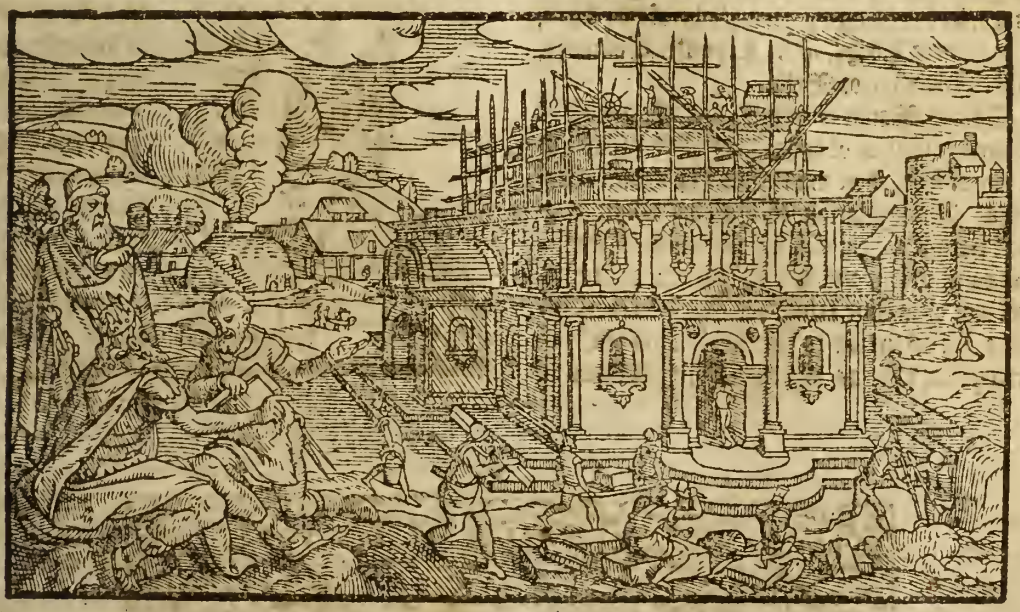
Yee haue thus partly heard what the Daniſhe writers doe recorde in their hiſtories touchyng the Conqueſtes whych theyr people made in Irelande, but whether the ſame bee meante of that whyche goeth before, or rather of that whiche followeth, touchyng the trade whyche the Norwegian Merchauntes vſed thither, or whether the Iriſhe writers haue paſſed theſe iourneys ouer with ſilence whiche the Daniſhe writers in forme (as before is touched) doe make mention of, I cannot affirme: But lyke it is that as the Danes, or Normans, whether you will call them, dyd inuade Irelande as well as England, France, and Scotlande, in thoſe days, according to the reporte of theyr writers, and that by way of open warre, as well to conquere the countrey, as to take praye, priſoners and booties, and not for trade of Merchandiſe, onely albeit that they myghte peraduenture ſo get entrie at the firſte, as by the Iriſh hiſtories it ſhould ſeeme they dyd ſhortly after the ſlaughter of Turgeſius, and afterwards when they ſaw themſelues ſetled, and perceyued that they beganne to growe to be enuyed of their Iriſhe neyghbors, who therevpon woulde not ſticke to moleſt them as occaſions ſerued, they ſaw no better meane to aſſure themſelues againſt their aduerſaries, than to ſend vnto their cōtreymen, which in thoſe dayes roued abrode (as before I haue ſaid) in euery quarter of this our weſt Ocean, wayting for opportunitie to aduance their conqueſts in each countrey where any thing might be gotte: and ſo this may agree very well with the Iriſhe writers, whome as I do not take vppon me to controll, but rather to report the hiſtorie as I find it by them writte, I will proceede with the order whiche they followe. After the countrey was deliuered of the tyrannie wherewith it was oppreſſed by the ſame Turgeſius and his people Danes or Norwegiās whether they were (for ſo Cambrenſis eſteemeth them) the Iriſhe deliuered of ſeruile bondage, fell to their old wonted vomit, in perſecuting each other: and hauing lately defaced theyr fortifyed Townes and Caſtels, as receptacles & couertes for the enimie, all ſides lay more open to receyue harme.

This

This beeing perceyued and throughly conſidered, the Princes that in ỹ late rule of Turgeſius, had eſpied ſome towardneſſe to wealth & eaſe, fell in hand to diſcourſe the madneſſe and folly of their auncęſtors, whiche ſawe not the vſe of that which their enimies abuſed, they begunne to loth their vnquiet trade of life, to will eyther leſſe diſcord, or more ſtrēgth in each mans dominion, to eaſt the danger of naked countreys, ready to eaſt in the enimies, as the ſtrength of fortes and Caſtels was a meane to preſerue them from loſſe. Fayne would they haue prouided remedie in this caſe, if they had knowne how.

The former ſubiection, though it ſeemed intollerable, yet they felt therein proceeding ſteppes towards peace. The gayne that roſe of Merchādiſe, reſt and ſuretie to the whole eſtate of the Countrey. For the differēce was great betwixt the endeuors of the two nations, Norwegians and Iriſh.

The firſt knew the way to thriue, might they get ſome commodious ſeates and ſoyle. The other had commodities plentie, and cared not for them.



While the Princes and Potentates ſtayed vpon ſuche a good conſideration, certayne Merchants of Norway, Denmarke, & of other thoſe parties, called Oſtomanni, (or as in our bulgar lāguage wee tearme them Eaſterlings) becauſe they lie Eaſt in reſpect of vs, although indeede they are by other named properly Normans, and partly Saxons, obteyned licence ſafely to arriue here in Ireland with their wares, and to vtter the ſame.

Eaſterlings began to trade into Irelande.

Herevpon, the Iriſh, through traffike and bartering with theſe Normans or Danes, (for ſo are they called alſo in our Engliſh Chronicle, by exchanging of wares and money) finding them ciuill and tractable, and delting alſo with gay conceyts, brought in to them by thoſe Merchāts, (ſuch, as till they ſawe them) they neuer eſteemed needefull, they began to enter into a deſire, that a trade might be open betwixt them, and the other nations, whereupon, to allure other, they licenced theſe Merchāt ſtrangers to build, if they thought good, hauen Townes in places moſt commodious: this was no ſooner graunted, than begunne, and with ſpeede finiſhed.

They builde townes on the Sea coaſts.

Amlanus founded Waterforde, Sutarcus, Waterforde, Limerick, Inorus, Dublin: ſo by others diuers other townes were built as leaſure ſerued.

Then by the help and counſell of theſe men, many Caſtels, Fortes, Steeples, and Churches euery where were repaired. And thus are the Iriſhe mingled alſo with the bloud of the Danes, Norwegians or Normans, who from thenceforth continually flocked into Irelande, to the greate commoditie of the inhabitants, liuing amongſt them obediently, till welth pricked and moued them to reyſe rebellion, but they could not haue holden out, had not the conqueſt enſuing determined both their quarrels. In the meane while they became Lordes of the hauens and burrowe townes, planted men of warre in the ſame, and oftentimes ſkirmiſhed with their aduerſaries, but yet meaſured their fortune with indifferent gain, and crept no higher than the ſame would gyue them leaue, onely a memorie is left of their fielde in Clontars, where diuers of the Iriſhe nobilitie were ſlayne, that lie buried before the Croſſe of Kylmaynā. Theſe are by our author not without good iudgemēt reported to be Danes, which people then beeing Paganes, ſore afflicted Englande, and after that France, from whence they came again into England with William Conqueror, ſo that thoſe people called Oſtomanni, Eſterlings, Normās, Danes, Norwegiās, & Sueueners, are in effect al one nation, borne in ỹ huge

The Eaſterlings will be called Normans.

Long before this tyme (as ye haue heard) Irelande was beſtowed into two principall kingdomes, and ſometime into more, whereof one was euer elected and reputed to be chiefe, and as it were a Monarke, whome in their Hiſtories they name Maximum Regem, that is, the greateſt King, or elſe without addition, Regem Hiberniæ, the King of Ireland, the other they name Reguli or Reges, that is to witte, ſmall Kings, or elſe kings, by limitting the places wherof they were, to be reputed Kings, as of Leynſter, Connagh, Ulſter, Monſter, or Meth.

The seconde Booke of the Histories of Irelande, in which the conquest made by Henry the second of that name, King of Englande, is comprehended.

Ermucius or Dermote Macmurche Kyng of Leynister, and gouernor of the fifte parte of Irelande, possessed all ẏ East partes of the Ile alõgst by ẏ Sea coast, an oppressor of the nobilitie, vsing much cruelties towardes the Lords and great men of his countrey. To serue his lecherous lust, hee secretely made sute in dishoneste wise vnto the Queene of Meth, the daughter of Amalachelmus, and wife vnto Moyice King of Meth, which Moyice going vpon a iourney into farre parts forth of his countrey, left his Queene in a certayne ile in Meth, but before his returne, shee condiscending vnto Dermotes desire, was voluntarily stolne away by the same Dermucius. King Moyice of Meth hir husband sore moued herewith, determineth to bee reuenged, and the better to bring his purpose to passe, he maketh complaynte of the whole iniurie vnto Rotherick Ochonor King of Connagh, that was in those dayes Monarke of Ireland, beseeching him of assistance in that enterprise, which he meant to take in hand against that vile adulterer Kyng Dermote. The people of Leynister detesting the quarrell, and hauing long agoe conceyued no small hatred against theyr K. for his outragious crueltie vsed against his subiects, forsooke hym in his greatest necessitie, so that hee being left desolate of all comforte, with muche difficultie gote a vessell, and fledde for succour vnto Henry the second King of Englande then remayning in Aquitayne, where hee was occupied in warres against the Frenchmen.

Somewhat before this presente season it chaunced, that Adrian, the fourth of that name, then Pope of Rome, an Englishman borne, in the towne of Saint Albons, who before time had bin sente into Norway, to instruct that lande in the Christian religion, where he learned perfectly the state of Ireland, & how that although Christ was there taught and beleeued, yet the multitude being a furious and sauage generation, were growen to suche a licentious and shamefull kinde of libertie, making no accounte of the necessarie pointes of doctrine, more than serued their sensuall and wilfull lustes, that it was greatly to bee doubted, least they would at length vtterly abandon Christianitie, and giue themselues ouer to a beastly order of liuing, nothing agreeable with the lawes and rites of other people that professed Christes Religion.

Adrian the fourth Bishop of Rome an Englishman borne.

Hereto Henry the second, presuming vpon the Popes fauour, that was his borne subiect in the very first yeere of his raigne, had sente Ambassadors to Rome for licence, to attempt the conquest of Irelande. Pope Adrian wishing that a reformation of the abuses in that people might be had, granted his Bull for proofe of his consent to king Henries request, which Alexander that succeeded him confirmed and ratifyed with like conditions as his predecessor Adrian had giuẽ forth ẏ same.

Henry the second of that name King of England.

Now when Dermote was come in the nicke to further by occasion this enterprise thus pretended by Henry afore hand, hee presented his complaint, profering the interest of his Crowne, with condition hee might be restored to some parte of his lands.

The offer of Dermucius to king Henry

See more here in England.

This matter beeyng thus broched, although King Henry had his handes full of warres with the Frenchmen, yet hee receyued Dermote into his protectiõ, taking of him both his bond of subiection and othe of fidelitie: and where the Kyng coulde not then attende to goe with hym ouer into Irelande, yet, because of the earnest suite that Dermote made, for speede of assistaunce hee sente him into Englande, honorably attended and furnished with hys letters patents, the tenor whereof ensueth.

Henry King of Englande, Duke of Normandy, and Aquitaine, and Earle of Anion, to all our faithfull subiects Englishmen, Normãs, Welchmen, and Scottes, and to all other nations whatsoeuer subiecte to our Dominion, sendeth greeting.

The tenor of King Henries letters with the whiche Dermote returneth into England.

When these letters shall come to your handes know ye that we haue receyued Dermot, Prince of Leynister, into ỳ bolome of our grace and benevolence. Wherefore, whiche of you soeuer oure louing subiects within the limits of our dominions, will imploy your aids to help him forward, and reckon him as our liege man and faithfull subiect, be you assured by these presentes, to haue not only in that behalfe our licence, but also fauour and thankes at our handes. With these letters and many further promises, hee arriued at Bristow, where he remayned for a time, that by suche as came forthe of Irelande by Sea and landed there, hee might learne and vnderstande in what state thyngs stode in hys countrey.

He commeth to Bristowe.

While he continued thus at Bristowe, procuring by all meanes to get some ayde, it chanced, that vppon conference hadde with Richarde Strangbowe Earle of Penbroke, sonne to Gilbert Earle of Penbroke, to whome he couenanted to giue to him his daughter and heire in mariage, vppon promise, that the nexte Spring hee shoulde helpe to bring hym home into his countrey, and place hym agayne in hys Kingdome, whyche in remaynder was, to distend vnto the sayde Earle, by the marriage promised to him of Dermots daughter.

When all the couenauntes and agreementes were concluded vpon in order, whyche were necessary to passe betwixte them, Dermote departed from Bristowe, and wente into the parties of South Wales towardes Sainte Dauies, that hee myght bee the neerer vnto hys Countrey.

The same tyme, there were planted in Wales two Gentlemen, the one named Roberte Fitz Stephens, and Maurice Fitz Geralde, brethren of one Mother, alied to Rise ap Griffin then Prince of Wales, whose Grandfather was surnamed Rise the greate, whose daughter named Vesta, was Mother to the sayd Fitz Stephans, and Fitz Gerald.

Fitz Stephãs dwelled at Aberteiui in Southwales, and had bin high Connestable there vnder the King of England, and for his rigorous dealing against the Prince of Wales his seruantes, hee was layde for, and through treason of hys owne menne taken, and kepte in prison three yeeres by the Prince, and woulde neyther raunsome nor accept libertie promised him, but with suche conditions as stode with his honor, and so as his loyaltie to the Crowne myght in each behalfe remayne vnspotted. At length, by the mediation of Dauid Bishop of Sainte Dauid (that was brother vnto the said Fitz Stephans) and of his other brother Fitz Gerald, and also at the instante suite of Dermote (whome the Prince of Wales fauored in his enterprise for recouerie of his Kingdome,) Fitz Stephans was conditionally deliuered, that hee and his brother Maurice shoulde the next Spring (while the Earle of Penbroke prouided his army) assist Dermote to make entrie into his countrey, who in consideration thereof, assured them of an estate for euer in the towne of Wexforde, with two cantredes adioyning. Thus muche firmely concluded on eache side, King Dermote came to the towne of Saint Dauid about the Kalendes of August, and watching till a fauorable winde blewe, when the same came once about, hee stale ouer into Irelande and at Fernes wintered in secrete wise amongst the Cleargie there, that receyued hym with as muche fauour as coulde bee deuised, keeping hym close without making any greate bruite of his there being, till the next spring, that Robert Fitz Stephans with thirtie Knightes of his bloud, threescore Esquires or men at armes (as wee may learne them) and three hundred archers footemen, according to couenaunte, embarqued in three Shippes, passed ouer, and landed at Bannian about the kalendes of May.

The morrowe after their arriuall, a righte valiaunte Captayne, one Maurice de Prendelgast, following Fitz Stephans to the ayde of King Dermote, landed there also with a tenne Knightes, and a good bande of Archers, whome hee hadde Shipped at Millefordе Hauen in Wales in two vessels prouided for that purpose.

Dermote aduertised of their landing, forthwith sente one of his base sonnes named Dunwalde with fiue hundred menne to ayde them, whereupon they marched forth toward the towne of Wexforde.

Dunwald bastard sonne to Dermote.

The Townesmen vnderstanding that they were comming towardes them, issued forthe against them: but after they were aware of suche a power of armed menne, set in order of battell, diuerslie arrayed and weaponed, with barded Horses, and all other furniture of warre necessarie, they began to shrinke, and losing courage, retired backe to their Towne, brenning the Villages rounde about them, and all the prouision of victayles which they could not conuey with them, they made themselues within so strong as they coulde deuise, and stode manfully at defence of theyr gates and walles agaynste theyr enimies.

They were sharply assayled for the space of three dayes togither.

On the fourth day, by mediation of a certaine Bishop that lay in that Towne, the Townesmen were perswaded to yeeld themselues to their King, so that they rendred the Towne into hys handes.

Wexforde yeelded.

King Dermote hauing seene the proofe of the Welchmens prowes, meante not to deale with with them otherwiſe than promiſe, and therefore deliuered forthwith the poſſeſſion of the towne of Werforde, with the appurtenances, vnto Fitz Stephan and to hys brother Maurice Fitz Geralde.

To Heruie de Monte Mauriſco, he gaue two Cantheedes that lie betwixt ẏ townes of Werforde and Waterfourde, alongſt by the Sea ſide, to hold the ſame in fee.

After this, they gote togither to the number of three thouſand mẽ, with the ſupply of ẏ townemen of Werforde, and marched forth towardes the vpper Oſſorie, to be reuenged of the Lordes there, that had ſhewed themſelues moſt cruell and ſpitefull of all other towards the king in time of his troubles and baniſhment.

The chiefe gouernour of that quarter named Duncuald, gathering togither the people to defende their countrey, was trayned forth into the playnes and harde grounde, where with a violent charge of the horſemen, his army was eaſily diſcomfited and broken in peeces, ſo that the Iriſhe footemen following, and comming in among them, ſlew thoſe that they found borne downe by the horſemen, and brought two hundred of theyr heads whiche they had cut off, and threw them downe at Dermote his fote. The valiancie of two yong Gentlemen appeared greatly in thys exployt, the one called Robert de Barre, and the other Meiller, both Nephewes to Fitz Stephan, the one by hys brother, and the other by hys ſiſter.

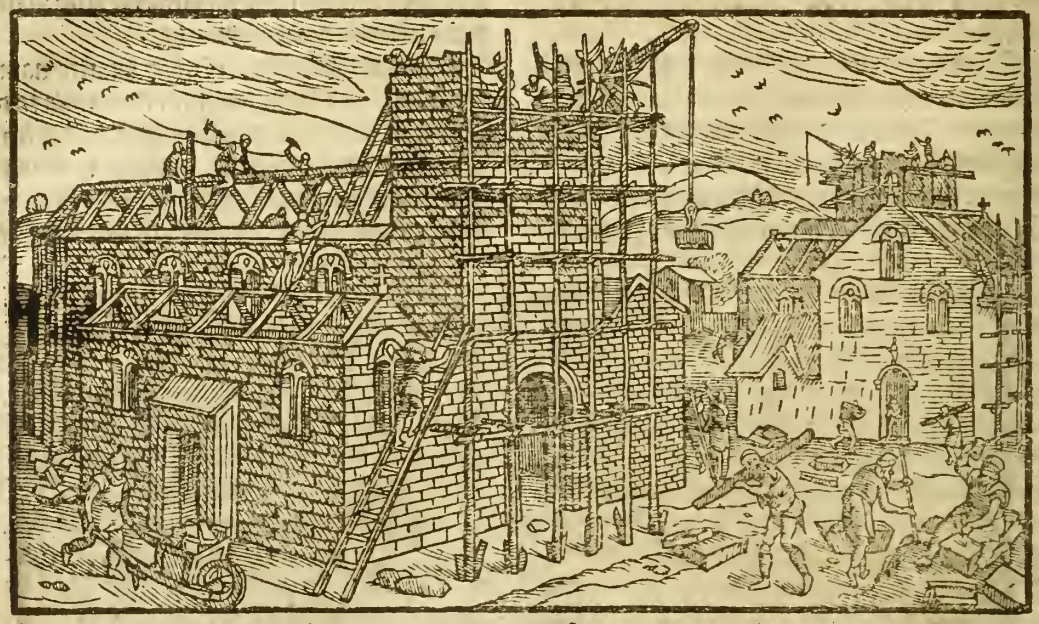
To be ſhorte, thoſe Lordes of vpper Oſſorie, were cõpelled to returne to their olde ſubiection, & ſweare fealtie. Roderike the Monarke appalled with the brute hereof, reyſed all the vnder Kings to defend the land from this inuaſiõ of ſtrangers, fearing leaſt all would goe to naughte, if timely prouiſion were not had. But yet firſt they ſent to Fitz Stephan certaine perſonages of credite, with courteous wordes and riche preſentes, requiring him to depart the land quietly, and not to moleſt them by warre without cauſe. His anſwer was, that he marueiled much at ẏ folie of thoſe Princes, who to ſatiſfie their diſpleaſure and malice, had opened ſuch a gappe to their owne deſtructiõ, not conſidering howe the ſubiectes whome they had ſchooled to breake their allegaunce anenſt theyr naturall Prince the King of Leyniſter, would not be as ready to rebell againſt the King of Connagh. But for his owne parte, although hee myghte with better reaſon inuade ſtraungers, than they mighte expell theyr neyghbours, and one that was their paire, yet if they would ſuffer the Kyng of Leyniſter to repoſſeed and enioy hys right, they ſhoulde not hynde hym vnreaſonable. Otherwiſe, they ſhoulde well perceyue, that the Welchmen wanted neyther habilitie nor faithe to mayneteyne theyr worde.

Welchmen.



Roderieke perceyuing it was no bote to ſtriue againſte the ſtreame, reſolued to growe vnto ſome agreemente, whiche at length was concluded, with theſe conditions. Firſte, that Dermote Macmourche, receyuing a newe othe of allegeance to the Monarchie, ſhould quietly repoſſeſſe thoſe partes of the Kingdome of Leyniſter, whyche Roderieke withheld by ſuſpenſion.

The agreemente betwixt Roderike and Dermote.

Secondly, that for aſſurance thereof, hee ſhoulde pledge hys deereſt bale begotten ſonne Conthurus, to whome Roderieke promiſed hys daughter if this peace continued effectuall.

Thirdlye, that beeyng eſtabliſhed in hys Kingdome, hee ſhoulde diſcharge the Welche Armye, and from thenceforthe, ſhoulde at no time call them ouer againe in his defence. About the ſame time, the King of Argias founded the Abbey of Melleſunt, the eldeſt that is recorded ſince the arriuall of the Danes, excepte Sainte Mary Abbey belyde Dublin erected. Anno.948.

Maurice Fitz Gerald landed at Wexforde.

In this meane while, there landed at Wexford, Maurice Fitzgerald, with .x. knightes. xxx. Eſquires, and an hundred good bowmen. Hereupon K. Dermote greatly encouraged, purpoſed with all ſpeede to ſeeke his reuenge againſte them of Dublin, that had ſhewed themſelues great enimies diuers wayes, both to him and his father. He aſſembled therefore his power togither, and marched toward Dublin, whileſt Fitz Stephen remayned two miles from Wexforde, where on the height of a Rocke called Karreck, hee built a Caſtell. But Fitzgerald with the Engliſh army went forth with King Dermote againſte Dublin, hauing the chiefe conduct of all the whole enterpriſe. They ſo beſturred them, that all the territorie about the Citie, and the countreys adioyning, were in manner brought to vtter ruine, with ſpoyle, ſlaughter, and fire, in ſomuche, that the townesmen of Dublin, perceyuing in what daunger they ſtode, ſubmitted them ſelues, and put in good ſuretie for their loyall demeanor in time to come.

Dublin ſubdued.

When Dublin and the Countrey about were thus recouered and reduced to their former ſubiection, there fell out variance betwixt Rodorike the Monarke, and Dunenald King of Limerik. To whoſe ayde his father in lawe Dermote ſent Fitz Stephans with his power, by whoſe high prowes, Roderike in diuers conflictes was put to the worſt, and forced to withdrawe home into his countrey with diſhonor.

Variance betwixt the Monark and the king of Lymerike.

Nowe was Dermote growen into ſome fauor and liking of his people, inſomuche that hee began to fancie a further conqueſt, hauing alreadye recouered his whole kingdome of Leymſter. And becauſe he knewe it ſhoulde be to ſmall purpoſe to attempt any ſuch thing, without the help of his Engliſh confederates, hee conſulted with the two brethren Fitzſtephans, and Fitzgerald, about the inuading of Connagh, for hee meante to giue a puſh for the obteining of that countrey, with the whole monarchie of Ireland, and for as much as hee founde them ready to further him in that enterpriſe, he wrote ouer into England vnto ỳ Erle of Penbroke, requiring his aſſiſtãce, in renuing ỳ former couenants paſſed betwixt thẽ.

Dermucius ſendeth to the Earle of Penbroke.

This Erles anceſtors came into this Realme of Englãd with Willam Conqueror, but now eyther through riotous prodigalitie, or diſfauor of the Kings, they were runne farre behinde hand with the world, and therefore this man gaue the more willing eare vnto Dermots letters, & thereupon paſſed ouer to the King, beſeeching him eyther to reſtore him to ſuch landes as he withheldе of his, or elſe licẽce him in forraigne parts to ſeke his fortune. The King as one ỳ ſpake in ſcorne, bade bade him go forward in the name of God ſo farre as his feete woulde beare him.

The Earle diſſembling to vnderſtand the hollowneſſe of the Kings heart and good will towardes his preferment, firſt furniſhed forth hys couſin Reymond le Grace, nephew by an elder brother vnto Fitz Stephans, and Fitz Geralde, with .x. knightes and .lxx. Archars about the Kalendes of May, appoynting him to paſſe ouer before him into Irelande. Who landing neare to a rocke by the Sea ſide called Dundenolfe (foure myles from Waterforde, towarde Wexforde by ſouth) began there on the ſayde rocke to buylde a Fort of earth and fagots. The Citizins of Waterforde, and with them Machlachelin Ophelan hauing in a ielouſie the neighborhood of ſtraungers, aſſembled togither three thouſand men and paſſed ouer the ryuer that deuideth the Countrey of Deſmound from Leyniſter vnder their towne walles towardes the Eaſt, and deuiding themſelues into three battails marched forth, and valiantly approched to the ditches where Reymonde with his companie was intrenched. Reymonde perceyuing them thus to approche, boldly iſſued forth agaynſt them with ſuch ſmall companie as he had there with him. Howbeit not able to make his partie good, he was forced to retyre vnto hys ſtrength, but beyng purſued vnto the very gates by the Iriſhe, thinking to enter with the Engliſhe men, Reymond at the very entring of the gate turned backe vppon them, and thruſt his ſworde through the firſt of his enimies that preſſed next to follow him at the heeles, and calling to his people to turne vpon the aduerſarie, he ſo encouraged his companye, and ſtroke ſuche a feare into the Iriſh mens hearttes, that they toke themſelues to flight, and were ſo egerly followed of their aduerſaries, that aboue fiue hundred of the were ſlaine, beſide a great number that were dryuen to take the ſea, where they were loſt & drowned

The Iriſh men diſcomfited.

The valiancie of one William Ferrando a knight was much noted in this conflict. Seuenty townſmen of Waterford were taken, and afterwardes (contrarie to the minde of Raymond) caſt into the ſea and drowned, through the perſwaſion of Heruie de Monte Mauriſco, in which doing the Engliſh men did great hurt to themſelues, for the aduauncement of their proceedings in Ireland. In the meane time the Erle of Pembroke hauing made all his prouiſion readie, toke the ſea in Mylforde hauen with two hundred knightes, and a thouſand other men of warre, and arriued at Waterforde on Bartholmewe euen, and the morow after Bartholmew day, being Tueſday, they aſſaulted the Citie, and were twiſe repulſed, but yet at length breaking downe an houſe that ioyned to the wall, they entred by force, and cleaſing the Citizins, obteyned a bloudie victorie.

Shortly after came king Dermote thither with Fitz Stephans and Reymonde, and there according to couenant, gaue vnto Erle Strangbow, his daughter Eue in mariage, with the ſucceſſion of his kingdome. When Waterford was thus gotten, and Leyniſter pacified, and the princes of Oſſorie tamed, and a choſen power of men of warre placed in gariſon, King Dermote was become ſo terrible that none durſt ſtyre agaynſt him.

Dermote not yet ſatisfyed in his minde agaynſt them of Dublin, got his army on foote, and drew towardes that Citie by the bending coaſtes of the Mountaynes of Glindelachan, auoyding the wayes that lay through the woodes, becauſe hee knew ỹ ſame to be beſet with his enimies. Therfore hauing ſtill in remembrance the iniurie done to his father, kept him out of the woods, hating the Citizins of Dublin chiefely becauſe they had trayterouſly ſlaine his father in tyme paſt, in the middeſt of a great houſe, whither they were wont to repayre as to a place where cauſes were vſually heard: and to adde a repꝛoche to their cruell murthering of their Pꝛince, they buried him togither with a dog. At the kings apꝛoch to the city, whileſt Imbaſſadoꝛs were ſent, and that by mediation of the Archbiſhoppe of that Citie named Laurence, a treatie of peace was in hande, while Reymond on the one ſide, and Myles Cogan a right valiant knight on the other, with their companies of yong luſtie ſoldiers aſſaulting ẏ walles fꝛthwith obteined the victoꝛie, not without great ſlaughter of the Citizens, the better part of them yet with Captaine Haſtulf got them to ſhipboꝛd with their beſt goods, & haſted thẽce vnto ẏ noꝛth Iles. Dermote hauing thus wonne the Citie of Dublyn, & ſet things in oꝛder there, he left Miles Cogan to gouern the ſame, & marched fꝛth togither with the Erle of Pẽbꝛoke, & the reſt of the army into Methe, & entred into the confines of that countrey, waſted & ſpoiled with fire & ſwoꝛde the whole region of Methe. Rotherike king of Connagh ſent vnto Dermote to put him in remembꝛance of the couenant paſſed betwixt them, & ſpecially to reſtraine the excurſions of the ſtrangers, that were in his companie, foꝛ elſe he would not faile to put to death his ſonne whom he had with him as a pledge. Which to do, when Dermote did not onely refuſe, but alſo declared plainly that he would not ſtay from purſuing his purpoſe, till he had ſubdued al Cõnagh, & obteyned the Monarchie of ẏ whole Ile appertaining to him by right diſcẽded frõ his anceſtors: Roderik taking indignatiõ wꝛeat, cauſed his ſõnes head to be ſtrikẽ off.

The Iriſh Clergie perceyuing in whar daunger the countrey ſtood, aſſembled thẽſelues togither at Ardmagh, and with one accoꝛd pꝛoteſted, that foꝛ their ſinnes, & ſpecially foꝛ their barbarous kind of tyꝛannie which they vſed in buying and ſelling, and vilely abuſing ſuch Engliſh captiues as they bought, aſwel of Merchants as Pirates, the land was now like to be tranſlated to that nation whõ they had ſo cruelly intreated. Theꝛfoꝛe to appeaſe the wꝛath of God, they decreed that all the Engliſh people whereſoeuer any of them remayned in ſeruitude within the Ile, ſhoulde fꝛthwith be releaſed, and if it pleaſed God to lay his ſcourge vpon them, they determined to ſuffer the ſame patiently, as a puniſhment a great way beneath the fulneſſe of their deſertes.

King Henry although he was well contented to ſo beare the preſence of the Erle of Pembꝛoke, yet he liked nothing at all to ſee him thus aduanced in Irelande, ſith he might in time atteyne to ſuch power there, that the ſame adioyned to hys faction in Wales, he ſhould be able to countenance the Cꝛowne of Englande. An Edict theꝛfoꝛe was made and publiſhed, charging all ſubiects to returne home into Englande befoꝛe Eaſter next, vpon peꝛill to foꝛfeyt landes and goodes, and to be baniſhed the Realme foꝛ euer. Alſo that none ſhoulde pꝛeſume to paſſe into Irelande from any of the Kings dominions by ſhippe, to conuey any wares oꝛ pꝛouiſions thither. Wherevpon Reymond was ſent ouer to ſpeake with the king, remayning as then in France. Whileſt he followed the Court, and the king lingring time to deſpatch him with anſwere, Thomas Archebiſhop of Canterburie was diſpatched out of life, as in the Engliſh Hiſtoꝛie is mentioned. 1171

Thus had the Iriſhe a bꝛeathing ſpace, and ſo continued all the Winter without any greate troubles, which ſeaſon being paſt, King Dermote Mac Mourche departed this life at Fernes, about the Kalendes of May, being a man well ſtriken in yeares.

The deceaſe of Dermote Mac Mourchie.

The ſame time, that is, about Whitſuntide, Haſtulfus that in times paſt had beene gouernoꝛ of Dublyn, with .lx. ſayle fꝛaught with Noꝛwegians and Iland men, arriued neare to Dublin, and landing his people vnder the gouernment of one that had the leding of thẽ, named John Henuode, a foꝛwarde man of warre, they pꝛepared themſelues to aſſault the Citie. They were well appoynted foꝛ the warre, clad in long habergeons oꝛ plate cotes cunningly wꝛought, with rounde targettes coloured redde, and bound about with a ring of yꝛon, ſo that both themſelues and theyꝛ weapons were couered with yꝛon. They aſſaulted the Citie at the Eaſt gate, but Miles Cogan then captain of that Citie manfully made a ſally fꝛth vpon the enimies, but not able to abyde the impreſſion of ſuche an huge multitude, having loſt part of his ſmall number, he was conſtrayned to retyꝛe backe into the Citie, till his bꝛother Richard Cogã iſſuing fꝛth wᵗ a few at the poſterne of the ſouthſide, ſet vpõ the enimies behind, raiſing ſuch a noiſe & hobub, ẏ ſtriken vpon a ſodain with a maruellous feare, they toke themſelues to flight, ſo that being fiercely purſued, ẏ moſt part of them were were ſlaine togither with Iohn Henuode theyr Captaine.

Haſthulf alſo as he woulde haue fledde to the ſhips, was ouertaken by one Manne Gili, and brought priſoner into the Citie. He was at the firſt courteoully vſed, but when he began arrogantly to forget himſelfe, vttering certaine preſumptuous ſpeeches, ſaying, well, we came now but with a ſmall power to trie what might bee done, this is but a beginning of a prouiſe made, for if God ſpare me life, greater attemptes ſhall follow. Theſe wordes comming to the knowledge of Myles Cogan, hee commaunded that he ſhould forthwith be brought to a blocke, where he was puſht downe and had his head ſwapped off: and ſo for his vntemperate tongue hee loſt his life, that otherwiſe with great curteſie had bin preſerued. His intemperate talke coſt him his life.

After this the Iriſhmen aſſembled theyr powers togyther on eche hande, ſo that with an infinit number of men they came and beſieged Dublin, at the procuring of Laurence Archbiſhop of that Citie, who vpon a zeale to his Countreymē trauayled earneſtly therein. Dublin beſieged.

Gothredus king of Man being writtē vnto, as well by the Archbiſhop, as by Rotherike king of Connagh, came to further this enterpriſe with other Iland men embarked in. xxx. ſhips fraught full of warlike people, and arriuing in the hauen of Hauenliph, came forwarde to cloſe vp the hauen of Dublin.

After that the Earle of Pembroke being ſhut vp within the walles of Dublin, had abyd the ſiege for the ſpace of two Monethes togither, and coulde recouer no vytayles for the releefe of hys people, ſo that famine began ſore to annoy them within: The malice of theyr enimies was not thus contented to moleſt the Engliſh men with keping them beſieged within Dublin, but Dunualde, Mac Dermicius or Dermote, alſo comming forth of the confines of Kencelie, got togither an armie (what of ſuche as he brought with him forth of Kencelie, and of the townelmen of Wexford) in all to the number of three thouſand, with which power hee enuironed Fitz Stephan that with a few lay within his Caſtel of Karree, and conſtrayned him ſo ſore, that he wrote vnto the Earle, aduertiſing him, that if he were not reſcued within three dayes, all ſuccour would come to late. There were beſieged within Dublyn in company of the Erle, Maurice Fitz Geralde and Reymonde that was lately returned from King Henrie: the one brother, and the other nephew to Fitz Stephan: wherevpon when aduertiſement was come in what daunger he ſtood, being ſo beſet of enimies that he might by no meanes eſcape without preſent reſcue, they vſed ſuch perſwaſion with the Earle, that it was reſolutely determined to make a ſally forth vpon the enimies, and to trie the hazarde of battaile, ſo to deliuer themſelues and other from inſtant perill: eyther with victorie or death, ſithe otherwiſe they knewe not howe to prouide remedie in ſuch deſperate ſtate of things. The beſieged determin to ſally forth vpō their enimies.

Herevpon they choſe forth a conuenient number to leaue behinde them in the Citie for the gard thereof, and with the reſidue marched forth, deuided into three troupes, the firſt being led by Reymonde accompanied with. xx. knightes. The ſeconde was gouerned by Myles, who had with him. xxx. knightes: and laſtly in the rereward went the Erle himſelfe, and Fitz Geralde, hauing with them. xl. knightes beſide other horſmen, and a fewe Citizens that were ioyned with them in eche of thoſe three wardes ſome: with ſo ſmall a cōpanie they manfully ſet vpon the whole campe of theyr enimies, being fewe leſſe than. xxx. thouſand, and ſo beſtyred themſelues, that with great ſlaughter they obteyned a glorious victorie, chaſing their enimies, and ſleaing them as they ouertooke them, till the euening came vpon them, and cauſed them to returne into the Citie with ſuch vytayles and other ſpoyles as they founde in the enimies campe. Rotherike being in his bane when the fight firſt began, got away as well as he might, and ſo eſcaped. A notable victorie gotten by a fewe agaynſt a great number.

The

The Engliſh men hauing thus got the victory and deliuered the citie quite from the ſiege on eche ſide, the next day leauing a competent gariſon within Dublin, they marched forth with their victorious enſignes towards Wexford to the ſuccor of Fitz Stephan, but before their comming he had yelded himſelf to the enimies: for cauſing him to beleeue by the aſſured report of the Biſhops of Wexford and Kildare, that Dublin was taken, & all the Engliſh men put to the ſworde, they perſwaded with him to yeelde before that the armies of Connagh and Leynſter came, promiſing that if he would commit himſelf vnto their fayth, they would ſee that he ſhoulde be ſafely conueyed ouer into Wales, and ſo eſcape the daunger of al other his enimies. But after he had yelded himſelf diuerſe of his people being ſlaine, the reſidue were beaten and maymed, and thruſt into priſon.

Fitz Stephan yeeldeth himſelfe to the enimies.

After this, the Iriſh hearing that the Engliſhe men were comming as victorers to the reſcue of their friends, they burnt their citie and fled to the Ile that lieth in the mouth of the hauen there called holy Iland, with al their riches, goodes, & captiues. In the meane time the Erle of Pembroke paſſing forth towards Wexford, was encountred at the paſe of Odrone by the army of Lynſter ỳ was got thither before him to defende the paſſage there againſt him. But ſuch was the force of the Engliſh power, though but a handfull in cõpariſon to the number of their aduerſaries, that with ſlaughter of a great number of the Iriſh, they got through into the plaines without any leſſe at all, except of one yong gentleman. In this cõflict the accuſtomed prowes of Meiller was ſufficiently apparãt. The Engliſhmẽ then drawing towards Wexford, & hearing what had chaũced vnto Fitz Stephans, they were highly diſpleaſed & troubled in mind, and forthwith turning on the right hand toward Waterford, where they found Hervey that was come from the king of Englãd, to whom he had bin ſent, and now vpon his returne, brought letters, by the tenor wherof he was authoriſed to perſwade the Erle to returne home into Englãd, who not only ſhewed the letters, but alſo in ſpeech vſed what perſwaſions he might to induce ỳ Erle to accompliſh the king's pleaſure. The Erle perceyuing the kings ielouſie ſtill to continue, & again how no ſmal part of his army was decayed through ſickneſs, & in deface of diuerſe good townes which king Roderik had aſſaulted, he determined to returne into Englande, & to ſeeke to pacifie the kings minde, ſo as he might purchaſe ſome aſſiſtance to go through with that he had begon touching the conqueſt of Ireland, and ſo hauing taken order for ỳ defence of thoſe places which were in his poſſeſſion, he paſſeth the ſea, and came to the king whom he found at Mytcham, not farre from Glocester redy there with an army to paſſe forward towards Ireland. Here after much talke and reaſoning of matters, by the mediation & interceſſion of Hervey, the Erle was reconciled to the kings fauor, yeelding to the king the chiefeſt parcels of all his winnings, as Dublyn with the Cauthredes adioyning, & all the townes & caſtels alongſt by the ſea ſide, and for the reſidue which it pleaſed the king to permit him to inioy, he couenanted to acknowledge that he helde the ſame of the king & his heyres for euer. Theſe things thus accorded, the K. toke his iourney directly towards Wilford hauen, where he rigged a goodly nauy of ſhippes. About this time the Abbay de caſtro dei was founded. In the meane time Ororike ſurnamed Monoculus, that is with the one eie, King of Methe, taking occaſion by the abſence of the Erle & alſo of Reymond that remained as yet at Waterforde about the kalendes of September, came to Dublin with a great multitude of men, and finding in the Citie but a few to defende it agaynſt him with great noyſe and violence aſſayled the walles and rampyres, in hope to haue entred by fine force at the firſt aſſault: but Myles Cogan gouernour of the Citie, although he had no great number to make account of about him at that preſent, yet knowing that thoſe few which he had, were men of approued manhode, ſallyed forth, and ſetting vpon the enimies on the ſodain, made ſuch ſlaughter amongſt thē, that the whole number beeing vtterly diſcomfited, he returned backe into the Citie with a glorious victorie. Among other of the Iriſh that were ſlaine, a ſonne of king Moyice a iolly luſtie yong Gentleman was one.

Whileſt theſe things were a doing in Ireland king Henrie was buſie to prouide all things readie to paſſe ouer, and ſo taking the Sea, landed at Waterford about Saint Lukes day, with fiue hundred knightes, beſide other horſemen, and a great number of Archers. This was in the.xvij. yeare of his raigne. and.xlj. of his age. Whileſt he remayned for a fewe dayes ſpace in Waterford, thither came vnto him the townſmen of Werford to make their way for pardon and fauour at his handes, and for a policie to nouriſh the ſuſpition which was entred the kings minde againſt thoſe gentlemen that firſt had attempted the inuaſion of Irelande, they preſented vnto him Fitz Stephans in Irons, as it were to gratifie him, for that contrarie to his aſſent he had bene the firſt that came thither, and occaſioned al the other that after followed to do the like.

The king for that cauſe ſeeming highly offended againſt him at the firſt, dealt verie ſtraitly with him, and ſent him back togither with one of his fellowes to be kept bounde and chained in fetters within Reighnalds tower.

Immediatly hereupon, Dermote or Dermucius king of Cork, came to the king of England, and ſubmitting himſelfe to his obeyſance, made his othe of fidelitie, and deliuering pledges for further aſſurance thereof, couenanted to pay a certaine yearely tribute.

The king departing from Waterford, went to Liſmore, and ſtayed there but two dayes, and frō thence went to Caſhill where Doualde the Prince of Limerike the morrow after came to him at the Water of Suit, and couenanting for a tribute to holde his landes of king Henrie, became his liegeman, vpon good aſſurance by ſolemne oth, and deliuering ſufficient pledges. Theſe and other the Princes of the South partes of Ireland, as Doualde, and Onialaghlen, right puiſſant Lordes, and as they were termed kings of Oſſorie, hauing ſubmitted themſelues to king Henrie, and eche of thē being ſent home into their countreys with honourable giftes and good entertaynment, he returned to Waterford, cauſing Fitz Stephan to be brought vnto him, and conſidering the high manhood of that noble Gentleman, and what daungers he had paſſed in aduenturing about the conqueſt of that Countrey, he reſtored him to libertie, and through the earneſt ſuyte of diuerſe noble men, receyued him into fauor, confirmed the graunts made to him by king Dermote, of Werforde and the Cantredes adioyning, taking from him onely the towne of Waterford, and the appurtenances.

The king leauing in Waterford Robert Fitz Bernard for the ſafe keeping of that towne, departed from thence towardes Dublyn through Oſſorie, and comming thither, remayned there for a time, during the whiche, all the Princes of thoſe parties, came in and humbly ſubmitting thē ſelues to his obeyſaunce beſought him to graunt them peace, and to receyue them into his protection, as Machelan, Dphelan, Omachealewy, Dthurthell. Thus all the Pzinces of the whole Iland, and ſpecially this Roderike King of Connagh that was reputed Monarke of Irelande for himſelfe and al other, acknowledged king Henrie for the ſupreme Lozde and ſoueraigne Pzince of all the Iland, ſo that there was not one of any name or accompt within the bounds thereof (thoſe of Ulſter onely excepted) that refuſed to exhibite due reuerence vnto hys royall Maieſtie. And ſo was the prophecie of Merlyn fulfilled (as ſome toke it.)

King Henrie acknowledged to be ſupreme Prince of all Irelande.

The Prophecy of Merlin.

The firſt ſhall ouerthzow the Walles of Irelande, and againe fiue pozcions ſhall be bzought into one.

This firſt they conſtrued now to be this king Henrie in whome the fiue vnderkingdomes were vnited.

Of the ſame conqueſt prophecied their fourt notable Saints, Patrike, Bzachan, Colme, and Moling.

In Chriſtmaſſe hee called all theſe Pzinces that were thus become his ſubiects vnto Dublyn where he made them a royall dinner. Here they began firſt to feed on Cranes fleſh, a foule til that ſeaſon vtterly abhozred of the Iriſh. The ſumptuous ſeruice, and noble traine of thoſe that wayted at this feaſt, was marueylous in the eyes of thoſe coũtrimẽ that had neuer ſene the like before.

King Henry feaſted the Iriſh Princes. Cranes fleſh not in vſe in Ireland till the comming of the Engliſh.

King Henrie not vnmyndfull of his charge enioyned him by the Popes Adzian and Alexander, for a reformation to bee had in matters of the Iriſh Churche, called a Synode of all the Iriſhe Clergie at Caſhell, whither came as chiefe the biſhop of Liſmoze, Legate of the ſea of Rome, Donate of Caſhell, Laurence of Dublyn, & Catholicus of Thomond, Archbiſhops with their Suffraganes & fellow Biſhops, Abbots Archdeacons, Pzioz, Deanes, and other pzelates of the land.

There were alſo ſent thither from king Henrie, Rauſe Abbot of Buldewis, Rauſe Archedeacon of Landaffe, and one of his Chapleynes named Nicholas, with other Chapleynes & Counſellors of the ſame king.

In which Synode the enormious abuſes of ỹ Iriſh Church being propoſed and put in writing vnder the Legats ſeale, they ſet in conference for the reforming thereof, and in the ende they concluded vpon the ſame, which were regiſtred in eight articles.

Articles agreed vpon in this counſell.

Fyrſt, that they ſhoulde not contract any vnlawfull mariages with their couſins or neare allyes, but in the ſame obſerue the rules of the Canons.

Fourthly, that the landes and poſſeſſions belonging to the Church, ſhoulde be enfranchiſed of all ſecular exactions, and ſpecially that neyther the Kinges nor Erles, nor anye other Lozdes of Irelande nor theyr ſonnes, with theyr families ſhoulde demaunde nor preſume to exact violently from thence forth any meate or drinke, or harborow within the Church poſſeſſions, as they had beene vſed, and that the dyet which had beene exacted foure tymes in the yeare of Churche

Fiftly, that foz murthers conuitted when the offender compoũded with the kinſmen of the partie dead, Churchmen that were couſins to the offender ſhould not be fozced to beare any part of the fine, except they were acceſſaries to the offence.

Sixtly, that the ſicke ſhould cauſe his teſtamẽt to bee made and read in preſence of credible perſons, and if they had wyues, theyz debts and ſeruantes wages deducted, the reſidue of theyz goods ſhould be deuided into thzee parts, whereof ẏ wife was to haue one, the childzen another, and the thirde to be employed about his funerals, and otherwiſe as he ſhould appoynt. If he had no lawfull iſſue, then his goodes to bee deuided betwixt him and his wife, and if he had childzen and hys wife deceaſſed, then the ſame to bee deuided betwixt him and his childzen.

Seuenthly, that the funerals of the dead be deuoutly and ſolemnly kept and executed.

Eightly, foz as much as it had pleaſed God to deliuer them vniuerſally into the gouernment of the Engliſhe Nation, it was decreed that in all poyntes, rytes and ceremonies, they ſhould agree in foꝛme with the Church of England.

Thus where in many things befoze the king of Englands comming into Irelande, many inoꝛdinate and heynous cuſtomes were crept into the gouernment, as well eccleſiaſticall as ciuil, by his good diligence and politike meanes, the ſame were in part refoꝛmed, ſo that what good ozders either foz maintenance of peace oz increace of religion, remayned afterwardes among them, was to bee aſcribed to him.

The Articles befoze rehearſed were eſtabliſhed and confyꝛmed with conſent of all the Synode.

Galas the Primate of Ardmagh was not there by reaſon of infirmitie and great age, but yet he came afterwardes to the King at Dublyn, and gaue his conſent in all things, fauoꝛing the kings ozder and diſpoſition herein. He dyed two yeares after, ſo aged a man, that his onely ſuſtenaunce was the mylke of a white Cowe, which he toke with him whither ſoeuer he trauayled. The winter was ſo tempeſtuous, that vneth any ſhip durſt venter to paſſe either to oz fro betwixt Englande and Irelande, ſo that aduertiſements were verye geaſon both with the king in Irelande, and with his counſell at home here in Englande, not hearing (but very ſeldom) they frõ him, oz he frõ them. Thus whileſt he lay foz the moſt part of ẏ winter ſeaſon in Waterfoꝛd, longing dayly to here foꝛth of Englãd, he practiſed to procure certain knights that ſerued vnder the Erle of Pembꝛoke, as Reymond, Miles Cogan, Williã Maſkarel, & others being mẽ of right approued valiancie & experience in warlike exploytes to foꝛſake the Erles ſeruice, & to ſerue him, taking it to be no ſmal policie ſo to make his part the ſtroger, & the Erles the weaker, foꝛ he had the Erle ſtil in a iealouſie, & miſtruſted leaſt his puiſſance might in time breed danger to his eſtate. After midſent ſhips arriued there, both foꝛth of England and Aquitaine, by who it was ſignified that there were come into Noꝛmandie two Cardinals frõ Pope Alexander the third, menacing to put the K. & his whole dominions vnder the ſentence of interditing, if he came not the ſooner to meete them, & to excuſe himſelf of things they had to charge him with, touching the death of the Archbiſhop Thomas: & herevnto an other miſchief appeared, foꝛ it was infoꝛmed him ẏ hys ſonne Henry whõ his father had foꝛ good purpoſe crowned king, was thꝛough euil aduice ſo miſled, that he ment to thꝛuſt himſelf into the actuall poſſeſſion of the crown, in his fathers life time. Theſe newes ſoꝛe troubled the king, bycauſe he muſt needes returne home & leaue Irelande foꝛ that time, where he ment to haue remayned til in that ſommer following, he might aſwell with building caſtels & foꝛtreſſes haue made himſelf ſtrong, as alſo eſtabliſhed the cuntry in perfect peace, whiche he much deſired. But ſith there was no helpe but ẏ vrgent occaſiõ of buſineſſe (as ye haue heard) called him thence, he took ozder foꝛ the ſafe keeping of the cuntry in his abſence, & appoynted captaines with cõpetent numbers of men of warre to lie in gariſon within ſundꝛie townes where he thought neceſſarie. In Dublin he left Hugh Lacy (to whõ he had giuen the cuntry of Meth to hold of him in fee) & with him .xx. knights: Robert Fitz Stephã, and Maurice Fitz Gerald with .xx. other knights were alſo appoynted to the gard of the ſame citie. Humfrey de Bohun, Robert Fitzbernard, & Hugh de Gundeuile with .xl. knights were left in Waterfoꝛd. Williã Fitz Aldelme, Philip de Haſtings & Philip de Bꝛewſe wt .xx. knights had the charge of Wexfoꝛd cõmitted to them. The king hauing thus pꝛouided foꝛ the ſafe keeping of theſe townes & other places, & leauing ozder foꝛ the gouernmẽt of the cuntry in the beſt wiſe he might, he toke the ſea at Wexfoꝛd on Eaſter Monday in the moꝛning, & with pꝛoſperous wind and weather paſſed the ſeas, & landed in Southwales in an hauẽ there not paſt .xij. miles diſtãt frõ Hauerfoꝛd weſt, & ſo haſted foꝛward, not ſtaying much till he got ouer into Noꝛmandy, where he met the Cardinals at Conſtance (as in the Engliſh hyſtoꝛie you may read moꝛe at large.) After that the king was thus departed foꝛth of Ireland, Oꝛoꝛick king of Meth ſurnamed Monoculus, that is, with the one eye, made ſuite to come to a Parley with Hugh de Lacie, but Oꝛoꝛick had deuyſed to murther the ſayde Lacie, and had bꝛought hys purpoſe to paſſe, if a Knight that was Nephewe to Maurice Fitz Geralde named Griffyne admoniſhed by a dreame had not deliuered him from that daunger.

This Griffin (gelling by interpretation of his dreame, that ſome ſuch thing would come to paſſe as followed in deede) in tyme of the parley with ſeuen knightes of his lynage, whom he had choſen forth of purpoſe to that effect, withdrewe a part to the backe ſide of the hill (on the whiche they were appoynted to meete and talke togyther) were furniſhed with ſhieldes and ſpeares, the ſaid Griffyn and his mates mounted on horſebacke, exerciſed themſelues in running and turneying, after the maner of Fraunce, in whiche meane while Dorſike (after they could not agree in talke, but that they grewe to open defiance,) he gaue ſigne to ſuch as he had layde in ambuſh for that purpoſe, to come forth and help to worke the feate which he had determined before hande to accompliſh. And he himſelfe being withdrawen by a certaine ſpace from the ground where they had talked, after his companie was once come forth vnto him, he with his Axe maketh againe towardes the place where Hugh Lacie ſtoode, and had ſlaine him vpon the ſodaine, if Maurice Fitz Gerald drawing forth his ſworde had not warned him to take heede and to loke about him: and yet ſuch was the violent rage of the traytor, that ſtryking at Lacie, he cut off the arme of one that was interpretour betwixt them, who faythfully thruſt himſelfe betwixt Lacie and the blow. Beſide this, ſo fierce were the Iriſh vpon Hugh Lacie, that twice by reaſon of haſt in ſtepping backe he fell, and vneth eſcaped by the helpe of Fitz Gerald, who manfully layde about him to beate back the enimies. Herewith no ſmall number of thoſe that brake out of the Ambuſhe came with an hideous noiſe, running to the place, that they might make an ende of Lacie and Fitz Geralde, which vndoubtedly they had eaſily done (for by appointment they came to the grounde where they thus talked but with a fewe about them and thoſe vnarmed) if Griffyn with his companions hearing the noyſe and clamour, had not come to the ayde of theyr friendes. But they perceyuing how the game went, came gallopping in vpon the ſpurres with ſuch violēce that they diſperſed the enimies, and Griffyn with his ſpeare running at Dorſike as he was about to haue mounted on horſebacke, ſtroke through both horſe and man, and ſo the diſloyall wretch ended his life. Three of his ſeruants alſo that brought him his horſe, were there ſlaine. The reſidue of the Iriſhe were ſlaine, as they coulde bee ouertaken, being followed by the Engliſh men euen vnto the entrie of the Woods, to the which (being a good way off) they fled ſo faſt as their feete might beare them.

Dorſikes head ſent to king Henrie.

Among other, deſeruing great commendation for their manhode ſhewed in this bickering, one of Fitz Stephans ſonnes named Raufe, was highly commended.

The Engliſh men perceyuing ſuch diſloyall practiſes to bee dayly attempted againſt them, toke from the Iriſh (as farre as they might) all truſt of gouernment, fenced themſelues with gariſons, placed Captaynes, Gouernours, and Conſtables euerie where within the compaſſe of theyr conqueſtes.

But king Henrie was troubled with the rebellion of his ſonnes, which brake forth in Aprill next after his returne forth of Ireland, that he had no leyſure to attend greatly to the doings in Irelande. But ſtill yet his iealouſie increaſed towardes Earle Strangbow, whom he miſtruſted as one eaſie to be caried away by any light occaſion of chaunge of fortune.

King Henries iealouſie towardes Earle Strangbow.

The Earle was a man of great byrth, but (as ye haue partly heard) as well by his auncеſtors diſſauour with their Princes, as his owne, and likewiſe his ryotous expences in his youth, bee bare no great name, till the good happe of his mariage had aduaunced him, and euen after alſo knowing himſelfe neyther byroked in ſight, nor truſted in abſence, kept ſtill one rate in all his doings, bare a low ſaile, fed no quarels, and ſhunned all ſuſpitious conference.

Earle Strangbow his wiſe dealing.

Thus whileſt the king was diſquieted at home, and doubting of the ſtate of Ireland, becauſe letters came dayly ouer, how faintly the Princes in Ireland perfourmed their obedience, for (except in Leyniſter, all other partes reteyned theyr auncient kinde of gouernment, and onely acknowledged a tribute) it was thought expedient by king Henries Counſell, to eaſe his mynde of that care, and ſeeing there was buſineſſe more than ynough on all ſides, and that it was harde to prouide remedie eche way forth at once, they determined to venter the keeping of Irelande to the fidelitie of Strangbow, who was like for his owne wealth and aſſurance to procure all poſſible meanes to bridle and keepe vnder the Iriſh, with a kinde of ſome conſtrayned obedience, for otherwiſe it woulde not be.

The Erle therfore being about the ſame time come ouer to the king into Normandie, who remayned as then in the Citie of Rouen, he was made gouernor, (or Lorde Deputie as we call him) of Ireland, hauing Reymond le Grace ioyned with him in commiſſion, for otherwiſe the Erle refuſed to take the charge vpon him.

Earle Strangbow made the kings lieutenant in Ireland hauing Reymond le Grace ioyned with him.

The King alſo the ſame time gaue to the Earle the Citie of Wexforde, with the Caſtell of Guikalone.

The Earle thus with his commiſſion returning ning into Irelande appointed Lord Lieutenant, found the countrey farre out of order, for in maner all the princes were become rebelles, ſo that within ſhort time hee had ſpent all the treaſure which he brought ouer with him, and nowe that he wanted to pay his men of warre their wages, they began to mutine, finding themſelues grieued againſt Heruey, that in Reymonds place had taken vpon him as quarter maſter to lead them: and becauſe alſo they were now kept ſhort, ſo as they profited not by gayning of bootes as they were woont to do. they came to the Earle and told him flatly, that if Reymonde were not appointed to lead them againe, they would ſurely forſake him, and eyther returne into Englande, or elſe withdrawe to the aduerſaryes, and ſerue amongeſt the. Herevpon Reymond being appoynted to gouerne them, forth they went againſt certaine rebelles, and wanne great plentie of bootes to refreſh their wantes, and furniſhed themſelues with horſe and armor.

The citie and prouince of Liſmore, they ſpoyled, and meaning to returne vnto Waterforde by water, they fraught with ſpoyle. xiij. ſhippes, of the which ſome they founde there in the hauen, and the reſidue were come thither from Waterforde. Whileſt they ſtayed for a proſperous wind, there came. xxxij. ſhippes, which they of Corke had made forth, well appoynted and throughly manned, the which aſſayled the Engliſh men in their ſhips with great fury, ſo that the battail was right dangerous, whileſt the one part with ſtones and Axes, and the other with arrowes and other weapons, enforced to bring eche other to deſtruction. At length yet the Iriſh were vanquiſhed, and their captain ſlain, ſo that the Engliſh men with their captaine Adam de Herefordе, hauing encreaſed the number of their ſhips with thoſe which they toke from their enimies, returned with honor vnto Waterford. Reymond that was aduertiſed of this victory, marching thitherwards alongſt the ſhore with. xx. knights, & lx. other horſmen, met with Dermote K. of Deſmond coming towards Liſmore with a great power to ayd the of Corke, but Reymond putting him to flight, got & brought wt him to Waterf. a booty of. 4000. head of cattel.

Reymonde diſcomfiteth the king of Deſmond.

About the ſame time, William Fitz Geralde, father to Reymond, departed this life, and therefore Reymond returned home into Wales, & in the meane time Heruey eftſoones toke vpon him to gouerne the men of warre, & brought the Erle with his houſhold vnto Caſhell. The Citizens of Dublin by appoyntment comming to theyr ayde, and lodging one night in Oſſory, Donald of Lymerike a prince in that nation not improuident about his buſineſſe, early in the morning aſſayling them that thus were come from Dublyn in their lodging, toke them ſo at vnwares, that he ſlue foure hundred of them, togither wyth foure knights that had the leading of them. By reaſon of this chance, the reſidue of the Iriſh princes toke ſuch courage and boldneſſe, that by they ſtart in euery corner, tagge and ragge, in purpoſe to expell the Engliſhmen out of the whole Countrey, ſo that the Erle being returned vnto Waterford, was kept ſo ſhort, that he durſt vneth peepe out. Rotherike king of Connagh paſſing ouer the ryuer of Sheynyn, with a mightie power inuaded Weth, and finding the caſtels in that Countrey voyde without garde, he brought into aſhes and layd flat with the ground all that he met with by the way, euen hard to the walles of Dublyn.

The Erle remembring how Reymond had bin an earneſt ſuter to his ſiſter Baſill, to haue hir in mariage, & that there was no ſtay but the graunt of his good will, to bring him ouer againe wyth more ſpeede to his ayde, he wrote to him louing letters, with promiſe that if hee woulde make haſt to come, and bring with him ſome power to ſtrengthen his parte agaynſt the Rebelles, hee ſhoulde haue hys ſyſter and all things at hys pleaſure.

Reymonde vnderſtanding in what diſtreſſe the Earle and other his friendes ſtoode in Irelande, and deſirous withall to enioy the Ladie Baſill whome he entirely loued, hee communed with his couſin Meiller, and other worthie Gentlemen of his lynage, whome he perſwaded eaſily to goe ouer with hym: ſo that hauing aſſembled thirtie luſtie Knightes, with an hundred other horſemen, and three hundred Archers footemen, choſen forth of the Welche Nation, he embarked them in .xv. ſhippes, paſſed ouer with them and landed at Waterford, where the Citizens the ſame time rayſing a tumult, were about to haue ſlain the Engliſh men, but by the arriual of Reymond which chaunced ſo in the nicke, the vprore was pacified, and all things brought to quiet. This done, Reymõd brought the Erle to Wexford, and as Frecell gouernor of Waterford was about to follow the Erle in a veſſell by the water of Suire, he with diuerſe of his companie were ſlaine by thoſe mariners that vndertooke to paſſe him ouer, which murther committed, the murtherers returning to the Citie, ſlue all ſuch Engliſhe people as they mette with, either in the ſtreetes or houſes, not ſparing either ſexe or age. But they miſſed yet of winning the full poſſeſſiõ of the city. For an Engliſh gẽtleman ẏ remayned in charge with keeping it, ſo handled ẏ matter, that the traitors were ſubdued and brought to quiet, with worſe opinion and ſtate than they were in before.

Reymonde not forgetting the Earles promiſe conteined in his letters, would not depart forth of Wexford, till the Ladie Baſill was fetched from Dublyn, and coupled with him in mariage. The ſolemnization whereof being finiſhed, vnderſtanding that Roderike king of Connagh, hauing vterly deſtroyed the Countrey of Meth, had nowe inuaded the confines about Dublin, the morrow after his mariage feaſt, Reymonde with his bandes of men of warre, iſſued forth and marched towardes thoſe parties, wherof Roderike hauing knowledge, withdrew backe into his Countrey.

Reymonde marieth the Ladie Baſill, ſiſter to Erle Strangbow.

Thoſe parties then once reformed, and the caſtels of Trim, and Duuels being eft ſones repayred, that had beene forſaken of Hugh Tirell theyr keeper and deſtroyed, the whole Ile for a time reſted in meetly good quiet. So that the Engliſhe Nobilitie that lay there, had tyme the better to ſettle themſelues, and for more increaſe of ſtedfaſt amity, to match themſelues in mariage according to their degrees. Hervey maried Reymonds ſiſters daughter, whiche Ladie was the daughter of Maurice Fitz Geralde, and by procurement of Reymond, the Erle gaue his daughter Alma in mariage vnto Williã the eldeſt ſon of Maurice Fitz Gerald, to which Maurice, being ſente for forth of Wales) the Earle gaue the middle Candred of Ophelan (which he had poſſeſſed before by the kings aſſignment) togither with the caſtel of Guikinlou, to holde the ſame in fee.

Ye muſt here note, that the king of Englãd to aſſure his title to Ireland with a color of further right, procured of Pope Adriã that was an Engliſh man borne (as before ye haue heard) bulles of confirmation, to the ende (as the tenor of thoſe bulles ſignified) that he ſhould root out ſuch abuſes & euill cuſtomes as were commonly practiſed there among the people, cõtrarie to the order of all Chriſtiantie. And ſo in reforming the ſtate of religion, and reducing the people to liue within the compaſſe of honeſt lawes & more ciuill ordinances, he graunted to him the ſupreme dominion of that land, commanding all the inhabitants therof to receiue him for their ſouerain lord & gouernor.

The

The Clergie therfore now of late hauing perused thoſe Bulles, and perceyuing that vnder ſtreight paynes they were commaunded to owe their allegiance vnto the king of Englande, they buſily did their diligence to repreſſe the furie of their Countrey men, and by authoritie aſwell of the Bulles of Pope Adrian, as Pope Alexander, which had beene publikely read in the Counſel at Caſſhell, they denounced all thoſe accurſed that maliciouſly ſhoulde withſtande or ſeeke to make fruſtrat the ſame. By ſuch meanes ẏ land reſting from any great troubleſome rebellios for a while, the firſt that began to ſtyre, was Donalde king of Lymerike, who leaping out, renounced his allegiance to the king of Englād, wherupon Reymond aſſembling togither an army of .C. and .xx knights w̄. CCC. other horſmē, & .CCCC. archers on foot, about the Kalends of Octobet marched boldly towards Lymerike, & cōming to the water that runneth round about that towne, paſſeth the ſame, notwithſtanding the aduerſaryes were readie there to keepe him off. One of Reymonds nephews, a yong ſtripling called Dauid, and ſurnamed Welch, becauſe he was borne in Wales, though not of the Welch linage, was the firſt that lept into the riuer, & led the way to giue example to others. The ſecond (ſaue one knight that was drowned) was Meiller, and Reymond the third that entred the water. When the whole army was once got ouer, with ẏ loſſe only of that one knight that hight Guy, & two other horſmen, they followed their enimies, and making of them great ſlaughter, ceaſſed not til they brake into the citie, and wan the ſame with great riches which they found within it. Here is to be noted, that Lymerik was taken vpon a Tueſday, and Waterford likewiſe was taken vpon a Tueſday, and alſo Dublyn. Neither came this to paſſe of any purpoſe, but fell out euen ſo as chaunce gaue it.

Reymond diſpoſing things in order for the ſure gard of that citie, cauſed vitails from ech ſide to be brought into it, and leauing there .l. knights two hundred horſmen, and .CC. archers, vnder the gouernment of Miles of S. Dauid hys couſin that was appoynted captaine of that citie, he returned and drew into Leyniſter with the reſidue of his people in ſafetie, hauing thus obteyned a notable victorie. But as enuie is euer a companion to well doing, though not to further, but readie ſtill to hinder the ſame, ſo Heruie bearing a continuall ſecrete grudge agaynſt Reymonds glorie, that neyther reſpect of affinitie, nor other reaſonable conſideration coulde cauſe him to forget it, ſticked not to ſende Meſſengers to the King, with ſiniſter informations agaynſt Reymonde, wrongly interpreting all hys doings, in ſo muche that he put into the kings head, how he went about as one fully determined therupon, not onely to vſurpe to hymſelfe and his, the Citie of Lymerike, but alſo all Irelande, greatly agaynſt the kings honour and his owne promiſed fidelitie.

Reymond marcheth toward Limerik.

They paſſe the riuer.

Limerike wonne.

The king crediting ſuch reports, ſent ouer foure commiſſioners into Ireland to examine the matter, & to make a true certificat of the ſtate of that land. The names of thoſe commiſſioners were theſe, Robert Poer, Olbert de Herloter, Adam de Gernemuth, and William de Bendenges. Two of them he appoynted to returne backe, & to bring Reymonde with them: the other two hee commaunded to remaine there with the Erle.

Foure Commiſſioners ſent into Irelād to enquire of Reymondes demeanor.

As Reymond then was readie to paſſe the ſea to come ouer, ſtaying only for a proſperous wind, there came meſſengers from them that lay in Lymerike, bringing word ẏ Donald prince of Thomond had beſieged thē with an infinit multitude of people, and becauſe they had ſpent all their prouiſiō of vitails, there was no remedie but to ſuccor them them with ſpeed, for otherwiſe they could not endure agaynſt the force of their aduerſaries.

The Earle carefull to ſend ayde to relieue his men thus brought into that extremitie, vpon moouing the matter to his men of warre, whome he ment to ſent forward about that enterpriſe, hee found them ſo diſmayd for the departing of Reymonde, that with one generall voyce they flatly denied to go on that iourney without him.

The loue which the ſoldiers bare to Reymond.

The Erle conferring vpon this refuſall of his men of warre with the Commiſſioners, it was agreed by their conſents, that Reymonde ſhoulde haue the leading of the army vnto Lymerike, and ſo ſetting forward with. lxxx. knightes, two. C. other horſemen, and three hundred archers, beſide ſuch Iriſhe men as he toke with him, vnder the conduct of Murchard Kenceili, & Dunald of Oſſorie, with this power he went firſt vnto Caſhell, hearing by the way that the enimies hauing left the ſiege of Lymerike, were layde in the paſe of Caſhell, which being of it ſelfe a very combroſom ſtrayt, & hard to get through by nature of the place, they had made it much more noyſome to thoſe that ſhould attẽpt to paſſe that way, in laying trees ouerthwart and caſting ditches a trauerſe, which they kẽced with hedges plaſhed aloft vpon the rampire.

Murcharde Kenceili.

The Engliſhmẽ deuided their army into three wards, the vantgard being led by Meiller, ruſhed forth to the hedge with ſuch violẽce, that they bare down & tore the ſame in peeces, as it had bin ſome ſtrange tempeſt of wind, & with their ſwords they made way & opened ẏ paſſage, not without great ſlaughter of them that ſtood there at defence agaynſt them.

1175

The paſſage being thus wonne, and the enimies put to flight on Eaſter eue, vpon the Tueſday in Eaſter weeke they came through like victorers vnto Lymerike, and as it was wonne vpõ a Tueſday (as before ye haue heard) ſo nowe it was likewiſe relieued vpon a Tueſday.

The kings of Connagh, and Thomond come to a parley with Reymond.

After this, the king of Connagh, and the king of Thomond came to a parley with Reymonde about. xxj. myles diſtant from Lymerike beyond Kelleleonyne in one ſelfe day, though not togyther, nor in one ſelfe place. They grew in both the places to this effect in their talk, that either prince deliuering hoſtages, renued their othes of fidelitie vnto the king of Englande; and ſo in louing wiſe they departed eche from other.

Dermucius Marcharthy prince of Deſmond vexed by his ſonne Kormac Olecham.

The ſame time Dermote or Dermucius Macharthy, prince of Deſmond, was by his eldeſt ſon Kormac Oletham in maner expulſed out of his countrey, wherevpon he ſued vnto Reymond for ayde againſt his vnnaturall ſon. Reymond moued aſwel at the ernеſt prayer, as promiſe of large entertainment, toke vpon him that enterpriſe, and turning his victorious enſignes towards Cork, he ſo bled the matter that his armye was in ſhort ſpace greatly enriched, what with ſpoile & wages, & plenty of vitailes, which they recouered in thoſe parties, in ſuch wiſe that they ſent great abũdance vnto Limerik, for Dermote Macharthy by ẏ help of Reymond reſtored now wholy again vnto his dominion, ſought to pleaſure him and his cõpany in all things he might. But yet Kormac vnder colour of peace, led forth his father Dermote craftily with fayre wordes, till he got him into his hands, & committed him to priſon, but within a while after, the father recõpenſing his ſonne with like curteſie, practiſed his ſonnes death, whileſt he ſo remayned in priſon, and bringing his purpoſe to paſſe, was ſo deliuered.

The crafty diſſimulation of the ſonne to intrappe the father.

To what ends it came.

1177

About the kalends of June, Richard Strangbow Erle of Pembroke departed this life, wherof Reymond aduertiſed, conſulting with his truſtie friends, betaketh Lymerike to the keeping of Donald prince of Thomonde, as to one of the kings faythfull Barons, receyuing of him both pledges, and ſwearing him alſo to preſerue that Citie frõ hurt, and to reſtore it to the king of Englands vſe whenſoeuer he was thervnto required. This done, he with the army departed towards Leyniſter, to defend that countrie and the hauen townes there, for the more ſuretie of the Engliſh poſſeſſions in Ireland. But he was no ſooner come to the further end of the bridge, but the other end next to the Citie was broken downe, and the Engliſh men might behold fire ſet in foure corners of the Citie, to their great grief, which was done by treaſon of Donald, ſhewing a taſt what credit was to be giuen vnto the people of that nation by that his diſloyall periurie and breach of othe ſo lately taken, without all feare of Gods vengeance to follow, or ſhame of the world that might be imputed to him amongſt men of honeſt reſpect.

The treaſon of Donalde.

At Reymonds comming to Dublin, the bodie of the Earle was buried in Chriſtes Church within that Citie, the Archebiſhop Laurence doing the office of the funerals. For the Earle in his life time had commaunded that his bodie ſhoulde be kept aboue grounde till Reymond were come, and till his comming the Earles death in deede was kept ſecrete, ſo that few vnderſtood therof.

Earle Strangbow buried.

This Earle was of colour ruddye and freckled, with great eyes, of a feminine viſage, ſmall voyce, ſhorte necke, of ſtature tall, and a goodly perſonage, liberall and curteous, and where ſubſtaunce wanted to ſhewe his franke heart, hee ſupplyed it with gentle wordes, more readie to obey than to commaunde. At home more lyke a Souldier than a Captayne, but abrode in the warres he ſhewed himſelfe a Captayne, and not a Souldier. Although he neuer would enterpriſe any exployt of himſelfe without the aduice of other, being once ioyned in fight with his enimies,

he

he ſtode as an aſſured ſtandard for his people to haue recourſe to, for their ſafetie. And howſoeuer the chance of battail turned he was euer conſtant and ſtable, neyther drowping as one in diſpayre whē fortune ſeemed to frowne, nor too ioyful whē ſhe was diſpoſed to fawne. He left no iſſue behind him in life but one daughter named Iſabell, maried after .viij. yeares to William Earle Marſhall.

After this, the king of Englands Commiſſioners perceyuing what eſtimation and opinion the ſouldiers & men of warre had conceyued of Reymonde, they authoriſed him lieutenaunt, tyll the kings pleaſure therein might be further knowne: and herewith they returned into Englande to informe him of the chaunge of things in Irelande by the Earles death. The king throughly informed how things ſtode, ſent William Fitz Aldelme, one of his truſtie ſeruants as his lieutenāt into Ireland with .xx. knights ioyning with him in commiſſion Iohn de Curcy, with other fenne knights, alſo Fitz Stephans & Miles Cogā, with xx. knights, which two laſt remembred captaines had ſerued the king right valiauntly in thoſe late ciuil warres, which his ſonnes had reyſed againſt him. Reymond vnderſtāding that they were arriued, met them with a braue number of knights, in the borders of Wexford, deliuering all the Cities, townes, & caſtels togither with ſuch hoſtages as he had into Aldelmes hands as the kings lieutenant of that kingdome. Fitz Aldelme moued with enuie, to ſee Reymond furniſhed with ſuch a traine of luſtie youthes, he threatned to abate ſuch pride, and to make a ſcatter of thoſe chieldes. Frō that time forth, aſwell he as other lieutenāts of Irelād that ſucceeded him, ceaſed not (as it had bene by ſome purpoſed conſpiracie) to hinder the good fortune of Reymond, Meiller, Fitz Moyice, Fitz Gerald, Fitz Stephans, & all that whole generation, although no cankred enuy was able to rote out the plants of ſo plentifull an offſpring.

Now foraſmuch as we haue to make ſo often mention of Reymond, Meiller, Heruie, Fitz Aldelme, & Fitz Stephans, being chiefe doers in the reducing of Irelād vnder the Engliſh ſubiection, we haue thought it not impertinent to ſhew what maner of men in perſonages and qualities they were, as Giraldus Cambrenſis doth deſcribe thē.

Reymond therefore was of a large & mightie ſtature, with yellow heares a little curling, great eies, gray and round, his noſe ſomewhat in height rayſed, well coloured of viſage, with a pleaſant & merrie countenance. And although he was verie corpulent, yet with a liuelineſſe of ſpirit he recompenced the vnweldineſſe of his fleſhe, and ſo ouermatched the groſſenes of his bodie with the vertue of his mind. He would paſſe the nights without ſleep, to ſee to the ſafetie of his army, and as a ſurueyer of the watch, he would go vp and down about the campe with marueylous care and diligence, ſo that ſuche bandes as were vnder hys charge, ſeldome or neuer attempted anye thing raſhly, or through negligēce came to hinderance, neither delicate in his feeding, nor fine in his apparell. He would endure both heate and cold alike, yeelding to neither of them both, able to bryde wrath, & to abide al maner of painful trauails. He ſeemed rather to profite than to rule ouer thē that were vnder his gouernment, rather as a ſeruant than a maiſter: and to conclude, he was bountifull, curteous, and wiſe. And although he was right vertuous, and readie to bide battaill, yet he excelled moſte in prudent policie and prouident foreſight, ſo as he iuſtly deſerued to be cōmended, both for a valiant ſouldiour, and a circumſpect Captaine. Thus much for Reymond.

The deſcriptiō of Meiller.

Meiller was browne of colour, with black eies, and of countenaunce grim and ſterne, of ſtature ſomewhat leſſe than the common ſort, but yet of paſſing ſtrēgth for the quantitie of his body, with a brode breaſt, and ſlender waſt, his armes and other limmes being greater of bone and ſinewes than filled with fleſh, a right hardy knight & ready to attēpt any enterprice ẏ was to be atchieued either alone or accōpanied: the firſt to giue the onſet in euery battel, & the laſt ẏ would depart forth of ẏ field, & nothing in him might be diſpraiſed, but ẏ he was giuen ouer much to ſpilling of bloud, and ſo deſirous of praiſe, that he eſteemed honor more than life. This with more doth Giraldus Cambrenſis report of the foreſayd Meiller.

The diſcriptiō of Heruey.

Now as cōcerning Heruey, he was of perſon beautiful, with gray eies, & ſomwhat ſtāding outward, or (as we terme it) bol eied, a round vpright neck, crump ſhoulders, with lōg armes & handes, brode breſted, but in ẏ waſt ſlēder with due proportiō, thighes, legs, & feet anſwerable to ẏ ſame, in height not much exceeding the cōmon ſtature. But as nature had garniſhed the outward partes of the man with ſundry graces, ſo had ſhe diſgraced the inner parts with ſundry vices, for euen frō his youth he was giuē to ſenſuall luſt, not caring with what womā he delt, ſo he might ſatiſfie hys liking, not ſparing kinſwoman nor other. Beſide this, he was enuious, ſlanderous, a ſower of iniſter reports, & double in all his dealings, crafty, faire ſpoke, & deceitful: in meaſtancy only cōſtant, ſometime ſet aloft through fortunes fauor, & after caſt downe without hope of recouery. In the French warres he had ſhewed good proufe of his valiancy, but after his cōming into Ireland, his praiſe wōderfully decayed. As by Giral. Cam. it ſhould appere. At length he became a Monk at Canterbury, as in another place is ſpecified.

Giral. ſeemeth to ſpeake enuiouſly of this man.

Now as cōcerning Fitz Aldelm, he was of ſtature ſomwhat bigger thā ẏ mean ſort, of hādſom proportion, a man liberall and pleaſant, but ſubtill and deceytfull ynough, in outwarde countenaunce curteous, friendly, and gentle, but inwardly conteyning more gall than honie, hys wordes were as ſoft as Dyle, but they proued pearcing Dartes: whom this day he honoured, to morow he would ſpoyle, oppreſſing the weake and bearing with the rebell: harde to thoſe that were ouercome, and eaſie to them that helde good agaynſt him, giuen to wine and women, and as he was Courtly, ſo was he couetous.

Fitz Stephans was a man of a large and ſound body, of a right ſeemely countenance, of ſtature ſomwhat exceeding the common ſort, bountifull, liberall, and pleaſant, but giuen to wine and women aboue all meaſure.

Thus much of theſe gentlemen, being accounted among the chiefe of thoſe Captaynes that cõquered Ireland. Of Earle Strangbow hath bene ſayde before, of Curcy and Lacie ye ſhall heare partly hereafter.

But now to returne where we left: The firſt attempt that Fitz Aldelme made to the hynderance of that progenie, was agaynſt the ſonnes of Maurice Fitz Gerald, taking occaſion by the deceaſſe of the ſame Maurice, who departed this life about the Calendes of September.

Maurice Fitz Gerald departeth this life. 1177

After whoſe death Fitz Aldelme toke from his ſonnes the Caſtelles of Guikinlo by a craft, aſſigning to them as it were by exchaunge, the towne of Ferue, where although it ſtoode in the myddeſt of the enimies Countrey, they had buylded a ſtrong Caſtell.

Walter Almain also Aldelmes nephew toke from Reymond ſuch lands as he was ſeyſed of in Dublin dale, and aboute Wexford.

Walter Almaine.

Moreouer, where Aldelme had in commaundement from the king, to reſtore vnto Fitz Stephans the Cantred of Ophelan, being brybed to the contrarie, he did not as he was commaunded, but ſtill remoued thoſe captaines ẏ were knowne to be of any approued valiancie into places farre within the Countrey, and where moſt daunger was ſuſpected: ſpecially he ſought by all wayes & meanes to keepe vnder thoſe of the lynage of Fitz Gerald, deuiſing how to bring them out of credit, and to depriue them of ſuch liuings, rowmthes, and offices as they helde, and had bene gyuen to them in recompence of their good ſeruice.

But whileſt Fitz Aldelme went about only to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his friendes in the beſt and moſt quiet partes of Irelande, his aſſociate that valiant knight John de Curcy victoriouſly conquered the countrey of Ulſter, which hitherto had not bene ſubiect to the king of England.

We reade in Giraldus Cambrenſis, that he fought fiue times with the enimies before he could eſtablish his conqueſt there in any ſuretie, twiſe at Doune, as firſt ſhortly after Candlemaſſe, ſecondly about Mydſommer, where with a ſmall power of men he diſcomfited. xv. thouſand of his enimies.

The third conflict chaunced at Ferly in taking a bootie, where by reaſon of the ſtraytes & narrow paſſages, his people were put to the worſe, ſome ſlaine, and ſome ſcattered and diſperſed here and there among the Woodes, ſo that he had vneth xj. knightes left with him, and yet through hys high valiancie and manhood, with thoſe few he retyred ſtill in keeping off the enimies, paſſing by the ſpace of. xxx. myles a foote (for they had loſt theyr horſes) and at lengthy got home to his caſtell, after he had bene purſued by his enimies for the ſpace of two dayes and two nightes, not once ſuffred to reſt, nor to take any refection in all that time. A thing ſtraunge and worthy to be had in memory.

The fourth battayle which he fought wyth his aduerſaryes, was at Vzcell, where alſo hee loſt many of his men, and the reſidue were put to flight.

The fifth encounter was at the bridge of Ivory, vpon his returne forth of England, in which place he went away with the victorie. And thus in three battayles he had the vpper hande, and in two taſted the chaungeable fortune of warre, although with no leſſe domage redounding to the enimie than to him ſelfe at both thoſe times when he was ſo foyled at their handes.

To eſtabliſh the conqueſt of Ulſter, and other the parties of Irelande before enioyed, Alexander the third of that name Biſhop of Rome, ſent a Cardinall named Viuianus to ſignifie the tytle that king Henrie had to the ſoueraigne gouernement of that lande, with a reſeruation of Peter pens to be payde to the Church of Rome, and beſide to denounce them accurſed that would not yeeld and ſubmit themſelues vnto the ſayd king, but ſhew themſelues rebels contrarie to their dutifull allegiance, who being as they were deſpiſers and breakers of the eccleſiaſticall Canons, yet for a colour to mainteine their vnruly miſdemeanors they had deuiſed to make Churches their barnes, filling the ſame full of their corne & graynes, that the vitaylers and purueyours of the kings campe ſhould not in any wiſe meddle with the ſame, for feare to run into the offence of ſacrilege. Therfore he licenced the kings officers in this behalf, in curteous wiſe & diſcretly to cõmune with ſuch perſõs as made the Church a ſanctuarie for their graine, and in time of neede to take thereof at reaſonable prices. Little good did Fitz Aldelme, and leſſe was he like to do, becauſe he went about to croſſe his Peeres, and was therewith croſſed agayne in his courſe of gouernment, wherevpon Hugh Lacie was made generall lieutenant ouer the whole Ile, vnder whõ Miles Cogan, Philip de Brewſe Fitz Stephans, Fitz Stephans, Power and diuers other were appointed to the rule of diuerſe countreys ſeuerally & apart by themſelues. Lacy builded diuerſe caſtels and foꝛtreſſes thꝛough the coũtreys of Leyniſter & Meth. The ſame yeare Miles Cogan & his ſonne in law Rauf Fitz Stephans, the ſonne of Robert Fitz Stephans, were ſlaine betwixt Waterfoꝛde and Liſmoꝛe by a traytoꝛ named Machtire, as they ſat abꝛode in the fieldes togither, ſtaying foꝛ the men of Waterfoꝛde, with whom they ſhoulde haue talked: but the traytoꝛ with other in his cõpanie came behinde them, & with their Axes ſlue them out of hand. They were appoynted to haue lodged with the ſayde Machtire the night following, as with him whome they toke to be theyꝛ aſſured friend. And immediately hereupon, al the countreys of Deſmond and other there about, beganne to reuolte from the Engliſhe obedience after that the ſame had continued in meetely good quiet vnder the gouernment of Robert Fitz Stephans, and Miles Cogan, foꝛ the ſpace of .v. yeres but togither nowe the rebels ſtarting vp in euery coꝛner, ſet all in a bꝛoyle, and dꝛoue Fitz Stephans to that extremitie, that he was glad to kepe him within the Citie of Coꝛg, beſet on eche ſide by his eniuies that lay rounde about him, till hys couſin Reymond came by water from Wexford with .xx. knightes, and diuers other men of armes and archers to his ayde, by whoſe aſſiſtance the enimies were in ſundꝛie conflictes ouerthꝛowne, and partly dꝛiuen out of the Countrey, and partly reduced to their foꝛmer obedience: and ſo that tempeſtuous ſtoꝛme within a while was well calmed, and all things bꝛought into quiet: foꝛ ſhoꝛtly after, Richard Cogan, bꝛother to Miles Cogan, was ſent from the king of Englande to ſucceede in rule of the Countrey in his bꝛothers place. And ſhoꝛtly after there aꝛriued Philip de Barre, the nephew of Fitz Stephans, aſwell to ayde his vncle as to defende his poſſeſſions of Olethan giuen to him by Fitz Stephans, and after iniuriouſly taken frõ Rauke the ſon of Fitz Stephans. The ſame time Giraldus Cambꝛenſis, bꝛother to the ſame Philip de Barre, and nephewe likewyſe to Fitz Stephan, came ouer in companie with his bꝛother to ſuruey the Countrey, the deſcription whereof, with the Hiſtoꝛie, he afterwardes wꝛote, out of whom we haue gathered the moſt part of that whiche we haue wꝛitten here in the beginning of this Iriſhe hiſtoꝛie, the whiche foꝛ want of getting ſight of his booke in time, we haue bene conſtrayned to inſert confuſedly, foꝛ ẏ leyſure hath not ſerued vs to wꝛite out the copy again after we had firſt wꝛittẽ it, as firſt we found it bꝛiefly cõpiled by Campion, who gathering foꝛth bꝛief notes, hath handſomely ioyned them togither, but omitted many things likewiſe foꝛ haſt where otherwiſe that which he hath done in this behalf, deſerueth vndoubtedly ſingular cõmendation. But nowe to the matter. In this ſeaſon diuers caſtels, abbeys, & bꝛidges were ereſted, & builded in Ireland. Foꝛ the Engliſh & Welch nobilitie now ſetled there, ſtudied both to reduce ẏ people to ciuilitie, & likewiſe to beautify the cũtry wt buildings, ſeruing both foꝛ defẽce & cõmoditie.

Giraldus cambrenſis goeth into Ireland.

The Abbey of Roſglas was founded about the ſame time. And the Welchman Hꝛuey, one of the ſpeciall conquexoꝛs of Irelande, founded the Abbey of Donbꝛothy. And afterwards about this ſeaſon, to wit, in the yeare .1179. he renounced the woꝛld, & became a Monke in Trinity Abbey at Canterbury. In this meane while, Hugh Lacie had fenced the countreys of Meth & Leyniſter wt diuers caſtelles & foꝛtreſſes which he had built, the better to bꝛidle the Iriſh from their rebellious attempts, and with ſuch politike gouernment as he vſed to bꝛing the people in loue with lawes, and to like of reſt and quietneſſe. The ſtate of thoſe

Countreyes whereof he had the rule, was in ſhort time brought to a perfite frame of a well ordered Prouince, for he behaued himſelfe ſo courteouſly among them that ſhewed themſelues ductifull, and hampered the other that woulde abyde no order, ſo as he was both greatly loued and feared, inſomuche at length ſome ſuſpition grewe, leaſt hee woulde haue vſurped a Kingdome to himſelfe, wherevppon John Lacie the Conſtable of Cheſter, and Rycharde de Peche were 1182 ſent ouer into Irelande from king Henrie to take vppon them the gouernment in Hugh Lacyes rowmth, who was commaunded to returne into England to the king.

They arryued in Irelande aboute the latter ende of Aprill, remayning there all the Sommer following: diuerſe Caſtelles were by them builded with the aduiſe of Hugh Lacie before he departed homewardes, as at Fothred, Dualan, at Treſtelder mot, at Collacht, and ſundrye other.

Where as Meiller enioyed the Countrey of Kildare giuen to him by Earle Strangbow, they remoued him from thence into the Countrey of Leys, exchaunging with him in the Kings behalfe to haue the one for the other. And this was done of purpoſe, that he being a warrelyke perſonage, ſhoulde poſſeſſe a Countrey wylde and full of enimies whereby to bring the rebels into ſome conformitie by force, ſith otherwiſe they were not to be tamed.

In the Winter following, the Conſtable of Cheſter and his aſſociate returned into England, and Hugh Lacie was againe appoynted Lorde Lieutenant of Irelande, hauing one of the kings Chaplaynes ioyned with him, named Robert de Shrewſburie, to be as it were an aſſyſtaunt to him, and a witneſſe of all his dealings. Who vpon his returne nowe into Irelande, fell in hand to buylde more Caſtelles in places where he ſawe it expedient, ſo to reſtrayne the attemptes of vnruly perſons, and to defende others from ſuſteyning iniurie.

The deſcription of Hugh Lacie.

This Hugh Lacie was a man right diligent in his buſineſſe, and carefull, and as he was an expert warriour, ſo yet was he not verie fortunate in iourneys nowe and then which he made vpon the enimyes. He was of vyſage browne, blacke eyed and hollowe, flat noſed, with his cheeke on the right ſyde diſfigured, by reaſon hee had beene burnt by chaunce in his youth, ſhort necked, his bodie hearie, but ſtrong ſinewed. And to conclude, of ſtature ſmall, and of ſhape deformed.

After the deceaſſe of his wife, he was noted to be verie diſſolute of lyfe, vſing the companie not of one but of manye Concubines, couetous to heape vppe ryches, and ambicious beyonde meaſure.

But nowe to the Hyſtorie. In the yeare laſt paſt, to witte, 1182. (or as others haue in the yeare. 1180. dyed Laurence Archbiſhop of Dublyn, after whō ſucceeded John Cumyn an Engliſh man, that was brought vp in the Abbey of Eueſham founder of Saint Patrikes in Dublyn, which before that time was a pariſh Church, and by him conuerted into a Colledge, with ſufficient reuenues aſſigned for the maintenaunce of parſons, vicars, clearkes and choriſters.

There hath riſen great contention betwixt this and chriſts Church for antiquitie, wherin doubtleſſe (ſayth our Author) Saint Patrike ought to giue place. They are in deed both written cathedrall Churches, and both reputed the Biſhops Chapiter, in whoſe electiō they ought to come togither in the Church of the Trinitie, commonly called Chriſts Church, which in all recordes hath the preeminēce of place. The party diſturbing this order of election, forfeyteth to the Archebiſhop of Dublyn. 200. lb. The foundation of S. Patrikes was greatly aduaunced by king John.

In the yeare. 1183. died king Henrie the ſonne reconciled to his father, but preparing a new war againſt his brother Richard Duke of Aquitaine. And ſhortly after died another of king Henries ſonnes named Geffrey Erle of Brytaine. And ſo were left Richard, and John that was after Erle of Glouceſter, ſurnamed without land, to whome the father conueyed all his intereſt and Lordeſhip of Irelande, and ſent him thither honourably accompanied, being then but. xij. yeares olde, & with him in eſpecial truſt Geraldus Cambrenſis a lerned man, and a diligent ſearcher of antiquities. 1183

The death of king Henrie the ſonne.

Ireland giuen to Iohn the ſonne of king Henrie. 1185

About this yong gentleman were placed ſeruants & Counſellers of three ſundry ſortes, fyrſt Normās great quaffers, ſlouthful perſōs, prowd, gluttons, trayned vp in extorcions & briberie, to whom he moſt leaned. Secondly Engliſh men, that went ouer with him, bad ynough and vnſkilfull. Thirdly the Engliſhe men whiche hee founde in the land, whom being beſt worthy and moſte forwarde in all good ſeruice, hee leaſt regarded.

Counſellers about the lord Iohn the kings ſonne.

Hereof ſprung factions and diſdaine, ſo that the knightes whiche were moſte valiant and readieſt to doe their duetyes, were greatly diſcouraged, and the enimies in hope highly recomforted.

With the bruite of his arriual at Waterforde, the kings of Thomond, Deſmōd, and Connagh, put themſelues in order after the braueſt maner they could to meete him, and to ſubmitte theyr Countreys to his grace. Before they came the Iriſh franklins with rich preſents (and as they are verie kynde hearted where they are willing to ſhew obedience) made vnto the childe their ſouereine Lorde, the moſt ioy and gladneſſe that might bee, and though rudely, yet louingly, and after the vſage of their countrey offered to kiſſe him after ſuch a friendly familiaritie as they were accuſtomed to ſhewe towardes their Princes at home. Two Normans that were of the garde pikethankes, and diſdaynefull clawbackes ſhoke and put backe the Clownes very roughly, tearing them by their clibbe heades and beardes churliſhly and vnmannerly, thruſting them out of preſence, whome they ſhoulde rather haue borne with, and curteouſly inſtructed. The Iriſhmen thus miſuſed, went againſt the forenamed kings, ſhewed the rebukes and villanies done to them in recompence of their humbleneſſe and meeke demeanor, declaring playnely, that their Lorde to whome they were going to do honor, was but a boy, peeuiſh and inſolente, gouerned by a ſorte of yong flattering bribers, that ſith to them whyche were buxome and tractable, ſuch deſpite and diſhonor (for that tearme they vſed, hauing borrowed it of the Spanyardes) little good mighte the ſtates of Irelande looke for in continuance, when the Engliſh once had yoked thē and pawed them in their clouches. This reporte lightly alienated the mindes of thoſe princes, not yet very reſolute, and turned them with greate othes and leagues concluded among them ſelues, and cauſed alſo the mightieſt Captaynes elſewhere to ſticke together, couenanting not to giue ouer whileſt their liues laſted for any manner earthly thing, but manfully to ſtande in defence of their auncient liberties. Immediately hereupō, ſeditious ſturres, mutinies, and commotions were reyſed in ſundry partes, ſo that the yong gentleman and hys company were glad to referre the quieting of ſuch broyles vnto Lacie, Brews, Curcy, Fitz Gerald and others, he himſelfe returned backe into England the ſame yeere he came, leaning the Realme by a great deale in worſe plight than he found it. Commotions reyſed.

The Lorde Iohn returneth into Englande.

Thus farre Cambrenſis, and now for that which followeth: Our Authour (as he himſelfe writeth) vſed ſuche notes as were written by one Philip Flatſburie, out of a certayne nameleſſe authour, from this place vnto the yeere 1370. and wee hauing none other helpe beſide (except only Henry of Marlebourrow,) do ſet downe that whiche wee finde in our oftmentioned authour, and in ẏ ſame Marleburgh in all the whole diſcourſe that followeth, excepte in ſome certayne particuler places, where we ſhew from whence we haue drawē that whiche we write as occaſion ſerueth. To proceede then with the matter where we left, Lacie the rather to meete with ſuche hurlyburlies as were like to put the ſtate of the countrey in danger if the ſame were not the ſoner brought to quiet, erected and built a number of Caſtels in places conuenient, well and ſufficiently garniſhed with men munitions and vitayles, as one at Derwath, where diuers of the Iriſh prayed to be

Lacie came ſundry tymes thither to further the worke, full glad to ſee them fall in vre with any ſuch exerciſe wherein might they once begin to haue a delight, and taſt the ſweeteneſſe of a true mans life, he thought it no ſmall token of reformation: for whiche cauſe hee viſited them the oftner, and merily would commaund his gentlemen (to giue the labourers example) to take theyr tooles in hande, and to worke a ſeaſon, whyle the poore ſoules looking on might reſt them. But this paſtime grewe to a tragicall end: for on a time as each man was buſily occupied, ſome lading, ſome heauing, ſome plaſtring, ſome grauing, the generall alſo himſelfe digging with a pickaxe, a deſperate villayne among them, whoſe tole the noble man vſed, eſpying both his hands occupyed, and his body enclining downewards, ſtill as he ſtroke watched when hee ſo ſtouped, and with an axe cleft his head in ſunder, little eſteeming the tornients that for this trayterous acte enſued. This Lacie was reputed to be the conqueror of Meth, for that hee was the firſte that broughte it to any due order of obedience to the Engliſhe power. His body the two Archbiſhops, Iohn of Dublin, and Mathew of Caſſeill buried in the Monaſterie of Beeſtie, and his head in Sainte Thomas Abbey at Dublin.

By occaſion of this murder committed on the perſon of Hugh Lacie, Iohn Curcy and Hugh Lacie the yonger, with their aſſiſtants, did ſtraight execution vpon the Rebels, and preuenting euery miſchiefe ere it fell, ſtayed the Realm from vproares. Thus they knitting themſelues togither in friendſhip, continued in wealth and honor vntill the firſt yeere of King Iohns raigne, who ſucceeding his brother King Richard, tooke his nephew Arthur, ſonne to his brother Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and diſpatched him, ſome ſayde with his owne handes, becauſe he knew what clayme he made to the Crowne, as diſcended of the elder brother, and therefore not only the French King, but alſo certayne Lordes of Englande and Irelande fauored his title, and when they vnderſtoode that he was made away, they tooke it in maruellous euil part. And Curcy either of zeale to the truth, or parcialitie, abhorring ſuch barbarous crueltie, whereof al mens eares were full, ſpake bloudy words againſt K. Iohn, whiche his lurking aduerſaries (ẏ lay ready to vndermine him) caught by ẏ end, & vſed ẏ ſame as a meane to lift him out of credit, which they did not only bring to paſſe, but alſo procured a commiſſion to attach his body, & to ſend him ouer into England. Erle Curcy miſtruſting his part, & by like getting ſome inckling of their drift, kepte himſelfe alowe, till Hugh Lacy lorde Iuſtice was fayne to leuie an army & to inuade Vlſter, from whence he was oftētimes put backe: whervpō he proclaimed Curcy traytor & hired ſundry gētlemē with promiſe of great recōpence, to bring him in, eyther quicke or dead. They fought once at Doune, in whiche battell, there dyed no ſmall number on both partes, but Curcy gote the vpper hand, and ſo was the Lord Iuſtice foyled at Curcies hands, but yet ſo long hee continued in practiſing to haue him, that at length Curcies owne Captaynes were inueyghed to betray their maiſter, inſomuche, ẏ vppon good Friday, whileſt the Earle out of his armour viſited barefooted certayne Religious houſes for deuotion ſake, they leyde for him, tooke him as a Rebell, and ſhipped him ouer into Englande the next way, where hee was adiudged to perpetuall priſon. One Saintleger addeth in his collections, as Campion ſaith, that Lacie payed the traytors their money, and forthwith there vppon hanged them.

Tranſlation of Prebendaries to Mōks.

This Curcy tranſlated the Church and Prebendaries of the Trinitie in Doune, to an Abbey of blacke Monkes brought thither from Cheſter, & cauſed the ſame to be conſecrated vnto S. Patrick: for which alteration, taking the name from God to a creature, he deemed himſelfe worthily puniſhed. Not long after (as ſay the Iriſh) certain French knightes came to king Iohns court, and one among them required the combate for triall of the right to the Duchie of Normandy. It was not thought expedient to iooperd the title vpō one mans lucke, yet the chalenge they determined to anſwer. Some friende put them in minde of the Erle impriſoned, a warriour of notable courage, and in pitch of body like a Giant. K. Iohn demāded Curcy, whether he could be content to fighte in his quarrel, not for thee ſaid ẏ Erle, whoſe perſon I eſteeme vnworthy ẏ aduēture of my bloud, but for ẏ crowne and dignitie of the Realme, in which many a good man liueth againſt thy will, I ſhall be content to hazard my life.

He taketh vpon him to defende the chalenge.

Theſe

Theſe woꝛdes were not conſtrued in the woꝛſt part as pꝛoceeding from an offended mind of him that was therein eſteemed, moꝛe playne thā wiſe. Therefoꝛe being cheriſhed and muche made of, he was fedde ſo wōderfully (nowe he came to large allowaunce in dyet after harde keeping) that the Frenche chalenger toke him foꝛ a Monſter, and fearing to deale with him, priuily ſtale away into Spayne. It is further repoꝛted, that the French King, being deſirous to ſee Curcy, requeſted K. John that he might come beſoꝛe them, and ſhewe of what ſtrength hee was by ſtriking a blowe at an helmet. Herevpon foꝛth he was bꝛoughte, and pꝛeſented beſoꝛe the Kings, where was an Helmet ſet vpon a blocke. Curcy taking a ſwoꝛde in his hande, and with a ſterne frowning countenance caſt vpon the Kings, gaue ſuch a ſtroke to the helmet, that cleauing it in ſunder, the ſwoꝛde ſticked ſo faſt in the logge, that no mā there was able to plucke it foꝛthe, excepte Curcy him ſelfe. When he therefoꝛe had plucked foꝛth the ſwoꝛd, the Kings aſked him what he meant to looke vpon them with ſuch a grimme and froward cōuntenance beſoꝛe he gaue the blowe to the helmet; he aunſwered, that if he had miſſed in his ſtroke, he would haue killed all the whole company, as well the Kings as other. Then was he releaſed of bondes, and croſſing the Seas towards Ireland whether he was boune, was fifteene times beaten backe agayne to the Engliſhe ſhoꝛe: and going into France to change the coaſt dyed there. This Curcy was whyte of colour, mightie of limmes, with large bones and ſtrong of ſynewes, tall and bꝛoade in pꝛopoꝛtion of body, ſo as hys ſtrength was thought to exceede, of boldneſſe incomparable, and a warriour euen from his youth, the foꝛmoſt in the front of euery battell where hee came, and euer ready to hazard himſelfe in place of moſt daunger, ſo foꝛeward in fight, that oftentimes foꝛgetting the office of a Captaine, he toke in hande the part of a Souldiour, pꝛeſſing foꝛthe with the foꝛmoſt, ſo that with his ouer raſh violence, and deſire of victoꝛy, he might ſeeme to put all in daunger. But although he was thus haſtie and hote in the field againſt his enimies, yet was hee in conuerſation modeſt and ſober, and very religious, hauing Churchmen in great reuerence, aſcribing all to the goodneſſe of God, when he had atchieued any pꝛayſeworthy enterpꝛiſe, yeelding thankes to his diuine Maieſtie accoꝛdingly. But as ſeldome times any one man is founde perfecte in all things, ſo theſe vertues were ſpotted with ſome vices, namely too much nigardneſſe in ſparing, and inconſtancie. He maried the daughter of Godꝛed King of Man, and after many conflicts and battayles had againſt the Iriſhe, he conquered (as beſoꝛe ye haue heard) the countrey of Vlſter, and building diuers ſtrong Caſtels therein, he eſtabliſhed the ſame vnder his quiet rule, and gouernement, till he and Lacy fell out as beſoꝛe is expꝛeſſed.

After Curcies deceaſſe, bicauſe he left no heires, the Earledome of Vlſter was giuen vnto Hugh Lacie, in recompence of his good ſeruice. There was one of the Curcies remayning in Irelande, that was Lorde of Rathemy and Kilbarrocke, whome (as an eſpiall of all their pꝛactiſes, and informer thereof to the King Walter and Hugh, the ſonnes of Hugh Lacy ſlew, by reaſon wherof, great trouble and diſquietneſſe enſued, thoſe Lacies bearing themſelues (nowe after the deceaſſe of their father) foꝛ gouernoꝛs out of checke. To ſet the Realme in quiet, King John was fayne to paſſe thither himſelfe in perſon, with a mayne army, baniſhed the Lacies, ſubdued the reſidue of the countrey, yet not conquered, toke pledges, puniſhed malefactoꝛs, eſtabliſhed the execution of Engliſh lawes, coyned money of like valew currant ſterling in both Realmes.

king Iohn went into Ireland.

The two Lacies repenting their miſdemeanoꝛs, fledde into Fraunce diſguiſed in poꝛe apparell, and ſerued there in an Abbey as gardiners, vntill the Abbot by their countenaunce and behauiour began to geſſe their eſtates, and apposed them ſo farre, that they diſcloſed what they were, beſeeching the Abbot to keepe their counſels, who commending their repentant humblenеſſe, aduiſed thē yet to make ſute foꝛ their pꝛinces fauoꝛ, if it might be hadde, pꝛomiſing to doe what he could in the matter, and ſo toke vppon him to bee a ſutoꝛ foꝛ them vnto the King, that was his godcept and well acquainted with him. He trauelled ſo earneſtly herein, that at length he obteyned their pardons. But yet they were fined; Walter at four thouſand, and Hugh at fiue and twentie hundꝛed markes, and herevpon, Walter was reſtoꝛed vnto ẏ Lordſhip of Meth, & Hugh, to the Earledome of Vlſter.

They fled into Fraunce.

William Veſcy Lorde Iuſtice.

In the yere. 1292. a fiftenth was graunted to the King, of all the temporall goodes in Ireland, whileſt Veſcy was as yet Lord Juſtice.

This Veſcy was a ſterne manne and full of courage, he called John Earle of Kildare before him, charging him with riots foule & miſdemeanors, for that he ranged abroade, and ſoughte reuenge vpon priuate diſpleaſures out of all order, and not for any aduauncemente of the publike wealth or ſeruice of his ſouereigne.

and by King Edwardes hand (for that was accompted no ſmall oth in thoſe dayes among the Iriſh) you would if you durſt appech me in plain tearmes of treaſon or felonie: for where I haue the title, & you the fleece of Kildare, I wote well how great an eye ſore I am in your ſight, ſo that if I might be handſomly truſſed vp for a fellone, then might my maſter youre ſonne become a Gentleman: a Gentleman quoth the Juſtice, thou proude Erle, I tell thee, the Uelcies were Gentlemen before Kildare was an Earledome, & before that Welch bankrupt thy couſin, fethered hys neſt in Leynſter. But ſeeing thou dareſt me, I will ſurely breake thy hart, and therewith he called the Earle a notorious theefe and a murderer. Then followed facing and bracing among the Souldiers, with high words, and terrible ſwearing on both ſides, vntil either parte appeaſed his owne.

The Lord Juſtice ſhortly after, leauing his deputie William Hay, toke the ſea, and haſted ouer to ỳ King. The Earle immediatly followed, and as heynouſly as the Lorde Juſtice accuſed him of felony, Kildare no leſſe appealed hym of treaſon. For triall hereof, ỳ Erle asked ỳ cõbate, & Uelcy refuſed not: but yet when the liſtes were prouided, Uelcy was ſlipt away into Fraunce, & ſo diſenherited of all his lãds in ỳ countie of Kildare, which wer beſtowed vpõ ỳ Erle & his heires for euer. The Erle waxing loftie of mind in ſuch proſperous ſucceſſe, ſquared with diuers nobles, Engliſh & Iriſh of ỳ land. D. Edwarde ¶ Edwarde the ſeconde.

RIchard Archbiſhop of Dublin, after he hadde gouerned that Sea the ſpace of fiue yeeres, by reaſon of a viſion that he ſawe in his ſleepe, feeling himſelfe troubled in conſcience, with conſideration of that dreame, reſigned the nexte morrow al his title to the Archbiſhops dignitie (as before ye haue heard) and contented himſelfe with other eccleſiaſticall benefices, as ſeemed conuenient to his eſtate. This yeere by vertue of letters directed from the Pope to the K. of England, hee cauſed al the templers as wel in Englād as Ireland, to be apprehended, & committed to ſafekeeping. The profeſſion of theſe templers beganne at Ieruſalem, by certayn Gentlemen ẏ remained in an Hoſtell neere to the Temple, who til ẏ counſel of Troiz in France, were not increaſed aboue the number of. 9. but frō that time forth, in little more than fiftie yeeres, by the zealous contributiō of al Chriſtian Realmes, they had houſes erected euery where, with liuings bountifully aſſigned to ẏ ſame for their maintenance, in ſo much, as they were augmented vnto the number of three hundred, that were Knightes of that order, beſide inferiour brethrē innumerable: but now with welth they ſo forgot themſelues, that they nothing leſſe regarded, than the purpoſe of their foundatiō: and withal being accuſed of horrible hereſies (whether in all things iuſtly or otherwiſe the Lorde knoweth) they were in the counſel at Lions in Frāce condemned, and their liuings tranſpoſed to the knights Hoſpitalers, otherwiſe called ẏ Knights of the Rodes, and nowe of Malta. The manner of their apprehenſion and committing was ſuddayne, and ſo generally in all places vppon one day, that they had no time to ſhift for thēſelues. For firſt, the King ſente forth a precept to euery Sheriſe within the Realme of Englande, commaunding them within each of their roumths to cauſe a preſcribed number of Knightes, or rather ſuch men of credite, on whoſe fidelities he might aſſure himſelfe, to aſſemble at a certayne towne, named in the ſame writte, the Sunday next after the Epiphany, and that each of the ſame Sheriſes failed not to bee there the ſame day to execute all that ſhoulde be enioyned them by any other writte, then and there to be deliuered. The Sheriſe of Yorke was commaunded to gyue ſommonance to. 24. ſuch Knightes, or other ſufficient men, to meete him at Yorke. The Sheriſe of Norfolke and Suffolke, was appoynted to ſommone twentie to meete him at Thetford, the other Sheriſes were appoynted to call to them ſome tenne, ſome twelue, or ſome fourteene, to meete them at ſuch Townes as in their writtes were named. The date of this writte was, from Weſtminſter the fifteenth of December, in the firſte yeere of thys King Edwarde the ſeconde raigne: the other writte was ſent by a Chapleyne authorized both to deliuer the ſame writte, and to take an othe of the Sheriſe, that he ſhould not diſcloſe the contentes, till he had put the ſame in execution, which was, to attache by aſſiſtance of thoſe aforementioned Knightes, or as many of them as he thought expedient to vſe, al the templers within the precinct of hys roumth, and to ſeaze all their landes, goodes, and Cattells, into the Kings handes, and to cauſe an Inuentarie of the ſame indented be made in preſence of the Warden of the place, whether he were Knighte of the order, or any other, and in preſence of other honeſt men neyghbours thereabouts, keeping the one counterpane with himſelfe, ſealed with hys ſeale that made the ſeazure, and leauing the other in the hands of the ſayde Warden: and further to ſee the ſame goodes and Cattels to bee put in ſafekeeping, and to prouide that the quicke goodes might be well kept and looked vnto, and the groundes manured to the moſt profit, and to cauſe the bodies of the templers attached, to be ſo detayned in al ſafetie, as that they be not yet cōmitted to Irons nor to ſtreyght priſon, but to remayne in ſome conuenient place other than their owne houſes, and to be found of the goods ſo ſeazed, accordingly as falleth for their eſtates, till he haue otherwiſe in commaundemente from the King: and what is done herein, to certifie into the Eſcheker the morrowe after the Purification. The date of this ſeconde writte was, from Biſket the twentith of December. There was lykewiſe a writte directed to John Wogan, Lorde Iuſtice of Irelande, ſignifying vnto him what ſhould be done in England, touching the apprehēſion of the Templers, and ſeazure of their lāds and goodes, commaunding him to proceede in ſemblable manner againſt them in Irelande: but the day and place when the Sheriſes ſhould there aſſemble, was lefte to the diſcretion of the ſayde Iuſtice and Treaſorer of the Eſcheker there, but ſo as the ſame might be done, before any rumour of this thing coulde be brought ouer out of England thither. Alſo a like commaundemente was ſent vnto John de Britaigne Erle of Richmōd, Lorde Warden of Scotlande, and to Euſtace Cotelbache Chamberlayne of Scotland: Alſo to Walter de Pederton Lorde Iuſtice of Weſt Wales, to Hugh Aldigheleygh, Alias Audeley Lord Iuſtice of North Wales, and to Roberte Holland Lord Iuſtice of Cheſter. Thus muche for the Templers. But now to other doings in Irelande. In the yeere. 1308. the. xij. of Aprill, deceaſſed Peter de Birmingham a noble warriour, and one that had bin no ſmall ſcourge to the Iriſh. The eleuenth of May, the Caſtell of Kennun was brente, and dyuers of them that hadde it in keeping were ſlayne by William Macwabther

John Wogan hauing occaſion to paſſe into England, William Burgh ſupplied his rowmth, vnto whome Kyng Edwarde recommended Peers de Gauceſton, when contrary to the kings minde he was baniſhed by the Lordes of Englande, and about the Natiuitie of oure Lady, hee came ouer into Irelande, beeyng ſente thyther by the King with many Jewels, and beſide the letters which he brought of recommendation from the King, he had aſſigned to him the commodities royall of that Realme, whiche bredde ſome trouble and bickerings there, betwixte Richarde Burgh Earle of Ulſter, and the ſayd Gauceſton, who notwithſtanding bought the good willes of the Souldiers with his liberalitie, ſlew Dermot Odempey, ſubdued Obren, edifyed ſundry Caſtels, Cauſeys, and bridges, but the next yeere, he was reuoked home by the King, as in the hiſtory of England it may appeare.

In the vigill of Simon and Jude, the Lorde Roger Mortimer landed in Irelande with hys wife, righte heire to the Seigneurie of Meth, as daughter to Piers Genuille, that was ſonne vnto the Lord Geffrey Genuille, whiche Geffrey became a Frier at Trym of the order of ẏ Preachers: by reaſon whereof, the Lorde Mortimer and his wife entred into poſſeſſion of the landes of Meth. In the yeere. 1309. on Candlemas day, the Lorde John Bonneuill was ſlayne neere to the towne of Ardſcoll, by the Lorde Arnold Power, and his complices, his body was buried at Athy in the Church of the Friers Preachers. At lengthe, yet the ſayde Roberte Uerdon, and many of hys complices came, and ſubmitted themſelues to pziſon, within the Caſtell of Dublin, abidyng there the Kings mercie.

The Lozd Edmond Butler was made deputie Juſtice vnder the Lozde John Wogan, who in the lent next enſuing, beſieged the Obzenes in Glindelowe, and compelled them to yeelde themſelues to the Kings peace.

Alſo the Lozd Edmond Butler created. xxx. Knightes in the Caſtell of Dublin, on Sainte Michaels day, being Sunday. The Knightes Hoſpitallers oz of Sainte Johns as they were called, were inueſted in the lāds of the Templers in Ireland.

The ſame yeere was the Lozde Theobalde Uerdon ſent Lozd Juſtice into Irelande.

In the ninth yeere of King Edwards raigne, Edward Bzuce, bzother to Robert Bzuce King of Scottes, entred the Nozthe part of Irelande with fiue thouſand men. There were with hym diuers Captaynes of high renowne among the Scottiſhe Nation, of whome the chiefe were theſe, the Earles of Murrey and Menteth, the Lozd John Stewarde, the Lozd John Cambell, the Lozde Thomas Randolfe, Fergus de Indzeſſan, John Wood, and John Biſſet. They landed neere to Crag Fergus in Ulſter the fiue and twentith of May, and ioyning with the Iriſh, conquered the Earledome of Ulſter, and gaue ẏ Engliſh there diuers great ouerthzowes, toke the towne of Dundalke, ſpoyled and bzente it, with a greate parte of Vrgile: they bzente Churches and Abbeyes, with the people whome they founde in the ſame, ſparing neyther manne, woman noz childe. Then was the Lozd Edmonde Butler choſen Lozde Juſtice, who made the Earle of Ulſter and ẏ Giraldines friends, and reconciled himſelfe with Sir John Maundeuill, thus ſeeking to pzeſerue the reſidue of the Realme which Edwarde Bzuce meant wholly to conquere, hauing cauſed himſelfe to be crowned ned K. of Ireland. The Lord Juſtice aſſembled a great power out of Mounſter and Leyniſter, and other parties thereaboutes, and the Earle of Ulſter with an other armie came vnto him neere vnto Dundalke, where they conſulted togyther how to deale in defending the countrey agaynſte the enimies: but hearing the Scottes were withdrawen backe, the Erle of Ulſter followed them, and fighting with them at Coyners, hee loſt the fielde.

There were many ſlayne on both partes, and William de Burgh the Earles brother, Sir John Mandeuill, and Sir Alane Fitz Alane were taken priſoners. Heerewith the Iriſhe of Connagh and Meth began forthwith to rebell againſt the Engliſhmen, and brente the Caſtell of Athlon and Randon. And the Bruce comming forwarde, brente Kenlis in Meth, and Granard, alſo Finnagh and New Caſtell, and kept his Chriſtmas at Loghſudy. From thence he went through the Countrey vnto Rathymegan and Kildare, to the parties about Triſteldermot and Athie, then to Raban and Sketlier nere to Ardſcoll in Leyniſter, where the Lord Juſtice Butler, the Lord John Fitz Thomas, the Lorde Arnold Power and other the Lords and Gentlemen of Leyniſter and Mounſter came to encoũter the Bruce: but through diſcorde that roſe among them, they left the field vnto the enimies, Sir William Prendergaſt Knighte, and Haymond le Grace a righte valiaunte Eſquire were ſlayne there. And on the Scottiſhe ſide, Sir Fergus Indreſſan, and Sir Walter Morrey, with diuers other that were buried in the Churche of the Friers Preachers at Athy. After this, the Bruce in his returne towardes Meth, brente the Caſtell of Ley, and ſo paſſed forthe till hee came to Kenlys in Meth. In which meane time, Roger Lorde Mortimer, truſting to winne hymſelf fame if he might ouerthrow the enimies, called forthe fifteene M. men, and vnderſtanding ẏ the Scottes were come to Kenlys, made thytherwards, and there encountring with them, was put to the worſe, his men (as was ſuppoſed) wilfully ſhrinking from him, as thoſe that bare him hollow hartes. With the newes of this ouerthrowe, vpſtart the Iriſh of Mounſter, the Otoolies, Obriens, Omores, and with fire & ſworde waſted all from Arelowe to Leix. With them coped the Lorde Juſtice, and made of them a great ſlaughter. 80. of their heades were ſente to the Caſtell of Dublin.

In time of theſe troubles and warres in Irelande by the inuaſion thus of the Scottes, certayne Iriſhe Lordes, faithfull men and true ſubiectes to the King of England, did not only promiſe to continue in their loyall obeyſance towards him, beeing their ſoueraigne Prince, but alſo for more aſſurance, deliuered hoſtages to bee kept within the Caſtell of Dublin. The names of whiche Lordes that were ſo contented to aſſure their allegiance were theſe, John Fitz Thomas Lord of Offalie, Richard de Clare, Morice Fitz Thomas, Thomas Fitz John le Power Baron of Donoille, Arnolde le Power, Morice de Rochfort, Dauid de la Roche, and Miles de la Roche. Theſe and diuers other reſiſted with all their might and mayne the iniurious attempts of the Scottes, although the Scots had drawen to their ſide, the moſt parte of the wilde Iriſh, and no ſmall number alſo of the Engliſhe Iriſhe, as well Lordes, as other of meaner calling, ſo that the countrey was miſerably afflicted, what by the Scottes on the one parte, and the Iriſh Rebels on the other, which Rebels notwithſtanding were ouerthrowen in diuers par-

The Lord Richarde Birmingham had an Eſquire that belonged to him called John Huſley, whome by commaundemente of his maiſter, went forthe to take view of the dead bodies, and to bring him worde, whether Okelli his mortall foe were ſlayne among the reſidue. Huſſey comming into the fielde with one man to turne vp and ſurvey the dead carcaſſes, was ſtraight eſpyed by Okelli, that lay lurking in a brake buſhe thereby, who hauing had good proofe of Huſſey his valiancie afore that time, lōged ſore to traine him from his Captayne, and preſuming nowe vpon this good opportunitie, diſcouered hymſelfe, not doubting, but eyther to winne him with curteous perſwaſions, or by force to worke hys will of hym, and ſo comming to him, ſayde: Huſſey, thou ſeeſt I am at all poyntes armed, and haue my Squire here likewiſe furniſhed with Armour and weapon, ready at myne elbow, thou arte naked with thy Page, a yongling, and not to bee accōpted of, ſo that if I loued not thee, and ment to ſpare thee for thyne owne ſake, I might nowe do with thee what I would, and ſlea thee for thy maſters ſake, but come and ſerue me vpon thys requeſt heere made to thee, and I promiſe thee by Sainte Patricks ſtaffe, to make thee a Lorde in Connagh of more poſſeſſions, than thy maiſter hath in Irelande. When theſe words mighte nothing way him, his owne man (a great ſtoute lubber) beganne to reproue hym of follie, for not conſenting to ſo large an offer, which was aſſured with an oth, whereupon he durſt guage hys ſoule for performance. Now had Huſſey three enimies, and firſt therefore turning to his knaue, he diſpatched him, next he raught vnto Okellyes Eſquire ſuch a knocke vnder the pitte of the eare, that downe he came to the grounde, and there hee laye. Thirdly, he layd ſo about hym, that ere any help coulde be looked for, he had alſo ſlaine Okelly, and perceyuing the Eſquire to be but aſtonied he recouered him, and holp him vp againe, and after he was somewhat come to hymſelfe, he forced hym vpō a troncheō, to beare his Lords head into the high towne before him, who did ſo, and Huſſey preſented it to Birmingham, who after the circumſtaunces declared, hee dubbed Huſſey Knight, aduaūcing him to many preferments. The ſucceſſors of that familie afterwardes were Barons of Galtrim. Sir Thomas Mandeuill and other in this meane while made oftentymes enterpriſes againſt the Scottes, and ſlew diuers of them in ſundry conflictes. But howſoeuer it chanced, wee fynde recorded by Henry Marlebugh, that eyther the ſayd Sir Thomas Mandeuill (that thus valiantly behaued hymſelfe againſt the Scottes) or ſome other bearing the ſame name, and his brother alſo called John Mandeuill were both ſlayne ſhortly after at Downe vppon their comming forthe of Englande, by the Scottes that were readye there to aſſayle them.

Sir Thomas Mandeuill ſlayne.

Thus may wee ſee, that thoſe Lordes and Knightes, whiche had giuen pledges for theyr loyaltie to the King of Englande, ſought by all wayes and meanes howe to beate backe the enimies, whiche they mighte haue done with more eaſe, if the Iriſh had not aſſiſted the Scottes, and preſuming of theyr ayde, rebelled in ſundry parts of the countrey, who neuertheleſſe, were oftentimes well chaſtiſed for their diſloyall dealings, as partly we haue touched, although wee omitte diuers ſmall ouerthrowes and other particuler matters, ſith otherwiſe wee ſhould encreaſe thys Booke further than our firſte purpoſed intente woulde permitte.

Whileſt the Scottes were thus holden vp in Irelande that they could not in all things worke theyr willes, Roberte le Brews King of Scots came ouer himſelfe, landed at Cragfergus to the ayde of his brother, whoſe Souldiers moſt wickedly entred into Churches, ſpoyling and defacing the ſame of all ſuche tombes, monumentes, plate, Copes, and other ornamentes whiche they founde, and myghte lay handes vppon.

The Lorde Thomas, ſonne to the Earle of Ulſter departed this life.

And on the Sunday next after ẏ Natiuitie of our Lady, ẏ Lord John Fitz Thomas deceaſſed at Laragh Brine neere to Maynoth, & was buried at Kildare, in the Church of ẏ Friers Preachers. This John Fitz Thomas, a little before his deathe, was created Earle of Kildare, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Thomas Fitz John a right wiſe and prudent perſonage.

The fourteenth of September, Conhor Mackele, and fiue hundred Iriſhmen were ſlayne by the Lord William de Burgh, and Lord Richard Birmingham in Connagh. Alſo on ẏ Monday after the feaſt of all Saintes, John Loggan and Sir Hugh Biſſet ſlewe a great nũber of Scots, among the whiche were. 100. with double armours, and. 200. with ſingle armours: ſo that of their men of armes, there dyed three hundred beſide footemen.

The fifteenth of Nouember chanced a mighty tempeſt of wynde and rayne, whiche threwe downe many houſes, with the Steeple of the Trinitie Church in Dublin, and did much other hurt both by land and water.

The fifth of December, Sir Alane Stewarde that had bin taken priſoner in Ulſter by John Loggan, and Sir John Sandale, was brought to the Caſtell of Dublin.

1317 After Candlemas, the Lacies came to Dublin, and procured an inqueſt to be impanelled to inquire of their demeanor, for that they were accuſed to haue procured the Scottes to come into Irelande: but by that inqueſt they were diſcharged, and therewith toke an oth to keepe the kings peace, and to deſtroy the Scots to the vttermoſt of theyr power.

In the beginning of Lent, the Scottes came in ſecret wiſe vnto Slane, with twẽtie thouſand armed mẽ: and with them came the army of Ulſter, deſtroying all the countrey before them.

Moreouer, on Monday before the Feaſt of S. Mathias the Apoſtle, the Earle of Ulſter lying in the Abbey of Sainte Mary neere to Dublin, Robert Notingham Maire of that Citie, with the communaltie of the ſame went thither, toke the Earle, and put him in priſon within the Caſtell of Dublin, ſlew. vij. of his men, and ſpoyled the Ibbey.

The ſame weeke, Edwarde Bruce marched towardes Dublin, but heerewith, turning to the Caſtell of Cnocke, he entred the ſame, and toke Hugh Tyrrell the Lorde thereof, togither with his wife, and raunſommed them for a ſumme of money. The Citizens of Dublin brent all theyr ſuburbes for feare of a ſiege, and made the beſt purueyance they coulde to defende their Citie, if the Bruce had come to haue beſieged them: but he turning another way, went vnto the towne of Naas, and was guided thither by the Lacies, cõtrary to their othe.

From thence, he paſſed vnto Triſtledermot, and ſo to Baliganam, and to Callan, at length he came to Lymerike, and there remayned till after Eaſter.

They of Ulſter ſent to the Lorde Juſtice lamentable informations of ſuche cruelties as the enimies practiſed in thoſe partes, beſeeching hym to take ſome order for their reliefe in that theyr ſo miſerable eſtate. The Lorde Juſtice deliuered to them the Kings power with his ſtandard, wherewith vnder pretence to expell the Scottes, they gote vp in armour, and ranging through the countrey, did more vexe and moleſt the ſubiectes, than did the ſtrangers. The Scots proceeded and ſpoyled Caſſhels, and whereſoeuer they lyghte vpon the Butlers lands, they brente and ſpoyled them vnmercifully.

The Kings ſtanderd deliuered to them of Vlſter.

In this meane while, had the Lord Juſtice, and Thomas Fitz John Earle of Kildare, Richard de Clare, and Arnold le Power, Baron of Donnoill, leuied an armie of thirtie thouſande men, readie to goe againſte the enimies, and to giue them battayle, but no good was done, for about the ſame time, the Lord Roger Mortimer was ſent into Irelande as Lord Juſtice, and lãding at Poghall, wrote his letters vnto the Lord Butler, and to the other Captaynes, willing thẽ not to fighte, till he came with ſuch power as he had brought ouer with him. Whereof the Bruce being warned, retired firſt towardes Kildare: but yet after this he came vnto foure miles of Trym, where he lay in a wood, and loſt many of his men through famine, and ſo at length. about the beginning of May, he returned into Ulſter.

Roger Mortimer iuſtice of Irelande.

The Lorde Edmonde Butler made greate ſlaughter of the Iriſhe neere to Triſtledermot, and likewiſe at Balitehan, hee hadde a good hande of Omorthe, and ſlewe manye of hys men. The Lorde Mortimer pacifyed the diſpleaſure and variance betwixt Richarde Earle of Ulſter, and the Nobles that had put the ſayde Earle vnder ſafekeping within ẏ Caſtell of Dublin, accuſing him of certaine riots committed to the preiudice and loſſe of the Kings ſubiectes, whereby the Scottes increaſed in ſtrength and courage, whoſe ſpoyling of the countrey cauſed ſuch horrible ſcarcitie in Ulſter, that the Souldiers which the yeere before abuſed the Kings authoritie to purueay themſelues of ouer fine diet, ſurfetted with fleſhe and Aqua vite all the Lente long, prolled & pilled inſatiably, where ſoeuer they came without neede, and without regarde of the poore people, whoſe onely prouiſion they deuoured.

Theſe people nowe liuing in ſlaucrie vnder the Bruce, ſterued for hunger, hauing firſt experienced many lamentable ſhiftes, euen to the eating of dead carcaſſes.

The Earle of Vlſter deliuered.

The Earle of Vlſter was deliuered by maine price, and vpon his oth, by the whiche hee vndertoke neuer to ſeeke reuenge of hys apprehenſion otherwiſe, than by order of lawe, and ſo had daye giuen him vnto the feaſt of Natiuitie of Sainte Iohn Baptiſt, but he kept not his day, whether for that hee miſtruſted to ſtande in triall of hys cauſe, or through ſome other reaſonable let, I can not tell.

Great dearth.

A great dearth this yeere afflicted the Iriſhe people, for a meaſure of Wheate called a chronecke was ſold at foure and twentie Shillings, and a cronecke of otes at ſixteene Shillings, and all other victayles likewiſe were ſolde, accordyng to the ſame rate, for all the whole countrey was ſore waſted by the Scottes and them of Vlſter, in ſo muche that no ſmall number of people periſhed through famine.

About the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the Lord Iuſtice Mortimer toke his iourney towards Droghda, and ſent to the Lacies, commaunding them to come vnto him: but they refuſed ſo to do: whereupon he ſente Sir Hugh Croftes vnto them to talke with them about ſome agreement of peace, but they ſlew the meſſenger, for whome greate lamentation was made, for that he was reputed and knowne to be a right worthy knighte.

Sir Hugh Croftes ſlayne.

The Lord Iuſtice ſore offended herewith, gathereth an army, and goeth againſte the Lacies, whome he chaſed out of Connagh, ſo that Hugh Lacie, withdrewe into Vlſter, and there ioyned himſelfe with Edward Bruce. Whereupon, on the Thurſday next before the feaſt of Sainte Margaret the ſaid Hugh Lacie, and alſo Walter Lacie, were proclaymed Traytours.

The Lacyes reuolte to the Scottes.

This yeere paſſed very troubleſome vnto the whole Realm of Irelād, as wel through ſlaughter betwixt the parties enimies one to another, as by dearth and other miſfortunes.

Hugh Cannon the Kyngs Iuſtice of hys bench was ſlayne by Andrew Bermingham, betwixt the towne of Naas and Caſtell Warten. 1318

Alſo in the feaſt of the purification, the Popes Bulles were publiſhed, whereby Alexander Bignore was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Dublin. About the ſame time was great ſlaughter made of Iriſhmen, through a quarrell betwixt two greate Lordes in Connagh, ſo that there dyed in fighte

Walter Iſlep treaſorer of Irelande.

After Eaſter, Walter Iſlep Treaſurer of Irelande, was ſent ouer into ẏ Realme, who brought letters to the Lorde Mortimer, commaundyng hym to returne into England vnto ẏ king: which he dyd, and departing forth of Ireland, remayned indebted to ẏ Citizens of Dublin for his proviſiō of victayles, in the ſumme of a thouſand pounds, wherof he payde not one farthing, ſo that many a bitter curſe he carried with him to the ſea, leauing William Archbiſhop of Caſſhell Lord Chancellor, gouernor of the lande in his place: ſo by this meane was the ſayd Archbiſhop both Chancellor and Iuſtice, and ſo continued till the feaſt of S. Michael, at what time Alexander Bignor Archbiſhop of Dublin arriued at Pogball, beeing conſtituted Lorde Iuſtice, and came to Dublin on Saint Dionile day, being ẏ ſeuenth of Octobre.

But here is to be remembred, ẏ a little before the departure of the Lord Mortimer forth of Ireland, to witte the fifth of May, the Lord Richard de Clare with foure Knightes, ſir Henry Capell, Sir Thomas de Naas, Sir James Caunton, and Sir Iohn Caunton.

The Lord Richard de Clare ſlayne.

Alſo Adam Apilgard and other, to the number of foureſcore perſons, were ſlayne by Obrene and Maccarthy.

It was ſayde, that the enimies in deſpite, cauſed the Lorde Richardes bodie to bee cut in peeces, ſo to ſatisfye their malicious ſtomackes: but the ſame peeces were yet afterwardes buried in the Churche of the Friers Minors at Limerike.

Alſo before the Lorde Mortimers returne into Englande, Iohn Lacye was hadde forthe of the Caſtell of Dublin, and carryed to Trim, where hee was arreygned and adiudged iudged to be preſſed to death, and ſo he died in priſon.

But now to returne vnto the doings in time of Bignors gouernment. Immediatly vpon his arriuall the Lorde John Birmingham being generall of the fielde, and hauing with him diuerſe Captaines of worthie fame, namely ſir Richarde Tute, ſir Miles Verdon, ſir Hugh Trippetton, ſir Herbert Sutton, ſir John Cuſacke, ſir Edmõd Birmingham, ſir William Birmingham, Walter Birmingham the primate of Ardmagh, ſir Walter de la Pulle, and John Maupas, ledde forth the kings power to the number of .1224. able men againſt Edward Bruce, who being accompanied with the Lord Philip Mowbray, the lord Walter de Soules, the Lorde Alaine Stewarde, with his three brethren, ſir Walter, and ſir Hugh, ſir Robert, and ſir Aymerie Lacies, and others, was encamped not paſt two miles from Dundalke with three thouſande men there abyding the Engliſhmen, to fight with them if they came forward, which they did with all conuenient ſpeed, being as deſirous to giue battaile as the Scottes were to receyue it.

The victorie thus obteyned vpon Saint Calixtus day, made an end of the Scottiſh kingdom in Irelande, and Lorde Birmingham ſending the head of Bruce into Englande, or as Marleburgh hath, being the meſſenger himſelfe, preſented it to king Edwarde, who in recompence gaue to him and his heyres Wales, the Earledome of Louth, and the Baronie of Ardich and Athenrie to him and his heyres generall for euer.

Shortly after ſir Richard de Clare with foure other knightes of name, and many other men of warre were ſlaine in Thomond, the Lord Roger Mortimer came againe into Ireland to gouerne as Lorde iuſtice there nowe the ſecond time, and the townes of Athelſell and Plebs were brent by the Lorde Fitz Thomas, brother to the Lorde Maurice Fitz Thomas. And about this ſeaſon the bridge of Kilcolyn was buylded by Maurice Jakis.

In the yeare following, to wit. 1320. which was the .xiiij. of king Edwards raigne, Thomas Fitz John Erle of Kildare was made Lord Iuſtice of Irelande.

Here is to be remembred, that about this time also, Alexander Bignore Archbiſhop of Dublyn, ſent to Pope John the .xxij. for a priuiledge to inſtitute an Vniuerſitie within the citie of Dublyn, and his ſuite toke effect. And the firſt three Doctors of Diuinitie did the ſayde Archbiſhop himſelfe create, William Hardity a Frier preacher, Henrie Cogie a Frier minor, and Frier Edmond Bermerden: and beſide theſe one Doctor of Canon, to wit, Richard Archdeacon of S. Patrikes, that was Chauncellor of the ſame Vniuerſitie, who kept their termes and Cõmencements ſolemnly: neyther was this vniuerſitie at any time ſince diſcontinued, but onely through chaunge of tymes diſcontinued, and now ſince the diſſoluing of Monaſteries vtterly decayed.

An Vniuerſitie erected at Dublyn.

A motion was made (as Campion hath noted) in a Parliament holden there whileſt ſir Henrie Sidney was the Queenes Lieutenant to haue it againe erected, by way of contributions to be layd togyther, the ſayde ſir Henry offering .xx. pounde landes, and an hundred pound in money: Other there were alſo, that according to their abilities and deuotions followed with their offers. The name was deuiſed, A worthie Plantation of Plantagenet and Bulleigne But while they diſputed of a cõuenient place for it, & of other circumſtances, they let fall the principall.

1321 In the yeare. 1321. there was a great ſlaughter made of the Oconhurs at Balibagan, by ỳ Engliſh of Leyniſter & Meth. And John Birminghã Earle of Louth was made L. iuſtice of Irelande.

Rec. Turris. Unto this man whileſt he was Lord iuſtice, the king wrote, cõmaunding him to be with him at Carleil in the Octaues of the Trinitie, in the. xv. yeare of his raigne, with. three. C. men of armes, one. M. hobellares, and ſixe. M footemen, eche of them armed with an aketon, a ſallet, and gloues of Male, which number was to be leuied in that land, beſide three. C. mẽ of armes which the Erle of Ulſter was appoynted to ſerue with in that iourney, which the king at that time intended to make againſt the Scottes. The date of the letter was the third of Aprill.

1322 In the yere. 1322. diuerſe nobles in Ireland departed this life, as the Lord Richard Birminghã, the Lord Edmond Butler, & the Lorde Thomas Percenale. Moreouer the L. Andrew Birminghã, & ſir Richard de la Lõd were ſlain by Onolã.

The Ladie Alice Kettle accuſed of ſorcerie. In theſe dayes liued in the Dioces of Oſſorie the Ladie Alice Ketell, whom the Biſhop aſcited to purge hirſelfe of the faine of inchantment and witchcraft impoſed vnto hir, & to one Petronille and Baſill hir complices. She was charged to haue nightly cõference with a ſpirit called Robin Artiſſon, to whõ ſhe ſacrificed in the high way. ix. red cockes, & ix. peacocks eies. To the houſe of VVilliam my ſonne, Hie all the wealth of Kilkenny towne.

At the firſt conuiction they abiured and did penance, but ſhortly after they were found in relapſe, and then was Petronille burnt at Kilkenny, the other twaine might not be heard of.

She at the houre of hir death accuſed the ſayd William as priuie to their ſorceries, whome the Biſhop helde in durauncc. ix. weekes, forbidding his keepers to eate or to drinke with him, or to ſpeake to him more than once in the day. But at length through the ſuite and inſtance of Arnold le Poer then Seneſchall of Kilkenny, he was deliuered, and after corrupted with brybes the Seneſchal to perſecute the Biſhop, ſo that he thruſt him into priſon for three Monethes. In rifeling the cloſet of the ladie, they found a Wafer of ſacramentall bread, hauing the diuels name ſtamped thereon in ſtead of Jeſus Chriſt, and a Pipe of oyntment, wherewith ſhe greaſed a ſtaffe, vpõ the which ſhe ambled and galloped through thick and thin, when and in what maner ſhe liſted.

This buſineſſe about theſe witches troubled al the ſtate of Ireland, the more, for that the Ladie was ſupported by certaine of the nobilitie, & laſtly conueyed ouer into England, ſince which time it could neuer be vnderſtood what became of hir.

In the yeare. 1326. and laſt of king Edwarde the ſecondes raigne, Richard Burgh Erle of Ulſter departed this life.

Edward the third.

1326 VNneth was the buſineſſe about the Witches at an ende, when it was ſignified that a gentleman of the familie of the Otwlies in Leyniſter named Adam Duffe, poſſeſſed by ſome wicked ſpirit of erroz, denyed obſtinately the incarnation of our ſauiour, the trinitie of perſons in the vnitie of the Godhead, & the reſurrectiõ of the fleſh: as for the holy ſcripture, he ſayde it was but a fable: the virgin Marie he affyrmed to be a womã of diſſolute life: ỳ Apoſtolike ſea erronious. For ſuch kind of aſſertions, he was burnt in Hogging greene be-

In the yeare following, the lord Thomas Fitz John Earle of Kildare, and the Lorde Arnolde Poer, and William Erle of Ulſter, wer ſent ouer into Ireland, and Roger Outlaw prior of ſaint Johns of Ieruſalem in Ireland, commonly called the prior of Kilmaynam, was made Lorde Iuſtice. This man by reaſon of variance that chaunced to riſe betwixt the Giraldines, the Butlers, and Birminghams, on the one ſide, and the Poers and Burghes on the other, for terming the Earle of Kildare a rimor, to pacifie the parties called a Parliament, wherin he himſelfe was fain to make his purgation of a ſlaunder impoſed to him, as ſuſpected of Hereſie.

The Prior of Kilmaynam Lord iuſtice.

Arnald Poer accuſed of hereſie. The Biſhop of Oſſorie had giuen an information againſt Arnalde le Poer conuented and conuicted in his Conſiſtorie of certaine hereticall opinions, but becauſe the beginning of Poers acculation concerned the Iuſtices kinſman, and

the

the Biſhop was miſtruſted to proſecute his own wrong, and the perſon of the man rather than the fault: a day was limitted for the iuſtifying of the byll, the partie being apprehended and reſpited therevnto.

This dealing the Biſhop (who durſt not ſtyrre out of Kilkenny to proſecute his accuſation was reputed partiall, and when by meanes herof the matter hanged in ſuſpence, he infamed the ſayde Priour as an abettor and fauourer of Arnolds hereſie. The Priour ſubmitted himſelfe to the tryal, and therupon were ſeueral Proclamations made in Court, that it ſhoulde bee lawfull to any man to come into the Court, and to inferre, accuſe, and declare what euidence he coulde, againſt the Lorde Iuſtice, but none came. Then paſſed a decree by the Counſaile, commaunding all Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, & the Maiors of Dublyn Corke, Lymerike, Waterford, and Droghdagh, the Shirifes, Knightes, and Seneſchals of euerie ſhire, to appeare at Dublin. From amongſt all theſe, they appointed .vj. inquiſitors, which examining the biſhops & other perſons aforeſayd ſingularly one by one, found that with an vniuerſal conſent they depoſed for the Priour, affyrming that to their iudgments he was a zealous and a faithfull childe of the Catholike Church. In the meane time, Arnold le Poer the priſoner deceaſed in the Caſtel, and byeauſe he ſtode vnpurged, long hee lay vnburied.

In the yeare. 1329. John de Birmingham Erle of Louth, and his brother Peter, with many other of that ſurname, and Richard Talbot of Malahide were ſlain on Whitſon euen at Balibragan by men of the Countrey. Also the Lord Thomas Butler, and diuerſe other noble men were ſlaine by Mac Gogoghdan and other Iriſh mē neare to Molinger, for the Iriſh aſwell in Leyniſter as in Meth, made inſurrections in that ſeaſon, and ſo likewiſe did they in Mouſter vnder the leading of Odzen, whom William Erle of Vlſter, and Iames Erle of Ormond vanquiſhed. So outragious were the Leyniſter Iriſh, that in one Church they brunt foure ſcore innocent ſoules, aſking no more but the life of their prieſt thē at Maſſe, whō they notwithſtāding ſticked with their Iauelins, ſpurned the hoſt, & waſted al with fire, neither forced they of ẏ Popes interdictiō, nor any eccleſiaſticall cenſures denoūced againſt thē (matters of no ſmal cōſideratiō amōg thē namely in thoſe days) but malicioully perſeuered in ẏ courſe of their furious rage, till the citizens of Wexford ſomwhat tamed thē, & ſlue. 400. of thē in one ſkirmiſh, ẏ reſt fleeing were all drenched in the water of Slane.

1329 The Earle of Louth ſlaine.

The Lorde Butler ſlaine.

In the yeare. 1330. the Earle of Vlſter with a great army made a iourney againſt Odzen, and the priour of Kilmaynā Lord iuſtice put Maurice Fitz Thomas Erle of Deſmond in priſon in the Marſhallee, out of the which he freely eſcaped, and the Lord Hugh Lacie returned into Ireland, and obteyned the kings peace and fauour.

In the yeare. 1331. the Earle of Vlſter paſſed ouer into Englande, and great ſlaughter was made vpon the Iriſh in Okenſly. Also the caſtell of Arclo was taken by the Iriſh men, and great ſlaughter made of the Engliſhe in the Cowlagh by Otothell and other.

Also the Lorde Anthonie Lucie was ſent ouer Lorde Iuſtice into Irelande, and great ſlaughter was made of the Iriſh at Thurlis by the knightes of the Countrey, and at Finnath in Meth, there were manye of them ſlaine by the Engliſh, but yet was the Caſtell of Fernis taken and burnt by the Iriſh.

Anthony Lucy Lord Iuſtice.

1332 William Birmingham executed.

In the yeare .1332. the ſayde ſir William was hanged at Dublin, but Walter was deliuered by reaſon he was within orders.

Campion.

Campion following ſuche notes as he hath ſeene, writeth that the death of this William Birmingham chaunced in time of the gouernment of William Outlaw Prior of Kilmaynã, being lieutenant vnto John Lorde Darcie, that was made Lorde Juſtice (as the ſayd Campion hath noted) in the yeare .1329. Although Marleburgh affyrmeth that hee came thither to beare that office, in the yeare .1332. after the Lord Lucie was diſcharged, as hereafter ſhall be recyted. But whenſoeuer, or vnder whom ſoeuer Birmingham was executed, hee was accounted an odde Knight, and ſuche one as for his baliancie, hys matche was not lyghtly to bee any where founde.

The Caſtell of Clonmore was taken the ſame yeare by the Engliſhmen, and the caſtell of Bonrate was deſtroyed by the Iriſh of Thomõd.

Alſo Henry de Mandeuile was taken and ſent priſoner to be ſafely kept in Dublyn.

Likewiſe Walter Burgh with two of hys brethren were taken in Connagh by the Earle of Ulſter, and ſent to the Caſtell of Norburgh.

This yeare the Lord Antonie Lucie was diſcharged of his rowmth by the king, and ſo returned with his wife and children into Englande, and the Lorde John Darcie was ſent ouer Lord Juſtice in Lucies place, and great ſlaughter was made vpon Bren Obren, and Mac Carthi, in Mounſter, by the Engliſh of that Countrey.

This John Darcie (as ſhoulde appeare by gyftes beſtowed vpon him by the King) was in ſingular fauour wyth him. Amongeſt other things which hee had of the kings gyft, we fynde that hee had the Manours of Louth, and Baliogarie, and other landes in Irelande which belonged to the Earle of Ew, and for that the ſayd Earle was a Frenchman, and toke part wyth Philip de Valois the kings enimie, they were ſeyſed into the kings hande.

The Earle of Ew.

1333 A Parliament.

The Earle of Deſmonde vpon ſureties was ſet at libertie, and by the Parliament holden at Dublyn in this yeare .1333. was ſent ouer into Englande vnto the King, and William Earle of Ulſter a yong Gentleman of twentie yeares of age, in goyng towardes Knockfergus the .vij. of June, was ſlaine neare to the fourdes in Ulſter, by his owne people: but hys wyfe and daughter eſcaped into Englande: and the daughter was after maryed vnto the Lorde Lionell the kings ſonne. She deceaſſed afterwards at Dublyn, and left a daughter behind hir that was hir heyre, maryed to Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and Lorde of Trym.

The Earle of Vlſter ſlaine.

This murther was procured by Robert Fitz Martine Mandeuile, who was the firſt that preſumed to giue to the Earle any wounde.

To reuenge the death of this Erle of Ulſter (ſlaine as ye haue heard beſide Knockfergus) the Lorde Juſtice Darcie with a great power went into Ulſter, to purſue thoſe that through Mandeuiles ſeditious tumultes had ſo trayterouſly murthered their Lord. At his ſetting forward, the ſaide Juſtice Darcie appoynted ſir Tho. Burgh Treaſurer, to gouerne as lieutenant to him in his abſence. When the Lorde Juſtice had puniſhed the trayters in Ulſter, hee paſſed ouer into Scotlande, there to make warre agaynſte the Scottes that were enimies at that preſent to the king of England, and on the feaſt day of Saint Margaret, greate ſlaughter was made of the Scots by the Iriſh men, and ſo what by the king in one part, and the Lorde Juſtice of Irelande in another, Scotland was in maner wholy conquered, and Edwarde Ballioll was eſtabliſhed king of Scotland. The Lord Juſtice might haue poſſeſſed the Iles if they had bene worth the keeping, into the which Iles, except the ſayd Darcy & the Earle of Suſſex late Lieutenant of Irelande, no gouernor at any time yet aduentured.

At Darcyes comming backe into Irelande, and exerciſing the office of Lorde Juſtice, he deliuered Walter Birmingham out of the Caſtell of Dublin.

In the yeare. 1336. and tenth of Edward the thirdes raigne, on Saint Laurence day, the Iriſh of Connagh were diſcomfited and put to flight by the Engliſh men of the Countrey there, with the loſſe of one Engliſh man, and ten thouſande of the enimies. The Lord John Charleton baron came into Irelande to be Lord Juſtice, and with him his brother Thomas Biſhop of Hereforde Lord Chancelor, & John Rice Lorde Treaſorer, and two hundred Welchmen ſouldiers. The Biſhop was ordeyned afterward Lorde Juſtice, in whoſe time all the Iriſh of Ireland were at defiance with the Engliſh, & ſhortly brought againe into quiet by the Erles of Kildare and Deſmond. The Lorde John Darcy by the kings letters patents, was during life ordeyned Lorde Juſtice of Irelande, in the. xiij. yeare of king Edwarde the thirds raigne, which king abuſed by euill counſell and ſiniſter informers, called in vnder his ſignet royall, the franchiſes, liberties and grants whatſoeuer had bin deuiſed, made & ratified to ỹ realm of Ireland, and to euery eche perſon thereof. This reuoking of liberties was diſpleaſantly take. The Engliſh of byrth, and the Engliſh of blond falling at wordes, were deuided into factions about it, for which contention the Iriſh ſtill wapted, ſo as the realme was euen vpon the point to giue ouer all and to rebel. For redreſſe whereof the lorde Juſtice called a Parliament at Dublin, to the which the nobles refuſed to come, & in quiet wiſe aſſembled thẽſelues togither at Kilkenny, where they with the commons agreed vpon certain queſtions to be demaũded of the king by way of ſupplication, ſignifying in the ſame partlye their griefs. Which queſtiõs were in effect as foloweth.

Howe a Realme of warre might bee gouerned by one both vnſkilfull and vnable in all warlike ſeruice. Articles or queſtions.

How an officer vnder the king that entred very poore, might in one yeare grow to more exceſſiue wealth, than men of great patrimonie and liuelode in many yeares.

Howe it chaunced, that ſithe they were all called Lordes of theyr owne, that the ſouereigne Lord of them all, was not a pennie the richer for them.

The chiefe of them that thus ſeemed to repine with the preſent gouernment, was Thomas Fitz Maurice Erle of Deſmonde, through whoſe maintenance and bearing out of the matter, the Countrey was in great trouble, ſo as it had not lightly beene ſeene, that ſuche contrarietie in myndes and diſlyking had appeared amongeſt thoſe of the Engliſh race in that realme at any time before.

Herewith Rauſe Vffort was ſent ouer Lord Juſtice, who bringing hys wyfe wyth hini, the Counteſſe of Ulſter arryued about the. xiij. of Julie.

Rauſe Vffort Lord iuſtice.

Thys man was verye rygorous, and through perſwaſion (as was ſayde) of his wyfe, he was more extreeme and couetous than otherwyſe hee would haue beene, a matter not to bee forgotten: for if thys Ladie had beene as readie to moue hir huſbande to haue ſhewed hymſelfe gentle gentle and mylde in his gouernment, as ſhe was bent to pricke him forwarde vnto ſharpe dealing and rygorous proceedings, ſhee had beene nowe aſwell reported of, as ſhee is infamed by theyr pennes that haue regyſtred the doyngs of thoſe tymes.

But to ỳ purpoſe. This Vffort Lord iuſtice in paine of forfeyture of all his lands commaunded the Erle of Deſmonde to make his perſonall appearance at a Parliament which he called to bee holden at Dublin, there to begin the viij. of June, and bycauſe the Erle refuſed to come (according to the ſummonance, he rayſed the kings Standard, and with an army marched into Mounſter, The Earle of Deſmonde.

and there ſeyſed the Earles poſſeſſions into the kings handes, letting them forth to ferme for an annuall rent vnto other perſons.

And whileſt hee yet remayned in Mounſter, he deuiſed wayes how to haue the Earle of Deſmonde apprehended, whiche being brought to paſſe, hee afterwarde deliuered him vpon mainprize of theſe ſureties whoſe names enſue: William de Burgh Earle of Vlſter; James Butler Earle of Ormonde, Rycharde Tuyt, Nicholas Verdon, Maurice Rochefort, Euſtace le Power, Geralde de Rochefort, John Fitz Robert Power, Robert Barry, Maurice Fitz Gerald, John Welleſley, Walter le Fant, Richard Rokelley, Henrie Traherne, Roger Power, John Lenfaunt, Roger Power, Mathew Fitz Henrie, Richarde Walleys, Edmonde Burgh ſonne to the Earle of Vlſter, knightes: Dauid Barry, William Fitz Gerald, Foulke de Fraxinus, Robert Fitz Maurice, Henry Fitz Berkley, John Fitz George de Roche, Thomas de Lees de Burgh.

Sureties for the Earle of Deſmonde.

These (as ye haue heard) were bounde for the Earle, and by cauſe hee made default, the Lorde Juſtice verily toke the aduauntage of the bonde agaynſt the mainpernours, foure of them onely excepted, the two Earles, and two knightes.

Vffort euill ſpoken of.

The lord Juſtice is charged with ſtrayte dealing by writers in this behalfe, for that the ſame perſons had aſſiſted him in his warres agaynſte Deſmond: but truly if we ſhal conſider the matter with indifferencie, he did no more than law & reaſon required. For if euery ſurety vpo forfeyture of his bonde ſhoulde be forborne, that otherwyſe doth his dutie, what care woulde men haue eyther to procure ſureties, or to become ſureties themſelues?

But ſuch is the affection of writers, ſpecially when they haue conceyued any miſlyking towardes thoſe of whome they take occaſion to ſpeake, ſo as many a worthie man hath bene defamed, and with ſlaunder greatly defaced in things wherein he rather hath deſerued ſingular commendation. But howſoeuer this matter was handled touching the Earle of Deſmonde, vpon the death of the Lord Juſtice, whiche enſued the nexte yeare, Bonfyres were made, and greate ioye ſhewed throughout all the Realme of Irelande.

Ioy conceyued for the death of the lord Iuſtice Vffort.

His Ladie verily (as ſhoulde appeare) was but a miſerable woman, procuring him to extortion and bryberie. Much he abridged the prerogatiues of the Churche, and was ſo hated, that euen in the ſight of the Countrey he was robbed without reſcue by Mac Cartie, notwithſtanding he gathered power, and diſperſed thoſe Rebels of Vlſter.

Robert Darcy was ordeyned Juſtice by the Counſell, till the kings letters came to ſir John Fitz Mozice, who releaſed Fitz Thomas Earle of Kildare left in durance by Vfford at his death. 1346 Robert Darcie Lord iuſtice.

Fitz Mozice continued not long, but was diſcharged, and the Lorde Walter Birmingham elect to ſucceede in that rowmth, who procured Iohn Fitz Morice Iuſtice. Lord Birmingham Iuſtice.

Wee finde that Thomas Lorde Berkeley, and Reignalde Lord Cobham, and Sir Norice Berckley became mainpernours for the ſayde Earle of Deſmonde, that her ſhoulde come into England and abide ſuch tryall as the law would awarde.

John Archer Prior of Kylmaynam was ſubſtituted Lieutenaunt to the Lorde Juſtice. To whome ſucceeded Baron Carew, and after Carewe followed Sir Thomas Rokeſbye Knight, vnto whome was aſſigned aboue his ordinarie retinew of twentie men of armes, a ſupplie of tenne men of armes, and twentie Archers on Horſebacke, ſo long as it ſhould bee thought needfull.

Greate mortalitie chaunced this yeare, as in other partes of the worlde, ſo eſpecially in places aboute the Sea coaſtes of Englande and Irelande.

In the yeare following, departed this life Alexander Bignor Archbiſhop of Dublin. And the ſame yeare was John de Saint Paule conſecrated Archbiſhop of that ſea.

This yeare deceaſed Kenworyke Shereman ſometime Maior of Dublin, a great benefactor to euery Churche and religious houſe within. xx. myles rounde aboute the Citie. His legacies to the poore and other, beſides his liberalitie ſhewed in his lyfe tyme, amounted to three thouſande Markes.

In this ſeaſon dwelled in Ulſter a wealthie knight, one Sir Robert Sauage, who the rather to preſerue his owne, began to wall and fortifie his Manor houſes with Caſtelles and pyles againſt the Iriſh enimie, exhorting his heyre Henrie Sauage to applie that worke ſo beneficiall for himſelfe and his poſteritie. Father (quoth yong Sauage) I remember the prouerbe, Better a Caſtell of bones than of ſtones: where ſtrēgth & courage of valiant men are preſt to helpe vs, neuer will I (by the grace of God) comber my ſelfe with dead walles. My fort ſhall bee where ſoeuer yong bloods be ſtyrring, and where I finde rowmth to fight.

The father in a fume let lie the buylding, and forſware to goe any further forwarde in it. But yet the want therof and ſuch like, hath beene the decay as well of the Sauages, as of all the Engliſhe Gentlemen in Ulſter: as the lacke alſo of walled Townes is one of the principall occaſions of the rude wildeneſſe in other partes of Irelande.

This Sauage hauing prepared an armie againſt the Iriſhe, allowed to euerie Souldier before they ſhould buckle with the enimie, a mighty draught of Aqua vite, Wine, or olde Ale, and killed in prouiſion for their returne, Beefe, Veneſon, and fowle, great plentie: which doing diuers of his captaines miſliked, bycauſe they conſidered the ſucceſſe of warre to be vncertaine, and therefore eſteemed it better policie to poyſon the cates, or to do them away, than to keepe the ſame, and happely to feed a ſort of rogues with ſuch princely foode, if ought ſhoulde happen to themſelues, in this aduenture of ſo fewe againſte ſo manye. Hereat ſmyled the Gentleman and ſayde, Tuſhe, ye are too full of enuie: This worlde is but an Inne, to the which ye haue no ſpeciall intereſt, but are onely tenants at will of the Lorde. If it pleaſe him to commaunde vs from it, as it were from our lodging, and to ſet other good fellowes in our rowmthes, what hurt ſhall it be for vs to leaue them ſome meate for their ſuppers, let them hardly winne it and weare it. If they enter our dwellings, good maner woulde no leſſe but to welcome them with ſuch fare as the Countrey breedeth, and with all my heart much good may it do them. Notwithſtanding I preſume ſo farre vpō your noble corages, that verily my mind giueth me we ſhal returne at night, & bāket our ſelues with our owne ſtore, and ſo they did, hauing ſlain three. M. Iriſhmen.

In the yere. 1355 deceaſed Maurice Fitz Thomas Erle of Deſmond L. iuſtice of Ireland, that had that office of the kings grant for terme of life. 1355 The Earle of Deſmond lord iuſtice deceaſſeth.

After him ſucceeded in ỳ rowmth Thomas de Rokeſby, a knight ſincere & vpright of conſcience, who being cōtrolled for ſuffring himſelf to be ſerued in treen cups, anſwered: thoſe homely cups & diſhes pay truly for that they cōtein: I had rather drinke out of treen cups, & pay gold & ſiluer, than drink out of golde and make woodden payment. Thomas Rokesby Lorde iuſtice. His ſaying.

This yeare began great controuerſie betwixt Richard Rauſe Primate of Ardmegh, and the foure orders of begging Friers, which ended at length by the deaths of the ſayd Richarde Rauſe, and Richarde Kilminton, in the yeare. 1260. Rauſe deceaſſing in the Popes Court, and Kilminton in England. 1357 Diſſention betwixt the Primate of Ardmagh, and the foure orders of Friers.

Almerike de Saint Amand, John, or as other haue James Butler Erle of Ormōd, and Maurice Fitz Thomas Erle of Kildare, were appointed Lord Juſtices of Ireland by turnes. Three Lorde Iuſtices.

In Dymonds time, and in the. xxxiij. yere of king Edward the thirds raigne, order was taken that the Iriſh Lordes ſhould remaine & dwell in their Record Tur.

And further, proclamation went forth, that no mere Iriſh borne ſhould be made Maior, Bailife, porter, officer or miniſter, in any towne or place within the Engliſh dominiõs: nor that any Archbiſhop, Biſhop, Abbot, prior, or any other being of the kings allegiance, vpon forfeyture of al that he might forfeit, ſhould aduance any that was mere Iriſh borne to the rowmth of a Canon, or to haue any other eccleſiaſticall benefice that lay among the Engliſhe ſubiects.

The Earle of Kildare Lorde iuſtice.

To Maurice Thomas Erle of Kildare, when he was ordeyned Lord Juſtice, the kings letters aſſigned in yearely fee for his office fiue hundred pounds, with condition that the ſayde gouernor ſhould find .xx. great horſes to ſerue in the field, he himſelf to be the twentith man in going againſt the enimie: whiche alowance and conditions in thoſe dayes (ſo farre as I can geſſe) ſhould ſeeme to be ordinarie to the office.

Lionell Duke of Clarence.

Lionell Duke of Clarence, ſonne to king Edward the third, came ouer into Ireland to be lord Juſtice there. He was in right of his wife Erle of Ulſter. He publiſhed an inhibition to all of the Iriſh birth, not ouer to approch his army, nor to be in any wiſe imployed in ſeruice of the warres. He vanquiſhed Obren, but yet ſodenly no man vnderſtãding how, an hundred of his ſouldiers were wanting, as they lay in gariſon, the loſſe of whõ was thought to be occaſioned by that diſpleaſant decree afore rehearſed: wherevpon he toke better aduiſe, and receiued the Iriſh into like fauor as other lieutenants had them in before that preſent, ſhewing a tender loue towards them all, & ſo euer after proſpered in his affayres. He created diuerſe knights, as Preſton, now knowne by the name of the familie of Gormaunſton, Holywood, Talbot, Euſac, De la Hide, Patrike, Robert and John de Fraxinis. All theſe being Gentlemen of worthie fame in chiualrie.

The Eſchequer he remoued to Catherlagh, & beſtowed in furniſhing that towne .v.C. pounds.

1362 In the yeare .1362. John de Saint Paul Archbiſhop of Dublin departed this life the fifth Ides of September. And in the yeare following was Tho. Minot conſecrated Archbiſhop of ỳ place.

1367 Gerald Fitz Maurice Erle of Deſmond was appoynted Lord iuſtice, vntil the comming of the Lord William Winſore, the firſt lieutenant in Ireland, who came ouer in the yeare .1369.

The Lorde Winſerde lieutenant.

1369 This Winſore called a Parliament at Kilkenny, in the which was graunted to the king a ſubſidie of three thouſand pounds to be leuyed of the people, ſubiects to the king in that land: and in an other Parliament holden by him at Balydoill they graunted two thouſande pounds to be likewiſe leuyed. Which ſayde ſummes were graunted of the mere and free good willes of the Nobles and Communaltie of the lande, towardes the maintenaunce of the Kings expences in his warres. Yet the King in the .xliij. yeare of hys raigne, directing his letters vnto the ſayde Lorde Wynſore, commaunded him to ſurceaſe from leuying the foreſayde money, although afterwardes he commaunded againe that the arrerages ſhould be leuyed and payde to his lieutenant the ſayde Winſore.

In the dayes of this king Henry the fourth, the Inhabitants of Corke beeing ſore afflicted with perpetual oppreſſions of their Iriſh neighbors, cõplained themſelues in a generall writing directed to the lord of Rutland & Corke, the kings deputie there, & to the counſell of the realme then aſſembled at Dublin: which letter bycauſe it openeth a windowe to behold the ſtate of thoſe parties, and of the whole realme of Ireland in thoſe dayes, we haue thought good to ſet down here as it hath bin entred by Campion, according to the copie deliuered to him by Francis Agard Eſquire, one of ẏ Queenes Maieſties priuie counſell in Ireland.

A letter from Corke out of an old recorde that beareth no date.

IT may pleaſe your wiſedomes to haue pity vpon vs the kings poore ſubiects within ẏ coũtie of Corke, or elſe we are caſt away for euer. For where there are in this coũty theſe lords by name, beſide knights, eſquiers, gentlemen & yeomen, to a great number that might diſpend yerely. viij. C. poundes, vj. C. poundes. iiij. The Lord Barneuale of Beerhauen his yerely reuenues was beſide Bodze hauen and other creekes, M. vj. C. pounds ſterling.

I thinke rather greene caſtell. The Lorde Uggan of the great Caſtell hys yearely reuenue beſide his hauens and creekes, xiij. thouſand poundes.

The Lord Balram of Enkort, his yearely reuenues beſide hauens and creekes. M. CCC. pound ſterling.

The kings Maieſtie hath the landes of the late yong Barry by forfeyture, the yearely reuenue wherof, beſide two riuers and creekes, and al other caſualties, is. M. viij. C. pound ſterling.

And that at the ende of this Parliament, your Lordſhip with the kings moſt noble coũſell may come to Corke, & call before you al theſe Lords, & other Iriſh men, and bind them in pain of loſſe of life, lands & goods, that neuer one of them do make warre vpon an other, without licence or commaundement of you, my lord deputie, & the kings counſel: for the vtter deſtruction of theſe partes, is that only cauſe. And once all the Iriſh men, & the kings enimies were driue into a great valley called Clane onighte betwixt two great mountains called Maccorr, or the leprous Iland: and there they liued lõg & many yeres vp̃ their white meat, till at the laſt theſe Engliſh lords fell at variance among thẽſelues, & thẽ the weakeſt part toke certain Iriſh men to take their part, & ſo vanquiſhed their enimies. And thus fell the Engliſh lordes at warre among themſelues, till the Iriſh men were ſtronger than they, & driue thẽ away, & now haue the cuntry whole vnder thẽ, but ẏ the lord Roch, the lord Barry, & the lord Curcy only remaine vp̃ the leaſt part of their anceſters poſſeſſions, & yong Barry is there vpõ the kings portion, paying his grace neuer a penny rent: wherfore we the kings poore ſubiects of the Citie of Corke, Kinſale, and Poghal, deſire your Lordſhip to ſende hither two good Iuſtices to ſee this matter ordred, and ſome Engliſh captains with. xx. Engliſhmẽ that may be captains ouer vs all, and we will riſe with thẽ to redreſſe theſe enormities all at our own coſtes. And if you will not come nor ſend, we will ſende ouer to our liege lorde the king and complaine on you all. Thus farre that letter.

The Citie of Corke. And as ſaith Campion, at this day the citie of Corke is ſo encombred with vnquiet neighbors of great power, ẏ they are forced to gard their gates continually, & to kepe thẽ ſhut at ſeruice times, at meales, & from ſunne ſetting to ſunne riſing, not ſuffring any ſtranger to enter the towne with his weapõ, but to leaue ẏ ſame at a lodge appointed. They dare vneth at any time walke abrode farre from the towne for their recreation, except at ſeaſons, and then with ſtrength of men furniſhed with armour and weapon for their ſafegarde. They match in wedlocke among themſelues, ſo that well neare the whole Citie is allied and ioyned togither in conſanguinitie.

A Parliament.

In the yeare. 1421. the Parliament began againe vpon the laſt prorogation the Monday after Saint Ambroſe day, in which Parliament it was ordeyned that certaine perſons ſhould be ſent to the king, to ſue that a reformation might bee had in matters touching the ſtate of the land. The chiefe of thoſe that were thus ſent, were the Archbiſhop of Ardmagh, & ſir Chriſtopher Preſton knight. Moreouer, Richard Dhedian biſhop of Caſhell, was accuſed by John Bele Biſhop of Liſmore and Waterford, who layd. xxx. Articles to his charge. Amongſt other, one was for that he loued none of the Engliſh nation, and that he beſtowed not one benefice vpon any Engliſh man, and counſelled other biſhops that they ſhould not beſtow any within their Dioces vpon any Engliſh man. Moreouer, an other Article was for counterfeyting the kings ſeale, and an other for that he went about to make himſelf K. of Mouſter, and had taken a ring from the Image of S. Patrike (which the Erle of Deſmond had offred) and giuen it to his lemman. Many other crymes were layd to him, by the ſayd Biſhop of Liſmore and Waterford, which he exhibited in writing.

Alſo in the ſame Parliament, there roſe cōtention betwixt Adam Pain biſhop of Clone, & an other prelate whoſe church he would haue annexed vnto his ſee. At length after the Parliament had continued for the ſpace of xviij. days, it brake vp. Herewith came newes of ẏ ſlaughter of the Lord Tho. of Lācaſter duke of Clarence, ẏ had bin L. lieutenant of Ireland, & vpō the. vij. of May, certaine of the Erle of Ormondes men were ouerthrown by the Iriſh, nere to the Abbey of Leys, & xxvij. Engliſhmen were ſlain there, of whom the chief were two gētlemē, the one named Purcel, & the other Grant. Alſo. x. were takē priſoners, and two. C. eſcaped to the foreſayde Abbey, ſo ſauing themſelues. About the ſame time, Mac Mahun an Iriſh lord, did much hurt within the coūtry of Vrgile, by burning and waſting all afore him.

Alſo vpon the morrow after Midſommer day, the Erle of Ormond Lord lieutenant entred into the Countrey about Leys vpon Ormoryis, & for the ſpace of foure dayes togither did muche hurt in ſleaing and ſpoyling the people, till the Iriſh were glad to ſue for peace.

¶ Henrie the ſixt.

LIeutenants to Henrie the firſt ouer the realme of Irelande were theſe, Edmonde Earle of March, and James Erle of Ormond his deputy. John Sutton Lord Dudley, & ſir Tho. Strange knight his deputie. Sir Thomas Stanley, and ſir Chriſtofer Plunket his deputie. [Thys ſir Thomas Stanley, on Michaelmaſſe day, in the twelfth yeare of King Henrye the ſixth, wyth all the Knightes of Meathe and Irrell, fought agaynſte the Iriſhe, ſlue a greate nunber, and toke Neill Odonell priſoner.]

Lion

Lion Lord Welles, & the Earle of Dzmonde his deputie. James Earle of Dzmonde by hym ſelfe, John Erle of Shrewelburie, and the Archbiſhop of Dublin Lorde Juſtice in his abſence. Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, father to King Edwarde the fourth and Earle of Ulſter, had the office of Lieutenaunte by the Kings letters patents, during the tearme of tenne yeeres, who appoynted to rule vnder him as his deputies at ſundry times, the Baron of Deluin, Richarde Fitz Euſtace Knight, James Earle of Dzmōd, and Thomas Fitz Mozice Erle of Kildare. To this Richard Duke of Yorke and Ulſter then reſident in Dublin, was borne within the Caſtell there his ſecōd ſonne the Lord George, that was after Duke of Clarence: his Godfathers at the fontſtone were the Erles of Dzmond and Diſmonde. Whether the commotion of Jacke Cade an Iriſhman borne, naming himſelf Mortimer, and ſo pretending coſinage to diuers noble houſes in this land, proceeded from ſome intelligēce, with the Dukes friends here in Ireland, it is vncertayne: but ſurely the Duke was behemently ſuſpected, and immediately after began the troubles whiche through him were reyſed. Whyche broyles being couched for a time, the Duke helde himſelfe in Ireland, being lately by Parliamente ordeyned protector of the Realme of Englande: he left his agent in the Court, his brother ẏ Erle of Saliſburie, Lord Chancellor, to whom he declared the troth of the troubles then towarde in Ireland: which letter exemplyfyed by Sir Henry Sidney Lorde Deputie, a greate ſearcher and preſeruer of antiquities, as it came to Campions hands, and by hym ſet downe, we haue thoughte good likewiſe to preſent it here to your viewe.

To the right worſhipfull, and with all mine hart, intierly beloued brother, the Earle of Salisburie.

RIght Worſhipfull, and with all my harte, intierly beloued brother, I recommende me vnto you as hartily as I can. And like it you to witte, ſith I wrote laſt vnto the King our Soueraigne Lorde his highneſſe, the Iriſh enemie, ẏ is to ſay Magoghigam, and with him three or foure Iriſhe Captaynes, aſſociate with a greate felowſhip of Engliſh Rebells, notwithſtandyng that they were within the King our Soueraygne Lord his peace of greate malice, and againſte all truth haue maligned againſt their legiance, and vengeably haue brent a great towne of myne inheritance in Meth, called Ramore, and other villages thereaboutes, and murthered and bꝛēt both men, womē and children, withouten mercy: the whiche enimies be yet aſſembled in Woods and fortes, aweighting to do the hurt and greeuance to the Kings ſubiects, that they can thinke or imagine. For whiche cauſe, I write at this tyme vnto the Kings highneſſe, and beſeeche his good Grace for to haſten my payment for this lande, according vnto his letters of warrant nowe late directed vnto the Treaſorer of Englande, to the intente I may wage men in ſufficiente number, for to reſiſt the malice of the ſame enimies, and puniſh them in ſuch wiſe, that other which wolde do the ſame for lacke of reſiſtance, in time maye take example. For doubtleſſe, but if my paymente be had in all haſt, for to haue men of warre in defence and ſafegard of this land, my power cā not ſtretch to keepe it in the kings obeyſance, and bery neceſſitie will compell me to come into Englande to liue there vpon my powre liuelyhood: for I had leuer be dead than any inconuenience ſhoulde fall therevnto in my default: for it ſhall neuer bee chronicled nor remayne in Scripture by ẏ grace of God, that Ireland was loſt by my negligēce. And therefore I beſeeche you right Worſhipfull brother, that you will holde to your handes inſtantly, that my paymente may bee had at thys time in eſchewing all inconueniences. For I haue example in other places, (more pitie it is) for to dread ſhame, and for to acquit my troth vnto the Kings highneſſe as my duetie is. And thys I pray and exhort you good brother, to ſhewe vnto his good grace, and that you will be ſo good, that this language may bee enacted at this preſente Parliamēt for mine excuſe in time to come, and that you will be good to my ſeruant Roger Roe the bearer of theſe, and to my other ſeruaunts, in ſuch things as they ſhall purſew vnto the kings highneſſe, and to giue full faith and credence vnto the report of the ſaid Roger, touching the ſayde matters. Right worſhipful, and with all my hart intierly beloued brother, our bleſſed Lorde God preſerue and keepe you in all honor, proſperous eſtate, and felicitie, and graunte you righte good life & long. Writtē at Dublin ẏ. 15. day of June.

Your faithfull true brother
Richarde Yorke.

Of ſuche power was Magoghigam in thoſe dayes, who as he wan and kept it by the ſworde, ſo nowe his ſucceſſors in that ſtate liue but as meane Captaines, yeelding their winnings to ẏ ſtronger. This is the miſerie of lawleſſe people, reſembling the rudeneſſe of the rude world, wherin euery mā was richer and powrer than other, as he was in might & violence more or leſſe enabled. Here began factions of the nobilitie in Irelande, fauoring diuers ſides that ſtroue for the Crowne of England. For the Duke of Yorke in thoſe ten yeeres of his gouernemente, exceedingly wanne the hartes of the noblemen and Gentlemen of that land, of the whiche diuers were ſlayne with him at Wakefielde, as the contrary part was the next yeere by his ſonne Edward Erle of Marche at Mortimers Croſſe in Wales. In which meane time the Iriſhe grewe hardy, and vſurped the Engliſhe countreys inſufficiently defended, as they had done by like opportunitie in the latter end of Richard the ſecond. Theſe two ſeaſons ſet thē ſo a flote, ẏ hēceforward they could neuer be caſt out from their forcible poſſeſſions, holding by playne wrong all Vlſter, and by certayne Iriſhe tenures no ſmall portions of Monſter and Connagh, leaſt in Meth and Leyniſter, where the ciuill ſubiects of the Engliſhe bloud did euer moſt preuayle.

Lieutenaunts and Deputies in king Edward the fourth his dayes.

THomas Fitz Morice Earle of Kildare, Lord Iuſtice vntill the thirde yeere of Edward the fourth, after whiche time the Duke of Clarence, brother to the King, had the office of Lieutenant while he liued, and made his deputies by ſundry turnes, Thomas Erle of Deſmond, John Tiptoft Erle of Wurceter the Kings couſin, Thomas Earle of Kildare, and Henry Lord Grey of Ruthin. Great was the credit of the Giraldines euer whē the houſe of Yorke proſpered, and likewiſe the Butlers thriued vnder the bloud of the Lancaſters: for whiche cauſe the Earle of Deſmond remayned many yeres Deputie to George Duke of Clarence his good brother: but when he had ſpoken certayne diſdaynefull words againſte the late marriage of king Edward with the Lady Elizabeth Gray, the ſayd Lady beeing nowe Queene, cauſed his trade of life after the Iriſhe manner, contrary to ſundry olde ſtatutes enacted in that behalfe, to be ſifted and examined by John Earle of Wurceter his ſucceſſor, ſo that hee was atteynted of treaſon, cōdemned, and forthe ſame beheaded at Drogheda.

James the father of this Thomas Earle of Deſmond, being ſuffered and not controlled, during the gouernemēt of Richard Duke of Yorke his godcept, and of Thomas Erle of Kildare his kinſman, put vpon the Kings ſubiects within the countries of Waterford, Corke, Keary, and Limirike, the Iriſh impoſitions of Quinio and Liuery, Cartings, Cariages, lodings, Cocherings, Bonnaght and ſuch like, which cuſtomes are the very breeders, mayntayners and vpholders of all Iriſhe enormities, wringing from the poore tenantes euerlaſting ceaſſe, allowāce of meate and money, whereby their bodies and goodes were brought in ſeruice and thraldome, ſo that the mē of warre, Horſes, and their Galloglaghes lye ſtil vpon the fermors, eate them out, begger the coūtrey, foſter a ſort of Idle vagabonds, ready to rebell if their Lord commaund them, euer nouſled in ſtelth and robberies. Theſe euill preſidents giuen by the father, the ſonne did exerciſe, being L. Deputie, to whome the reformation of that diſorder ſpecially belonged. Notwithſtanding the ſame faulte beeing winked at in other, and with ſuch rigor auenged in him, was manifeſtly taken for a quarrell ſought and procured. Two yeeres after, the ſayd Earle of Wurceter loſt his head, while Henry the firſt take out of the Tower was ſet vp againe, ẏ king Edward proclaymed vſurper, and then was Kildare enlarged, whom likewiſe atteynted, they thought alſo to haue rydde; and ſhortly both the Earles of Kildare and Deſmond were reſtored to their bloud by Parliamēt: Sir Rouland Enſtace, ſometime Treaſorer and Lord Chancellor, was laſtly alſo Lord Deputie of Ireland. He founded S. Francis Abbey beſide Kilcollen bridge. King Edwarde a yeere before his death, honored his yonger ſon Richard Duke of Yorke, with the title of Lieutenant ouer thys lande, which he enioyed til his vnnaturall Vncle bereft both him and his brother King Edwarde the fifth of their naturall liues.

¶ Richard the third.

VVHen this Monſter of nature and cruell Tyrant Richard the third had murthered his two yong Nephewes, and taken vpon hym the Crowne and gouernement of England, hee preferred his owne ſonne Edward to the dignitie of Lorde Lieutenante of Ireland, whoſe deputie was Geraldine Earle of Kildare that bare that office all the reigne of King Richard, and a while in Henry the ſeuenth his dayes.

Richard the third.

¶ Henry the ſeuenth.

TO the which Earle came the wilie Prieſt, ſir Richard Simond, bringing with him a lad that was his Scholer, named Lambert, whome hee feygned to bee the ſonne of George Earle of Clarence, lately eſcaped forth of the Tower of London. And the boy could reckon vp his pedegree ſo redily, and had learned of the Prieſt ſuche Princely behauiour, that hee lightly moued the ſayde Earle, and many other ẏ nobles of Ireland (tendering tendering as well the lignage royal of Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, and hys sonne George their Countreymã borne, as also maligning the aduancement of the house of Lancaster in Henry the seuenth) eyther to thinke or to faine, ỳ the world might beleeue they thought verily this child to be Edward Earle of Warwike, the Duke of Clarence his lawfull sonne.

And although King Henry more than halfe marred their sporte, in shewing the right Earle throughout all the streetes of London, yet the Lady Margaret, Duches of Burgongne, sister to Edwarde the fourth, hyr Nephewe John de la Poole, ỳ Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton Knighte, and dyuers other Captaynes of this conspiracy, deuised to abuse the coloure of this yong Earles name, for preferring their purpose: which if it came to good, they agreed to depose Lamberte, and to erect the very Earle indeede, nowe prisoner in the Tower, for whose quarrell, had they pretended to fight, they deemed it likely hee shoulde haue bin made away. Wherefore it was blazed in Irelande, that the King to mocke hys subiectes, had scholed a boy, to take vppon hym the Earle of Warwikes name, and hadde shewed him about London, to blinde the eyes of the simple folke, and to defeate the lawfull inheritour of the good Duke of Clarence theyr countreyman and protector duryng his life, vnto whose lignage, they also deriued title in right to the Crowne.

In all hast, they assembled at Dublin, and there in Christs Churche, they Crowned thys Idoll, honoring him with titles imperiall, feasting and triumphing, reysing myghtie shoutes and cryes, carrying him from thence to the Castell vpon tall mens shoulders, that hee myghte bee seene and noted, as hee was sure an honorable childe to loke vpon.

Heerewith, assembling their forces togither, they prouided themselues of Shippes, and embarquing therein, they toke the Sea, and landing in Lancashire, passed forwarde, till they came to Newarke vpon Trent: thereupon ensued the battell of Stoke, commonly called Martin Swartes field, wherein Lambert and hys maister were taken, but yet pardoned of life, and were not executed.

The Earle of Lincolne, the Lorde Louell, Martin Swart, the Almayne Captayne, and Maurice Fitz Thomas, Captayne of the Irish, were slayne, and all their power discomfited, as in the Englishe history it may further appeare.

Iasper Duke of Bedford, and Erle of Pembroke Lieutenant, and Walter Archbyshop of Dublin his Deputie. Iasper Duke of Bedford Lieutenant.

In this time, befell another like Irishe illusion, procured by the Duches aforesayd, and certayne nobles in England, whereby was exalted as rightfull King of Englande, and vndoubted Earle of Ulster, the counterfeyte Richarde Duke of Yorke, preserued from kyng Richards cruelties (as the adherentes faced the matter downe) and with thys Maygame Lorde, named indeede Peter (in scorne Perkin) Warbecke, they flattered themselues manye yeares after. Perkin Warbecke.

Then was Sir Edward Poynings Knight sente ouer Lorde Deputie, with commission to apprehende Warbeckes principall partners in Irelande: amongst whome, was named Giralde Fitz Girald Earle of Kildare, whose purgation the kyng (notwithstandyng dyuers surmising and auouching the contrarye) dyd accept. 1494 Sir Edward Poynings L. Deputy.

After muche adoe, Perkin beeing taken, confessed by hys owne writing the course of hys whole life, and al his proceedings in thys enterprise, whereof in the Englishe history, as wee haue borowed the same forthe of Halles Chronicles, yee may reade more, and therefore heere we haue omitted to speake further of that matter. In the yeare. 1501. King Henrye made Lieutenant of Ireland his second sonne Henry, as then Duke of Yorke, who after reigned by the name of Henry the eyght. 1501 Henry Duke of Yorke, after King Henry the eyght, L. Lieutenaunt.

To him was appoynted Deputie, the foresayd Giralde Earle of Kildare, who accompanyed with John Blake Maior of Dublin, warred vpon William le Burgh, Obrene, and Mack Nemarre, Mcarroul, and foughte wyth the greatest power of Irishmen that hadde bin togither since the Conquest, vnder the hyll of Knocktowe, in Englishe, the hyll of the Axes, sixe miles from Galoway, and two myles from Bellielare Burghes manour Towne: Mack William and his complices were there taken, hys Souldyers that escaped the swoorde were pursued fleeing, for the space of fyue myles, great slaughter was made of them, and many Captaynes caughte, without the losse of one Englishman. The fielde of Knocktowe.

The Earle of Kildare at hys returne, was made Knighte of the noble order of the Garter, and lyued in worthy estimation all hys lyfe long, as well for thys seruice, as diuers other his famous exployte. The Earle of Kildare, knight of the Garter.

The thirde Booke of the Hiſtorie of Ireland, compriſing the raigne of Henry the eyght: continued by Richard Stanihurſt, and vvritten to the right honorable Sir Henrie Sidney Knight, Lord Deputie of Ireland, Lord preſident of VVales, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, and one of hir Maieſties priue Counſayle within hir Realme of Englande.

HOw comberſome (ryghte Honorable) & daungerous a taſke it is, to engroſſe & diſbulge the doings of others, eſpecially whē the parties regiſtred or their iſſue are lining: both common reaſon ſufficiently acknowledgeth, and dayly experience infallibly approueth. For Man by courſe of nature is ſo partially affected to himſelf, and his bloud, as hee will bee more agreeued with the Chronicler for recording a preuiſh treſpaſſe, than hee will be offended with his friende, for cōmitting an heynous treaſon.

Ouer this, if the hiſtorian be long, hee is accompted a triflер: if he be ſhort, he is taken for a ſummiſter: if he commende, he is twighted for a flatterer: if he reprooue, he is holden for a carper: if he be pleaſant, he is noted for a ieſter: if hee bee graue, he is reckened for a droupers: if he miſdate, he is named a fallyfyer: if he once but trippe, hee is tearmed a ſtumbler: ſo that lette hym beare himſelfe in hys Chronicle, as vprightly and as conſcionably as he may poſſible, yet hee ſhall bee ſure, to fynde them that wyll bee more preſt to blabbe forth his peeliſh faultes, than they will be ready to blaze out his good deſertes.

Others there bee, that although they are not able to reproue what is written, yet they will bee ſure, to caſt in hys diſhe what is forgotten. Heere, ſaye they, thys exployte is omitted: there that policie is not deteſted: heere thys ſaying woulde haue beene enterlaced: there that treacherie ſhoulde haue beene diſplayd.

Theſe and the lyke diſcommodities, wyth which Hiſtoriographers are vſually cloyd, haue borne backe diuers and ſundry willing mindes, who taking the way to bee thorny, the credite ſlipperie, the carpers to bee many, woulde in no caſe bee medlers, chooſing rather to ſitte by theyr owne fyre obſcurely at home, than to bee bayted with enuious tongs openly abrode.

Others on the contrary ſide, beeyng reſolute fellowes, and trampling vnder foote theſe curious faultfynders, would not ſticke to put themſelues forthe in preſſe, and maugre all theyr heartes, to buſkle forwarde, and ruſhe through the pykes of theyr quipping nippes, and bityng frumpes.

But I, takyng the meane betweene both theſe extremities, helde it for better, not to bee ſo feynte and peeuiſhe a meacocke, as to ſhrinke and couche myne head, for euery mizeling ſhoure, nor yet to beare my ſelfe ſo high in heart, as to praunce and iette lyke a proude gennet through the ſtreete, not weighing the barking of curriſh baudogges.

And therefore, if I ſhall be founde in my hyſtorie ſometyme too tedious, ſometime too ſpare, ſometime too fawning in commendyng the lyuing, ſometime too flatte in reprouing the dead: I take GOD to witneſſe, that myne offence therein proceedeth of ignorance, and not of ſette wilfulneſſe.

But as for the paſſing ouer in ſilence of dyuers cuentes (albeit the lawe or rather the libertie of an hyſtorie requireth, that all ſhoulde bee related, and nothing whuſted) yet I muſt confeſſe, that as I was not able, vppon ſo little leaſure, to knowe all that was ſaid or done, ſo I was not willing, for ſundry reſpects, to write euery trim tram, that I knew to be ſaid or done. And if any bee ſo ouerthwartly waywarded, as he wil ſooner long for ẏ I haue omitted, than he will be cōtented with that I haue chronicled, I cannot deuiſe in my iudgement a better way, to ſatiſfye his appetite, than vnto one Doly, a preſtour of Oxford, his anſwere: who being appointed to tricke out the tenne commaundementes, omitted one, and pourtraped but nyne, which faulte eſpied by hys maiſter, ẏ hyred him: Doly anſwered, that in very deede, he poynted but nine: howbeit, when he vnderſtood, ẏ his maiſter had well obſerued and kepte the nine commaundements, ments, that already were drawen, hee gaue hys worde at better leysure throughly to finishe the tenth. And truely so must I say: I haue layde downe heere to the Reader his view, a briefe discourse, wherof, I trust, hee shall take no greate surfet. And when I am aduertised, that hee wyll digest the thinne fare, that heere is dight before hym: it may be, Godwilling, hereafter, that hee shal find my Booke, with store of more licorous deynties farsed and furnished, leaning to hys choyse, eyther nicely to pickle, or greedely to swallow, as muche as to his contentation shall best beseeme him.

Wherefore, my good Lorde, sith I may not denye, but that the worke is paynefull, and I doe forecast, that the misconstruction may be perilous: the toplesomnesse of the payne, I referre to my priuate knowledge, the abādoning of the peril, I committe to your honorable patronage, not doubting thereby, to be shielded agaynst the sinister glosing of malitious interpretors.

Thus betaking your Lordshippe to God, I craue youre attentiuenes, in perusing a cantell or parcel of the Irish Historie, that here ensueth.

GIrald Fitz Giralde, Earle of Kildare, sonne to Thomas Fitz Girald, of whom mention was made in the later ende of the second Booke, a mightie man of stature, full of honoure and courage, who had bin Deputie, and Lorde Iustice of Ireland first and last, three and thirtie yeares, deceassed at Kildare the thirde of September, and lyeth entombed in ẏ quire of Christes Church at Dublin, in a Chappell by hym founded.

Betweene him and James Butler Earle of Ormond (their owne ielousies fedde with enuy and ambition, kindled with certaine lewde factious abettors of eyther side) as generally to all noble men, so especially to both these houses bery incident, euer since the ninth yeare of Henrye the seuenth, bred some trouble in Irelande. The plot of whiche mutuall grudge, was grounded vpon the factious dissention, that was raysed in England, betwene the houses of Yorke & Lancaster, Kildare cleauing to Yorke, and Ormond relying to Lancaster. To the vpholding of whiche discord, both these noble men laboured, with teth and nayle, to ouercrowe, and consequently to ouerthrow one the other: And for asmuch as they were in honour Peeres, they wrought by hooke and by crooke to be in authoritie superiours. The gouernement therefore in the reignes of Henry the seuenth, being cast on the house of Kildare, James Earle of Ormond, a deepe and a farre reaching mā, giuing backe, like a butting Ramme, to strike the harder push), deuised to inueigle his aduersarie by submissiō and courtesie, being not then able to ouermatch him ẏ stoutenesse or preheminence. Whereupon, Ormonde addressed his letters to the Deputie, specifying a slaunder raysed on hym and his, that hee purposed to deface his gouernemente, and to withstand his authoritie, and for the clearing of himselfe and of his adherentes, so it stode with the Deputie hys pleasure, he woulde make his speedy repayre to Dublin, and there in open audience, woulde purge hymselfe of all suche odious crimes, of whiche he was wrongfully suspected.

To this reasonable request had the Lorde Deputie no sooner condiscended, than Ormond with a puissant army marched towardes Dublin, encamping in an Abbey in the suburbes of the Citie, named Saint Thomas Court. The approching of so greate an army of the Citizens suspected, and also of Kildares counsaylours greatly disliked, lastly the extortion, that ẏ lawlesse Souldyours vsed in the pale by seuerall cōplaintes detected: these three poyntes, with dyuers other suspitious circumstances laid and put togither, did minister occasion rather of further discorde, than of any present agreement.

Ormonde marcheth to Dublin.

Ormond persisting still in his humble suite, sent hys messenger to the Lord Deputie, declaring, that he was prest and ready to accomplishe the tenoure of his letters, and there did attende (as became him) his Lordship his pleasure. And as for the company, he brought with him from Mounster, albeit suspitious braynes did rather of a malitious craftinesse surmise the worst, thā of charitable wisedome dyd iudge the best, yet notwithstanding, vppon conference had wyth his Lordshippe, hee woulde not doubt to satisfye hym at full in all poyntes, wherewith hee coulde bee with anye coulour charged, and so to stoppe vppe the spring, from whence, all these enuious suspitions gushed. Kildare with this mild message entreated, appoynted the meeting to bee at S. Patricke his Churche: where, as they were ripping vp one to the other their mutuall quarrels, rather recounting the damages they susteined, than acknowledging the iniuries they offered: the Citizens and Ormond his army, fell at some iarre, for ẏ oppression & exaction with whiche ẏ souldiers surcharged them. With whome, as part of the Citizens bickered, so a round knot of archers rusht into the Churche, meanyng to haue murthered Ormond, as the Captaine and belweather of al these lawlesse rabble. The Erle of Ormond suspecting that he had bin betrayd, fled to the Chapitre house, put to the doze, sparring it with might and mayne. The Citizens in their rage, imagining that euery post in the Churche had bin one of ẏ Souldyers, shot habbe or nabbe at randon vppe to the Rode lofte, and to the Chancell, leauing some of theyr

Kildare pursuing Dymond to the Chapiter house doze, vndertoke on hys honoz, that hee should receyue no villanie. Whereupon, the recluse craning his Lozdships hand to assure hym his life, there was a clift in the Chapiter house doze, pierced at a trice, to the end both the Erles should haue shaken hands, and bee reconciled.

But Dymond surmising that this drift was entended foz some further treacherie, that if hee 10 woulde stretche out his hande, it had bin percase chopt off, refused that proffer, vntill Kildare streteht in his hand to him, and so the doze was opened, they both embraced, the stozme appeased, and all their quarrels foz that presente, rather discontinued than ended.

The Earles reconciled.

In this garboyle, one of the Citizens, surnamed Blanchfielde, was slayne.

Blanchfielde slayne.

This later quarrell beeyng lyke a greene wounde, rather bunglerly botcht, than soundly 20 cured, in that Kildare suspected, that so greate an army (which the other alledged, to be brought foz the guarde of his person) to haue bin of purpose assembled, to outface hym and his power in his owne Countrey: and Dymonde mistrusted, ỹ this treacherous practise of the Dublinians, was by Kildare deuised. These and the like surmises lightly by both the noble men misdeemed, and by the continuall twatling of flyring clawbackes in their eares whispered, bred 30 and fostered a malice betwixte them and theyr posteritie, many yeares incurable, which caused muche sturre and vnquietnesse in the Realme, vntill the confusion of the one house, and the noneage of the other, ended and buryed theyr mutuall quarrels.

The description of Ormond

Dymond was nothing inferioure to the other in stomacke, and in reach of policy, farre beyond him.

The description of Kildare.

Kildare was in gouernemente milde, to hys 40 enimies sterne, to the Irishe such a scourge, that rather foz despite of him, than foz fauoure of anye parte, they relyed foz a tyme to Dymond, came vnder hys protection, serued at hys call, perfozmed by starres (as theyr manner is) the duetie of good subiects.

Dymonde was secrete, and of great forecast, very stayed in speech, daungerous of euery trifle that touched his reputation.

Kildare was open and playne, hardly able 50 to rule hymselfe when hee were moued, in anger, not so sharp as shozt, being easily displeased, and sooner appeased.

Being in a rage with certayne of his seruãts, foz faultes they committed, one of hys horsemẽ offered maister Boyce (a Gentleman that reteyned to him) an Irish Hobby, on condition, that hee woulde plucke an heare from the Earle hys berde. Boyce taking the proffer at rebound, stept to the Earle (with whose good nature hee was throughly acquainted) parching in the heate of his choler, and sayd: So it is, and if it like youre good Lozdshippe, one of youre Horsemen promised mee a choyce Horse, if I snippe one heare from your berde. Well quoth the Earle, I agree thereto, but if thou plucke anye moze than one, I promise thee to bring my fyst from thine eare.

The braunche of this good nature hathe bin deriued from him to an Earle of his posteritie, who beeing in a chafe, foz the wrong saucing of a Partridge, rose suddaynely from the Table, meanyng to haue reasoned the matter wyth hys Cooke: hauyng entred into the Kitchen, drownyng in obliuion hys chalenge, hee began to commende the buyldyng of the roome, wherein hee was at no tyme before, and so leauyng the Cooke vncontrold, he returned to his guests merily.

Thys olde Earle beeyng, as is afozesayde, some hote and some colde, was of the Englishe well beloued, a good Justicier, a suppressor of the Rebels, a warrioure incomparable, towards the nobles that he fansyed not, somewhat headlong and vnruly: beeyng charged before Henrye the seauenth, foz burning the Churche of Cashell, and manye witnesses prepared, to auouche agaynste hym the trouth of that article, hee suddaynely confessed the fact, to the greate wondering and detestation of the counsell: when it was loked how hee woulde iustifye the matter: by Jesus (quoth hee) I woulde neuer haue done it, hadde it not bin tolde me, that the Archebyshoppe was within: and bycause the same Archebyshoppe was one of hys busyest accusers there present, the Kyng merily laughed at the playnesse of the noble man, to see hym alledge that thing foz excuse, whiche most of all did aggrauate hys offence.

The last article agaynste hym, they conceiued in these tearmes: Finally, all Irelande can not rule thys Earle. No? quoth the Kyng, then in good fayth shall this Earle rule all Irelande.

Thus was that accusation turned to a iest: the Earle returned to hys Countrey Lord Deputie, who notwithstanding hys simplicitie in peace, was of that valoure and policie in warre, as his name bred a greater terrour to the Irish, than other mens armyes.

Kildare returneth Lorde Deputie.

In hys warres hee vsed, foz policie, a reteheesse kynde of diligence, or a headye carelessnesse, to the ende hys Souldyers shoulde not faynte in theyr attemptes, were the enimie neuer of so greate power. Beeyng generall in the fielde of Knocktowe, where in effect, all Kildares policie in warre.

the Irish Rebelles of Ireland were gathered against the Englishe pale, one of the Earle hys Captaines presented him a bad of Kearnes, ruē as they wer ready to ioyne battayle, and without demaunded of the Earle, in what seruice hee would haue them employd? Mary (quoth hee) let them stande by and gyue vs the gaze.

Suche was hys courage, that notwithstanding his enimies were two to one, yet would hee sette so good a face on the matter, as hys Soulyers should not once suspect, that hee eyther needed, or longed for any further help.

Hauing triumphantly vanquished the Irishe in that conflict, hee was shortly after, as well for that, as other his valiāt exployts, made knight of the garter, and in the fifth yeare of Henry the eyght in that renowme and honoure hee dyed, wherein for the space of manye yeares, hee lyued.

No maruayle if this successe were a corsy to the aduerse part, which the longer it held glose, and bit the bridle, the more egrely it followed the course, hauing once gote scope and mouth at will, as shall bee hereafter at full declared.

Dymond bearing in mynde the treachery of the Dublinians, procured such as were the graue[st] Prelates of his Cleargie, to intimate to the Court of Rome the heathenish riot of the Citizens of Dublin in rushing into the Churche armed, polluting with slaughter the consecrated place, defacing the Images, prostrating the reliques, racing downe Aultars, with barbarous outcries, more like miscreaunt Sarazens, than Christian Catholiques. Whereuppon, a Legate was posted to Ireland, bending his course to Dublin, where some after, he was solemnely receyued by Walter Fitz Simons, Archbyshop of Dublin, a graue Prelate, for hys learnyng and wisedome chosen to be one of King Henry the seuenth hys Chaplaynes, in which vocation hee continued twelue yeares, and after was aduanced to be Archbyshop of Dublin.

The Legate vppon his arriuall, indicted the Citie for his execrable offence: but at length, by the procurement as well of the Archbyshoppe as of all the Cleargie, hee was weighed to gyue the Citizens absolutiō, with this caueat, that in detestation of so horrible a fact, and ad perpetuam rei memoriam, the Maior of Dublin should goe barefooted through the Citie in open Procession before the Sacrament, on Corpus Christi day, whyche penitente satisfaction was after in euerye suche Procession duely accomplished.

Girald Fitz Girald, sonne and heire to the aforesayd Earle of Kildare, was shortly after his father his decease, constituted Lorde Deputie of Irelande, before whome in the seuenth yeare of Henry the eyght, there was a Parliamente holden at Dublin, wherein it was established, that al such, as bring out of England the kings letters of priuate seale, for particular causes against any of the King his subiects in Irelande, should finde sufficient succtie in the King hys Chancerie in Irelande, to bee bound by recognisance, that the playntife shall satisfye the defendante, that purgeth or acquiteth himselfe of the matter to hym alledged for hys costes and damages susteyned by suche wrongfull vexation.

A Parliamente holden at Dublin.

This noble man being valiant and well spoken, was nothing inferiour to hys father in martiall prowesse, chasing in the time of his gouernemēt the family of the Tooles, battering O Carrell his Castels, and bringing in awe all the Irish of the land.

This Earle of good meaning, to vnite the houses in friendship, matched his sister Margaret Fitz Giralde, with Pierce Butler Earle of Ossorie, whome he also holp to recouer ỳ Erledome of Dymond, into the which, after the decease of the Earle James, a Basterde Butler, had by abatement intruded.

Pierce Butler, and Margaret Fitz Girald espoused.

Greate and manifolde were the miseries the Lady Margaret susteyned, hir husband Pierce Butler beeing so egrely pursued by the vsurper, as hee durst not beare vp head, but was forced to houer and lurke in Woodes and Forrestes.

The noble woman being great with childe, and vppon necessitie constreyned to vse a spare dyet (for hir onely sustenaunce was milke) she longed sore for wine, and calling hyr Lorde, and a trusty seruaunte of hys, James White, vnto hir, shee requested them both, to helpe hyr to some Wyne, for shee was not able any longer to endure so streight a like.

James White.

Truely Margaret, quoth the Earle of Ossorie, thou shalt haue store of Wine within thys foure and twentie houres, or else thou shalte feede alone on milke for me.

The nexte daye following, Pierce hauyng intelligence, that hys enimie the bace Butler would haue trauayled from Donnore to Kilkennie, notwithstanding hee were accompanyed with syxe horsemenne, yet Pierce hauyng none but hys Lackey, did forstalle hym in the way, and with a couragious charge, gored the Basterd through with his speare.

The Basterde Butler slayne.

Thys prosperous calme succeeding the former boysterous storme, the Lady Margaret began to take hearte, hir naturall stoutenesse floted, as well by the remembraunce of hir noble birth, as by the intelligence of hir honorable match.

Kildare all this while kept in authoritie, notwithstanding the pulles giuen againste him by secrete heauers, that enuyed his fortune, and sought to nourish the olde grudge, was at legth by their priuie packing, fetched vp to the Court of Englande by commission, and causeb hym to bee examined vppon diuers interrogatories touching the affayres of Irelande.

Kildare sent for into England.

Hee left in hys rowmth Maurice Fitz Thomas, of Lackragh Lorde Justice: and shortly after came ouer Lorde Lieutenaunte Thomas Howarde Earle of Surrey, who was after Duke of Northfolke, Grandfather to the last Duke, accompanyed with two hundred yeomen of the Crowne: before whome, shortly after his repaire thither, there was a Parliamente holden at Dublin, in whiche, there past an acte, that al wilful burning of corne, as wel in reekes in the fields, as in Villages and Townes, shuld be high treason.

Maurice Fitz Thomas Lord Iustice.

Surrey Lord Lieutenant of Irelande.

A Parliamente holden at Dublin.

Item an acte agaynste lodyng wolles and flore, vppon payne of forfayture of the double value of the same, the one halfe to the Kyng, and the other halfe to him that will sue therefore.

Item that any person seised of lands, tentes, or tenementes in possession or in vse, vnto the yerely value of tenne markes aboue the charges, in fee simple, fee tayle, or for tearme of lyfe, copy holde, or auncient demeane, shall passe in euery attaint.

While the Lord Lieutenante sate at dynner in the Castle of Dublin, hee hearde newes that the Moores with a mayne army were euen at the entrie of the borders, readye to inuade the English pale.

The Moores in Rebellion.

Immediately menne were leuyed by Iohn Fitz Simons, then Maior of Dublin, and the nexte morowe ioyning them to his bande, the Lieutenant marched towardes the Frontiers of Leixe.

Iohn Fitz Simons.

The Moores vppon the Lieutenant hys approche, seuered themselues into sundry companies, and vnderstandyng that the carriage was dragging after the army, and slenderly mãned, certayne of them charged the Lieutenante hys seruauntes, and suche of the Citizens as were appoynted to guarde the carriage.

Patricke Fitz Simons, a strong sturdy yonker, kept the enimies such tacke, as he seazed part of them away, rescued the carriage, slewe two of the Rebelles, and broughte their heads wyth him to maister Maior his tent.

Patricke Fitz Simons.

The nexte morning, two of the Lieutenaunte his men, that flunke away from Fitz Simons, thinking that the carriage had bin lost, aduertised their Lorde, that Fitz Simons fledde away, and the Moores were so many in compasse, as it had bin but folly for two to bicker with so great a number.

The Lieutenante posted in a rage to the Maior his pauilion, telling hym, that his man Fitz Simons was a cowardly Traytor in rũning away when hee shoulde haue defended the carriage.

What am I, my Lord, quoth Patricke Fitz Simons, skipping in his shirt out of the tente, with both the heads in his hand. My Lorde, I am no cowarde, I stoode to my tacklings, when your men gaue me the slippe, I rescued the carriage, and haue heere sufficiente tokens of my manhoode, tumbling downe both the heads. Saist thou so Fitz Simons quoth the Lieutenant? I crie thee mercie, and by this George, I woulde to God it had bin my good hap, to haue bin in thy companie in that skirmish. So drinking to Fitz Simons in a bolle of wine, and honorably rewarding him for his good seruice, he returned to his pauilio, where hauing knowledge of Omore his reuole, he pursued him with a troupe of horsemen.

A valiant wife

The Lieutenant thus passing forward, was espyed by a gunner of Omores, who lodged close in a woodde side, and watching hys time, hee discharged his peece at the verye face of the Lieutenante, strake the viser off hys helmet, and pierced no further as God would.

The Earle of Surrey in daunger to haue bin slaine.

This did he (retchlesse in manner what became of himselfe, so hee might amaze the armye for a time) and surely hereby he brake the swiftnes of their following, and aduantaged the flight of his Captaine, which thing hee wanne with the price of his owne bloud. For the Souldyers would no further, till they hadde rausackt all the nookes of thys woodde, verily suspecting some ambush thereabout, and in seueral knottes ferretted out thys gunner, whome Fitz Williams and Bedlowe of the Roche, were fayne to mangle and hew in peeces, bycause the wretche would neuer yeelde.

Fitz Williams Bedlowe.

In the meane whyle, defyance was proclaymed with Fraunce and Scotlande both at once, whiche moued the Kyng to call home Surrey out of Irelande, that hee myghte employ hym in those warres. Hys prowesse, integritie, good nature, and course of gouernement, the Countrey muche commended.

Surrey sent for home.

Piers Butler Earle of Ossory, was appoynted Lorde Deputie.

Piers Butler Earle of Ossorie Lord Deputie.

In the meane time, Kildare attending the King his pleasure for his dispatche, recouered fauoure through the instance of the Marques Dorset, whose daughter dame Elizabeth Grey, he espoused, and so departed home.

1524

Now was partaker of all ỹ Deputies counsell, one Roberte Talbot of Belgarde, whome

Robert Talbot of Belgard

the Si-

the Giraldines deadly hated: him they procured to keepe a Kalender of all their doings, who incensed brother against brother. In which rage, James Fitz Girald meeting the sayde Gentleman beside Ballimore, slew him euen then vpon his iourney towarde the Deputie to keepe his Christmas with him.

With this despitefull murther, both sides brake out into open enmitie, and especially the Countesse of Ossorie, Kildare his sister, a rare womã, and able for wisedome to rule a realme, had not hir stomacke ouerruled hir knowledge.

Heere began informations of newe treasons, passing to and fro, with complaintes and replyes.

But the Marques Dorset had wrought so for his sonne in law, that he was suffered to rest at home, and onely commissioners directed into Ireland, with authoritie to examine the roote of their griefes, wherein if they found Kildare any thing at all purged, their instructions were to depose the plaintife, and to sweare the other Lord Deputie.

Commissioners were these, Sir Raufe Egerton, a Knighte of Cheshire, Anthony Fitz Herbert, seconde Justice of the common place, & James Dētō, Deane of Lichefield, who hauing examined these accusatiōs, suddaynely toke the swoorde from the Earle of Ossorie, sware Kildare Lorde Deputie, before whome, Con Oneale bare the swoord that day.

Concerning the murtherer whome they myght haue hanged, they brought him prisoner into Englande, presented him to the Cardinall Wolsey, who was sayde to hate Kildare his blood: and the Cardinall intending to haue put him to execution, with more reproche and dishonour to the name, caused him to bee ledde about the streetes of London haltred, and hauing a taper in his hande, which asked so long time, that the Deane of Lichefielde stepped to the King, and begged the Gentleman his pardon.

The Cardinall was sore inflamed heerewith, and the malice not hitherto so ranke, was throughly ripened, and therefore hence forewarde, Ossorie brought forthe diuers proofes of the Deputie his disorder, for that (as hee alledged) the Deputie shoulde winke at the Earle of Desmonde, whome by vertue of the King his letters, he ought to haue attached.

Also, that he sought for acquaintance and affinitie with meere Irish enimies, that hee hadde armed them against him, then beeing the King his Deputie, hee hanged and headed good subiects, whome he mistrusted to leane to the Butlers friendship. Kildare was therefore presently commaunded to appeare, which he did, leauing in his roomth his brother Fitz Girald of Lexlip, whome they shortly deposed, and chose the Baron of Deluin, whome Oconor toke prisoner, and then the Earle of Ossorie (to shewe his habilitie of seruice) brought to Dublin an army of Irishmen, hauing captaines ouer them Oconor, Omore, and Mcarrol, and at Saint Mary Abbey, was chosen Deputy by the King his counsell. In whiche office being himselfe (saue only in feates of armes) a simple Gentleman, hee bare out his honoure, and the charge of gouernement very worthely, through the singular wisedome of his Countesse: a Lady of suche a port, that all estates of the Realme crouched vnto hir: so politique, that nothing was thought substantially debated without hir aduice: manlike and tall of stature: very liberall and bountifull: a sure friende, a bitter enimie, hardly disliking where she fansied, not easily fansying wher she disliked: the only meane at those days wherby hir husbande his Countrey was reclaymed from sluttishnes and slouenry, to cleane bedding and ciuilitie. But to these vertues was ynked suche a selfe liking, suche an ouerweening, and suche a maiestie aboue the tenure of a Subiect, that for assurance thereof, shee sticked not to abuse hir husbands honoure against hir brothers folly.

Notwithstanding I learne not that shee practised his vndoyng (whiche ensued, and was to hir vndoubtedly greate heauinesse, as vppon whome, both the blemishe thereof, and the substance of the greater part of that family depended after) but that she by indirect meanes lifted hir brother out of credite, to aduance hir husbād, the commō voice, and the thing it selfe speaketh. All this while abode the Earle of Kildare at the Court, and with muche adoe, found shift to bee called before the Lords to aunswere suddaynely. They sate vpon him diuerslie affected, and namely ỹ Cardinall Lord Chancellour misliking the Erle his cause, cōforted his accusers, & enforced the articles obiected, & what else so euer could be gathered thereof in these words:

Fitz Girald Lord Iustice.

The Earle of Ossorie chosen L. Deputie.

The Countes of Ossorie.

Kildare conuented before the Counsell.

The Cardinall L. Chancellor chargeth Kildare.

I wote well (my Lorde) that I am not the meetest at this boorde to charge you with these treasons, bycause it hathe pleased some of youre pewfellowes to report, that I am a professed enimie to all nobilitie, and namely to the Giraldines: but seeing euerye curst boy can say as muche when hee is controlled, and seeing these poyntes are so weightie, that they should not bee dissembled of vs, and so apparant, that they cānot be denyed of you, I must haue leaue (notwithstanding your stale flaunder) to bee the mouth of these honorable at this present, and to trumpe your treasons in youre way, howsoeuer you take me. First you remember, how ỹ lewde

'Earle of Desmond your kinsman (who passeth
'not whome hee serueth, mighte hee change hys
'master) sent his confederates with letters of cre'dence to Francis the Frenche Kyng: and ha-
'uyng but colde comfort there, went to Charles
'the Emperoure, profering the help of Mounster
'and Connaght, toward the conquest of Irelād,
'if either of them woulde helpe to winne it from
'our King. Howe many letters, what preceptes,
'what messages, what threats haue bin sent you
'to apprehende him, and yet not done? Why so?
'forsooth I could not catch him: nay nay Earle,
'forsooth you would not watche him. If hee bee
'iustly suspected, why are you partiall in so great
'a charge? if not, why are you fearefull to haue
'him tryed? yea for it will be sworne and deposed
'to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you
'haue winked wilfully, shunned his sighte, alte'red youre course, warned hys friendes, stopped
'both eares and eyes againste his detectors, and
'when so euer you toke vppon you to hunte him
'out, then was hee sure before hande to bee out of 'your walke. Surely, this iugling and false play
'little became either an honest man called to such 'honour, or a noble man putte in so greate truste.
'Had you lost but a Cowe or an Horse of youre
'owne, two hundred of youre reteyners woulde
'haue come at your whistle to rescue the pray frō
'the vttermost edge of Ulster: all the Irishe in 'Ireland must haue giuen you the way. But in 'pursuing so needeful a matter as this was, mer-
'cifull God, howe nice, how daungerous, howe
'wayward haue you bin? One while he is from 'home, another while he keepeth home, sometimes
'sicke, sometimes in the bordures, where you
'dare not venter. Iwisse my Lorde, there bee
'shrewde bugges in the bordures for the Earle
'of Kildare to feare, the Earle, nay the Kyng of
'Kildare: for when you are disposed, you raigne
'more lyke than rule in the land: where you are
'malitious, the truest subiects stand for Irishe e-
'nimies: where you are pleased, the Irish enimie
'standeth for a ductifull subiect: harts and hands,
'liues and landes, are all at your courtesie: who 'fawneth not thereon, he cannot rest within your
'smell, and youre smel is so ranke, that you take 'them out at pleasure.

Whilest the Cardinall was speaking, the Earle chaufed and changed coloure, and sundry profers made to aunswere euery sentence as it came: at last hee brake out, and interrupted hym thus.

Kildare interrupteth the Cardinals tale

'My Lord Chancellor, I beseech you pardon
'me, I am short witted, and you I perceyue in-
'tende a long tale: if you proceede in this order,
'halfe my purgation will be lost for lacke of car'riage. I haue no schole trickes, nor arte of me-
'morie: excepte you heare me while I remember your wordes, your second processe will hammer out the former.

The Lordes tender Kildare.

The Lordes associate, who for the most parte tenderly loued him, and knew the Cardinall his manner of tauntes so lothsome, as wherewith they were inured many yeares agone, humbly besought his grace, to charge him directly with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter, vntill it were examined throughly: that graunted, it is good reason (quoth the Earle) that youre grace beare the mouth of hys worde, but my Lorde, those mouthes that put these things into your mouth, are verye wyde mouthes, suche in deede as haue gaped long for my wracke, and nowe at length, for waunte of better stuffe, are fayne to fill their mouthes with smoke. What my cousin Desmonde hathe compassed, as I knowe not, so I beleeue his naked hearte, for holding out so long. If hee can bee taken by my agents, that presently waite for him, then haue mine aduersaries bewrayed their malice, and this heape of heynous wordes shall resemble a scarcrowe, or a man of strawe, that seemeth at a blushe to carrie some proportion, but when it is felt and peysed, discouereth a vanitie, serueng only to feare Crowes: and I verily trust, youre honours shall see the proofe by the thing it selfe, within these few dayes. But go to: suppose hee neuer be hadde, what is Kildare to blame for it more than my good brother of Ossorie? who notwithstanding his high promises, hauing also the King his power, is yet content to bring him in at leysure. Cannot the Earle of Desmonde shift, but I must be of counsell? cannot hee hyde him, except I winke? if hee bee close, am I hys mate? if he be friended, am I a Traytour? This is a doughty kynde of accusation, whiche they brge againste me, wherein they are stabled and mired at my firste dentall. You woulde not see him (say they) who made them so familiar with mine eyesight? or when was the Earle within my sight? or who stode by, when I let hym slippe? or where are the tokens of my wilfull hudwinke? but you sente him worde to beware of you: who was the messenger? where are the letters? conuince my negatiues, see how losely this idle geare hangeth togither. Desmonde is not taken. Well, you are in fault, why? bycause you are: who proueth it? no body: what coniectures? so it seemeth: to whome? to your enimies: who tolde it them? they will sweare it. What other ground? none: will they sweare it my Lord? why then of like they know it, eyther they haue mine hād to shewe, or can bring forth ẏ messenger, or were present at a conference, or priuie to Desmonde, or some body bewrayed it to them, or they themselues were my carriers or vicegerentes therein: whiche of these partes will they

He answereth the Cardinals obiection.

'they chose, for I know them too well. To reckon
'my selfe convict by their bare wordes or headlesse
'sayings, or frantike othes, were but a mere mock-
'erie. My Letter were some read, were any such
'wryting extant, my seruants and friends are rea-
'die to be sifted: of my cousin of Desmonde they 'may lie lewdly, since no man here can well con-
'trarie them. Touching my selfe, I neuer noted
'in them eyther so much wit, or so fast fayth, that 'I would haue gaged vpon their silence the life of 'a good hounde, much lesse mine owne. I doubt 'not, may it lyke your honours, to appose them,
'how they came to the knowledge of those mat'ters, which they are so readie to depose: but you
'shall finde their tongues chayned to an other man
'his trencher, and as it were knightes of the post,
'suborned to say, sweare, and stare the vttermoste
'they can, as those that passe not what they say,
'nor wyth what face they say it, so they saye no
'truth. But of an other side it grieueth mee, that 'your good grace whom I take to be wise & sharpe,
'& who of your blessed disposition wisheth me well,
'shoulde be so farre gone in crediting these corrupt
'informers, that abuse the ignorance of your state
'and Countrey to my perill. Little knowe you,
'my Lorde, how necessarie it is, not onely for the 'gouernour, but also for euery Noble man in Ire-
'lande to hamper his vncivil neighbours at discre'tion, wherein if they wayted for processe of lawe,
'and had not those lyues and landes you speake of
'within theyr reach, they might happe to lose their
'owne liues and landes, without lawe. You beare
'of a case as it were in a dreame, and feele not the 'smart that vexeth vs. In Englande there is not 'a meane subiect, that dare extend his hande to fil-'lippe a peere of the Realme. In Irelande except 'the Lord haue cunning to his strength, & strength 'to saue his crowne, and sufficient authoritie to 'take theeues and varlets when they sturre, he shal
'finde them swarme so fast, that it will be to late 'to call for iustice. If you wil haue our seruice take 'effect, you must not tie vs alwayes to these iudi-
'ciall proceedings, wherewith your realme (thanked be God) is inured. Touching my kingdome
'I know not what your Lordship shoulde meane
'thereby. If your Grace imagin, that a kingdom
'consisteth in seruing God, in obeying the prince,
'in gouerning with loue the common wealth, in 'shouldering subiects, in suppressing Rebelles, in 'executing iustice, in brideling blind affections, I 'would be willing to be inuested with so vertuous
'and royall a name. But if therefore you terme
'me a king, in that you are perswaded that I re-
'pine at the gouernment of my soueraigne, or 'winke at malefactors, or oppresse ciuill liuers, I
'vtterly disclayme in that odious tearme, marueyl-
'ling greatly, that one of your Grace his profound
'wisdome, woulde seeme to appropriate so sacred a name to so wicked a thing. But howsoeuer it be, my Lorde, I woulde you and I had chaunged Kingdomes but for one Moneth, I woulde trust to gather vp more crummes in that space, than twise the reuenues of my poore Earledome:
but you are well and warme, and so holde you,
and vpbrayde not me with such an odious terme.
I slumber in an hard Cabyn, whē you sleepe in a soft bed of downe: I serue vnder the Kyng hys Cope of heauen, when you are serued vnder a ca-napie: I drinke water out of my skull, when you drinke wine out of golden cuppes: my courser is trayned to the fielde, when your Genet is taught to amble: when you are begraced and beloued, and crouched and kneeled vnto, then find I small grace with our Irish borderers, excepte I cut thē off by the knees.

At these gyrdes the Counsayle woulde haue smyled, if they durst, but eche man bit his lippe, and held his countenaunce: for howsoeuer some of them inclined to the Erle of Ossorie, they hated all the Cardinall, who perceyuing that Kildare was no babe, rose in a fume from the Coun-sayle table, commytted the Earle, and deferred the matter, till more direct probations came out of Irelande.

The Cardinall not beloued.

The Duke of Norffolke bounde for Kildare.

The Duke of Norffolke who was late Lieutenant in Ireland, perceyuing the Cardinal to be sore bent agaynst the noble man, rather for the deadly hatred hee bare his house, than for anye great matter he had wherwith to charge his person, stept to the king, & craued Kildare to be his prisoner, offring to be bound for his forth cōming, ouer and abouc all his landes, bodie for bodie.
Wherevpon to the Cardinall his great grieke, the prisoner was bayled, and honourably by the duke entertayned.

The Irish in rebellion.

During his abode in the duke his house, O-neyle, and Oconor, and all their friendes and alyes, watching their time to annoy the pale, made open insurrection agaynst the Earle of Ossorie then Lord Deputie of Irelande, insomuche that the nobleman mistrusting the fickleneſſe of Desmond on the one side, and the feare of these newe start vp Rebels on the other side, stood halfe amazed, as it were betwene fire and water. For remedie wherof, letters thicke and three folde were addressed to the Counsaile of Englande, purporting that all these late hurly burlies were of purpose raysed by the meanes of Kyldare, to the blemishing and staynyng of his brother Ossorie his gouernment. And to put the matter out of doubt, it was further added, that Kildare commaunded his daughter Elice Fitz Gerald, wife to the baron of Slane, to excite in his name the aforesaid traitours to this open rebellion.

Kildare a fresh impeached.

The Cardinall herevpon caused Kildare to be examined before the counsaile, where he pressed him so deepely with this late disloyaltie, that the presumption being, as the Cardinall did force it, vehement, the treason obious, the king suspicious, the eminite egre, the friendes feint, (which were sufficient grounds to ouerthrow an innocent person) the Earle was reprieued into the tower.

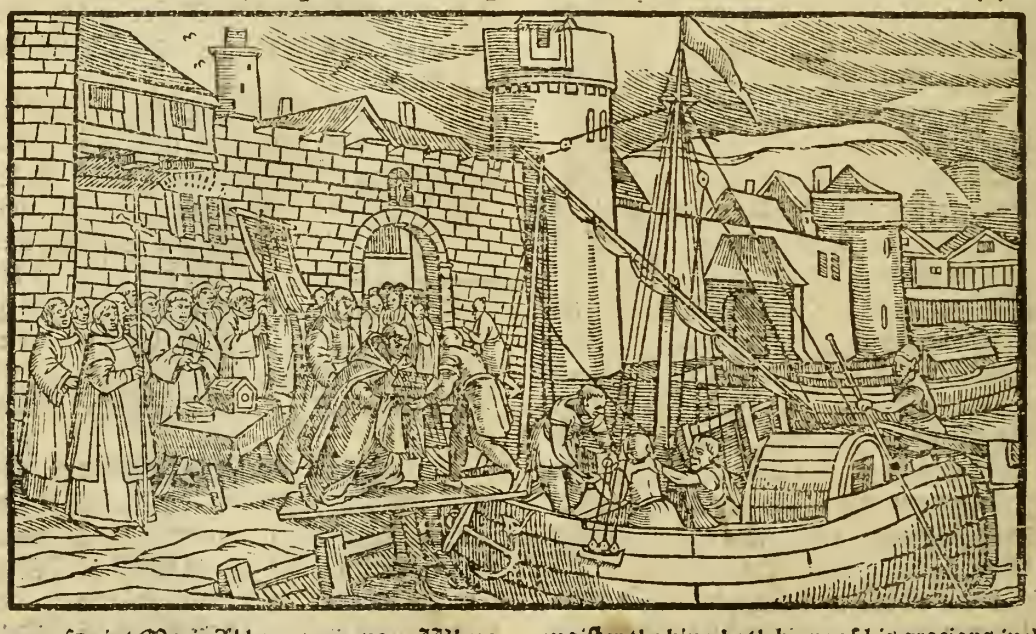
The Earle of Kildare committed.

The noble man betoke himselfe to God, and the king, he was heartily beloued of the Lieutenant, pitied in all the Court, and standing in so harde a case, altered little of his accustomed hue, comforted other noble men prisoners with him, dissembling his owne sorrow.

One night when the Lieutenant and he for their disport were playing at slidegrote or shoueborde, sodainly commeth from the Cardinall a Mandatum, to execute Kyldare on the Morrow. The Earle marking the Lieutenants deepe sigh, by S. Bryde, Lieutenant (quoth he) there is some madde game in that scrole: but fall how it will, this throwe is for an huddle. When the worst was tolde him, nowe I pray thee (quoth he) do no more but learne assuredly from the king his owne mouth, whether his highnesse be witting thereto, or not. For doubted the Lieutenant to displease the Cardinall: yet of verie pure loue to his friend, he posteth to the king at midnight, and deliuered his errand: for at all houres of the night the Lieutenant hath accesse to the Prince vpon occasions. The king controlling the saucinesse of the Priest (for those were his termes) deliuered to the Lieutenant his Signet in token of countermaunde, which when the Cardinall had seene, he beganne to breathe out vnseasoned language, which the Lieutenant was lothe to heare, and so left him pattring and chaunting the Deuill his Pater noster.

A mandatum to execute Kildare.

The Cardinal his presumptuousnesse blamed of the king.



Thus broke vp the storme for that time, and the next yeare Wolsey was cast out of fauour, and within few yeares, sir William Skeffington was sent ouer L. Deputie, and brought with him the Erle pardoned and ryd from all his troubles.

1529

Sir William Skeffington Deputie of Irelande.

When it was bruted, that Skeffington, the Earle of Kildare, and Edward Staples Bishop of Meth landed neare Dublyn, the Maior and Citizens mette him with a solemne Procession, on Saint Marie Abbayes greene. Where maister Thomas Fitz Simons recorder of Dublyn made a pithie Oration to congratulate the Gouernour and the Earle his prosperous arryuall, to whom Skeffington shaped an answere in this wise.

Edward Staples Bishop of Meeth.

Thomas Fitz Simons.

Skeffington his answere.

"Maister Maior, and maister Recorder, you "haue at length this noble man here present, for "whom you sore longed, whyles he was absent. "And after many stormes by him sustayned, hee "hath nowe to the comfort of his friendes, to the "confusion of his foes, subdued violence with pa- "tience, iniuries with sufferance, and malice with "obedience: and such Butchers as of hatred thyr- "sted after his bloud, are nowe taken for outcaste "Maslines, littred in curtisi bloud. How well my maister the king hath beene of his gracious inclination affected to the Earle of Kildare, (his backe friende being by his iust desert from his Maiestie weeded) the credit wherein this noble man at this present resteth, manifestly declareth. Wherefore it resteth, that you thanke God and the King for his safe arriuall. As for his welcome, maister Recorder his courteous discourse, your great assemblies, your cheerfull countenances, your willing meetings, your solemne Processions, doe so faire shewe it, as you minister nee occasion on hys Lordship his behalf, rather to thanke you for your courtesie, than to exhort you to any further ceremonie.

He glanceth at the Cardinal who was taken to be a butcher his sonne.

Hauing ended his Oration, they road all into the Citie, where shortlye after the Earle of Ossorie surrendred the swoorde to sir William Skeffington.

Ossorie

During the time that Kildare was in Englande, the sept of the Toles making his absence their harueste, ceased not to molest and spoyle his tenants, and therefore the Earle meaning not to wrap vp so lightly their manifold iniuries, was determined presently vpon his arriuall to exile the quittance: to the speditiue of which seruice he requested the aide of the Citizens of Dublyn: and expecting in Chyrstes Church their answere touching thys motion, the Maior and his brethren promised to assyst him with two C. Archers.

The late come Bishop of Meth being then present, moued question, whether the Citizens were pardoned, for crowning Lambert contrarie to theyr duetie of allegeance, and if they were not pardoned, he thought they might aduantage the king thereby. Whereat one of their sagest and expertest Aldermen, named John Fitz Simons, stept forth and sayde:

My Lorde of Meth, may I be so bolde as to craue what Countrey man you are? Mary sir (quoth the Bishop) I woulde you shoulde knowe it, I am a Gentleman, and an Englishe man. My Lorde (quoth Fitz Simons) my meaning is to learne, in what shire of Englande you were borne? In Lyncolnshyre, good sir, quoth Staples. Why then my Lorde, quoth Fitz Simons, we are no traytors, bycause it was the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lorde Louell that crowned him, and therefore if you be a Gentleman of Lincolnshyre, let that you be pardoned, for God and our King be thanked, we haue need of none.

At this answere Meth was set, and suche as were present were forced to smyle, to see what a round fall he caught in his owne turne.

In the seconde yeare of Skeffington his gouernment, it happened that one Henrie White, seruant to Benet a Marchant of Dublyn, was pitching of a Cart of hay in the high streete, and hauing offred boyes play to passengers that walked to and fro, he let a bottle of his hay fall on a souldiers Bonet, as he past by his Cart: the souldiour taking this knauishe knacke in dudgeon, hurled his Dagger at him, and hauing narowly miss the princocks, he sticked it in a post not farre off. White leapt downe from the Cart, and thrust the souldiour through the shoulder wyth hys pyke. Whereupon there was a great vproare in the Citie, betweene the Souldiours and the apprentises, insomuch as Thomas Barby beyng the Maior, hauing the King his swoorde drawne, was hardly able to appease the fray, in which vproare were wounded, and none slaine.

The Lorde Deputie issued out of the Castel, and came as farre as the Pyllorie, to whome the Maior posted through the prease with the swoorde naked vnder his arme, and presented White that was ỹ brewer of all this garboyl to his Lordship, whom the Gouernour pardoned, as well for hys courage in bickering, as for his retchles simplicity and pleasantnesse in telling the whole discourse. Wherby a man may see how many bloudie quarels, a brawling swashbuckler may pyke out of a bottle of hay, namely when his braynes are forebitten with a bottle of nappie Ale. White pardoned.

About this time ther was a great sturre reised in Englãd, about the king his diuorse, who thinking it expedient in so tickle a woorlde to haue a sure post in Irelande, made Kildare Lorde Deputie, Croommer, the Primate of Armach, Lorde Chancellour, and sir James Butler Lord Treasorer. Kildare Lorde Deputie. Croommer. Butler.

Skeffington supposing, that he was put beside the cushion by the secrete canualling of Kildare his friendes, conceyued thereof a great iealousie, being therein the deeper drenched, bycause that Kildare hauing receyued the swoorde, woulde permit Skeffington, who was late gouernour, now like a meane priuate person, to daunce attendance among other suiters in his house at Dublyn, named the Carbry. Skeffington offended with Kildare.

Skeffington playing thus on the bit, shortly after sayled into England, vpon whose departure the Lorde Deputie summoned a Parliament at Dublin, where there past an Act againste leazers of corne: Item, for the vniting and appropriation of the personage of Galtrim, to the Priorie of Saint Peters by Trim. He sayleth into Englande.

A Parliament summoned at Dublin.

In the Parliament tyme, Oneale on a sodaine inuaded the Countrey of Vriell, ryfling and spoyling the king his subiects, at which tyme also was the Earle of Ossorie greatly vexed by the Giraldines, by reason of the olde quarelles of either side a fresh reuiued. Vriell inuaded by Oneale.

The next yeare, the Lorde Deputie going against Dearroule, was pitifully hurt in the side, with a Gunne at the Castell of Byrre, so that he neuer after enioyed his lymmes, nor deliuered his woordes in good plight, otherwise like ynough to haue bene longer forborne, in consideration of his many noble qualities, great good seruices, and the state of those tymes. Kildare hurt.

Streight wayes complaynctes were addressed to the king of these enormities, and that in most heynous maner that could be deuysed, boulting out his doings as it were to the least brake of sinister surmises, turning euerie priuate iniurie to be the king his quarell, and making euerie Puddings pricke as huge in shewe as Sampsons hys Piller. Whereupon Kildare was commaunded by sharpe letters to repayre into Englande, leauing such a person for the furniture of that realm, and the gouernance of the lande in his absence, for whose doings he would answere. Kildare accused. He is sent for to Englande.

Being

Being vpon the sight of this letter prepared to sayle into England, he sate in counsaile at Dublyn, and hauing sent for his sonne and heyre the Lorde Thomas Fitz Giralde (a yong stripling of xxj. yeares of age, borne in England, seame to the Lorde Souch his daughter, the Erle of Kildare his firste wife) in the hearing of the whole worde thus he spake.

Thomas Fitz Girald.

'Sonne Thomas, I doubt not, but you know 'that my soueraigne Lord the King, hath sent for 'me to Englande, and what shall betyde me, God 'knoweth, for I know not. But howsoeuer it 'falleth, both you and I know, that I am well 'stept in yeares: and as I may shortly die, for that 'I am mortal, so I must in hast decease, bicause I 'am olde. Wherefore in as much as my Wynter 'is well neare ended, and the Spring of your age 'nowe budded, my will is that you behaue your 'selfe so wisely in these your greene yeares, as that 'to the comfort of your friendes, you may enioy 'the pleasure of your Sommer, gleane and reape 'the fruite of your Haruest, that with honour you 'may growe to the catching of that hoarie Win- 'ter, on whiche you see me your father fast pic- 'king.

Kildare his exhortation to his sonne the L. Thomas.

'And whereas it pleaseth the king his Maie- 'stie, that vpon my departure here hence, I shoulde 'substitute in my rowme such one, for whose go- 'uernment I would answere: albeit I knowe, 'that your yeares are tender, your wit not settled, 'your iudgement not fully rectified, and therefore 'I myght bee with good cause reclaymed, from 'putting a naked swoorde in a yong mans hande: 'yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as I am your 'father, and you my sonne, I am well assured to 'beare that stroke with you in steering your ship, as 'that vpon any information I may commaunde 'you as your father, and correct you as my sonne 'for the wrong handling of your helme.

'There be here that sit at this bourd, far more 'sufficient personages for so great a charge than 'you are. But what then? If I shoulde cast this 'burthen on their shoulders, it might bee, that 'hereafter they would bee so sarre with enuie ca- 'ryed, as they would perceaue hazard the losse of 'one of their owne eyes, to be assured, that I should 'be depriued of both mine eyes. But forasmuche 'as the case toucheth your skinne as neare as 'mine, and in one respect nigher than mine, by- 'cause (as I sayde before) I rest in the Winter, 'and you in the Spring of your yeares, and nowe 'I am resolued day by day to learne, rather howe 'to die in the feare of god, than to liue in the pompe 'of the worlde, I thinke you will not be so braine- 'sicke, as to stabbe your selfe through the body, on- 'ly to skarrifie my skinne with the poynt of your 'blade. Wherefore, my sonne, consider, that it is 'easie to raze, and harde to buylde, and in all your affayres be schooled by this worde, that for wise- dome is able, and for the inter affection it bea- reth your house will be founde willing, to lesson you with sounde and sage aduise. For albeit in authoritie you rule them, yet in counsaile they must rule you. My sonne, you know that my late maimes kicketh: my talke rather wise I would haue gra- tified longer on this matter. For a good tale may be twise tolde, and a sounde aduise reasones itera- ted, taketh the deper impression in the attentiue hearer his minde. But although my fatherly af- fection requireth my discourse to be longer, yet I trust your good inclination asketh it to be shorter, and vpon that assurance, here in the presence of this honourable assembly, I deliuer you thys swoorde.

Thus he spake for his last farewell with tric- kling teares, and hauing ended, he stoode, embra- ced the Counsaile, committed them to God, and immediately after he was embarked.

Kildare sayleth into Englande.

But although with his graue exhortation the frozen heartes of his aduersaries for a short spirt thawed, yet notwithstanding they turned sone after all this gay Gloria patri, to a further fetche, saying that this was nothing else but to dazell their eyes with some iugling knacke, to the ende they shoulde aduertise the king of his loyall spee- ches, adding further, that he was tow tow euill, that coulde not speake well. And to force the prepen- sed treasons, they layde to his charge, with fur- ther surmises, they certified the counsaile of Eng- lande, that the Erle before his departure, furni- shed his owne Piles and fortes with the King his Artillerie and Munition taken forth of the Castel of Dublin.

His oration misconstrued.

He is accused for taking the king his artillerie.

The Erle being examined vpon that article before the Counsaile, although he answered that the fewe potte Gunnes and Chambers hee toke from thence, were placed in his Castell to streng- then the borders agaynst the inroades of the Irish enimie, and that if he intended any treason, he was not so folish, as to fortifie walles and stones, and to commit his naked bones into their hands, yet notwithstanding he deliuered his speeches by reason of his Palsey, in such staggering and maf- fling wise, that such of the Counsaile as were not his friends, perswading the rest that he had sunke in his owne tale, by imputing his lisping and dragging answere, rather to the guilt of consci- ence, than to the infirmitie of his late maime, had him committed, vntill the king his pleasure were further knowne.

Kildare committed.

But before we wade any further in this mat- ter, for the better opening of the whole ground, it woulde be noted, that the Earle of Kildare a- mong diuerse hidden aduersaries, had in these his later troubles foure principall enimies, that were

Kildare his chiefe enimies

the Belweathers and Caterpyllers of his ouerthrow, as in those dayes it was commonly bruted.

The first was John Alen Archebishoppe of Dublin, a Gentleman of a good house, Chaplayne to Cardinall Wolsey, and after by the Cardinall his meanes constituted Archbishop of Dublin, a learned Prelate, a singular good Cānonist, a good housholder, of the people indifferently beloued, and more woulde haue bene, had he not ouerbusied himself in supplanting the house of Kildare.

And although it were knowne, that his fierce grudge towards the Giraldines, proceeded from the great affection he bare his Lorde and maister the Cardinall, insomuch as he would not sticke, were he able, for the pleasuring of the one to vndoe the other, yet suche occasions of greater hatred after ensued (namely for that hee was displaced from beeyng Lorde Chauncellour, and Cromer the Primate of Armache by Kildare his drifte setled in the office) as notwithstanding the Cardinall his combe were cut in England, yet did hee persist in pursuing his wonted malice toward that seat.

The seconde that was lynked to this confederacie, was sir John Alen Knight, first Secretarie to this Archbishop, after became mayster of the Rolles, lastly Lorde Chauncellor. And although sir John Alen were not of kinne to the Archebishop, but onely of the name, yet notwithstandyng the Archebishop made so greate reckenyng of him, as well for his forecaste in matters of weyght, as for hys faythfulnesse in affayres of trust, as what soeuer exployte were executed by the one, was forthwith deemed to haue bene diuised by the other.

The thirde of this crewe was Thomas Cannon, Secretarie to Skeffington, who thinkyng to be reuenged on Kildare for puttyng his Lord and maister beside the Cushen, as hee surmysed, was very willyng to haue an Dare in that Boate.

The fourth that was suspected to make vp the muster, was Robert Cowly, first Baylife in Dublin, after seruaunt to the Ladie Margaret Fitz Giralde Countesse of Dzmond and Desmond, lastly maister of the Rolles in Ireland, and finally hee deceassed at London.

This Gentleman for his wisedome and policy was very inwarde with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Desmond, as one by whose aduise shee was in all hir affayres directed. Wherupon some suspicious persones were perswaded and brought in mynde, that hee was the sower of all the discorde that rested betweene the two brethern Kildare and Desmond, as though hee coulde not bee rooted in the fauour of the one, but that hee must haue professed open hatred to the other.

These foure as byrdes of one feather, were supposed to bee open enimies to the house of Kildare, bearyng that sway in the common wealth as they were not occasioned, as they thought, eyther to craue the friendshippe of the Giraldines, or greatly to feare theyr hatred and enmitie.

There were beside them diuerse other secrete vnderminers, who wrought so cunningly vnder the thumbe, by holdyng with the Hare, and runnyng with the Hounde, as if Kildare had prospered, they were assured, theyr malice would not haue bene in maner suspected, but if hee had bene in hys affayres stabled, then theyr fine deuises for theyr further credite shoulde haue bene apparented. Wherefore the beauyng of hys backe friendes not onely surmised, but also manifested, by Kildare, the Lorde Thomas being Lorde Justice, or vice Deputie, in his father hys absence, fetcht both the Alens so roundly ouer the hippes, as well by secrete drifte as open tauntes, as they were the more egerly spurrde, to compasse his confusion. For the Lord Justice and the Counsayle, with diuerse of the Nobilitie at a solemne banquet, discoursing of the auncientie of houses, and of theyr armes, sir John Alen spake to the Lorde Justice these wordes.

The L. Thomas encreaseth the Alens agaynst him.

My Lorde, your house giueth the Marmoset, whose propertie is to eate his owne tayle. Meanyng thereby as the Lorde Thomas supposed, that Kildare did vse to pill and poll hys friendes, tenants and reteyners. These wordes were no sooner spoken, than the Lorde Thomas strikyng the ball to Alen agayne, answered, as one that was somewhat slipper tongued, in this wise.

The properties of the Marmoset.

You say truth sir, in deede I heard some say, that the Marmoset eateth his owne tayle. But although you haue bene fedde by your tayle, yet I woulde aduise you to beware, that your tayle eate not you.

Shortly after this quippyng gamegall, the Lorde Justice and the Counsaile road to Drogheda, where hauyng for the space of three or foure daies soiourned, it happened that the Counsaylours awayted in the Counsayle Chamber the gouernour his comming, vntill it was hard

vpon the stroke of.xij. The Archbishop of Dublyn rawly digestyng the Vicedeputie his long absence, sayde:

My Lordes, is it not a pretie matter, that all wee shall stay thus long for a boy? As he vttered these speeches, the Lorde Justice vnluckily was commyng vp the Stayres, and at hys entrie taking the wordes hoate from the Bishop his mouth, and iterating them very coldly hee sayde:

The Archbishop his taũt.

My Lordes, I am heartily sory, that you stayed thus long for a boy. Whereat the Prelate was appalled, to see how vnhappily he was galde with his owne caltrop.

These and the like cutting speeches, enkindled suche coales in both theyr stomackes, as the flame coulde not any longer be smouldered, but at one clift or other must haue fumed. The enimies therefore hauing well nighe knedded the dough that should haue beene baked for the Giraldines bane, deuised that secrete rumors should sprinckle to and fro, that the Earle of Kildare his execution was intended in Englande, and that vpon his death the Lorde Thomas and all his bloud should haue bene apprehended in Irelande.

The enimies conspire the ouerthrow of the Giraldines

The occasion of Thomas Fitz Giralde his rebellion.

As this false muttering flewe abrode, it was holpen forwarde by Thomas Cannon, and other of Skeffington hys seruauntes, who sticked not to write to certayne of theyr friends, as it were, very secrete letters, howe that the Earle of Kyldare theyr mayster hys secrete enimie (so they toke hym, bycause hee gotte the gouernment ouer hys heade) was already cut shorter, as his issue presently shoulde bee, and nowe they trusted to see theyr mayster in hys gouernment, after whiche they sore longed, as for a preferment, that woulde in shorte space aduauntage them. Suche a letter came to the handes of a simple Priest, no perfect Englishman, who for haste hurled it among other Papers in the Chimneys ende of hys Chamber, meaning to peruse it better at more leysure. The same very night, a Gentleman retayning to the Lord Thomas, the lord Justice or Vicedeputie, as is before specified, toke vp his lodgyng with the Priest, and raught in the morning when he rose for some Paper, to drawe on his strayte stockings, and as the Diuell would, he hit vpon the letter, bare it away in the heele of his stocke, no earthly thyng misdeeming. At night againe he founde the Paper vnfretted, and musing thereof he beganne to poare on the writing, which notified the Earle his death, and the apprehension of the Lorde Thomas. To horse goeth he in all hast, brought the letter to James Delahide, who was a principall counsaylour to the Lorde Thomas in all his doings. Delahide hauing scantly ouerread the letter, making more hast than good speede, posted to the Lorde Thomas, imparted him that letter, and withall putting fire to flaxe, before hee diued to the bottome of this treacherie, hee was contented to swim on the skum and froth thereof, as well by soothing vp the tenour of the letter, as by inciting the Lorde Thomas to open rebellion, cloaking the odious name of treason, with the zealous reuengement of his fathers wrongfull execution, and with the warie defence of his owne person.

James Delahide.

The Lorde Thomas being youthfull, rash, and headlong, and assuryng himselfe, that the knot of all the force of Ireland was twisted vnder his gyrdle, was by Delahide his Counsaile so farre caryed, as he was resolued to cast all on fire and seuen. Wherefore hauing confedered with Oneale, Oconor, and other Irish Potentates, he road on Saint Barnabies day, accompanied with seuenscore horsemẽ in their shirtes of Maile, through the Citie of Dublin, to the Dam his gate, crost ouer the water to Saint Marie Abbey, where the Counsayle accordyng to appoyntment, awayted his comming, not being priuie to his intent, onely Crommer the Lord Chauncellour excepted, who was secretly aduertised of his reuolt, and therefore was very well prouided for him, as hereafter shall be declared.

This Crommer was a graue Prelate, and a learned, well spoken, milde of nature, nothing wedded to factions, yet a well willer of the Giraldines, as those by whose meanes he was aduaunced to that dignitie.

Croommer Lo. Chancellor.

When the Lord Thomas was set in counsaile, his horsemen and seruants rusht in to the counsaile Chamber armed and weaponed, turning their secrete conference to an open parlee. The Counsaile hereof amazed, and silence with securitie commaunded, the Lorde Thomas in this wise spake.

Howsoeuer iniuriously wee be handled and forced to defend our selues in armes, whẽ neither our seruice nor our good meaning towardes our prince his Crowne auayleth, yet say not hereafter, but in this open hostilitie which here we professe and proclayme, we haue shewed our selues no villaynes, nor churles, but warriours and Gentlemen. This sworde of estate is yours, and Thomas Fitz Girald his rebellious Oration.

'and not mine, I receyued it with an othe, and
'haue vsed it to your benefite. I should desteyne
'mine honour, if I turned the same to your an'noyance. Nowe haue I neede of mine owne
'swoord, which I dare trust. As for the common
'swoord it flattereth me with a painted scabberde,
'but hath in deed a pestilent edge, already bathed
'in the Giraldines bloud, & now is newly whet-
'ted in hope of a further destruction. Therefore
'saue your selues from vs, as from open enimies,
'I am none of Henrie his Deputie, I am his fo.
'I haue more mind to conquer, than to gouerne,
'to meete him in the field, than to serue him in 'office. If al the hearts of England and Ireland,
'that haue cause thereto, would ioine in this qua-
'rell (as I hope they wil) then should he soone aby
'(as I trust he shal) for his cruelties and tyranny,
'for which the age to come may lawfully score
'him vp among the auncient Tyrants of most
'abhominable and hatefull memorie.

Hauing added to this shamefull Oration many other slaunderous & foule tearmes, which for diuerse respects I spare to pen, he would haue surrendered the swoord to the Lord Chancellor, who, as I sayd before, being armed for the Lord Thomas his cõming, and also being loath, that his slacknesse should seeme disloyall, in refusing the swoorde, or his frowardnesse ouer cruell in snatching it vpon the first proffer, toke the Lord Thomas by the wrest of the hand, and requested him for the loue of God, the teares trilling downe his cheekes, to giue him for two or three woordes the hearing, which graunted, the reuerend father spake as ensueth.

My Lorde, although hatred be commonly
'the handmayden of truth, because we see hym,
'that plainely expresseth his minde, to be for the 'more part of most men disliked: yet notwithstã-
'ding I am so well assured of your Lordship his 'good inclination towardes me, and your Lord'ship so certaine of mine entire affection towardes
'you, as I am emboldned, notwithstanding this
'companie of armed men, freely and frankly to
'vtter that, which by me declared, and by youre
'Lordship followed, wil turne God willing, to the 'auayle of you, your friends, alies, & this coũtrey.
'I doubt not, my Lord, but you know, that it 'is wisdome for any man to looke before he leape,
'and to sownde the water before his ship hul ther-
'on, and namely where the matter is of weight,
'there it behoueth to follow sounde, sage and ma'ture aduise. Wherefore, my Lorde, sithe it is no
'Maygame, for a subiect to leuie an armye a'gainst his prince: it lyeth your Lordship in hand
'to breath longer on the matter, as well by fore'casting the hurt whereby you may fall, as by re-
'uoluing the hope wherewith you are fed. What 'should moue your Lordship to this sodaine attempt, I know not. If it be the death of your father, it is as yet but secretly muttered not manffully published. And if I should graunt you, that your zeale in reuenging your father his execution were in some respect to be commended: yet reason would you should suspend the reuenge vntil the certaintie were knowne. And were it, that the report were true, yet it standeth with the du-tie and allegeance of a good subiect (from whom I hope in God, you meane not to dissemer your selfe) not to spurne and kicke against his prince, but contrariewise, if his soueraigne be mightie, to feare him: if he be profitable to his subiects, to honour him: if he commaunde, to obey him:
if he be kinde, to loue him: if he bee vicious, to pitie him: if he be a Tyrant, to beare with him, considering that in suche case it is better with patience to bowe, than with stubburnnesse to breake. For sacred is the name of a king, and odious is the name of a rebellion: the one from heauen deriued, and by God shielded, the other in hell forged, and by the Diuell executed. And therefore who so wyll obserue the course of Hy-stories, or weigh the Iustice of God in punishing malefactours, shall easily see, that albeit the Sunne shyneth for a tyme on them that are in Rebellion, yet suche sweete beginnings are at length clasped vp with sharpe and sowre endes.

Now that it appeareth, that you ought not to beare armoure agaynst your King, it resteth to discusse whether you bee able, although you were willing to annoy your King. For if among meane and priuate foes it be reckened for a folly in a secrete grudge to professe open hatred, and where hee is not able to hynder, there to shewe a willing mynde to hurte: muche more ought your Lordshippe in so generall a quarell as thys, that concerneth the King, that toucheth the Nobilitie, that appertayneth to the whole common wealth, to forsee the King his power on the one side, and your force on the other, and then to iudge if you bee able to cocke with him, and to put hym beside the Cushion, and not whyles you striue to sit in the Saddle, to lose to your owne vndoyng, both the Horse and the Saddle.

King Henrie is knowne to bee in these our dayes so puissant a Prince, and so victorious a worthie, that he is able to conquere forey ne dominions: and thinke you, that he cannot defend his owne? He tameth kings, and iudge you that he may not rule his owne subiectes? Suppose you conquere the lande, doe you ymagine that hee will not recouer it? Therefore my Lorde, flatter not your selfe ouer muche, repose not so great affiance either in your troupe of horsmen, or in your bande of footmen, or in the multitude
of,

The subiects dutie towards his king.

The name of a king sacred.

Rebellion frõ whence it springeth.

‘ of your partakers. What face soeuer they put ‘ now on the matter, or what successe soeuer for a ‘ season they haue, bycause it is easie for an army
‘ to vanquish them that doe not resist, yet hereaf‘ ter when the king shall send his power into this ‘ Countrey, you shall see your adherents like slip‘ per chaungelings plucke in theyr hornes, and
‘ such as were cõtent to beare you vp by the chin,
‘ as long as you could swim, when they espie
‘ you sinke, they will by little and little shrinke
‘ from you, and percase will ducke you ouer head
‘ and eares. As long as the gale puffeth full in ‘ your sayles, doubt not but diuerse wil anerre vn-
‘ to you, and feede on you, as Crowes on carion.
‘ But if any storme happen to blustor, then will ‘ they be sure to leaue you post alone sticking in
‘ the myre or sands, hauing least helpe, when you
‘ haue most neede. And what will then ensue
‘ of this. The braunches will be pardoned, the ‘ rote apprehended, your honour disteyned, your ‘ house attainted, your armes reuersed, your Ma-
‘ nours razed, your doings examined, at whiche
‘ time God knoweth, what an heartburning it ‘ will be, when that with no colour may bee de‘ nied, which without shame cannot be confessed.
‘ My Lorde I poure not out Oracles as a soth-

‘ Weigh therefore, my Lord, the nobilitie of ‘ your auncestors, remember your father his late

Hauing ended his Oration, which hee sette forth with suche a lamentable action, as his chekes were all beblubbered with teares, the horse-men, namely such as vnderstoode not Englishe, began to diuine what the Lorde Chauncellour ment with all this long circumstance, some of them reporting that hee was preaching a Sermon, others sayd, that he stoode making of some Heroicall Poetrie in the prayse of the Lorde Thomas. And thus as euery Idiot shot his foolishe bolt at the wise Counsalour his discourse, who in effect did nought else but drop precious stones before Hogges, one Bard de Melan, an Bard de Melan Irishe rithmour, and a rotten sheepe able to infect an whole flocke, was chatting of Irish verses, as though his tongue had runne on pattens, in commendation of the Lorde Thomas, inuesting him with the tytle of silken Thomas, bycause his horsemens iacks were gorgeously embrodered with silke: and in the ende he tolde him that hee lingred there ouerlong. Whereat the Lorde Thomas being quickned, did cast his eye towardes the Lorde Chauncellour, and sayde: Silken Thomas.

‘ My Lorde Chauncellour, I come not hi- ‘ He replyeth.
‘ther to take aduice what I shoulde doe, but to ‘ giue you to vnderstande what I minde to doe.
‘ It is easie for the sounde to counsaile the sicke:
‘ But if the sore had smarted you as much as it
‘ festereth me, you woulde bee percase as impaci‘ ent as I am. As you woulde wishe me to ho‘ nour my Prince, so duetie willeth mee to reue-‘ rence my father. Wherefore he that will with ‘ such tyrannie execute mine innocent parent, and ‘ withall threaten my destruction, I may not, nor ‘ will not hold him for my king. And yet in truth Henrie Lorde of Irelande.
‘ he was neuer our king, but our lord, as his pro-‘ genitours haue beene before him. But if it bee
‘ my hap to miscarie, as you seeme to prognosti‘ cate, catche that catche maye, I will take the ‘ Market as it ryseth, and will chose rather to die
‘ with valiauntnesse and libertie, than to liue vnder
‘ king Henrie in bondage and villanie. And yet it ‘ may be, that as strong as hee is, and as weake
‘ as I am, I shal be able like a flesh worme to itch
‘ the bodie of his Kingdome, and force him to ‘ scratch deepely before he be able to pike me out ‘ of my seame. Wherefore my Lorde, I thanke
‘ you for your good counsaile, and were it not that ‘ I am too crabbed a note in descant to bee nowe
‘ tuned, it might be, that I woulde haue warb-‘ led sweeter harmonie than at this instaunt I ‘ mean to sing.

With these words he rendred vp the sword, Thomas reddreth vp the sworde. and flung away like a bedlem, beeing garded with hys brutishe droue of braineslicke Rebelles.

The Counsaile sent secretely vpon his departure to maister Maior and his breethren, to apprehende, if they conueniently might, Thomas Fitz Giralde, and his confederates. But the warning was so skarborrow, the enimie so strong, the Citie by reason of the plague that raunged in towne and in country, so dispeopled, as their attempt therein would seeme but vaine and friuolous.

Ouer this, the weaker parte of the Rebelles would not penne vp themselues within the Citie walles, but stood houering aloft off towards Ostmantowne greene, on the toppe of the hyll where the gallouse stoode (a fitte center for suche a circle) till tyme they were aduertised of theyr Captayne Thomas his returne.

This open Rebellió in this wise denounced, parte of the Counsell, namely Alen Archbyshop of Dublin, Finglasse chiefe Baron, hyed wyth bagge and baggage to the Castell of Dublin, whereof Joan White was Constable, who after was dubbed Knight by the Kyng in England, for hys worthy seruice done in that byroze.

Thomas and his crew, supposing that in ouerrunning the whole land, they should finde no blocke to stumble at sauing the Earle of Ossorie, agreed to trie, if by any allurements he could be trayned to their cõfederacy. And for as much as the Lorde James Butler was linckt with Thomas Fitz Giralo in great amitie and friendshippe, it was thought best to giue him the onsette, who if he were wonne to sway with them, they woulde not weigh two chippes the forze of his father, the Earle of Ossory.

Thomas forthwith sent his messengers and letters to his cousin the Lord Butler, couenanting to deuide wyth hym halfe the Kingdome, would he associate him in this enterprise, wherupon, the Lorde Butler returned Thomas hys brokers with this letter.

TAking penne in hand, to write you my resolute aunswere, I muse in the very firste line, by what name to call you, my Lord, or my Cousin: seeing your notozious treason hath distayned your honour, and your desperate lewdenesse shamed youre kinred: you are so liberall in parting stakes with mee, that a man woulde weene, you had no right to the game: so importunat in crauing my company, as if you would perswade me to hang with you for good fellowship. Do you thinke that James was so madde, as to gape for Gogions, or so vngracious, as to sell his trueth for a peece of Ireland? Were it so (as it cannot bee) that the chickens you recken, were both hatched and feathered, yet bee thou sure, I had rather in this quarrell dye thine enimie, than liue thy partner: for the kindnesse you proffer me, and good loue in the ende of your letter, the best way I can, I purpose to requite, that is, in aduising you, though you haue fetched your feaze, yet to loke well ere you leape. Ignorance and errour wyth a certayne opinion of duetie, haue carried you vnawares to this follie, not yet so ranke, but it may be cured. The King is a dessell of bounty and mercy, youre wordes agaynste his Maiestie shall not be accompted malitious, but rather belched out for heate and impotency, except your selfe, by heaping offences, discouer a mischeuous and wilfull meaning. Farewell.

Thomas Fitz Giralo netled with this round aunswere, was determined to inuade the Coũtrey of Kilkenny, firste forcing an othe vpon the Gentlemen of the pale: and suche as woulde not agree thereto, he toke prisoners.

Fingall whiche was not before acquainted with the recourse of the Irishe enimie, was lefte open, to bee preded and spoyled by the Toles, who were therein assisted by Johan Burnell of Balgriffen, a Gentleman of a faire liuing, settled in a good battle soile of Fingall, taken for one not denoyde of witte, were it not that hee were ouertaken with this treason.

Fingall spoyled.

Iohan Burnell of Balgriffen.

The Dublinians hauing notice, that the enimie made hauocke of their neighbors of Fingal, issued out of the Citie, meaning to haue intercepted them at the bridge of Kilmaynan, and hauing encountred wyth the Irishe, neere the woode of Salcock, what for the number of the Rebelles, and the lacke of an experte Captayne to leade the army of Dublin in battayle araye, there were fourescore of the Citizens slayne, and the prede not rescued.

In this conflicte, Patricke Fitz Simons, wyth dyuers other good housholders miscaried.

This victory bred so greate an insolencye in Thomas Fitz Giralde, as hee sente his messengers to the Citie, declaring that albeit they offered him that iniurie, as that he could not haue free passage with hys companye to and fro in the pale, and therefore would he vse the benefyte of his late skirmishe, or bee aunswerable in iust reuenge to their due deserte, he mought by lawe of armes put their Citie to fire and sword: yet this notwithstanding, if they would but permit his men to lay siege to the Castell of Dublin, he would enter in league with them, and would vndertake to backe them in such fauorable wise, as the stoutest Champion in his army shoulde not be so hardy, as to offer the basest in their Citie so much as a fillip.

The Citizens considering that the Towne, by reason of the sickenesse, was weakened, and by this late ouerthrowe greately discouraged, were forced to make a vertue of necessitie, by lighting a candle before the Deuill, til tyme the Kyng hys pleasure were knowen, to whome wyth letters they posted one of their Aldermen, named Francis Herbert, whome shortly after, Francis Herbert sent into England. ẏ King for his seruice dubbed knight, enfeoffing him with parte of Christopher Eustace of Balintlan his landes, who had vnaduisedly a sote in this Rebellion. But before ẏ Citizens would returne aunswere to Thomas, as touching this message, they secretly aduertised maister Johan White, Connestable of the Castell, of this vnlawfull demaunde. Eustace of Balicutlan.

The Connestable weighing the securitie of the Citie, and little regarding the force of the enimie, agreed willingly thereto, so that he might be sufficiently stored with men and vittayles.

The Archbyshop of Dublin meaneth to sayle into England. Johan Alen Archbyshop of Dublin, fearyng that all would haue gone to wracke in Ireland, being then in the Castell, brake his minde touching hys sayling into Englande to one of hys seruauntes named Bartholmewe Fitz Giralde, whome, notwithstanding hee were a Giraldine, hee helde for hys trustiest and inwardest counsaylour. Bartholmew Fitz Girald.

Bartholmew vndertaking to be the Archbyshop his Pilot, vntill he were past the barre, encouraged his maister to embarke himselfe harde by the Dames gate. And as they were hulling in the Channell that euening, they were not ware, vntill the Barke strake on the sands neere Clontarfe.

The Archbyshop with his man stale secretely to Tartayne, there meaning to lurke, vntyll the wind hadde serued to sayle into Englande, where hee scantly fiue houres soiourned, when Thomas Fitz Girald knew of his arriuall, and accompanyed with James Delahide, sir Johan Fitz Giralde, Oliuer Fitz Giralde his Uncles, timely in the morning, being the .28. of July, he posted to Tartayne, beset the house, commaunded Johan Teling, and Nicholas Waffer to apprehend the Archbishoppe, whome they halled out of his bedde, brought him naked in his shirt, barefooted and bare headed, to their Captayne, whome when the Archbyshop espyed, incontinently he kneeled, and with a pitiful countenãce, and lamentable voice, he besought him for ẏ loue of God not to remember former iniuries, but to weigh his present calamitie, and what malice so euer he bare his person, yet to respect his calling and vocation, in that his enimie was a Christian, and hee among Christians an Archbishop. As he spake thus, bequeathing his soule to God, his body to the enimies mercy. Thomas being striken with some compassion, and withall inflamed with desire of reuenge, turned hys Horse aside, saying in Irish (Sir wem è boddeagh) which is as muche in Englishe, as awaye with the Churle, or take the Churle from mee, whyche doubtles he spake, as after he declared, meaning the Archbishop should bee deteyned as prisoner. But ẏ caitiffes that were present, rather of malice than of ignorance, misconstruing his words, murthered ẏ Archbishop without further delay, brayned and hackt hym in gobbets, hys blood with Abell crying to God for reuenge, whiche after befell to all such as were principals to this horrible murther. The place is euer since hedged and embayed on euery side, ouergrowen and vnfrequented, for detestation of the fact. This Alen as before is declared, was in seruice with Cardinall Wolsey, of deepe iudgement in the lawe Canon, the onely match of Stephan Gardiner, an other of Wolseys Chaplaynes, for auoiding of which emulation, he was preferred in Irelãd, rough and rigorous in iustice, deadly behated of ẏ Giraldins, for his maisters sake and his owne, as he that crossed them diuers times, and muche bridled both father and sonne in their gouernements, not vnlike to haue promoted their accusations, and to haue bin a forger of the letter before mentioned, whiche turned to his finall destruction. Alen Archbyshop of Dublin, murthered at Tartayne.

The Rebelles hauing in this execrable wise embrued their handes in the Archbishoppe hys bloud, they rode to Houth, toke Sir Christofer Lord of Houth prisoner, and vpon their returne from thence, they apprehended Maister Luttrel, chiefe Iustice of the common place, conueying him with them as their prisoner. The Lord of Houth taken prisoner. Iustice Luttrell taken.

The Dublinians during this space, hauing respite to pause, sent into the Castell by nyghte sufficient store of victuals, at which time, Johan Fitz Simons, one of theyr Aldermen, sente to Maister Cunstable twenty tunne of wine, four and twenty tunne of beere, two thousande dryeling, fiftene hoggesheads of poudred beefe, and twenty chambers, with an iron chayne for the drawbridge of the Castell, ẏ was newly forged in his owne house, for ẏ auoiding of all suspitiõ. The

The Castell beyng wyth men, munition, and vittaples, abundantly furnished, answere was returned to Thomas Fitz Girald, purpoz-ting a consent for ẏ receyuing of his Souldiers, which graunted, he sent thither James Field of Luske, Nicholas Waller, Johan Deling, Edward Roukes (who was likewise a Pirat, scouring the coast, and greatly annoying all passengers) Broade and Purcel with an hundred souldiers attendant on thē, as on their Captaynes. These valiant ruffrekinnes planted neere Preston his Innes, right ouer against the Castell gate two or three Falcons, hauyng with suche strong rampiers entrenched their company, as they little weighed the shot of the Castell, and to withdrawe the Connestable from discharging ẏ ordinance, they threatned to take the youth of ẏ Citie, and place them on the toppe of theyr trēches for maister Constable to shote at, as at a marke he would be loath to hitte.

The English pale in this wise weakened, the Citizens appeased, and the Castell besieged, Thomas Fitz Girald and his confederates were resolued to trie if the Lord Butler would stand to his doughty letter, and sith he woulde not by faire meanes be allured, he should be maugre his head by foule meanes compelled to assist them in this their generall attempt.

Thomas vpon this determination, being accompanyed wyth O Neale, dyuers Scottes, James Delahide, his principall Counsayloure; Johan Delahide, Edw. Fitz Girald his vncle, Sir Richarde Wellshe, person of Loughsewdy, Johan Burnel of Balgriffen, James Gernon, Walter Walsh, Rob. Walsh, Maurice Walsh with a mayne army, inuaded the Earle of Ossory, and the Lord Butler his landes, brenned & wasted ẏ Countrey of Kilkennie to Thomas Towne, the poore inhabitants being constreined to shunne hys force, rather than to withstande his power. Fitz Girald his approch towardes these confines bruted, the Earle of Ossory, and his son the L. Butler, with all the Gentlemen of the Countrey of Kilkēny, assembled neere Jeripō, to determine what order they myght take, in withstanding the inuasion of the Rebelles. And as they were thus in parley, a Gentleman of ẏ Butlers accompanyed with sixteene horsemen, departed secretely from the Falckmote, and made towardes Thomas Fitz Girald and hys army, who was then ready to incamp himselfe at Thomas Towne. Whē the challenger was eferied, and the certayne number knowen, sixteene of Fitz Giralde his Horsemen dyd charge him, and presently followed them seuen score Horsemen, with two or three banners displaid, pursuing them, vntil they came to the hil, where all the Gentlemen were assembled, who beyng so suddaynely taken, coulde not stand to bicker, but some fledde this way, some that way, the Earle was scattered from his company, and the Lord Butler vnawares was hurte, whome when suche of the Rebelles knewe, as fauoured him, they pursued him, but coldly, and lette hym escape on Horsebacke, taking hys way to Downemore (neere Kilkennie) where hee lay at Chirurgerie.

The Earle of Ossory fleeth.

The Lorde Butler wounded.

During the tyme that Thomas with his army was ransacking the Earle of Ossory hys lands, Francis Herbert returned from Englād to Dublin with the Kyng and Counsells letters to Maister Shillingforth then Maior, and his brethren, with letters likewise to maister White the Constable, to withstande (as theyr duetie of allegiance bound them) the trayterous practises of Thomas and hys complices, & that with al speede they should be succoured vpon the sight of these letters. Thomas Fitz Simons.

Recorder of the Citie, a Gentleman that shewed himselfe a politique and a cõfortable Cõsayler in these troubles, paraphrasing the Kyng his grations letters, with diuers good and sound constructions, emboldned the Citizens to breake their new made leagne, which with no Traytor was to be kept.

No league to be kept with Traytors.

The Aldermen and communaltie, wyth thys pithie perswasion easily weighed, gaue forthwith order, that the gates should be shutte, their perculliſſes dismounted, the Traitors that besieged the Castell apprehended, flagges of defyance vpon their walles placed, and an opẽ breach of truce proclaymed. Field and his compaynes, who did not all this while batter aught of the Castell, but only one hole that was bored through the gate with a pellet, which lighted in the mouth of a demy Canon, planted within the Castell) vnderstanding that they were betrayed, begaune to shrinke their heads, trusting more to their heeles than to their weapõs, some ranne one way, some another, diuers thoughte to haue bin housed, and so to lurke in Lozelles denne, who were thrust out by the head and shoulders: few of them swaumme ouer the Liffy, ỹ greater number takẽ and emprisoned. Forthwith post vppon post rode to Thomas Fitz Girald, who then was rifling the Countrey of Kilkenny, certifying him that all was marde, the fat was in the fire, he brought an olde house about his owne eares, the Palrockes of Dublin kept not touche with him, the english army was ready to bee shipt, Herbert with the Kyng hys letters returned, now it stode him vpon to shew himselfe a man or a mouse.

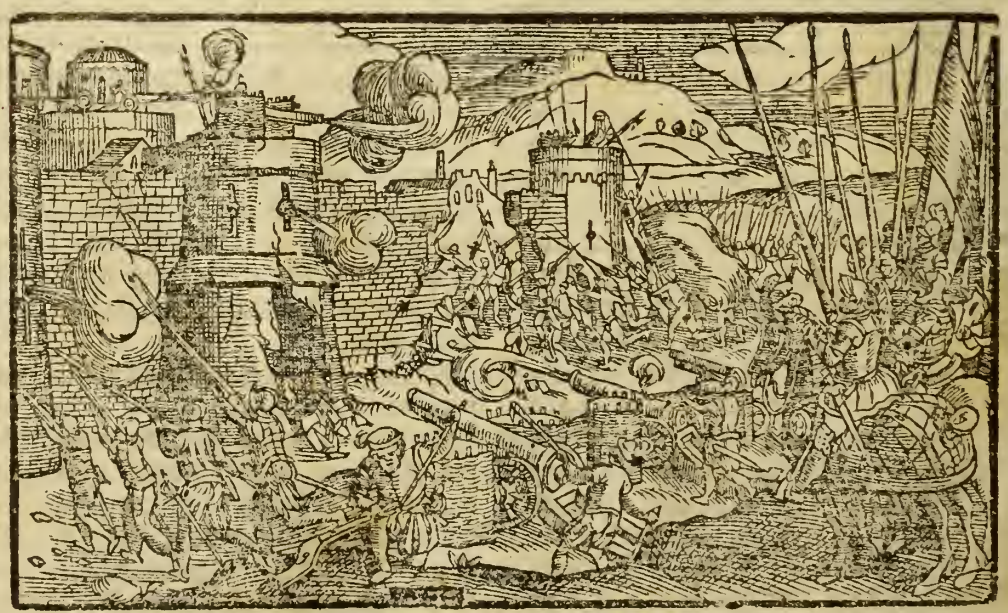
The Dublinians breake with Thomas Fitz Girald

Field and his company taken.

Thomas with these tidings amazed, made speedy repaire to Dublin, sending his Pursuãts before hym, to commaunde the Gentlemen of the Englishe pale to meete hym with all theyr power neere Dublin. And in his way towards the Citie, hys company toke diuers children of the Dublinians, that kept in the Countrey, (by reason of the contagion that then was in the Towne) namely Michaell Fitz Simons, Patricke Fitz Simons, William Fitz Simõs, all sonnes to Walter Fitz Simons late Maior, at whiche tyme was also taken James Stanihurst, with diuers other yonglings of the Citie.

The youth of Dublin taken prisoners.

Hauing marched neere Dublin, hee sente Doctor Trauerse, Peter Lince of the Knocke, and Oliuer Grace, as messengers (for I maye not rightly tearme them Ambassadors) to the Citizẽs, who crossing the Liffy from the blacke Friers to the key, explayned to the Maior and Aldermen theyr errand, the effect whereof was, eyther to stand to their former promise, or else to restore to their Captayne his menne, that they wrongfully detayned in goale.



Messengers sent to Dublin Trauerse. Lince. Grace.

The first and last point of this request flatly by the Citizẽs denyed, the messengers returned, declaring what colde entertaynement they had in Dublin.

Thomas herewith frying in his grease, caused part of his army to burne the Barke wherein Herbert sayled from Englande, whiche done without resistance, the vessell roade at anchor neere Saint Mary Abbey, they endeuoured to stoppe all the springs that flowed to the towne, and to cutte the pypes of theyr conduites, whereby they shoulde be destitute of freshe water.

Dublin besieged.

Shortly after, they layde siege to the Castell in the Shipstreete, from whence they were hastily by the ordinance feazed, and all the thatche houses of the Streete were burnt with wilde fire, whych maister White deuised, because the enimie should not be there rescued.

The Shipstrete fired.

When no butter could sticke on their bread

in

in that parte of the Citie, the greater number of the Rebelles assembled to Thomas court, and marched to Sainte Thomas his streete, razing downe the partitions of the rewe of houses before them on both sides of the streete, findyng none to withstande them, for the inhabitantes fledde into the Citie, so that they made a long lane on both the sides like a gallerie, couered all ouer head, to shield as well their horsemen, as their footemen from gunshot.

This done, they brent the newe streete, planted a falcon right againste the newe gate, and it discharged, pierced the gate, and kild an apprentice of Thomas Stecuens Alderman, as hee wente to bring a bason of water from the hygh pipe, whiche by reason the springs were damde vp, was at that time drie.

Richard Stanton, commonly called Dicke Stanton, then gaylour of the new gate, a good seruitoure, an excellente markman, as his valiant seruice that time dyd approue. For besides that hee galde dyuers of the Rebelles as they woulde skippe from house to house, by causing some of them with hys peece, to carrie theyr erraundes in their buttockes, hee perceyued one of the enimies, leueling at the windowe or spike at which he stoode: but whether it were, that the Rebell his pouder faylde him or some gimbol or other was out of frame, Stanton toke hym so truely for his marke, as hee strake him with hys bullet full in the forehead vnder ỹ brimme of hys scull, and withall, turned vp his heeles.

Stanton not satisfyed with his death, issued out at the wicket, stripte the harlet mother naked, and broughte in his peece and hys attire.

The desperateneſſe of thys facte displyked of the Citizẽs, and greately stomacked by the Rebelles, before Stanton returned to his standing, the enimies broughte faggottes and fyers to the new gate, and incontinently fyred them.

The Townesmen perceyuing that if ỹ gate were brent, the enimies woulde bee encouraged vpon hope of the spoyle, to venter more fiercely, than if they wer encountred without ỹ walles, thoughte it expedient presently to charge them: to this exployte they were the more egrely moued, because that notwithstanding Thomas his Souldyers were many in number, yet they knewe that the better parte of his company bare but hollowe hartes to the quarrell: for the number of the wise Gentlemen of the pale did little or nothing encline to his purpose. And therefore when hee besieged the Citie, the most parte of those arrowes, which were shot ouer the walles, were vnheaded, and nothyng annoyed them: some shotte in letters, and foretolde them of all the treacherous stratagemes that were in hammering.

That espyed the Citizens, and gathering the faintneſſe of his Souldyers thereby, blazed abrode vppon the walles triumphante newes, that the King hys army was arriued, and as it hadde bin so in deede, suddaynely to the number of foure hundred, rushed out at the newe gate through flame and fyre vppon the Rebelles, who at the first sighte of armed men, weening no lesse, but the truethy was so, otherwise assured, that the Citie woulde neuer dare to reencounter them, gaue grounde, forsoke theyr Captaynes, dispersed and scattered into dyuers corners, theyr Falcon taken, an hundred of their stoutest galloglasses slayne. The Citizens bicker with the Rebelles.

Thomas Fitz Giralde fledde to the grey Friers in Sainte Frauncis his streete, there coucht that nyghte, vnknowen to the Citie, vntyll the next morning, hee stale priuily to his armye not farre off, who stoode in wonderfull feare, that he was apprehended. Thomas Fitz Girald fleeth.

Thomas hys courage by thys late ouerthrowe, somewhat cooled, and also beeyng assuredly tolde, that a fleete was espyed a farre off, bearyng full sayle towardes the coast of Irelande, hee was sone entreated, hauyng so manye items in the fyre, to take egges for hys money: and wythall, hauyng no forrayne succoure, eyther from Paulus tertius, or Charles the fyft, whyche dayly hee expected, hee was sore quayled, beeyng of hymselfe, though strong in number of Souldyers, yet vnfurnished of sufficiente munition and artillerie, to stande and wythstande the Kyng hys army in a pitcht fielde, or a mayne battaile.

Vppon thys and other considerations, to make as fayre weather as hee coulde, hee sente James Delahyde, Lime of the knocke, William Bath of Dollardestowne, Doctor Trauerse, Thomas Fielde of Paynestowne, as messengers to the Citizens, to treate with them of a truce, who beeyng let in at the newe gate, repayred to William Kelly his house, where maister Maior and hys brethren were assembled. Delahide. Lime. Bath. Trauerse field.

The Articles propounded by them to the Citizens, were these. The Articles propounded to the Citizens.

In primis, that Thomas Fitz Girald hys men, who were deteyned in prison, should be deliuered.

2 Item, that the Citizens shoulde incontinently deliuer him at one payment, a thousande poundes in money.

3 Item, that they shoulde delyuer him fyue hundred pounds in wares.

4 Item, to furnish him with munition and artillery.

5 Item, to addresse their fauorable letters to the King for their Captaine his pardon, and all his confederates.

The Citizens aunſwer theſe articles.

The Maior and Aldermen hauing ripely debated the tenour of theſe Articles, agreed, that maiſter Fitz Simons their Recorder, ſhould anſwere to the firſte, that they would not ſticke, to ſet his ſeruaunts at libertie, ſo he woulde redeliuer them the youth of the Citie which was nothing elſe in effect, but tit for tat.

As for the ſeconde and thirde demaunde, they were ſo greatly by his warres empoueriſhed, as they myght hardly ſpare money or wares: and as touching implementes for warre, they were neuer ſuch fond niddicockes, as to offer any mā a rodde to beate their owne taples, or to betake their maſtiues to the cuſtodie of the Wolues, marueilling much, that their Captayne woulde ſo farre ouerſhote himſelfe, as to bee taken with ſuch apparant repugnancie. For if hee intended to ſubmitte himſelfe to the King his mercy, and to make them humble meanes to his highneſſe for the obteining of his pardon, he ought rather to make ſute for ſome good vellam parchmente for the ingroſſing thereof, than for munitiō and artillerie to withſtande his Prince: wherefore that three vnlawfull demaundes reiected, they would willingly condiſcend to the firſt and laſt, as well requeſting hym to deliuer them the youth of the Citie, as to ſubmitte himſelfe and his company to the King his mercy, promiſing not only with their fauourable letters, but alſo with their perſonall preſences to further, as far as in them lay, hys humble ſute to the King and Counſell.

As they parled thus to and fro, William Bath of Dollardeſtowne, a Student of the cōmon lawes ſpake: My maiſters, what needeth all thys long circumſtance, lette vs all drynke of one cuppe, whiche wordes were ſhortly after vpon Skeffington his arriuall, ſo crokedly gloſed, as by drinking of a ſoure cuppe, hee loſt the beſt ioynte of hys body. These were committed to the cuſtody of Dauid Sutton of Rabride, who redeliuered the to the Citizens, immediately after vpon the certayne rumour of Skeffington his repaire. Dauid Sutton.

Thomas growen to thys poynte with the Dublinians, rayſed his ſiege, cauſed his artillerie to be cōueyd to Howeth, marching after with his army, to the ende he might well as bulche the Engliſh Shippes, if they durſt auerre the coaſt, as to bicker with the Souldiers vpon their arriuall. But before he toke his iourney to Howeth, he rode to Maynoth, to ſee that the Caſtell ſhuld be of all ſides fortifyed, where being done to vnderſtand, that a companye of white cotes, with redde croſſes, landed at Dublin ſecretely in the dead of the night, and alſo that another band ariued at Howeth, and were ready to marche towardes Dublin, hee poſted incontinently wyth two hundred horſemen towardes the water ſyde, encountred neere Clontarfe, the Hamertons, two valiant and courageous Gentlemen, hauing in theyr company foureſcore Souldyers, where they foughte ſo valiantly for theyr liues, as ſo fewe footemen coulde haue done againſte ſo greate a troupe of horſemen: for they did not onely mangle and hacke dyuers of the Rebelles, but alſo one of the Hamertones woūded Thomas Fitz Girald in the forehead. The white coates land at Dublin. The Hamertones ſlayne. Thomas Fitz Girald wounded.

Some reporte, that one of the Mooſgraues, who was of kinne to Fitz Giralde, was ſlayne in this conflict, whoſe deathe hee is ſaid to haue taken greately to hearte. The Rebelles fleſht with the ſlaughter of the Engliſhe, hyed with al ſpeede to Howeth, ſhotte at the Shyppes that rode at anchor, cauſed them to flie from thēce, and to make towardes Skerriſh, where landed both the Eglebees, and the Dakers with theyr horſemen Roukes, Fitz Girald his Pirat, was ſent to ſcoure the coaſt, who toke an Engliſhe barke laden with very faire geldings, and ſente them to hys Captayne. Mooſgraue. Eglebees. Dakers. Engliſh geldings taken.

After that Thomas hadde returned with this booty, and the ſpoyle of ſuche as were ſlayne to Maynoth, Sir William Brereton Knyghte, with hys ſonne John Brereton, was enſhoared at Howeth with two hundred and fiftie Souldyers, very well appoynted, and maiſter Saliſbury with two hundred archers. Sir William Brereton Iohn Brereton Saliſbury.

Laſtly landed at the ſlippe neere the bridge of Dublin, Sir William Skeffington knight, Lorde Deputie, whome the Iriſhe call the Gunner, becauſe hee was preferred from that office of the King hys maiſtee Gunner, to gouerne them, and that they can euill brooke to bee ruled of anye that is but meanely borne. Sir William Skeffington Lord Deputy landeth.

The Maior and Aldermen receyued the gouernor wyth ſhot, & great ſolemnity, who yeelding them heartye thankes, for theyr true and loyall loyall seruice, deliuered them the King & Counsell his letters, purporting the same effect in writing, that he before expresst in words.

Barnewell Lord of Trimlestowne, who had the custody of the sword, dyd surrender it to Sir William Skeffington, according to the meaning of the King his letters patents on that behalfe.

Thomas Fitz Giralde hauing intelligence that the whole army was arriued, warded the Castel of Maynoth so strongly, as he toke it to be impregnable. And to the ende he might gyue the gouernoure battayle, he rode towards Connaght, to leuie all such power of the Irish, as either for wages, or for good will he could winne, to assist him. The Lord Deputie forewarned of his drift, matched with the English army, and the power of the pale to Maynoth, and layde siege to the Castell on the North side, towardes the parke. But before any peece was discharged, Sir William Brereton, by the Deputie his appoyntment, did sommone the Castell, offering suche as kepte it, to depart with bagge and baggage, and besides their pardon, to bee liberally rewarded for their good and loyall seruice. But such as warded the Castell, scornefully scoffing the Knight his offer, gaue him heartie thankes for his kindnesse, which they sayd, proceeded rather of his gentlenesse, than of their deseruing, wishing him to keepe vp in store such liberall offers for a deere yeare, and to write his commendations home to his friends, and withal, to keepe his head warme, for at their hands he was lyke to haue but a colde sute: finally not to take suche keepe of their safetie, in that they were assured, that he and his fellowes shoulde bee sooner from the siege rased, than they from the holde remoued. Upon this round aunswere, the ordinances were planted on the North side of the Castell, whiche made no great batterie for the space of a fortnight, yet the Castell so warely of eache side enuironed, as the Rebelles were imbard from al egresse and regresse. Chriſtopher Parese, foster brother to Thomas Fitz Girald, to whome of especiall trust, the charge of ỹ Castel was chiefely committed, proffering his voluntarie seruice, (which for the more part is so thankelesse & vnsauory, as it stinketh) determined to goe an ale beyond his fellowes, in betraying the Castell to the gouernoure. In this resolution, he shot out a letter endorsed to the Lorde Deputie, the effect whereof was, that hee would deuise the meanes the Castell shoulde be taken, so that hee myghte haue a summe of money for hys paynes, and a competent stay during his life. This motion by letters to & fro agreed vpon, Parese caused such as kept the warde, to swill and boll so much, as they snorted al the night like grunting Hogges, little misdeeming that whilest they slepte, anye Judas had bin waking within the Castel. The occasion of this extraordinary exceeding, was coloured, for snatching into the Castell a field peece the day before, from the army, for whiche, they kept such pot reuels, and triumphāt carousing, as none of them coulde discerne his beddes head, from the beddes feete.

Parese taking his tide and time, made signe to the army, betwene the twilight and dawning of the day, who hauing skaling ladders in arcadinesse, wolde not ouerslip the opportunitie offered. Holland, petite captaine to Salisbury, was one of the forewardest in this exploite, who leaping downe from the wall, fell by mishap into a pipe of feathers, where he was vp to the armepittes, so stiffely sticking therein, & also so vnwealdy in his armour, as there could not helpe himselfe neither in or out. Sir William Brereton and his bande hauing skaled the walles cried on a sodaine, S. George, S. George. Three drunken swadders that kepte the castell thought that this shoute was noughte else but a dreame, til time they espied the walles full of armed mē, & one of thē withal perceiuyng Hollād thus entangled in ỹ pype, bestowed an arrow vpō him, which by good hap did misse him. Hollād forthwith rescued by his fellowes, shot at the other, & strake him so full vnder the skull, as he left him sprauling. The resistance was faint, when the Souldyers entred, some yeelding themselues, others that withstood them slayne. Sir William Brereton ranne vp to the highest turret of the Castel, and aduaunced his Standerd on the top thereof, notifying to the Deputie, ỹ the fort was wonne. Great and rich was the spoile, such store of beddes, so many goodly hangings, so riche a Wardrob, such braue furniture, as truely it was accompted for housholde stuffe and vtensiles, one of the richest Earle his houses, vnder the Crowne of Englande. The L. Deputie entred ỹ Castell in the after noone, vpon whole repaire, James Delahyde, and Hayward, two singing men of the Earle his Chappell, that were taken prisoners, prostrated themselues on the ground, pitifully warbling a song, named Dulcis amica.

The gouernour rauished with the sweete and delicate voyces, at the instaunce of Girald Tylemer chiefe Justice, and others of the counsell, pardoned them. Chriſtopher Parese not mildoubting but ỹ he should haue bin dubd knight for his seruice done that day, presented hymselfe before the Gouernoure, with a cheerefull and familiar countenance, as who should say, beere is he that did ỹ deede. The Deputie very coldly & halfsternely casting an eye towards him said: Parese, I am to thank thee on my master ỹ K., his behalfe, for this thy profered seruice, which I,

Parese at this colde salutation of farewell and behango, turning his simpring to wimpring, sayd:

The gouernoure not mistrusting, that M. The Deputie returneth to Dublin.

Thomas Fitz Girald marcheth towards Maynoth.

The Deputie hauing left a garrison in ỳ Ca- stell, returned with the army triumphantly to Dublin. Thomas Fitz Girald not misdoubting but suche as hee left in the Castell were able to stand to their tacklings, leuied an huge army in Oconoure his Countrey, and in Connaght, to the number of seuen thousande, marching with them towards Maynoth, minding to haue re- moued the king his army from the siege, but be- ing certified, that Parese his foster brother, yel- ded vppe the Castell to the Deputie, the better part of his company gaue him the slippe. Al this notwithstanding he made with such as would sticke to him to Clane.

The Lord Deputie hauing intelligence of his approch, left Sir William Brereton at Dublin to defende the Citie, and marched with the ar- my to the Naas, where he tooke seuen score of Thomas his galloglasses, and led them all vn- armed toward Jonestowne. The skoutewatch espying Thomas to march neere, imparted it to the gouernour, who incontinently commaun- ded eache man to kyll hys prisoner before the charge, whyche was dispatcht, only Edmond Brereton leste to defende Dublin.

Oleyn escaping mother naked by flight to Thomas his companie, leauing his shyrt in his keepers hande. Both the armies aduaunced themselues one agaynst the other, but the horsemen of eyther syde coulde not charge, by reason of a marish or quakemyre that parted the. Wherfore the Deputie caused two or three field peeces to be discharged, which skattered Thomas and his rablement, insomuch as he neuer in such open wise durst after beare vp head in the English pale, but rather by slartes and sodaine stratagemes, would now and then gal the English. As when the Castell of Rathimgan was won, whiche was sone after the surrender of Maynoth, hee caused a droue of Cattell to appeare timely in the morning hard by the towne. Such as kept the Fort suspecting it to be a bootie, were trayned for the more part out of the Castel, who were surprised by Thomas, that lay hard by in Ambushe, and the greater number of them slaine.

In other tyme hee fired a Village harde by Trim, and deuised such of his horsemen that coulde speake English, beeing clad and horsed like Mortherne men, to ryde to Trim, where a garnison lay, with hue and crie, saying that they were Captaine Salisburie his souldiours, and that the traytour Thomas Fitz Giralde was burning a village harde by. The souldiours suspecting no coſnage, issued out of the towne, who were by his men charged, and a great number of them slaine, some chased to the towne, and forced to take Sanctuarie in the Church yarde, which those dayes was highly reuerenced.

These and the like knackes vsed Thomas, being for his owne person so well garded, and for defect of a maine armie so naked, as neyther he was occasioned to feare the English, nor the English forced to weigh him.

During this tyme, there arriued with a fresh supplie of horsemen and Archers, sir William Sentlo knight, and his sonne, sir Rice Manswell knight, sir Edward Grifeth knight, who were dispersed to sundrie partes of the Pale, to defende the Countrey from the enimyes inuasion. William Sentlo, Rice Manswel Edward Grifeth.

When the heate of this Rebellion was in this wise asswaged, the Lorde Deputie finding out no deuice to apprehende the Captaine, employed his industrie to intrap his confederates.

Delahis onet p-d.

The knight and his wife, lying in durresse for the space of twelue Monethes, were at seuerall tymes examined, and notwithstanding all presumptions and surmises that coulde bee gathered, they were in the ende founde guiltlesse of their sonne his folly. But the Ladie was had in examination apart, and intyced by fayre meanes, to charge hir husbande with hir sonne hys rebellion, who being not wonne thereto with al the meanes that coulde be wrought, was menaced to be put to death, or to be rackt, and so with extremitie to be compelled, whereas with gentlenesse she could not be allured to acknowledge these apparant treasons, that neyther hir husbande nor she coulde without great shew of impudencie denie.

The gentlewoman with these continuall stormes heartbroken, deceassed in the Castell: from thence hir bodie was removed to the gray Friers with the Deputie his commaundement, that it should not be enterred, vntill his pleasure were further knowne, adding withall, that the carkasse of one who was the mother of so arrant an Archtraytor, ought rather to be cast out on a Dunghill to be carion for Rauens and Dogs to gnaw vpon, than to be layd in any Christian graue. The corps lying foure or fiue dayes in this plight, at the request of the Ladie Gennet Golding, wife to sir John White knight, the gouernour licenced, that it should be buried.

With Fitz Giralde sir William Breerton skirmished so fiercely, as both the sides were rather for the great slaughter disaduantaged, than eyther part by any great victorie furthered. Maister Breerton therefore perceyuing that rough Nettes were not the fittest to take such peart byrdes, gaue his aduice to the Lorde Deputie to growe with Fitz Girald by faire meanes to some reasonable composition. 1535

Herevpon Thomas Fitz Giralde fore against the willes of his Counsaylours dismist his armie, and roade with the Deputie to Dublyn, where he made short abode when hee sayled to Englande with the fauourable letters of the gouernour and the Counsayle. And as hee woulde haue taken his iourney to Windsore where the Court lay, he was intercepted contrarie to his expectation in London way, and conueyed with hast to the Tower. And before his imprisonment were bruted, letters were posted into Irelande, straytly commaunding the Deputie vpon sight of them, to apprehend Thomas Fitz Girald his vncles, and to see them with all speede conuenient shipt into England. Which the Lorde Deputie did not slacke. For hauing feasted three of the Gentlemen at Kylmaynan, immediately after their banquet (as it is nowe and then seene, that sweete meate will haue sowre sauce) he caused them to be manacled, and led as prisoners to the Castell of Dublin: and the other two were so rouhdly snatcht vp in villages hard by, as they sooner felt theyr owne captiuitie, than they had notice of theyr brethrens calamitie.

Thomas his vncles taken.

The next winde that serued into Englande these fiue brethren were embarked, to wit Iames Fitz Giralde, Walter Fitz Girald, Oliuer Fitz Girald, John Fitz Girald, & Richard Fitz Girald. Three of these Gentlemen, Iames, Walter, and Richarde, were knowne to haue crossed their Nephew Thomas to their power in his Rebellion, and therefore were not occasioned to misdoubt any daunger. But such as in those dayes were enimies to the house, incensed the king so sore against it, perswading him, that he should neuer conquer Irelande, as long as any Giraldine breathed in the Countrey, as for making the pathway smoth, he was resolued to loppe off as well the good and sounde Grapes, as the wilde and fruitelesse Beries. Whereby appeareth howe daungerous it is to be a rubbe, when a King is disposed to sweepe an Alley.

Thus were the fiue brethren sayling into Englande, among whome Richarde Fitz Giralde being more bookish than the rest of his brethren, and one that was much giuen to the studies of antiquitie, wayling his inwarde griefe, with outward myrth comforted them wyth cheerefulnesse of countenance, as well perswading them that offended to repose affiaunce in God, and the King his mercie, and such as were not of that conspiracie, to relie to theyr innocencie, which they should hold for a more safe & strong Barbican, than any rampire or Castell of Brasse.

Innocencie a strong fort.

Thus solacing the sely mourners sometyme with smiling, sometime with singing, sometyme with graue & pithie Apophthegmes, he craued of the owner the name of the Barcke, who hauing answered, that it was called the Cow, the gentleman sore appalled thereat sayd:

Fitz as not Kil.

Is for Thomas Fitz Giralde, who (as I wrote before) was executed at Tyburne, I would wiſh the carefull Reader, to vnderſtand that he was neuer Earle of Kildare, although ſome writers, rather of erroꝛ than of malice, tearme him by that name. For it is knowne that his father lyued in the Towre, when hee was in open Rebellion, where for thought of the yong man his follye hee dyed, and therefore Thomas was attaynted in a Parliament holden at Dublyn, as one that was deemed, reputed, and taken for a traytour before his fathers deceaſſe, by the bare name of Thomas Fitz Giralde. For this hath beene obſerued by the Iriſh Hyſtoriographers euer ſince the conqueſt, that notwithſtanding all the preſumptions of treaſon wherewith any Earle of Kyldare coulde eyther faintly be ſuſpected, or vehemently charged, yet there was neuer any Erle of that houſe read or heard of, that bare armour in the fielde agaynſt his Prince. Which I write not as a barriſter hyred to pleade theyr cauſe, but as a Chronicler moued to declare the truth.

No Earle of Kildare bare armour at any time agayaſt his prince.

This Thomas Fitz Giralde, as before is ſpecified, was borne in Englande, vpon whom nature poured beautie, and fortune by byrth beſtowed Nobilitie, which had it beene well employed, and were it not, that his rare gyftes had bene blemiſhed by his later euill qualities, hee would haue proued an ympe worthie to bee engraft in ſo honourable a ſtocke. Hee was of ſtature tall and perſonable, in countenance amiable, a white face, and withall ſomewhat ruddie, delicately in eche lymme featured, a rolling tongue, tongue and a riche vtterance, of nature flexible and kinde, verie sone caryed where hee fansied, easily with submission appeased, hardly wyth stubbornnesse weyed, in matters of importance an headlong hotespurre, yet natheless taken for a yong man not deuoyde of witte, were it not, as it fell out in the ende, that a fole had the keeping thereof.

The aduentures of the yong Fitz Girald, sonne to the Lady Gray Countesse of Kildare.

But to returne to the course of the Hystorie, when Thomas and his vncles were taken, hys second brother on the father his syde, named Girald Fitz Girald (who was after in the raigne of Queene Marie restored to the Earledome of Kildare, in which honor as yet he liueth, being at that time somewhat past twelue, and not full thirtene yeares of age, lay sick of the smal pocks, in the Countie of Kildare, at a towne named Donoare, then in the occupation of Girald Fitz Giralde. Thomas Leuroufe, who was the childe his schoolemaister, and after became Bishop of Kildare, mistrusting vpon the apprehension of Thomas and his Vncles, that all went not currant, wrapt the yong pacient as tenderly as he could, and had him conueyed in a cleefe with all speede to Ophaly, where soiourning for a short space with his sister the Ladie Mary Fitz Giralde, vntill he had recouered his perfite health, his schoolemaister caryed him to Odon his Countrey, where making his aboade for a quarter of a yeare, he trauayled to Odzene hys Countrey in Mounster, and hauing there remayned for halfe a yeare, hee repayred to hys aunte the Ladie Elenore Fitz Giralde, who then kept in Mack Carty Reagh, hir late husband his territories.

Elenore Fitz Giralde.

This noble woman was at that time a widow, alwayes knowne and accounted of eche man, that was acquainted with hir conuersation of life, for a paragon of liberalitie and kindnesse, in all hir actions vertuous and godly, and also in a good quarell rather stout than stiffe. To hir was Odoneyl an importunate suyter, and although at sundrie tymes before she seemed to shake him off, yet considering the distresse of hir yong innocent nephew, how hee was forced to wander in Pilgrimwise from house to house, eschuing the punishment that others deserued, smarted in his tender yeares with aduersitie, before he was of discretion to enioy any prosperitie, she began to encline to hir woer his request, to the ende hir nephew should haue bene the better by his countenaunce shouldered, and in fine indeted to espouse him, with this caueat or prouiso, that he shoulde safely shield and protect the sayde yong Gentleman in this his calamitie. This condition agreed vpon, shee rode with hir nephew to Odoneyl his countrey, and there had him safely kept for the space of a yeare.

But shortly after, the Gentlewoman either by some secrete friend enformed, or of wisedome gathering, that hir late maryed husbande entended some treacherie, had hir nephew disguised, storing him like a liberall and bountifull Aunt, with seuen score Portegueses, not onely in baloure, but also in the selfe same coyne, incontinently shipped him secretly in a Brytons bessell of Saint Malouse, betaking him to God, and to their charge that accompanied him, to wit, maister Leuroufe, and Robert Walsh sometime seruant to his father the Earle.

The Ladie Elenors liberalitie.

Fitz Giralde sayleth to Fraunce.

The Ladie Elenor hauing thus, to hir contentation bestowed hir nephew, she expostulated verie sharpely with Odoneyle as touching hys villanie, protesting that the onely cause of hir match with him proceeded of an especiall care to haue hir nephew countenanced: and now that he was out of his lashe, that myn ded to haue betrayed him, he should well vnderstande, that as the feare of his daunger moued hir to annere to such a clownish Curmudgen, so the assurannce of his safetie, should cause hir to sequester hirselfe from so butcherly a cutthrote, that would be like a pelting mercenarie patche hyred, to sell or betray the innocent bloud of his nephew by affinitie, and hirs by consanguinitie. And in hys wise trussing vp bag and baggage, she forsoke Odoneyle, and returned to hir countrey.

The passengers with a prosperous gale arriued at Saint Malouse, which notified to the gouernour of Brytayne, named Monsieur de Chasteau Brian, he sent for the yong Fitz Giralde, gaue him verie heartie entertaynment during one Monethes space.

Chasteau Brian.

In the meane season the gouernor posted a Messenger to the Court of Fraunce, aduertising the King of the arriuall of this Gentleman, who presently caused him to be sent for, and had him put to the Dolphyn named Henrie, who after became king of France.

Sir Iohn Wallop (who was then the English Ambassadour) vnderstanding the cause of the Irish fugitiue his repayre to Fraunce, demaunded him of the French king, according to the newe made league betwene both the princes, which was, that none shoulde keepe the other his subiect within his dominion, contrarie to either of their willes, adding further, that the boy was brother to one, who of late for his notorious rebellion in Ireland, was executed at London.

Sir Iohn Wallop demaundeth Fitz Giralde.

To this answered the King, first, that the Ambassadour had no Commission from hys Prince to demaunde him, and vppon his Maiestie his letter he shoulde knowe more of his mynde: secondly that hee did not detayne him, but the Dolphyn stayed him: lastly, that howe grieuously soeuer his brother offended, hee was

The king denyeth him.

well assured, that the silly boy neither was nor coulde be a traytour, and therfore there rested no cause why the Imbassadour shoulde in suche wise craue him, not doubting that although hee were deliuered to his king, yet he woulde not so farre swarue from the extreeme rigour of Iustice, as to embrew his handes in the innocent his bloud, for the offence that his brother had perpetrated.

Maister Wallop hereupon addressed his Letters to Englande, specifying to the Counsaile the French kings answere, and in the mean tyme the yong Fitz Girald hauing an vncklyng of the Imbassadour his motion, fledde secretely to Flaunders, scantly reaching to Valencie, when James Sherelocke, one of Maister Wallop his men, did not onely pursue him, but also did ouertake him, as he soiourned in the sayd towne.

Whereupon maister Leurouse, and such as accompanied the childe, kept to the Gouernour of Valencie, complaynyng that one Sherelocke a sneaking spie, lyke a pyketh anke promoting Varlet, did dogge their maister from place to place, and presently pursued him to the towne: and therefore they besought the gouernour, not to leaue such apparant villanie vnpunished, in that he was willing to betray not onely a guiltlesse child, but also his owne Countryman, who rather ought for his innocencie to bee pitied, than for the deserte of others so eagerly to bee pursued.

The Gouernour vpon this complaint sore incensed, sent in all hast for Sherlocke, had him sodainly examined, and finding him vnable to colour his lewde practise with any warrantable defence, he layd him vp by the heeles, rewarding his hote pursute with colde interteynment, and so remained in gaole, vntill the yong Fitz Giralde requiting the prisoner his vnnaturall cruelties with vndeserued curtesey, humbly besought the gouernor to set him at libertie.

This brunt escaped, Fitz Giralde trauayled to Bruselles, where the Emperour kept his Court.

Doctour Pates being Imbassadour in the low Countreys, demaunded Fitz Giralde of the Emperour on his maister the King of Englandes behalfe. The Emperour hauing answered that he had not to deale with the boy, and for ought that he knewe, was not mynded to make any great abode in that Countrey, sent hym to the Bishop of Liege, allowing him for his pension an hundred Crownes Monethly. The Bishop interteyned him very honourably, had him placed in an Abbey of Monks, and was so carefull of his safetie, that if any person suspected, had trauayled within the circuit of his glebe, hee should be straytly examined, whether he would, or from whence he came, or vpō what occasion he trauayled that way.

Hauing in this wise remayned at Liege for halfe a yeare, the Cardinall Pole (Fitz Giralde his kinnesman) sent for him to Rome, whereupon the Gentleman as well with the Emperour his licence, as with surrendring his pension, trauayled to Italy, where the Cardinall woulde not admit him to his companie, vntill he had atteyned to some knowledge in the Italian tong. Wherefore allowing him an annuitie of three C. crownes, he placed him with the Bishop of Verona, and the Cardinall of Mantua, and after with the duke of Mantua.

Gardinal Pole sendeth for Fitz Giralde.

Leurouse in the meane while was admitted through the Cardinall Pole his procurement to be one of the Englishe house in Rome, called Saint Thomas his Hospitall.

Leurouse placed in the English Hospitall.

Robert Walshe, vpon his maisters repayre to Italy, returned to Ireland.

Robert Walsh returneth to Ireland.

Fitz Giralde hauing continued with the Cardinall, and the Duke of Mantua, a yeare and an halfe, was sent for by the Cardinall Pole to Rome, at which tyme the Duke of Mantua gaue him for an annuall pension three hundred Crownes.

The Cardinall greatly ioyed in his kinnesman, had him carefully trayned vp in his house, interlacing with such discretion his learning and studies, with exercises of actiuitie, as he shoulde not be after accounted of the learned for an ignorant idiot, nor taken of actiue Gentlemen for a deade and dumpish meacocke. If he had committed any fault, the Cardinall would secretly commaund his Tutors to correct him, and all that notwithstanding, hee woulde in presence dandle the boy, as though he were not priuie to his punishment: and vpon any complaint made he vsed to checke Fitz Giralde hys maister openly for chastising so severely his pretie darling.

Cardinal Pole his order in trayning yong Fitz Girald.

In this wise hee rested three yeares togither in the Cardinall his house, and by that tyme hauing stept so farre in yeares (for hee was pricking fast vpon nineteene) as he began to knowe himselfe, the Cardinall put to his choyse, eyther to continue his learning, or by trauayling to seeke his aduentures abroade. The yong stripling (as vsually kinde doth creepe) rather of nature addicted to valiantnesse, than wedded to bookishnesse, chosed to be a trauaylour: and presently with the Cardinall his licence, repayred to Naples: where falling in acquaintance with Knightes of the Rhodes, he accompanied them to Malta, from thence he sayled to Tripoly (a Fort appertayning to the aforesayde order, coasting vpon Barbarie) and there he aboade sixe

It that tyme the knightes serued valiantly agaynst the Turkes and Miscreants, spoyled and sacked their villages and townes, that lay neare the water syde, toke diuerse of them prysoners, and after solde them to the Christians for bond slaues.

Fitz Girald returneth to Rome. The yong Fitz Giralde returned with a rich bootie to Malta, from thence to Rome, hauing spent in thys voyage, not fully one yeare.

The Cardinall enhaunceth Fitz Giraldes pension. Proude was the Cardinall to heare of hys prosperous exployctes, and for his further aduauncement, he enhaunced his pencion of three hundred Crownes, to three hundred poundes, ouer and aboue three hundred crownes, that the Duke of Mantua allowed him.

He is Master of the horse to the Duke of Florence. Shortly after he preferred him to the seruice of the Duke of Florence, named Cosmo, with whom he continued maister of his horses three yeares, hauing also of the Duke three hundred Duckets for a yearely pension during life, or vntill he were restored, in like maner as the Cardinall Pole and the duke of Mantua in their annuities had graunted him.

During the time that he was in seruice with the Duke of Florence, he trauayled to Rome a thyrsuing, of set purpose to be merie: and as hee road an hunting with Cardinall Ferneise the Pope his nephew, it happened that in chasing He falleth into a deepe pit. the Bucke, he fel into a pitte .xxix. fatham deepe, and in the fall forsaking his horse within two fathams of the bottom, he toke holde by two or three rootes, gripping them fast, vntill his armes were so wearie, as he coulde hang no longer in that paine. Wherefore betaking himselfe to God, he let goe his gripe by little and little, and fell softly on his horse, that in the bottome of the pit lay starke dead, and there he stoode vp to the Ancles in water, for the space of three houres. When the chase was ended, an exceeding good Greyhound of his named Grikhound, not finding His Greyhound findeth him out. his maister in the companie, followed his tracke vntill hee came to the pitte, and from thence woulde not depart, but stoode at the brimme incessauntly howling. The Cardinall Ferneise and his traine missing Fitz Girald, made towardes the dogge, and surueying the place, they were verily perswaded that the Gentleman was squised to death.

Trecappan. Hauing therefore posted his seruantes in hast to a village harde by Rome (named Trecappan) for Ropes and other necessaries, he caused one of the companie to glide in a Basket, downe to the bottom of the hole. Fitz Giralde reuiued with his presence, and willing to bee remoued from so darksome a dungeon to the open ayre, besought the other to lende him his rome, wherevpon he was haled vp in the Basket, as well to the generall admiration of the whole companie, as to the singular gratulation of the Cardinall and all his friends, rendring most heartie thankes to God his diuine Maiestie, for protecting the Gentleman with his gracious guerdon.

And thus surceassing to treate any further of his aduentures, vntill the date of time trayne my penne to a longer discourse, I will returne to the inhabitants of the English Pale, who after the death of Thomas Fitz Giralde, through rigour of iustice, and the due execution of lawes, were greatly molested. For ouer this, that such as were knowne for open and apparant traytours in the commotion, were for the more part executed, or with rounde summes fined, or from the realme exiled: certaine gentlemen of worship were sent from Englande, with Commission to examine eche person suspected wyth Thomas his treason, and so according to theyr discretion, eyther with equitie to execute, or with clemencie to pardon all such as they could proue to haue furthered hym in his disloyall Commotion. Commissioners sent to Ireland.

Commissioners were these, sir Anthonie Their names. Sentleger knight, sir George Paulet knight, maister Moyle and maister Barnes.

As for the olde Earle of Kildare, who in this Parliament was attainted for diuerse presumptions in the preamble of the sayde Act rehearsed, certaine it is, that the reuolt of his sonne Thomas Fitz Giralde, smote him so deepely to the heart, as upon the report thereof hee deceassed in the Tower, wishing in his death bed, that eyther he had died before he had heard of the rebellion, or that his brainlesse boy, had neuer liued to rayse the like commotion.

de Erle Kildare his before dth.

This Earle, of such as did not stomacke his proceedings, was taken for one that bare himselfe in all his affayres verie honourably, a wise, deepe, and farre reaching man: in warre valyant without rashnesse, and politique wythoute treacherie. Such a suppressour of rebelles in his gouernment, as they durst not beare armour to the annoyance of any subiect, whereby he heaped no small reuenues to the crowne, enryched the king his treasure, garded with securitie the pale, continued the honour of his house, and purchased enuie to his person.

His great hospitalitie is to this day rather of eche man commended, than of any one followed. He was so religiously addicted to the serning of God, as what tyme soeuer he trauayled to any part of the Countrey, such as were of his Chapell, should be sure to accompanie him. Among other rare gyftes, hee was with one singular qualitie endued which were it put in practise by such as are of his calling, might minister great occasion as well to the abandoning of flattring cary tales, as to the stayed quietnesse of noble potentates.

ospitali- d deuo-

For if any whispered under Benedicite a sinister report or secrete practise, that tended to the distreyning of his honour, or to the perill of hys person, he would straytly examine the informer, whether the matter he reported were past, or to come. If it were sayde or done, he was accustomed to lay sore to his charge, where, and of whom he heard it, or how he could iustifie it. If he found him to haite in the proufe, he would punish him as a pikethanke makebate, for being so maliciously caried, as for curryng fauour to himselfe, he would labour to purchase hatred to another: But if the practise were future, and hereafter to be put in execution, then would hee suspende the credite, vsing withall such wary secrecie, as vntill the matter came to the pinche, the aduersarie should thinke that hee was moste ignorant, when he was best prouided. As being in Dublyn forewarned, that John Oluerkan with certaine desperate Varlets conspired his destruction, and that they were determined to assault him upon his returne to Maynoth, hee had one of his seruants named James Graunt, that was much of his pitche, and at a bluish did somewhat resemble him, attyred in his ryding apparaile, and namely in a skarlet Cloake, wherewith he vsed to be clad. Graunt in thys wise masking in his Lordes attyre, roade as hee was commaunded in the beaten highe way towardes Mainoth, with sixe of the Earle his seruantes attending upon him. The Conspiratours awayting towards Lucan the cumming of the Earle, encountered the disguised Lorde, and not doubting but it had beene Kildare, they began to charge him, but the other amazed therwith, cryed that they toke theyr marke amisse, for the Earle roade to Mainoth on the further side of Liffie. Wherewith the murtherers appalled fled away, but incontinently were by the Earle apprehended, sustreyning the punishment that such caytifes deserued.

The olde Erle of Kildare hys policie when his death was conspired.

This noble man was so well affected to his wife the Ladie Gray, as he would not at any tyme buy a sute of apparell for himselfe, but hee would sute hir with the same stuffe. Whiche gentlenesse she recompenced with equall kindenesse. For after that he deceassed in the Tower, she did not only euer after liue as a chast and honourable Widue, but also nightly before shee went to bed, she would resort to his picture, and there with a solemne conge, she would bid hir

The Ladie Grayes kindnesse to hir husband.

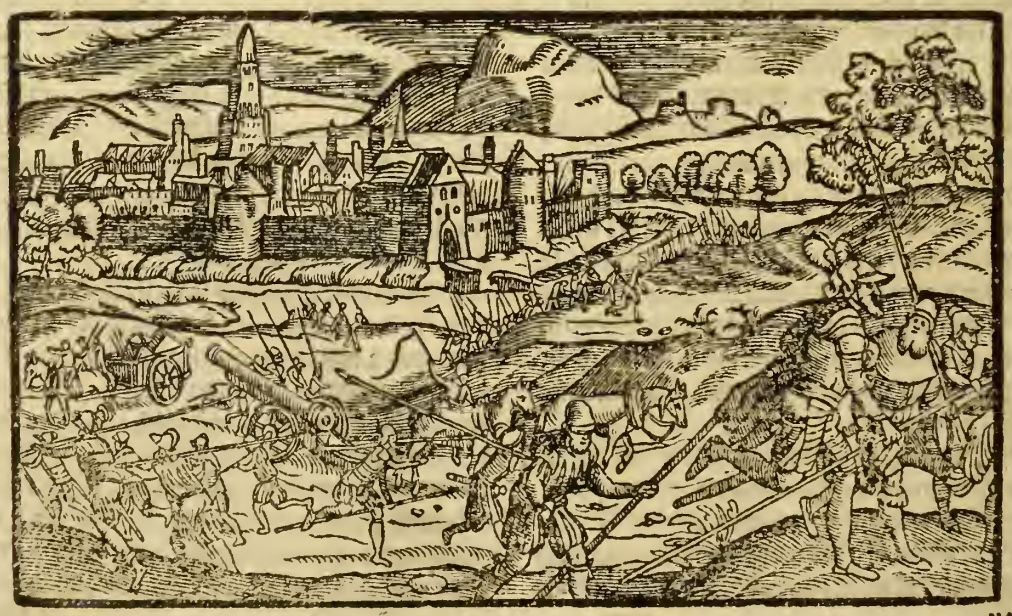
Lorde

Lorde goodnight. Whereby may bee gathered with howe great loue shee affected his person, that had in such price his bare picture.

In other Act that did passe in this Parliament touching absenties, proceeded of this occasion.

Giralde Aylmer.

Maister Girald Aylmer, who first was chief Baron of the Exchequer, after chiefe Justice of the Common place, was occasioned, for certain his affayres, to repaire to the Court of Englād. Where being for his good seruice greatly countenanced by such as were in those dayes taken for the pillers of the weale publike, namely of the Lorde Cromwell it happened that through his Lordship his earnest meanes, the king made maister Aylemer chiefe Justice of his Bench in Irelande. This aduauncement disliked by certaine of Waterford and Wexford, that were not friended to the Gentleman, they debated him in suche dispitefull wise, as the Earle of Shrewsburie, who then was likewise Earle of Waterforde, was by theyr lewde reportes caryed to chalenge the king, so farre as with his duetie of allegeance he durst, for bestowing so weightie an office vpon so light a person, beyng such a simple John at Stile as he tearmed him, no wiser than Patche, the late Lord Cardinall his fole. The king hereupon expostulated with the Lorde Cromwell, who being throughly acquainted with the Gentleman his rare wisedome, aunswered, that if it woulde stande with his Maiesties pleasure to enter into conference with him, hee shoulde bee sure to finde him no babe, notwithstanding the wrong informations of suche as laboured to thwart or crosse hym. Whereto the King vpon further leysure agreed, and shortly after according to his promise, bestowed two or three houres with maister Aylemer, who vpon the Lorde Cromwell his forewarning, was so wel armed for his highnesse, as he shewed himselfe in his discourse, by answering ad omnia quare, to be a man worthie to supplie an office of so great credite.



In this conference the King demaunded him, what he toke to be the chiefe occasion of disorder of Irelande, and howe hee thought it might best be reformed?

Truly and it like your Maiestie (quoth Aylmer) among sundrie reasons that might be probably alledged for the decay of that your Kingdome, one chiefe occasion is, that certaine of your Nobilitie of this your realme of England are seysed of the better part of your Dominion in Irelande, whereof they haue so little keepe, as for lacke of theyr presence, they suffer the sayde landes to be ouerrunne by Rebelles and traytours. Wherefore if your highnesse would prouide by Act of Parliament, that all suche landes which by reason of their absence may not be defended, should be to your highnesse by the consent of the Nobilitie and Communaltie graunted, you might thereby enrich your crowne, represse rebels, and defend your subiects from all trayterous inuasion.

The king tickled with this plausible deuise, yeelded maister Aylemer heartie thankes for his good counsaile, and in this Parliament had the tenour thereof put in effect. Which redowned chiefly to the Lorde of Shrewsburie hys disaduauntage, as one that was possest of diuerse auncient Lordshippes and Manours in that countrey.

Oneale rebelleth.

Soone after this Parliament, Oneale ymagining that he was able to make hys partie good againste the English Pale, conspyred with Odoneyle Maggadneth, Oraghan, Mack Kwylen, Ohanlan, and other Irish Lords, and on a sodain inuaded the Pale, came to the Na-uan,

nan, burnt all the townes of eche side consuming, after marched to Taraghe, musteringe wyth great pride hys armie upon the toppe of the hill: and hauing gathered togither the spoyle of the Pale without resistance, bee beganne to recule Northwarde, making his full account to haue gone scot free.

The Lord Leonard Gray being then Lord Deputie forecasting the worst, certified the king and counsaile of Oneal his rebellion, and withall humbly besought a fresh supply of souldiors to assist the pale in resisting the enimie, and that sir William Bzereton (who was discharged & returned into Englande) shoulde bee sent into Irelande, as one that for his late seruice was highly commended of the Countrey.

The King and Counsaile condiscending to the Deputie his request, appoynted sir William Bzereton to hie thither with speede, hauing the charge of two hundred and fiftie Souldiours of Chesshire men. In which seruice the Gentleman was founde so prest and readie, that notwithstanding in mustering his bande, he fell by mishap off his horse, and therewithall brake his thigh in two places, yet rather than hee woulde retire homeward, he appointed the Mariners to hale him up to theyr Barke by Pulleyes, and in such impotent wise arriued in Irelande, suppressing the feeblenesse of his bodie, with the courageous valour of his minde.

The Lorde Deputie in the meane while marched wyth the force of the Pale, the Maior and the Citizens of Dublin to Drogheda, from thence likewise accompanied with the Maior and Townesmen, he marched Northward to Bellahoa, where Oneale and his companie on the further side of the water, laye encamped with the spoyle of the Pale.

The Deputie by Spyes and secrete Messengers hereof certified, caused the armie to trauaile the better part of the nyght, in so muche as by the dawning of the day, they were neare the Ryuer side: where hauing eferied the enimies, namely Magaunoshe, and the Galloglasses, that were placed there to keepe the straytes, (for Oneale wyth the mayne armye lurked in a Groue not farre off,) they beganne to sette themselues in battayle array, as menne that were resolued wyth all haste and good speede to suppryse the enimye wyth a sodayne charge.

At which tyme James Flemming Baron of Slane (commonlye called blacke James) garded wyth a rounde companye, as well of horsmen as footmen, humbly besought the Deputie, to graunt him that day the honour of the onsette. Whereto when the Lorde Gray had agreed, the Baron of Slane wyth cheereful countenaunce, imparted the obteyning of hys suyte, as pleasant tydings to Robert Halfpennie, who wyth his auncestours was Standert bearer to the house of Slane. But Halfpennie seeing the further syde of the water so beset with armed Galloglasses, as he tooke it, as likely an attempt to raze downe the strongest Fort in Irelande wyth a fillippe, as to rushe through suche quicke Iron walles, flatlye aunswered the Baron, that hee woulde rather disclayme in his office, than there to gyue the onsette, where there rested no hope of lyfe, but an assured certaintie of death. And therefore hee was not as yet so wearie of the worlde, as lyke an headlong hotespurre voluntarilye to runne to hys vtter and vndoubted destruction. Wherefore hee besought his Lordship, to set his heart at rest, and not to impute his denyall to basenesse of courage, but to warynesse of safetie, althoughe hee knewe none of anye slayed mynde, but woulde sooner chose to sleepe in an hole sheepe hys pelte, than to walke in a torne Lyon hys skinne, namely when all hope of lyfe was abandoned, and the certaintie of death assuredly promised. Robert Halfpennie.

The Baron with this answere at his wittes ende, roade to Robert Betoa of Downeore, brake with him as touching Halfpennie hys determination, and withall requested hym (as he did tender hys honour) nowe at a pinche to supply the rowme of that dastardly cowarde, as he did terme him. Robert Betoa.

Betoa to thys aunswered, that although it stoode wyth good reason, that suche as heretofore tasted the sweete in peace, shoulde nowe be contented to sippe of the sowre in warre: yet notwythstanding, rather than the matter shoulde to hys honour lye in the dust, he promised to breake through them, or else to lye in the water: and withall beeing surpassinglye mounted, for the Baron gaue hym a choyse horse, hee tooke the Standarde, and wyth a sodayne shewte, hauing wyth him in the foreranke Mabe of Mabestowne (who at the first brunt was slaine) hee flung into the water, and charged the Irishe that stoode on the further shore. Mabe of Mabestowne slaine.

After followed the Gentlemen and Peomen of the Pale, that wyth as great manhood charged the enimies, as the enimies with courage resisted their assault.

To this stoutenesse were the enimies more boldly pricked, in that they had the aduauntage of the shore, and the gentlemen of the Pale were constrayned to bicker in the water.

But the longer the Irish cõtinued, the more they they were disaduauntaged, by reason that the English were so assisted with fresh supplyes, as their enimies coulde not any longer withstande them, but were compelled to beare backe, to forsake the banke, and to giue the armie free passage.

The Irish dis. comfited. Oneale putte to flighte.

The Englishe taking heart vpon their fayntnesse, brake through the Gelloglasses, slue Maggannouse their Captaine, pursued Oneal with the remnaunt of his Lordes, leauing be-hinde them for lacke of safe cariage the spoyle of the Pale, scantly able to escape wyth hys owne life, being egrely pursued by the army vntill it was Sun set.

King. Barnevvall. Basnet. Fitz Simons.

In this conflict Mathew King, Patricke Barnewall of Kylmahyocke, Sir Edwarde Basnet Priest, who after became Deane of Saint Patrickes in Dublin, and was swoorne one of the priuie Counsaile, and Thomas Fitz Simons of Curduffe, were reported to haue serued verie valiantly.

The Maiors of Dublin and Drogheda dubd knightes. Aylmer. Talbot.

Moreouer James Fitz Simons Maior of Dublin, Michael Cursey Maior of Drogheda, Girald Aylmer chiefe Justice, & Thomas Talbot of Malahide, were dubbed knights in ỹ field.

The valiantnesse of the Lord Gray.

But of all others, the Lord Gray then Lord Deputie, as hee was in authoritie superiour to them all, so in courage and manlynesse hee was inferiour to none. He was noted by the armye to haue endured greate toyle and paine before the skirmishe, by posting bareheaded from one bande to another, debacing the strength of the enimies, enhaunsing the power of the Pale, depressing the reuolt of rebellious traitours, extolling the good quarell of loyall subiectes, offring large rewardes, which with as great constancie he performed, as with liberalitie he promised. Ouer this he bare himselfe so affable to his souldiours, in vsing them like feiendes and fellowes, and terming thē with curteous names, and mouing laughter with pleasant conceyts, as they were incensed as well for the loue of the person, as for the hatred of the enimie, wyth resolute mindes to bicker with the Irishe. In whiche conflict the Deputie was as forwarde as the moste, and bequitte himselfe as valiaunt a Seruitour as the best.

The Gouernour turning the opportunitie of this skirmishe to his aduauntage, shortly after roade to the Northe, preding and spoyling Oneale with his confederates, who by reason of the late ouerthrow, were able to make but little resistance.

In this tourney he razed Saint Patricke his Churche in Downe, an olde auncient Citie of Ulster, and burnt the monuments of Patricke, Briged, and Colme, who are sayd to haue bene there entumbed, as before is expressed in the description of Ireland.

This fact lost him sundrie heartes in that countrey, alwayes after detesting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Whereupon conspyring wyth such of Mounster as were enimyes to his gouernment, they booked vp diuerse complaintes agaynste him, which they did exhibit to the king and counsell. The Articles of greatest importaunce layde to his charge were these.

The Lord Gray accused.

The articles that were layd to his charge.

In primis, that notwithstanding hee were straitly commaunded by the king his Maiestie, to apprehend his kinnesman, the yong Fitz Girald, yet did he not onely disobey the kings letters, as touching that point, by playing boapepe, but also had priuie conference with the said Fitz Girald, and lay with him two or three seuerall nights before he departed into France.

Item, that the chiefe cause that moued him to inueigle Thomas Fitz Giralde wyth suche fayre layze promples proceded of sette purpose to haue him cutte off, to the ende there shoulde be a gap set open for the yong Fitz Girald, to aspire to the Earledome of Kildare.

Item, that hee was so greedily addicted to the pilling and polling of the King his Subiectes, namelye of suche as were resiaunt in Mounster, as the beddes he lay in, the cuppes he dranke in, the plate with which he was serued in any gentlemans house, were by his seruants agaynst right and reason packt vp, and carted with great extortion away.

Item, that without any warrant from the King or Counsaile, he prophaned the Church of Saint Patrickes in Doune, turning it to a Stable, after plucked it downe, and shipt the notable ring of belles that did hang in the Steple, meaning to haue sent them to Englande, hadde not God of his iustice preuented hys iniquitie, by sinking the Vessell and passengers, wherein the sayde Belles should haue bene conueyed.

These and the lyke Artycles, were wyth such odious presumptions coloured by his accusers, as the King and Counsayle remembring his late faultes, and forgetting hys former seruices (for commonly all men are of so harde happe, that they shall bee sooner for one trespasse condemned, than for a thousande good deseртes commended) gaue commaundement that the Lorde Gray shoulde not onely bee remoued from the gouernment of the Countrey, but also had him beheaded on the Tower hil the xxviij. of June.

The Lord Gray beheaded.

But as touching the first Article, that brought him most of all out of conceyte wyth the King, I moued question to the Earle of Kyldare, whether the tenour thereof were true or false? His Lordshyp thereto answered bona fide, that hee neuer spake with the Lorde Gray, neuer sent messenger to him, nor receyued message or letter from him.

Whereby may bee gathered, with how many daungers they are inwrapped that gouerne Prouinces, wherein diligence is thwackt with hatred, negligence is loaden with tauntes, seueritie with perilles menaced, liberalitie with thankeleſſe vnkindneſſe contemned, conference to vndermining framed, flatterie to destruction forged, eche in countenaunce smyling, diuerse in heart pouting, open fawning, secrete grudging, gaping for suche as shall succeede in gouernment, honouring Magistrates with cappe and knee, as long as they are present, and carping them with tongue and penne, as soone as they are absent.

The Lord Leonard Gray, as is aforesayd, discharged, Sir William Brereton was constituted Lorde Iustice, whose short gouernment was intangled with no little trouble. For albeit he and Oneale fell to a reasonable composition, yet other of the Irishe Lordings, namely Oconour and his adherents, that are content to liue as subiectes, as long as they are not able to holde out as rebelles, conspired togither, and determined to assemble their power at the hyll of Fowre in west Methe, and so on a sodaine to ransacke the Pale.

Sir William Brereton Lorde Iustice.

The Lorde Iustice forthwith accompanied with the armie, and with two thousand of the Pale, of which no small number were ecclesiasticall persons, made towardes the rebelles, who vpon the approche of so greate an armie gaue ground and dispersed themselues in woods and marrishes. The Lorde Iustice this notwithstanding inuaded Oconour his Country, burnt his tenements, and made all his trenches with the multitude of Pioners so passable, as foure hundred Cartes, beside light cariage, were led without let through the Countrey. Oconnour sone after submitted himselfe, and sent his sonne Cormacke to the Lorde Justice as hostage for his future obedience and loyaltie to the king his highnesse.

Oconour submitteth himselfe to the Lorde Iustice.

After this iourney was ended, Sir Anthonie Sentleger knight of the order was constituted Lord Deputie, and Sir William Brereton lord high Marshal, who within one halfe yeare after he was preferred to be Marshall, trauayling by the Lord Deputie his appointment to Limmerick to bring in James Erle of Desmond, who stood vpon certaine tickle poyntes with the gouernor, ended his life in that iourney, and lyeth entumbed at Kilkenny in the Quire of Saint Kenny his Church.

Sir Anthonie Sentleger Lord deputie
Sir William Brereton Lord high Marshall.

He dyeth.

1542

In the.xxxiij. yeare of the raigne of Henry the eight, there was a Parliament holden at Dublin before Sir Anthony Sentleger, in which there passed:

An Act
- That the king and his successors to be kings of Ireland.
- For gray marchantes.
- That the plaintife may abridge his plaint in assise.
- That consanguinitie or affinitie being not within ỹ fifth degree, shall be no principall chalenge.
- That maketh it felony to any man to run away with his maister his casket.
- For the annihilating of precõtracts in mariage.
- For al Lordes to distreyn vpon the lands of them holden, & to make their auowrie not naming the tenant but their land.
- For capacities.
- For seruants wages.
- For Iointenantes.
- For recouerie in auoyding leases.
- For Tythes.
- For attournements.

This Parliament was prorogued vntill the xv. of Feb. & after was continued at Limmerick before the said deputie, at which time there past.

An Act
- For the adiournement of the Parliament, and the place to holde the same, and what persons shall bee chosen Knightes and Burgeses.
- For the election of the L. Justice.
- Touching mispleading and ieopfailes.
- For landes giuen by the king.
- For the suppression of Kilmainam and other religious houses.

This Parliament was likewise prorogued, and after was continued and holden before the sayde gouernour at Dublin, the sixthe daye of Nouember, in the.xxxiiij. yeare of the raigne of king Henry the eight, wherein there passed:

1543

An Act
- For the deuision of Meth into two shires.
- For persons standing bounde in any Court for their apparaunce, and being in seruice, to bee discharged by writ.

This Parliament was further prorogued vntill the.xvij. of Aprill, and at that time before the sayd Gouernour it was holden and ended, in which there passed an Act touching the manour and Castle of Dongaruan to be united and annexed to the crowne for euer.

To this Parliament resorted diuerse of the Irishe Lordes, who submytting themselues to the Deputie his mercy, returned peaceably to their Countreyes.

But James Erle of Desmond sayled into Englande, and before the King and Counsayle purged himselfe of all suche Articles of treason, as were falsly layd to his charge, whose cleare purgation and humble submission the king accepted very gratefully.

James Erle of Desmonde.

Shortly after Desmond his returne homeward, the great Oneale was created Earle of Tyron, and his base sonne Mathewe Oneale Baron of Dongaruan. For in those days John Oneale, commonly called Shane Oneale, the onely sonne lawfully of his bodie begotten, was little or nothing esteemed.

Oneale Erle of Tyron.

Oneale hauing returned to Irelande with this honour, and the king his fauour, Obryne with certaine other Irishe Lordes sayled into Englande, submitting their lyues and landes to the king his mercie.

This Obryne was at that tyme created Earle of Clincare, in which honour his posteritie hitherto resteth.

Obryne created Earle of Clincare.

Shortly after the returne of these Lordes to their Countrey, King Henrie being fully resolued to besiege Bollongne, gaue commaundement to Sir Anthonie Sentleger deputie, to leuie an armie of Irish men, and with all expedition to sende them to England.

The Irishemen for to the siege of Bollongne.

To these were appointed Captaynes the Lord Power, who after was dubbed knight. Surlock, and Finglasse, with diuerse others. They mustred in Saint James his Parke seuen hundred.

In the siege of Bollongne they stoode the armye in verye good steade. For they were not onely contented to burne and spoyle all the villages thereto adioyning, but also they would raunge twentie or thirtie miles into the maine lande, lande, and hauing taken a Bull, they vsed to tie him to a stake, and scorching hym with fagottes, they woulde force him to roare, so as all the Cattell in the Countrey woulde make towardes the Bull, all which they wouldelightly leade away, and furnish the campe with store of biefe.

If they toke anye Frenche man prysoner, least they shoulde bee accounted couetous in snatching wyth them hys intyre bodye, hys onelye raunsome shoulde bee no more but hys heade.

The French wyth this extraordinarie kind of warfarring astonyed, sent an Imbassadour to King Henrie, to learne whether he broughtmenne wyth hym or Diuelles, that coulde neyther bee wonne wyth rewardes, nor pacifyed by pitie: whiche when the King had turned to a least, the French menne euer after, if they coulde take anye of the Irishe scattering from the companie, vsed syrst to cutte off theyr genitours, and after to tormente them with as greate and as lingring paine as they could deuise.

After that Bollongne was surrendred to the King, there encamped on the West syde of the Towne beyonde the Hauen an armye of French menne, among whome there was a Thrasonicall Golias, that departed from the armye, and came to the brincke of the Hauen, and there in ietting and daring wise chalenged anye one of the Englishe armye that durst be so hardie, as to bicker with him hand to hande.

And albeit the distance of the place, the depth of the Hauen, the nearnesse of hys companie emboldned him to thys chalenge, more than any great valour or pithe that rested in him to indure a combate, yet all this notwithstanding, an Irishe manne named Mycholl Welshe, who after retayned to the Earle of Kyldare, loathing and disdeyning his prowde bragges, flung into the water, and swamme ouer the Ryuer, fought wyth the chalenger, strake him for dead, and returned backe to Bollongne wyth the Frenchman his heade in hys mouth, before the armie coulde ouertake hym. For which exployte, as hee was of all his companie highly commended, so by the Lieutenant he was bountifully rewarded.

Much aboute this tyme the Earle of Lennor, beyng wrongfully inquirted in Scotlande, and forced to forsake his Countrey, became humble petitioner to King Henrie, as well to relieue him in his distressed calamitie, as to compasse the meanes, how he might bee restored to his landes and liuing.

The King his highnesse moued wyth compassion, posted the Earle ouer to Irelande, with letters of especiall trust, commaunding sir Anthonie Sentleger then Deputie, to assist and further the Scottish outcast, with as puissant an armie, as to his contentation should seeme good.

James Butler Earle of Ormond.

The Deputie vpon the receyte of these letters, sente for James Butler Earle of Ormonde and Osserie, a noble manne, no lesse politique in peace, than valiaunt in warre, made hym priuye to the Kyng hys pleasure, and wythall in his Maiesties name dyd cause the charge hereof vppon the sayde Earle, as one that for hys tryed loyaltie was willing, and for his honour and valour able to attempt and atchieue so rare and famous an exployte.

The Lorde of Ormonde as wylling to obey, as the Gouernour was to commaunde, leuyed of hys Tenauntes and Retaynours, fiue hundred Gallowglasses, foure hundred Kearnes, three score Horsemen, and foure hundred and fortie shot: so in the whole he mustered on Ormontowne greene neare Dublyn, fiftene hundred souldiours.

The Lorde Deputie yeelding hys honour suche thankes in wordes, as hee deserued in deede, leuyed in the Pale fiftene hundred Souldiours more, to bee annexed to the Earle hys companye. Ouer them he constituted Sir Iohn Trauerse Capitayne, but the Earle of Ormonde was made Generall of the whole armie.

Sir Iohn Trauerse knight.

When the Souldiours were wyth Munition and victualles aboundauntlye furnyshed, the Earle of Ormonde and the Earle of Lennor toke shypping at Skerish, hauing in theyr companie twentie and eight Shippes well rigged, sufficiently manned, and stronglye appoynted.

From thence they sayled Northwarde, and roade at anchor without the hauen of Oldfleete beyond Katregfergus.

The Earle of Ormonde and the Earle of Lennox in danger to bee drovvned.

Where hauing remayned bulling wythoute the mouth of the Hauen contrarye to the aduise of the Maisters of theyr Shippes (who prognosticated the speedie approche of a storme, and therefore did wishe them to take a good harborowe) it happened, that the sayde night there arose so boysterous a Tempest, that the whole fleete was lyke to haue beene ouerwhelmed.

The Maryners betaking theyr passengers and themselues to the mercye of God, dyd cutte theyr mayne Mastes, lette slippe theyr Anchors, and were weather driuen to the hauen of Dunbrytaine in Scotlande, where as they were like to runne their shippes on ground, and consequently they all shoulde either haue beene plunged in the water, or else haue beene slaine on the lande by a greate number of Scottes that awaited theyr approche, God with hys gracious clemencye preuenting theyr immi-nent calamitie, sent them not onely a wished calme, but also a prosperous gale of wynde, that blewe them backe in safetie to the Irishe coast, from whence they were scattered.

The Earle of Lennox aduertised by certain of his frendes that met with him on the Sea, that the Scottes contrarie to theyr promise, dealt verie doubly with him (for although they gaue theyr worde to surrender vppe to hym the Castell of Dunbrytaine, yet they did not onelye fortifie that holde, but also were readie to encounter wyth hys Souldiours vppon theyr arryuals) he concluded to returne to Irelande.

The Earle of Ormonde verie loath, that so greate an attempt shoulde take so little effecte, dealt wyth him verie earnestly, notwithstanding his counsayle were bewrayed, to inuade hir enimies, and his Lordshippe shoulde be sure to finde the armie so forwarde in assisting hym in so famous an enterprise, as they would shew themselues more willing to bicker wyth hys foes in Scotlande, than without skirmishing to returne to Irelande. For the Earle of Ormonde was of this nature, that as hee woulde not beginne any martiall broyle rashly or vnaduisedly, so he woulde not seeme to put it vppe lightly or easily.

The Earle of Ormonde his propertie.

Further whereas the Earle of Lennox stood in hope, that the Lorde of the out Iles would ayde hym, it was thought by Ormonde not to be amysse, to expect his comming, and so ioyning his company to the armie, there rested no doubt, but that the Scottishe enimies woulde bee forced to plucke in theyr hornes, although at the first bluish they seeme to put a good face to the matter.

Lennox somwhat with this perswasion ryed, gaue his consent to expect the Lorde of the oute Isle his determination, who notwithstanding all the fetche of the enterprice were discried, would not slip from his word but personally sayled to the Irish fleete, with three Gallies verie well appointed.

The Lorde of the out Iles sayleth to the Erle of Lennox.

The noble man was with such martiall triumphes receyued, as warlike souldiours coulde on the sea afford him. But of al others, both the Earles gaue him heartie interteynment for his true and honourable dealing, that to bee as good as his worde, woulde not seeme to shrinke from his friend in this his aduersitie.

And shortly after as they craued his aduise, what were best to bee done, eyther to lande in Scotlande, or else to returne homeward, hys flatte resolution was, at that tyme to retyre, bycause theyr drift was detected, theyr feyned friendes fainted, the Castels were fortified, and the Shoares on all partes wyth swarmes of Scottes peopled. Wherefore he thought it better policie, to giue out in open rumours, that they meant not at any hande to inuade Scotlande, but to retire to their Countrey.

And after that the Scottishe Souldiours shoulde be dismyst, which woulde bee incontinent vpon theyr returne, by reason of the excessiue charges, then myght the Earle of Lennox with lesse preparation, and more secrecye gyue a freshe onsette, that the enimyes shoulde sooner feele his force, than heare of his arriuall.

Ormonde and Lennox land.

Ormonde and Lennox landed with the greater parte of the armie and appoynted the Shippes to bende theyr course to Dublyn.

The Lorde of the out Iles, and his three Gallyes sayled with the Fleete, for he was not able by reason of the feeblenesse of his bodie to trauaile by lande, or scantly further to prolong his life, whiche hee ended at Howth presently vppon hys arriuall, and was with greate solemnitie buryed in Saint Patricke his Church at Dublyn, vppon whose death this Epitaph was framed:

The Lorde of the out Iles dyeth.

Vig manus, mea patriæ dum redditur exsul,
Exsul in externa cogor & ipse mori.

His Epitaph

Both the Earles marched wyth the armye on foote to Carregfergus, where they brake company. For Lennox and sir John Trauerse taking as hee thought the shorter, but not the safer way, trauayled through the Ardes, with the number of fiue hundred Souldiours, where the Irishe inhabitantes skyrmished with them, and put them to suche straite plunges (for they woulde gladly haue seene what a clocke it was in theyr Budgets) as they wished they had not parted from the rest of the armye.

The Irish skirmish with the Erle of Lennox.

The Earle of Ormonde with his Souldiours (which were a thousande fiue hundred, as before is expressed) marched on foot to Belefast, which is an arme of the sea, a quarter of a mile broade, or little lesse, and albeit their weather were bitter and ouer nipping, and no small parcell of the water were congealed with frost, yet the Earle and his armie waded ouer on foote, to the great daunger as well of his person, as of the whole companie, whiche doubtlesse was a valiaunt enterprise of so honourable a personage.

The Earle of Ormonde his toylsome trauaile.

From thence hee passed to Strangforde, and through Lecale to Dondalke, where he discharged his Souldiours, and hauing presented himselfe to the Gouernour at Dublyn, he roade homeward to the Countie of Kilkenny.

Shortly

Shortly after, sir Anthonie Sentleger lorde Deputie, and the Earle of Ormonde fell at debate, insomuch as eyther of them layde articles of treason one to the others charge.

The chiefe occasion of their mutuall grudge, proceeded of certaine newe and extraordinarie impositions, wherewith the Deputie woulde haue charged the Subiectes. Whereat the Erle of Ormonde as a zealous defender of his countrey, beganne to kicke, and in no sort coulde bee wonne to agree to any such vnreasonable demaunde.

Herevpon Ormonde perceyuing, that the Gouernour persisted in his purpose, addressed Letters of complaynte to suche as were of the priuie Counsayle in Englande, whiche letters were by one of Sir Anthonie his friendes intercepted at Sea, and presented to him to bee perused.

Sir Anthonie hauing ouerread the writings, sent Maister Basnet in post haste with the packet to Kylkenny, where the Earle of Ormonde kept his Christmasse, requesting hys Lordshippe to take in good parte the opening of hys Letters, which was done rather to learne the effect of his complaynte, than in any sort to inbar his writings from comming to the counsaile his handes.

The Earle answered that his quarell was so good, his dealing so ope, as he little weighed, who toke a view of his letters. And for hys part, what he wrote hee ment not to vnwrite, but in such sort as they came from the Gouernour, they should be sent to the Counsaile, and if theyr honours woulde allow any Subiect to bee so hardie, as to entercepte and open Letters that were to them indorsed, hee coulde not but dygest any such iniurie, that they woulde seeme to beare.

With this aunswere Basnet returned, and the Earle performed his promise. Whereupon the Gouernour and he were commaunded, to appeare before the priuie Counsaile in Englande, where they were sundrie times examined, and their accusations ripely debated. In fine, the Counsaile equallye to bothe partes in theyr complaints affected, and weighing withall rather the due desert of both their loyall seruices, than the vaine presumption of their mutuall accusations, wrapped vp theyr quarelles, and made them both friendes, with such indifferencie, as neyther part should bee eyther with anye conquest exalted, or with anye foyle debased.

And for so muche as sir John Alen knight, then Lorde Chauncellour of Irelande, was founde to limpe in this controuersie, by playing as it was supposed, more craftily than wisely, with both the handes, in that hee seemed to bee rather a fosterer of theyr malice, than an appeaser of theyr quarelles, hee was likewise sent for into Englande, and being tript by the Counsaile in his tale, was committed to the Fleete, wherein he remayned a long tyme.

In this trouble the Earle of Ormond was greatly ayded by sir William Wise Knight, a worshipfull Gentleman, borne in the Citie of Waterforde, who deserning in deede the prayse of that vertue, whereof he bare the name, grewe to bee of great credite in the Court, and stoode highly in king Henrie his grace, whiche hee wholy vsed to the furtherance of his friends, and neuer abused to the annoyance of his foes. Sir VVilliam VVise knight.

This Gentleman was verye well spoken, mylde of nature, wyth discretion stoute, as one that in an vpright quarel would beare no coles, seldome in an intricate matter graueled, being found at all assayes to be of a pleasant and present wit.

Hauing lente to the King his Signet to seale a Letter, who hauing powdred Ermines engrayled in the Seale, why howe now Wise quoth the King, what? hast thou Lise here? And if it like your Maiestie, quoth sir Willia, a louse is a riche Coate, for by giuing the Louse, I part Armes with the French King, in that he gyueth the Floure de Lice. Whereat the king heartily laughed, to heare how pretily so byting a taunt (namely proceeding from a Prince) was sodaynly turned to so pleasaunte a conceyte.

Anon after the agreement made betweene Ormonde and Sentleger, the Earle his Seruants (which hee kept at that time in his lyuerey to the number of fiftie) besought his Lordship to take at the Lymehouse his part of a supper, which they prouided for him. The noble man wyth honour accepting their dutifull offer, supped at theyr request, but not to their contentation at the place appoynted. For whether it were that one caytife or other did poyson the meate, or that some other false measures were vsed (the certaintie wyth the reuenge whereof to God is to bee referred) the noble man wyth thirtie and fiue of his seruaunts presently that night sickned, one James White, the Earle his Stewarde, with sixtene of his fellowes died, the remnant of the seruauntes recouered, but theyr Lorde, whose health was chiefly to bee wished, in the floure of his age deceassed of that sickenesse, at Elie house in Holborne, muche aboute the .xxviij. of October, and was buried in Saint Thomas of Acres his Churche, whose death bred sorrow to his friendes, little comfort to his aduersaries, great losse to his Countrey, and no small griefe to all good men. The Earle of Ormonde deceaseth. 1546

His description. This Earle was a goodly and personable noble man, full of honour, which was not onely lodged inwardly in his mynde, but also hee bare it outwardly in countenaunce. As franke and as liberall as his calling required. A deepe and a farre reaching head. In a good quarell rather stout than stubborne, bearing himselfe with no lesse courage, when he resisted, than with honourable discretion, where he yeelded. A fauourer of peace, no furtherer of warre, as one that preferred vnlawfull quietnesse before vpright troubles, beeing notwithstanding of as greate wisedome in the one, as of valour in the other. In earnest and a zealous vpholder of his countrey, in all attempts rather respecting the publique weale, than his priuate gaine. Whereby he bounde his Countrey so greatlye vnto him, that Irelande might with good cause wish, that eyther he had neuer beene borne, or else that hee had neuer deceassed, so it were lawfull to craue him to bee immortall, that by course of nature was framed mortall. And to giue sufficient proufe of the entyre affection he bare his Countrey, and of the zealous care he did cast thereon, he betoke in his death bed his soule to God, his carkasse to Christian buriall, and his heart to his Countrey, declaring thereby, that where his minde was setled in his life, his heart should be there entombed after his death. Which was according to his will accomplished. For his heart was conueyed to Irelande, and lyeth engraued in the Quire of the Cathedrall Church in Kilkennie, where his auncestors for the more part are buried. Vpon which kinde legacie this Epitaph was deuised.

His Epitaph.

Cor patriæ fixum viuens, iam redditur illi,
Post mortem, patriæ quæ peracerba venit.
Non sine corde valet mortalis viuere quisq̃,
Vix tua gens vita permanet absq; tua.
Quæ licet infœlix extincto corde fruatur,
Attamen optato viuere corde nequit.
Ergo quid hæc faciat? quem re non posit amorem
Cordi vt tam charo reddere corde velit.

The effect of which Epitaph is thus Englished.

The liuing heart where lay engraue
the care of Countrey deere,
To Countrey liuelesse is restorde and lies engrauen heere.
None heartlesse liues: his countrey then alas what ioy is left, whose hope, whose hap, whose hart he was,
till death his life bereft.
And though the soyle here shrowdes the heart,
which most it wisht to enioy,
Yet of the change from nobler seate,
the cause doth it annoy.
What honour then is due to him,
for him what worthie rite?
But that eche heart with heartiest loue, his worthiest heart may quite.

This Earle was of so noble a disposition, as he would soner countenaunce and support his poore well willer in his aduersitie, than hee would make or fawne vpon his welthie friend in prosperitie.

The kindnesse of Iames Earle of Ormonde to his friendes.

Hauing bid at London, not long before his death, the Ladie Gray Countesse of Kildare to dinner, it happened that a souldiour, surnamed Power, who lately returned freshe from the Emperour his warres, came to take his repast with the Earle before the messenger. When the Erle and the Countesse were set, this roysting rutterkin, wholy then standing on the Soldado boigh, placed himselfe right ouer against the Countesse of Kildare, hard at the Earle of Ormonde his elbow, as though hee were haile fellow, well met. The noble man appalled at the impudent saucinesse of the malapert souldiour, (who notwithstanding might be borne withal, because an vnbidden guest knoweth not where to sit) besought him courteously to giue place. The Earle when the other rose, taking vpon him the office of a Gentleman Vsher, placed in Power his seate, his cousin Edwarde Fitz Giralde, now Lieutenant of hir Maiesties Pencioners, who at that time being a yong stripling, attended vpon his mother the Countesse, and so in order he set euery Gentleman in his degree, to the number of fifteene or sixteene, and last of all the companie, he licenced Power, if he would, to sit at the lower ende of the Table, where hee had scantly elbow rowme.

Edward Fitz Girald.

The Countesse of Kildare perceyuing the noble man greatly to stomacke the Souldiour his presumptuous boldnesse, nipt him at the elbow, and whispering softly, besought his Lordship not to take the matter so hote, because the Gentleman (the ment Power) knewe, that the house of Kildare was of late attainted, and that hir children were not in this their calamitie in such wise to be regarded.

No Ladie, quoth the Earle, with a lowde voyce, and the teares trilling downe his cheeres, say not so, I trust to see the day, when my yong cousin Edwarde, and the remnant of your children (as little reckning as hee maketh of them) shall disdain the cõpanie of any such skipJack. Which prophecie fell out as truly as he foretold it, only sauing that it stoode with God his pleasure, to call him to his mercie before he could see that day, after which doubtlesse he longed and looked, I meane the restitution of the house of Kildare.

After this noble Earle his vntimely decease, Sir Anthonie Sentleger was returned into Irelande Lorde Deputie, who was a wise and a wary Gentleman, a valiant seruitour in warre, and a good Justicer in peace, properly learned, a good good maker in the Englishe, hauing grauitie so enterlaced with pleasauntnesse, as with an exceeding good grace he would attaine the one without pouting dumpishnesse, and exercise the other without loathfull lightnesse.

There fell in his time a fat benefice of which he as Lord deputie had the presentation. When diuerse made sute to him for the benefice, and offred with dishonestie to buy that which with safetie of conscience he could not sell, hee answered merily, that he was resolued not to commit Simonie: yet notwithstanding he had a nagge in his Stable that was worth fortie shillings, and he that would giue him fortie pounds for the nagge, should bee preferred to the benefice. Which he rather of pleasure uttered, than of any unconscionable meaning purposed to haue done.

His gouernment had beene of the Countrey very well lyked, were it not, that in his time he began to assesse the Pale with certaine new impositions, not so profitable (as it was thought) to the Gouernours, as it was noysome to the subiectes. The debating of which I purpose to referre to them, who are discoursers of publique estates, and the reformers of the comon wealth, praying to God, that hee with his grace direct them so faythfully to accomplish the duties of good Magistrates, that they gouerne that powre battred Iland, to his diuine honour, to his maiesties contentation, to the suppressing of Rebels, to the vpholding of subiectes, and rather to the publique weale of the whole countrey, than to the priuate gaine of a few persons.

Thus farre (gentle reader) as mine instructions directed me, and my leysure serued mee, haue I continued a parcell of the Irish hystorie, and haue stretched it to the raigne of Edwarde the sixth. Whereupon I am forced to craue at thyne handes pardon and tollerance: pardon for any errour I shal be found to haue committed, which vpon friendly admonition I am ready to reforme: tollerance, for that part of the hystorie which is not continued, till time I be furnished and fraught with matter, as that I may employ my trauaile to serue thy contentation. And albeit I might with some enquirie, rumble vp these latter yeares, and so make the booke to beare a shewe of a complete Hystorie, yet notwithstanding, I am so precisely set vpon so tickle a taske, and so fickle a grounde, that rather concern.th the liuing, than apperteyneth to the deade, as I woulde be lothe to be taken in anye part therof, not onely to stumble, but also once to trippe. For as the Philosopher reproued the astronomer, which was so busie in gazing on the skie, as that he tumbled headlong in a pitte that was digged at his feete, supposing that hee which was ignorant of so neare a marke, was not like to prognosticate future euentes by Planets and Starres that were so farre distant of: so if a Chronicler shoulde misreport exployctes that were enterprised but hestern day, the reader might probably surmise, that hee which is rawe in these latter yeares, were like to bee verie vnripe in rehearsing matters that happened many yeares past. These and the like reasons, reclaymed mee from perfecting at this present the Irish Hystorie, requesting thee, gentle Reader, friendly to accepte, what is alreadie written, which I craue, as one that wisheth thee rather pleasure in the reading, than regardeth hys owne payne in the penning of the sayde Treatise.
